PREFACE.

This compilation represents the first systematic attempt to present in complete and available form the vast quantity of judicial interpretation and construction of the meaning of words and phrases found in the reported decisions of the American appellate courts. It has been over ten years in preparation, and has involved enormous editorial labor and research. The effort has been made to secure all the words judicially defined and all the definitions of each word. In collecting the material recourse has been had in all cases to the opinions of the courts as the original sources, and the work is the result of a page-to-page examination of the reported American cases. A careful search for definitions for words and phrases has also been made in all the latest codes and revisions of statutes, state and federal.

Its scope and purpose can perhaps be best shown by explaining at the outset what it is not.

It is not a dictionary, in the ordinary sense, and it does not undertake to give the general or accepted meaning of all words and phrases; nor does it concern itself directly with their orthography, derivation, or pronunciation. It is not even intended to be a complete compendium of legal terminology. It does not, therefore, take the place of a law dictionary or a general lexicon. It includes legal or nonlegal terms only so far as they have been the subject of interpretation or definition in the decisions of the American courts or in the acts of the American legislatures.

It is not a digest, and it does not undertake to present the legal principles which have been enunciated and applied by the courts in their decisions. The interpretation and definition of particular words and phrases is a function quite apart from the presentation and discussion of the points of law and doctrine set forth in the decided cases. To find and state the latter is the prerogative of the digester, the text-writer, and the commentator. Sometimes, it is true, the judicial definition of words is intimately connected with the discussion of questions of law, and there are many instances in these pages where the two will be found in inseparable combination. But it has been the aim of the compilers to include legal questions only where they were incidental to definitions. When the question was "What constitutes" some legal term (as "contributory negligence," "burglary," "cruelty as a ground for divorce," etc.), the rule has been to omit it as belonging in the digest or text-book. So far as such matter has come into this compilation, it has been because of the difficulty of "drawing the line" closely, and from a desire to give all the matter that might reasonably be looked for in such a work as this.

"WORDS AND PHRASES," therefore, seeks to fill a field of its own, and to render a service to the legal profession which is fully performed by no other existing publication. This service is the setting out in available form of all the judicial and statutory definitions which are to be found in American reports and statutes, whether the words and phrases defined are legal and technical or non-legal and general. Some of these definitions have been given in digests, some of them have been given in text-books, many of them have been collected and presented in more or less abridged form in the various "encyclopedias of law," but nowhere before have they been brought together with any attempt at exhaustiveness, nor given in such form as to make them practically available for direct use as authorities. The fact that some 132,000 separate definitions and constructions are here included shows at once how vast is the field and how incompletely it has been covered heretofore. It also shows how constant and universal must be the need in the legal profession of the information which is here given.

The judicial interpretation and definition of language has all the peculiar weight of authority which attaches to the judicial function, at least equally with the determination of technical legal issues. The question is not as to the meanings of a word in general, but as to its exact significance in some particular context or in connection with some particular statement of facts. In a doubtful case the previous construction of the disputed word by an appellate court will be of determining value as against the more generalized definitions of the lexicographer. These questions are determined by usage, common consent, agreement; and the searching examination of a court will most conclusively establish such usage as to any word used in any particular connection.

For obvious reasons no attempt has been made to limit the words defined to the technical terms of the law. Legal maxims have been excluded, except those that are so short as to resemble phrases, and where the courts have actually construed, and not merely translated, them. A comparatively small number of English cases have been included, but there has been no effort to bring these in exhaustively.

The plan has been to follow the language of the court, so that the definitions in the book will be authoritative, and to set out enough of the context or statement of facts in connection with which the word was used to enable the reader to see how far the definition is applicable to his own case. The reasoning of the court has also been incorporated so far as practicable. The idea has thus been to give the definitions themselves, carefully differentiating them where there are a number covering the same word, and not reducing them to any inferential statements of the "results" of the interpretation. Where the same definition is given ipsisimis verbis in several different cases, however, the cases are cumulated. Statutory definitions are as a rule given in full.

The arrangement of this material is of course alphabetical, and is made as simple as possible, with the one purpose of rendering all the matter easily accessible. An abundance of cross-references has therefore been provided to bring the words into connection with their synonyms and derivatives as well as analogous terms. Where there is no distinction in meaning between a verb and its derivative noun, these are treated together under a single head, as "Abandon—Abandonment"; but if the noun has also a distinctive meaning as a noun, this meaning is treated under the noun in addition to its treatment under the verb; thus, "Accept." "Acceptance." The same rule is followed in regard to adjectives and adverbs. Wherever any large number of paragraphs are given under a single general heading, subclassification is given with appropriate sub-headings.

In the arrangement of the black-letter lines under the several words different methods have been followed, according to the varying requirements of the material. Sometimes words have a number of quite different meanings, regardless of the connection in which they are used. In such cases the paragraphs are arranged alphabetically according to these different meanings. Thus:

"ACCUE.

As arise or become enforceable.
As become absolute or vested.
As become due and payable.
As exist."

Sometimes the meaning of the word varies according to the connection in which it is used, in which case paragraphs are arranged alphabetically according to these several uses. Thus:

"ABATE—ABATEMENT.

Of action.
Of freehold.
Of legacy.
Of nuisance."

When it has been necessary to follow both these methods under one word, the general definitions are placed first. Thus:

"ADVANCE—ADVANCES.

Advancement distinguished.
Change of title involved.
Loan equivalent.
As pecuniary advances.
By factor.
By owner.
In marine insurance.
On crops."

Some technical terms have developed a large number of meanings, and each meaning contains a number of separate elements, some definitions emphasizing one element and others other elements. These definitions have been arranged alphabetically, according to the elements so emphasized, which are indicated in black-letter lines. Thus:

"ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Actual occupation.
Color of title.
Continuousness.
Disseisin.
Hostile character."

The greatest difficulty has been experienced in dealing with phrases. In the construction of a statute or contract or other document the court often puts a phrase in quotations, and, while apparently dealing with the entire phrase, is really defining some particular word in it. These definitions have been placed with the other definitions of that particular word; and, where it has been difficult to determine which of two or more words in a phrase has been defined, the paragraph has been duplicated under each. Purely technical phrases have, however, been put under the phrase as a whole, that being the alphabetical place to which the reader would naturally turn; but in such cases cross-references have been introduced under the leading words of the phrase. Again, phrases have generally been made secondary heads, that is, printed in smaller type under the leading words as principal heads; but where they are uncommon, and have not become recognized as established phrases, they are placed under black-letter lines under the most important word.

No attention has been paid to different spellings of words, except that the word is placed under the spelling approved by the best modern usage. Other accepted spellings are often referred to by cross-references.

Citations are given to the Reporters, the State Reports, American Decisions, the American Reports, American State Reports, and the Lawyers' Reports Annotated. An investigator who wishes to go back to the full report is therefore placed in position to find the case in whichever of these series is most accessible to him. In the first report cited reference is made to the page on which the definition is found besides the usual citation to the page on which the case begins.

JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

The character "&" means the same as the word "and," and may be used synonymously with "and" as an abbreviation of such word. Brown v. State, 16 Tex. App. 245, 248; Stewart v. State, 34 South. 818, 821, 137 Ala. 33; Commonwealth v. Clark, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 596, 597.

The sign "&" is held and used to mean "and" by thousands who do not recognize it as the Middle Ages manuscript contraction for the Latin "et." Lorah v. Nissley, 156 Pa. 329, 331, 27 Atl. 242.

The sign "&" as used in an indictment instead of the word "and" does not render the indictment defective. Pickens v. State, 58 Ala. 364.

An indictment is not defective in using the sign "&" instead of the word "and." In his appendix to his unabridged dictionary, under the title "Miscellaneous," Mr. Webster makes the sign or abbreviation "&" mean the same as the word "and," and Mr. Richardson in his dictionary gives many illustrations from the old English authors under the word "and" showing that the sign "&" was used synonymously with "and" as an abbreviation for the word "and." This sign of abbreviation has come down to us, sanctioned by age and common use for perhaps centuries, and is used even at this day in written instruments, in daily transactions, with such frequency that it may be said to be a part of our language when it is written. It is better that, in writing indictments, all words be written in full, but we see no sufficient reason for holding the indictment vicious because of this matter. Molton v. State, 16 S. W. 423, 29 Tex. App. 527.

The character "&c." has received in use the same signification as was accorded the phrase "et cetera." That has been considered by lexicographers as its equivalent, and for that reason it has been stated by Worcester that these words, and also the contraction, "etc.," or "&c.," denote "and others of the like kind; and the rest; so forth; and so on." Lathers v. Keogh (N. Y.) 39 Hun, 576, 579.

"&c." implies some other necessary matter. Coke. As used in the resolutions of the directors of a certain railroad company authorizing a mortgage of the road, and its property, "&c.," it would apply to the franchises of the road. Bardstown & L. R. Co. v. Metcalfe, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 199, 211, 81 Am. Dec. 541.

In an entry on "The Old Purchase Blotter" of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania that "Ingersoll, &c., paid purchase money," on certain warrants for land, the sign "&c.," without explanation, means nothing, and may be disregarded. Smith v. Walker, 98 Pa. 133, 140.

In decree.

The character "&c." as used in a decree, reciting that the case was heard on the bill, demurrer, answer, exhibit, "&c.," refers to the replication, as everything else in the record is specifically referred to in that connection. Coles v. Hurt, 75 Va. 380, 384.

In pleading.

"&c.," as used in a petition in an action for damages to furniture, "&c.," cannot be construed as a designation of coffee, sugar, and apples. Whitmore v. Bowman, 4 G. Greene, 148, 149.

As used in a plea of the general issue, "and of this he puts himself upon the country, &c.," according to Lord Mansfield, means every necessary matter which ought to be expressed, which is its utmost office. Dickerson v. Stoll, 24 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 550, 553; Everitt v. De Groff (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 213, 214. And it will not be taken to mean "and the plaintiff or defendant doth likewise." Dickerson v. Stoll, 24 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 550, 553.

In recognizance.

A recognizance conditioned for defendant's "appearance, &c., at my office at a certain day," construed to mean the usual phrase, "and not depart without leave." Commonwealth v. Ross (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 427, 428.

In will.

In a will by which the testatrix authorized a certain person to withdraw the contents of her bank book to be disposed of, part for her burial and funeral expenses and the residue for charitable purposes, masses, "&c.," "&c." is equivalent to "etc.," or "et cetera," and imports other purposes of a like character to those which have been named, and does not import that the trustee may apply the property to other purposes not charitable at his discretion, but he must apply it to charitable purposes. In re Schouler, 134 Mass. 426, 427.

& CO.

"& Co." is apt to mean nothing. The addition of "& Co." to a person's name raises no presumption of the existence of a partnership, in the absence of a statute prohibiting any individual from doing business under the name and style of a firm. Schroeder v. Turner, 13 Atl. 331, 332, 68 Md. 506.

"& Co.," in a state where there is no statute prohibiting the use of a name or an abbreviation to do business under other than that of the individual, does not create a necessary presumption, when used after a dealer's name, that he has a partner, or that such title includes more than one person. Brennan v. Pardridge, 35 N. W. 85, 87, 67 Mich. 449.

@, as used in a note reciting "Int. @ 6 % p. a.," "is known and recognized among commercial people and business men as standing for the word 'at.'" Belford v. Beatty, 34 N. E. 254, 255, 145 Ill. 414.

A.

The adjective "a" is commonly called the indefinite article, and so called because it does not define any particular person or thing. According to Webster the adjective means "one" or "any," but less "emphatically than either." He also says it is placed before nouns of the singular number denoting an individual object or quality individualized; and quality is defined as "(1) the condition of being of such a sort as distinguished from others; (2) special or temporary character; profession, occupation." State v. Martin, 30 S. W. 421, 422, 423, 60 Ark. 343, 28 L. R. A. 153.

As any.

The article "a" is not necessarily a singular term. It is often used in the sense of any, and when so used may be applied to more than one individual object. Thus in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, authorizing an extension of time for creditors to become parties as the trustees should allow by "a" writing, does not limit them to one writing or extension, but means any writing. National Union Bank v. Copeland, 4 N. E. 794, 795, 141 Mass. 257, 267.

Where a person contracted to lease for a certain purpose "a room that is improved and suitable," he does not bind himself to furnish a particular room, but fulfills his contract if he provides additional room, improved and suitable. Thompson v. Stewart, 14 N. W. 247, 248, 60 Iowa, 225.

In Agricultural Holdings (England) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61, § 52), declaring that "no person shall act as bailiff to levy any distress or other holding to which the act applies unless authorized to act as a bailiff by a judge of 'a' county court," the word "a," as used in the phrase "a county court," was not intended to specify a particular, but should be construed as meaning any, county court. In re Sanders, 54 Law J. Q. B. 331, 333.

The term "a judge," in Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 22, providing that "a judge" may cause any house or building to be searched for the protection of gambling tables, etc., is equivalent to "any judge," and comprehends an entire class, and cannot, without distorting its meaning, be restricted in its applications to judges of county, city, and police courts; and therefore the judge of the Louisville law and equity court has authority to issue a warrant for such a search.

Commonwealth v. Wetzel, 2 S. W. 123, 125, 84 Ky. 537.

Within the section of the constitution providing that when a person dies intestate his estate shall be divided among his children and widow, "a person" is a general term; it means "any person." It therefore equally includes persons who are sole tenants and persons who are tenants in connection with others, as tenants in common, tenants in coparceny, and joint tenants. Lowe v. Brooks, 24 Ga. 325, 327.

As my.

In a conveyance the description of the property as "a house and lot of land situated on Amity St., Lynn, Mass.," contained in a contract to convey, construed to relate to an estate owned by the party contracting to convey; and though there were several lots of land, with houses, on Amity street, the description might be applied to a particular house and lot so situated and so owned. If the party who enters into the agreement in fact owned a parcel answering the description, and only one such, that must be regarded as the one to which the description refers. With the aid of this presumption, the words "a house and lot" on a street, where a party who uses the language only owns one estate, are as definite and precise as the words "my house and lot" would be—a description the sufficiency of which has been placed beyond all doubt by very numerous authorities. Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545, 547, 96 Am. Dec. 671; Scanlan v. Geddes, 112 Mass. 15, 17; Kitchen v. Herring, 42 N. C. 190, 191; Lente v. Clarke, 1 South. 149, 152, 22 Fla. 515.

A contract for the sale of land in which the vendor agreed to sell "a tract" of nine acres and 66 poles near the junction does not specify any tract of land, the words "a tract" not being equivalent to "my tract," and is therefore indefinite, since the description might apply with equal exactness to any one of an indefinite number of tracts. Dobson v. Litton, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 616, 619.

As one.

If used in an instruction that though plaintiff was negligent he was not precluded from a recovery, unless his negligence was "a" proximate cause of the injury, the "a" would have meant one, or one of the class, or one of the two contributing causes, and hence should have been used in place of the definite article "the." Wastl v. Montana Union Ry. Co., 61 Pac. 9, 15, 24 Mont. 159.

A covenant not "to erect any building" except "a" private dwelling house will be construed not merely to limit the class of building accepted, but to authorize only one of that class. Smith v. Standing, 32 Sol. J. 734.

Under a deed of settlement of a joint-stock company providing that it might incur a debt not exceeding a certain sum, and might issue "a" note therefor, the company, having contracted a debt to that amount, was not precluded from giving security for it by several notes instead of a single note. Thompson v. Wesleyan Newspaper Ass'n, 8 C. B. 849, 861.

The phrase, "a chain cable of any size," in the specification for a patent which recites that it will raise "a chain cable of any size," is to be construed as meaning that the windlass will raise one cable of any size only. "A" applies to one only, and at all events the phrase is capable of that meaning. "I see nothing in the word that necessarily indicates the contrivance to be for fitting more than one cable." Hastings v. Brown, 1 El. & Bl. 450, 454.

Const. art. 7, § 13, provides that the state shall be divided into circuits, for each of which a judge shall be elected. It was held that such section did not prevent the legislature from providing for an additional judge for a circuit. State v. Martin, 30 S. W. 421, 423, 60 Ark. 343, 28 L. R. A. 153.

As the.

A verdict finding defendant guilty of writing and publishing "a bill" of scandal is insufficient to sustain a judgment, as the finding of him guilty of publishing "a bill" did not amount to a finding of publishing "the bill" charged in the indictment. Sharff v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 2 Bin. 514, 519.

In a statute containing a clause, "with a view to giving such creditor a preference over other creditors," "a" should be read as equivalent to "the." Ex parte Hill, 23 Ch. Div. 695, 701.

A SEA.

The term "a sea," as used in a policy of marine insurance insuring live cattle from dangers caused by "a sea," is susceptible of two meanings—one general, and the other restrictive and particular. A sea may mean a general disturbance of the surface of the water occasioned by storm, and breaking it up into the roll and lift of the waves, following or menacing each other. When a captain reports that on a particular day he encountered a heavy sea he uses a natural and appropriate expression, which we are not liable to misunderstand. If he says that a gale came from a particular direction, and raised a sea, which delayed his progress, he properly describes the general disturbance of the water. On the other hand, if he reports that in a gale a sea carried away his boats, and another swept a seaman overboard, we understand him in each instance to refer to some particular wave or surge.

separate from its fellows, which worked its own peculiar and special destruction. It is scarcely reasonable to believe that the words, "by a sea," as used in a policy, meant the blow of one or more particular waves upon the vessel, when loss was almost impossible thereby, where the cattle were carried between-decks and killed by the tossing of the ship. It is evident that it was not intended to limit the loss to one caused by the tossing of a ship by one single wave. Snowden v. Guion, 5 N. E. 322, 323, 101 N. Y. 458 (reversing 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. [18 Jones & S.] 137, 143).

Words describing a ship as being "A 1" amount to a warranty. Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416, 423.

A. D.

The capitals "A. D.," as part of a date, have been adjudged to be English language by use, though in fact being the initials of two Latin words. State v. Hodgeden, 3 Vt. 481, 485; Clark v. Stoughton, 18 Vt. 50, 51, 44 Am. Dec. 361.

"A. D." means the year of our Lord, and a complaint containing dates in numeral characters and the abbreviation "A. D." is sufficient in so far as the dates are concerned. State v. Reed, 35 Me. 489, 490, 58 Am. Dec. 727.

In a complaint for a criminal charge, the year of the alleged offense may be stated by means of the letters "A. D.," followed by words expressing the year, the letters "A. D." as so used having acquired an established use in the English language. Commonwealth v. Clark, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 596.

The fact that a date in a complaint, "this 14th day of Jan., A. D. 1864," is written in Arabic figures, with the initials "A. D." for the year, does not render it defective, although it would be better for criminal pleaders to adhere to the ancient practice in framing complaints exclusively in the English language. Commonwealth v. Hagarman, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 401, 402.

The word "year" and the abbreviation "A. D.," when used in statutes, are equivalent to the expression, "year of our Lord." Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 11; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 11.

A DATU.

A lease providing that it shall commence "a datu" includes the day of the date of a lease. Haths v. Ash, 2 Salk. 413; Hatter v. Ash, 1 Ld. Raym. 84.

A DIE DATUS.

"From the day of the date," used in leases to determine the time or running of the estate, and when so used the time includes the day of the date. Doe v. Watton, 1 Cowp. 189, 191.

A lease providing that it should commence "a die datus" excludes the day of its date. Haths v. Ash, 2 Salk. 413.

ABANDON—ABANDONMENT.

"To abandon is totally to withdraw ourselves from an object; to lay aside all care for it; to leave it altogether to itself." Pidge v. Pidge, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 257, 265 (quoting Crabb on Synonyms).

The word "abandon" means a giving up; a total desertion; an absolute relinquishment. Sikes v. State (Tex.) 28 S. W. 688, 689.

An "abandonment" is the relinquishment of a right. There can be no such thing as the abandonment of land in favor of a particular individual for a consideration. Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 363, 366.

Abandonment is the giving up or relinquishing without consideration or without regard to any particular person. "To constitute an abandonment of a right secured there must be a clear, unequivocal, and decisive act of the party"—an act done that shows a determination not to have the benefit which is designated for him. Breedlove v. Stump, 11 Tenn. (3 Yerg.) 257, 276.

Abandonment is simply the evidentiary fact which proves the ultimate fact of the relinquishment of one's rights; in other words, the relinquishment of one's rights is the effect and result of one's abandonment of those rights; and hence the fact that a father had relinquished his right to the custody of his child may be shown by proving that he had abandoned it. Nugent v. Powell, 33 Pac. 23, 30, 4 Wyo. 173, 20 L. R. A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17.

Abandonment is the relinquishment of a right—the giving up of something to which one is entitled. Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 417, 424; Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 39 Pac. 1054, 1058, 15 Mont. 558. Abandonment must be by the owner without being pressed by any duty, necessity, or utility to himself, but simply because he desires no longer to possess the thing. Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 39 Pac. 1054, 1058, 59 Mont. 558.

Abandonment can only take place where the occupant leaves the premises free to the occupation of the next comer, whoever he may be, without any intention to repossess or reclaim for himself, and regardless and indifferent as to what may become of them in the future. There can be no "abandonment" except where the right entirely abates and ceases to exist. Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339, 345; Derry v. Ross, 5 Colo. 295, 300.

Abandonment is a question of intention. to be decided as a matter of fact, as to whether or not all of the circumstances indicate an intent to abjure all further claim of right and title to the property; but it contains no element of estoppel in pais, and evidence sufficient to establish estoppel in pais is not evidence of an abandonment. Marquart v. Bradford, 43 Cal. 526, 529.

Intention.

Abandonment is a question of intent. Intent is ordinarily proved by acts. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Greenhood, 41 Pac. 250, 266, 16 Mont. 395.

An "abandonment" is defined as a relinquishment or surrender of rights or property by one person to another; a giving up; a total desertion. It includes both the intention to abandon and the external act by which the intention is carried into effect. Hough v. Brown, 62 N. W. 143, 144, 104 Mich. 109; Barnett v. Dickinson, 48 Atl. 838, 840, 93 Md. 258; Cassell v. Crothers, 44 Atl. 446, 447, 193 Pa. 359; Sioux City & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Davis, 51 N. W. 907, 908, 49 Minn. 308; Landes v. Perkins, 12 Mo. 238, 256; Hickman v. Link, 22 S. W. 472, 473, 116 Mo. 123; Sideck v. Duran, 67 Tex. 256, 262, 3 S. W. 264.

Abandonment includes both the intention to abandon and the external act by which the intention was carried into effect, and, as intention is the essence of abandonment, the facts of each particular case are for the jury. Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. Taylor, 14 South. 379, 380, 102 Ala. 224; Bartley v. Phillips, 30 Atl. 842, 165 Pa. 325.

Where plaintiff in ejectment relies on prior possession as his evidence of title, and it is claimed by defendant that he abandoned the land in controversy, and it is not shown that he voluntarily left the land, or without any express intention to resume the possession, the question of abandonment is one of intention, of which the jury is to judge exclusively, under all the facts of the case. Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 291, 303, 82 Am. Rep. 738.

A finding of fact is not sufficient to support a conclusion of the law that real property has been abandoned unless it is found that the premises were left vacant without any intention of reclaiming possession, and with an intention to leave them open for the occupation of any one who might choose to enter. Smith v. Cushing, 41 Cal. 97, 99.

The "abandonment" of an irrigation water right in a ditch is a relinquishment of possession thereof without any present intention to repossess. To constitute such abandonment, there must be a concurrence of act and intent; that is, the act of leaving the premises or property vacant so that it may be appropriated by the next comer, and the intention of not returning. Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 299, 310; Bell v. Bed Rock Tunnel & Mining Co., 36 Cal. 214, 217; Moon v. Rollins, Id. 333, 337; St. John v. Kidd, 26 Cal. 263, 272; Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339, 345; Willson v. Cleaveland, 30 Cal. 192, 202; Utt v. Frey, 39 Pac. 807, 809, 106 Cal. 392; Nichols v. Lantz, 47 Pac. 70, 72, 9 Colo. App. 1; Oviatt v. Big Four Min. Co., 65 Pac. 811, 812, 39 Or. 118.

The question of abandonment of a mining claim is one of intention, and that intention is to be gathered from all the evidences and inferences from it. This is peculiarly within the province of the jury, to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case. Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min., Mill & Mfg. Co., 47 N. W. 290, 295, 1 S. D. 350; Weill v. Lucerne Min. Co., 11 Nev. 200, 212; Lockhart v. Wills, 60 Pac. 318, 320, 9 N. M. 263.

Abandonment includes both the intention to forsake or abandon and the act by which such intention is carried into effect. Property may be said to be abandoned when the owner throws it away, or when it is voluntarily left or lost, without any intent or expectation to regain it. Thus, two turbine water wheels left by their owner on a railway platform for one year, and then removed by him to a right of way, and left by him for nine years, cannot be said to have been abandoned. Sikes v. State (Tex.) 28 S. W. 688, 689.

In Vogler v. Geiss, 51 Md. 407, this court said, while a mere declaration of an intention to abandon will not alone be sufficient, the question whether the act of the party entitled to the easement amounts to an abandonment or not depends upon the intention with which it was done. Barnett v. Dickinson, 48 Atl. 838, 840, 93 Md. 258.

Lapse of time, evidence of.

While lapse of time is not an essential element of "abandonment," it may be a strong circumstance, in connection with others, to prove the intention to abandon. And where it appears that the locator of a mining claim, about a year after the location of the claim, left the mining district and territory, and has never since returned to the claim, there was an abandonment. Harkrader v. Carroll (U. S.) 76 Fed. 474, 475.

Abandonment is the leaving of property with the intention to abandon it, and if this intention to relinquish exists for never so short a time the abandonment is complete; but abandonment does not consist solely of an intention to abandon, it being necessary that there should be a concurrent act of leaving the premises vacant, so that they may be appropriated by the next comer. The intention to abandon is not necessarily inferable from the fact that the premises have been left vacant, unimproved, and without attention for more than five years, though such fact may be taken into consideration in determining the question. Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 299, 309.

Abandonment of land is the discontinuance of possession without any intention to repossess or reclaim in any event, or without regard to what may become of the land in the future. It is a question of intention, and not of lapse of time, which latter is only significant in connection with other circumstances for the purpose of ascertaining intention. Moon v. Rollins, 36 Cal. 333, 338; Davis v. Perley, 30 Cal. 630, 636.

Nonuser.

The abandonment of an easement necessarily implies nonuser. But nonuser does not create abandonment, no matter how long it continues. There must be found in the facts and circumstances connected with the nonuser an intention on the part of the owner of the easement to give it up; an intention existing coupled with nonuser will uphold the findings of abandonment. Welsh v. Taylor, 31 N. E. 896, 898, 134 N. Y. 450, 18 L. R. A. 535.

"Abandonment is a simple nonuser of an easement, and in order to make it an effectual answer to a claim upon that ground I find it perfectly well settled that the enjoyment, nay all acts of enjoyment, must have totally ceased for the same length of time that was necessary to create an original presumption." Corning v. Gould (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 531, 535.

Abandonment of water rights is a mixed question of intent and fact, and the mere nonuser, without intent to relinquish, does not constitute abandonment. Tucker v. Jones, 19 Pac. 571, 573, 8 Mont. 225.

Abandonment is a mixed question of intention and act. Mere lapse of time is not alone sufficient to establish abandonment. And where the owners of a ditch testified that they did not intend to abandon their right, and it appeared that one of them during the nonuser purchased the interest of one of his co-owners, there was no abandonment. Gassert v. Noyes, 44 Pac. 959, 960, 18 Mont. 216.

Desert synonymous.

See "Desert."

Laches distinguished.

Abandonment requires an intent, express or implied. It requires something more than mere passivity. It differs widely from laches in this: that in granting relief on the ground of abandonment, a court assumes to base its action on the will of the party; in granting relief on the ground of laches, the action is in invitum. William Wolff & Co. v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 56 Pac. 453, 454, 123 Cal. 535.

Sale or transfer distinguished.

If the possession of the occupant be continued in another by the expression of a wish or desire of the occupant to another that he succeed to the possession, and he thereupon takes possession, a gift is the result, and not an abandonment. Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339, 344.

Abandonment must be made without any desire that any other person shall acquire the same; for, if it were made for a consideration, it would be a sale or barter, and if without a consideration, but with an intention that some other person should become the possessor, it would be a gift. Stephen v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 363, 366; Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 39 Pac. 1054, 1058, 15 Mont. 558.

Abandonment is quite a different thing from a sale, and if for any reason a transaction fails as a sale it cannot be converted into an abandonment, since there is no such thing as an abandonment to a particular person or for a consideration. Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339, 344; McLeran v. Benton, 43 Cal. 467; Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 39 Pac. 1054, 1058, 15 Mont. 558.

The term "abandonment" in reference to the abandonment of a mining claim is not shown by the mere fact of the transfer of the claim by a qualified locator to an alien. Manuel v. Wulff, 14 Sup. Ct. 651, 652, 152 U. S. 505, 38 L. Ed. 532.

Surrender distinguished.

An allegation of abandonment of leased premises implies a surrender. Burdick v. Cameron, 42 N. Y. Supp. 78, 80, 10 App. Div. 589.

Where one gives up a right or thing to another by agreement, there is a "surrender"; but "abandon" imports the idea that the thing or right given up is of no value, and that it is not given up to any particular person. Hagan v. Gaskill, 6 Atl. 879, 880, 42 N. J. Eq. 215.

Of child.

"Abandon," in its ordinary sense, means to forsake entirely; to renounce and forsake; to leave with a view never to return. And when referring to the desertion of a wife by her husband it has been defined to mean the act of the husband in voluntarily leaving his wife with an intention to forsake her entirely, never to return to her, and never to resume his marital duties towards her, or to claim his marital rights. Such neglect as either leaves the wife destitute of the common necessities of life, or would leave her destitute but for the charity of friends. As used in the statute, making a father guilty of a misdemeanor if he willfully and voluntarily abandon his child leaving it in a dependent and destitute condition, in order to constitute abandonment there must be an actual desertion, accompanied with an intention to entirely sever, so far as it is possible to do so, the parental relation and throw off all obligation growing out of the same. That when the effect of this separation is to leave the child in a dependent and destitute condition the offense, under the statute, is complete. The act of desertion, and the attempt to throw off all parental obligation, are necessary component parts of the offense. The continued refusal to provide for the support of the child after the actual desertion takes place is necessary to complete the offense, but it alone is not an offense under the statute. Gay v. State, 31 S. E. 569, 570, 105 Ga. 599, 70 Am. St. Rep. 68.

The term "abandon," as used in Rev. St. 1846, c. 153, § 31, 2 Comp. Laws 1887, § 5741, providing that if a father or mother of any child under the age of six years, or any person to whom such child shall have been confided, shall expose such child in any street, field, house, or other place with an intention to abandon it, he or she shall be punished, etc., must be used in its ordinary sense of to forsake; to leave without an intention to return to; to renounce all care or protection of the child. It refers only to the intention of the party as connected with his own act, not the act of others, and has no reference to the probability or improbability of relief to the child from another; hence such intention is wholly independent of, and does not necessarily imply, an intention to injure. Shannon v. People, 5 Mich. 71, 89.

Wag. St. p. 497, § 4, making it a misdemeanor for any one to "abandon" his child or children, means a total desertion, and a leaving with a willful intention of bringing about perpetual separation, and does not apply to a mere temporary absence, or a temporary neglect of parental duty. State v. Davis, 70 Mo. 467, 468.

"Abandonment is simply the evidential fact which proves the ultimate fact of relinquishment. In other words, the relinquishment of one's rights is the effect and result of one's abandonment of those rights. As we have seen this relinquishment may be either by a deed or other instrument in writing, or it may be by parol, or by abandonment or by turning the child out of the house." Nugent v. Powell, 33 Pac. 23, 30, 4 Wyo. 173, 20 L. R. A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17.

In an action to foreclose mechanics' liens on a building it was contended that the owner was not liable because the contractor had abandoned work on the building; and the court held that the allegation that the contractor had entirely ceased labor thereon without completion of said building was a fair definition of "abandonment." McDonald v. Hayes, 64 Pac. 850, 852, 132 Cal. 490.

In a mining lease providing that it shall be void if the enterprise shall be abandoned twelve months, the word "abandoned" should not be interpreted to mean that there could be no abandonment until after operations had once commenced, but should be construed to include a failure to commence mining operations within twelve months after the lease commences. Woodward v. Mitchell, 39 N. E. 437, 439, 140 Ind. 406.

Of condemnation proceedings.

The "abandonment" by a municipal corporation of condemnation proceedings authorized by Code, § 2111, is an abandonment in good faith of the entire proceeding and of the land for the purpose for which it was sought. In other words, it must be a complete surrender of the project so far as the land involved is concerned. Robertson v. Hartenbower, 94 N. W. 857, 858, 120 Iowa, 410.

Of corporate franchise.

The term "abandonment," as used in relation to a corporate franchise to construct and maintain a street railway, is a misnomer. A mere privilege or right may perhaps be properly said to be abandoned, although often in that case there must be something more than mere nonuser to constitute such abandonment. There must be also an act indicating an intention to abandon. But while a mere easement or right may be abandoned, the word is plainly inapplicable to a duty owing to the state. A public duty is not to be laid down at will. It has, however, been held that a total nonuser of the franchises of a corporation may exist for so long a period and under such circumstances that a surrender of its franchises by the corporation and acceptance of such surrender on the part of the state will be presumed. This doctrine, however, cannot be said to have been adopted by this court. Wright v. Milwaukee Electric Ry. & Light Co., 69 N. W. 791, 794, 95 Wis. 29, 36 L. R. A. 47, 60 Am. St. Rep. 74.

Of highway.

Rev. St. § 1294, as amended by Laws 1882, c. 253 (1 Sandborn & B. Ann. St. § 1801), provides that any highway which shall be entirely "abandoned" as a route of travel, and on which no highway tax has been expended for five years, shall be considered legally discontinued, and the land shall revert to the owners. It was held that "abandon" means that the highway is not needed for travel, and therefore disused and abandoned as a highway. A highway, a small portion of which has been fenced by an abutting owner, and which the town authorities have neglected to make passable by the removal of such fence, the rest of the highway being used by the public and needed for travel, is not "abandoned," within the meaning of the statute. Maire v. Kruse, 55 N. W. 389, 390, 85 Wis. 302, 26 L. R. A. 449.

To rent or lease a piece of property is but to assert an ownership and control of it, and is never considered as an "abandonment." Improper use of a public street by the municipal authorities is not an abandonment of it. Beebe v. City of Little Rock, 56 S. W. 791, 801, 68 Ark. 39.

Of homestead or residence.

It is of the essence of an "abandonment" which will deprive a person of his homestead right that it should be made with the intention of giving up the place as a home. Holmes v. Nichols, 67 S. W. 722, 723, 93 Mo. App. 513.

Such a removal from a home as is sufficient to establish a new home is an "abandonment" of the first homestead. Jarvais v. Moe, 38 Wis. 440, 444, 446.

The term "abandonment," used in reference to the abandonment of one's abode or place of residence, cannot be predicated by a mere temporary absence or absences for business or pleasure. Stafford v. Mills, 31 Atl. 1023, 57 N. J. Law, 570.

Where the absence of one from a house in which she had lived was always temporary in character, and with an intention to return, and generally under medical advice in furtherance of her health, and her servants were in charge of the house in her absence, and her personal effects were kept there, a finding that she had not abandoned the premises, and ceased to reside thereon, was supported by the evidence. Barnett v. Dickinson, 48 Atl. 838, 840, 93 Md. 258.

To constitute "abandonment" of a residence in a mansion house, it is not enough that the person should at times abandon himself from it or lease it out, if he intends at the time he so absents himself or makes such lease to return to such homestead, and make it his home, and that his absence shall be temporary. King v. King, 56 S. W. 534, 535, 155 Mo. 406.

Where the head of a family removes from the homestead with intent to abandon it, and leaves some of his children in possession, with the understanding that they are to follow him at a later date, the abandonment does not become complete, so as to deprive the land of the homestead protection, until the children have also removed. Welborne v. Downing, 11 S. W. 501, 502, 73 Tex. 527.

"Abandonment" of property actually a homestead cannot be accomplished by mere intention. There must be a discontinuance of the use, coupled with the intention not again to use it as a home, to constitute abandonment. The mere temporary lease of lots does not constitute an abandonment of a homestead right in the lots.—Hines v. Nelson (Tex.) 24 S. W. 541, 543.

A husband, with his wife, occupied premises in the state of Missouri as a homestead until forced to leave, about the close of the war, by the disturbed condition of the country, when they removed to Iowa, where the husband died. The wife then returned to the homestead, and resided thereon, keeping house with her brother. Held, that there was no "abandonment" of the homestead. Leake v. King, 85 Mo. 413, 416.

Where a husband and wife remove from a lot with the fixed intention to not return to it, the fact being clearly proved by their declarations or otherwise, this would constitute an "abandonment" of the homestead right. O'Brien v. Woeltz, 58 S. W. 943, 944, 94 Tex. 148, 86 Am. St. Rep. 829.

The "abandonment" of a homestead is a question of law and fact, and largely dependent on the intent of the parties. But if the owner of a homestead, while such owner, removes from the state, and acquires a domicile in another state, he forfeits such homestead estate. Colle v. Hudgins, 70 S. W. 56, 57, 109 Tenn. 217.

According to the preponderance of authority, an actual removal with no intention to return constitutes an "abandonment" of a homestead, even when a new homestead has not been acquired. Galloway v. Rowlett (Ky.) 74 S. W. 260, 261.

The mere return of a party to his native country does not operate as an "abandonment of the domicile" he has acquired in a foreign country, unless there be an intention to change his domicile; and it rests on the party relying on the abandonment to prove it, and the fact that the party died on his return with his family to his native country is not sufficient to create the presumption of abandonment. Mills v. Alexander, 21 Tex. 154, 161.

Where a man owning and occupying with his family an urban homestead, and carrying on the business of a merchant in the lower story of the same building, ceased to do business as a merchant, and removed his family to a new home in a different portion of the same town, and rented out the old home for mercantile purposes, such actions constituted an abandonment, though he used the rents to aid in supporting his family, and intended to again use it as a place to carry on his business as a merchant if he should recover from financial embarrassment. Shryock v. Latimer, 57 Tex. 674, 679.

Of husband or wife.

To constitute an abandonment as a ground for divorce, there must be a final departure with the intention not to return, without sufficient reason therefor, and without the consent of the other party. The test is the intent at the time of departure; for if the desertion be in itself complete a subsequent offer to return will not avail, as the deserted party has a legal right, of which he cannot be deprived without his concurrence. Uhlmann v. Uhlmann (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 236, 237 (quoted in Simon v. Simon, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1121, 1123, 15 Misc. Rep. 515).

"Abandonment," when used in referring to the act of one consort in leaving the other, is defined to mean the act of husband or wife who leaves his or her consort willfully, and with an intention of causing perpetual separation. It is the willful departure of the husband or wife from the society of the other and the common home, with an intention never to return or resume the marital relation. Gay v. State, 31 S. E. 569, 570, 105 Ga. 599, 70 Am. St. Rep. 68.

"Abandonment," as used in Act of March 7, 1857, providing for the relief and support of married women when deserted by their husbands, may be defined to be the act of willfully leaving the wife with the intention of causing a palpable separation between the parties, and implies an actual desertion of the wife by the husband. Stanbrough v. Stanbrough, 60 Ind. 275, 279.

Under Rev. St. 1880, § 5132, cl. 1, providing that a married woman may obtain provision for her support when the husband shall have deserted her, an allegation that a husband had "abandoned" his wife sufficiently conveyed the full idea of the act of desertion; that is, the act of willfully leaving the wife with the intention of causing a palpable separation; cessation from cohabitation. Carr v. Carr, 33 N. E. 805, 6 Ind. App. 377.

"Abandonment," as used in a statute authorizing a divorce for an "abandonment" which is continued for over a year, means "a neglect or omission of all marital duty." Smith v. Smith, 22 Kan. 699, 701.

If a man fails to supply his wife with such necessities and comforts of life as are within his reach, and by cruelty compels her to leave him and seek shelter and protection elsewhere, such conduct constitutes an abandonment of her by him, as much as if he had deserted her and gone away himself. Levering v. Levering, 16 Md. 213, 219.

"Abandonment," within a statute punishing a man for the abandonment of his wife, etc., means the actual and willful desertion by a husband of the wife. It is the willful act of actually leaving her or separating from her, and the withdrawal of all aid and protection implied in the marriage relations.

If the wife herself procures the separation or consents to it, the case does not come within the statute. It cannot be the result of an agreement or effected by the judgment of the court, but must be what is known to the criminal law as willful and voluntary desertion or abandonment. Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 694; Pape v. Pape, 20 Q. B. Div. 76; Thompson v. Thompson, 1 Swab. & T. 231. A husband cannot be convicted of abandoning his wife, and required to make provision for her support, when he is living apart from her, pursuant to a judgment of separation from bed and board, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, in an action for a limited divorce, although such judgment makes no provision for the payment of alimony, but gives leave to apply for a further judgment upon that subject. People v. Cullen, 47 N. E. 894, 896, 153 N. Y. 629, 44 L. R. A. 420 (quoted in People v. Neyer, 79 N. Y. Supp. 367).

To constitute abandonment, the cessation of cohabitation must be without the consent of the other party, and with the intention not to resume it. Where both parties consented to the original separation, and subsequently endeavor to make a reconciliation, there was no abandonment. Dignan v. Dignan, 40 N. Y. Supp. 320, 17 Misc. Rep. 268.

In Williams v. Williams, 130 N. Y. 197, 29 N. E. 98, 14 L. R. A. 220, 27 Am. St. Rep. 517, it is said that the term "abandonment," as used in the law of divorce, contemplates a voluntary separation of one party from the other without justification, and with the intention of not returning. Thus, where a wife left the home of her husband for sufficient reasons, and was willing to return providing that such conditions were done away with, she was not guilty of abandonment. Simon v. Simon, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1121, 1123, 15 Misc. Rep. 515.

"Abandonment," as used in the statute relative to divorce, has been construed by this court to mean the refusal by the spouse to recognize and contribute to the marital relation for a period of one year, although the parties lived beneath the same roof. Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 516, 20 S. W. 605. Thus, a wife may be said to voluntarily leave her husband and live in adultery where the husband is insane, and confined in an asylum, and the wife lives in adultery in the house owned by the husband. McQuinn v. McQuinn, 61 S. W. 358, 360, 110 Ky. 321.

As used in Conn. St. 1853, which provides that a married woman abandoned by her husband may transact business and sue and be sued as a feme sole, "abandoned" means an abandonment which is voluntary on the part of the husband, with an intention never to resume his marital duties toward his wife or to claim his marital rights. It is of no consequence that such abandonment has been caused by the wife's misconduct. Moore v. Stevenson, 27 Conn. 14, 25.

The adultery of a husband is not of itself sufficient to constitute an "abandonment," within the statute making one who abandons his wife or children without means of support a disorderly person. People v. Neyer, 79 N. Y. Supp. 367.

The word "abandon," in Burns' Ann. St. 1901, § 7298a, providing that any male person who, being at the time under or liable to a prosecution for seduction or bastardy, fraudulently enters into a marriage with the female who has been seduced, or who is the mother of the bastard child, with the intention of thereby avoiding such prosecution, and who, within two years after such marriage, shall abandon his wife, or cruelly or inhumanly mistreat his wife, or fail and neglect to reasonably provide for her support, shall be liable to a penalty, means a physical abandonment, and does not include a constructive abandonment. Milbourne v. State (Ind.) 68 N. E. 684.

Of insured property.

Title "Du Délaissement" in the Code de Commerce (Code Napoleon), art. 372, provides that abandonment shall extend to nothing but those effects which are the objects of the assurance and of the risk. This code removes the apparent inconsistency in the law of France under the Code of Louis XIV, established in 1681. Emerigon in his Treatise des Assurances, c. 17, § 1, remarks that abandonment presents to the mind the idea of a thing existing in whole or part, or at least the idea of a doubtful existence, for it appears absurd to renounce to the assurers a thing of which the absolute loss is already established. "Nevertheless," he says, "according to our maritime laws one may abandon to the underwriters a thing which is entirely lost, and, however singular it may appear, the law requires the form of an abandonment in the process of an action de délaissement, though it be stated that the goods have absolutely ceased to exist." Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266, 284.

An insurance policy provided that in case of abandonment the assured should assign, set over, and transfer to the insurance company all their interest in and to the said property, and every part thereof, free from all claims and charges whatsoever. Held, that the word "abandonment" was there used in its technical legal sense, and as so used was to be interpreted as not intending to change the legal effect of abandonment, but merely to prescribe the form in which the transfer should be made to the underwriters of the interest insured, which was derived by the law of subrogation from the abandonment, and to point out the mode in which the intention to be abandoned should be unequivocally expressed. An abandonment operates as a transfer to the underwriter the legal title to and right of disposal of what remains of the thing insured. The former assignment provided for in the clause under consideration may reasonably have been intended simply to facilitate the sale of the right by the insurance companies without discharging them from their legal liability to account to the party insured for his proportion of the proceeds. Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Duffield, 6 Ohio St. 200, 205, 67 Am. Dec. 339.

The abandonment cannot transfer the interest of the assured any further than such interest is covered by the policy, and when properly made an abandonment operates as the transfer of the property to the underwriter, and gives him a title to it, or what remains of it, so far as it was covered by the policy. Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Duffield, 6 Ohio St. 200, 203, 67 Am. Dec. 339; Merchants' & Manufacturers' Ins. Co. v. Duffield (Ohio) 2 Handy, 122, 127; Pattasco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 604, 623, 8 L. Ed. 243; Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Bakewell, 43 Ky. (4 B. Mon.) 541, 543.

"By the word 'abandonment' is understood a yielding, ceding, or giving up." As used in the law of insurance, it means surrender after loss of "whatever is left of the property insured to the underwriters." A clause in a policy requiring an abandonment after loss is of no effect when the entire property is destroyed and there is nothing to abandon. Camberling v. McCall (Pa.) 2 Dall. 280, 283, 1 L. Ed. 381, 1 Am. Dec. 341.

Abandonment to underwriters is not necessary when there is in fact an average or total loss. Mellish v. Andrews, 15 East, 13, 15; Mullet v. Shedden, 13 East, 304, 310; Green v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 6 Taunt. 68, 70; Idle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 8 Taunt. 755; Robertson v. Clarke, 1 Bing. 445; Cambridge v. Anderton, 2 Barn. & C. 691, 692.

Abandonment proper, as used in relation to abandonment of vessels to an insurer of a transfer of some remnants of the subject of the insurance, whether ship, cargo, or freight. Abandonment, therefore, is not necessary when the loss is actually total, nor can the abandonment be made unless the loss is constructively total. Abandonment is never obligatory upon the injured, but operates only as a voluntary transfer of title. The collection from an insurance company of the full amount at which a vessel was valued in the policy on account of injury by collision does not import an abandonment of the vessel by the owner to the insurer, where she was undervalued in the policy, and the owner refuses to abandon. The St. Johns (U. S.) 101 Fed. 469, 472.

Abandonment is the act by which, after a constructive total loss, a person insured by a contract of marine insurance, declares to the insurer that he relinquishes to him his interest in the thing insured. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1922.

Of invention or patent.

Abandonment, as applied to inventions, is the giving up of his rights by the inventor, evidenced either by conduct or by declarations on his part, such as an acquiescence in full knowledge of the use of his invention by others, or he may forfeit his rights so as to constitute an abandonment by willful or negligent postponement of his claims. Woodbury Patent Planing Machine Co. v. Keith, 101 U. S. 479, 485, 25 L. Ed. 939.

A person is sometimes said to have abandoned his invention when he gives up the idea; surrenders it in the popular sense; relinquishes the intention of perfecting his invention, so that another person may take up the same thing and become the original and first inventor. Abandonment also applies where a party having made an invention allows the public to use it with his knowledge and consent; allows it to be incorporated into other machines with his knowledge and consent, and to be used by any person without objection. American Hide & Leather Splitting & Dressing Mach. Co. v. American Tool & Mach. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 647, 652.

If an inventor, after perfecting his invention, places it upon the market in large or considerable numbers, and sells to all who desire to purchase, and continues so to do for months without applying for a patent, no other conclusion can be drawn than that he does not intend to apply for a patent; and he cannot be permitted, after having made public the knowledge and induced many persons to purchase, to conclude that the invention may be worth patenting, and that he will debar the public from using the knowledge they have acquired from him by procuring the issuance of the patent. And, where no caveat has been filed, an "abandonment" of the invention to the public is constituted. Mast, Foos & Co. v. Demster Mill Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 71 Fed. 701, 703.

The mere sale of a patent right, not made within two years before the application for the patent, does not constitute an abandonment thereof. "Where the act is accompanied by a declaration to that effect there can be no doubt; but if the sale be not an abandonment, a mere acquiescence in the use of the invention would seem not to be. Within two years, to constitute an abandonment, the intention to do so must be expressed or necessarily implied from the facts and circumstances of the case. It is a question of intention." Bartlette v. Crittenden (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 981, 982; Pitts v. Hall (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 754, 757; Bevin v. East Hamilton Bell Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 321, 326.

The word "abandon," when used in reference to the abandonment of a patent, means that the inventor dedicated it to the public use; and the failure of the inventor to assert his claims by suit or otherwise, and the omission to sell licenses to use the invention, and his neglect to make any efforts to realize any personal advantage from his patent, and similar circumstances, may be considered in connection with other evidence on the question whether the inventor had abandoned his patent. Ransom v. New York (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 286, 291.

Of land.

A person "abandons land when he leaves the same free to the occupation of the next owner, whoever he may be, without any intention to repossess it, and regardless and indifferent as to what may become of it in the future." Mitchell v. Carder, 21 W. Va. 277, 285.

"If a man be dissatisfied with his immovable estate, and abandons it, immediately he departs from it corporally with the intention that it shall no longer be his, it will become the property of him who first enters thereafter." Moreau & Carleton's Partidas, 3, tit. 4, Law 50.

Where a single man has an actual settlement, improvement, and residence on a tract of land, his residing off the land for a reasonable time, in the house of his father-in-law, until he can arrange for accommodations more suitable to his changed conditions, does not constitute an abandonment. Heath v. Biddle, 9 Pa. (9 Barr) 273, 274.

Of legal title.

Precisely what is meant by an "abandoned legal title" is hard to define. If it is the valid legal title, it is inconceivable how it can be abandoned. The disappearance and long neglect to assert the title by the owner did not operate to extinguish or toll it. Nothing but a possession adverse to him for the statutory period would have such a consequence. If there has not been a devolution of title by operation of adverse possession, their title is perfect, and their right to recover would not be affected by a theoretical abandonment, predicated alone upon a neglect of their estate. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Wiggin (U. S.) 68 Fed. 446, 449, 15 C. C. A. 510.

Abandonment can only properly refer to inchoate rights; but a perfect title cannot be abandoned. If the owner of a perfect title fails or neglects to pay taxes, the law, instead of presuming his title abandoned, regards it as still remaining a species of valuable property, which is seized and sold to the highest bidder. City of Philadelphia v. Biddle, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 259, 263.

"Abandonment" is a word which has acquired technical meaning, and there can be no reason why a different signification should be given it when applied to the loss of a right to a mining claim than that which it has received in the books. It is defined to be the relinquishment of a right; the giving up of something to which we are entitled. Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold & Silver Min. Co., 1 Nev. 188, 204, 90 Am. Dec. 484.

"Abandonment," as applied to mining claims held by location merely, takes place only when the locator voluntarily leaves his claim to be appropriated by the next comer, without any intention to retake or claim it again, and regardless of what may become of it in the future. McKay v. McDougall, 64 Pac. 669, 670, 25 Mont. 258; St. John v. Kidd, 28 Cal. 263, 272.

Abandonment does not depend on any rules or regulations or customs of mining, but solely on the question of the intention of the locator in leaving his claim. St. John v. Kidd, 28 Cal. 263, 272.

The term "abandonment," when applied to a mining claim, correctly characterizes the act of one holding the claim, in giving up his claim, and stopping the payment of assessments in pursuance of the intention to give up the claim. Whether there has been an abandonment is a mixed question of fact. Oreamuno v. Uncle Sam Gold & Silver Min. Co., 1 Nev. 215, 217.

An abandonment, within the meaning of the rule that a mining claim may be lost by abandonment, includes the voluntary yielding of the possession of the claim to another. Murley v. Ennis, 2 Colo. 300, 306.

"Abandonment" is a question of act as well as intent; and it is also said that it is a question of mixed law and fact. Lockhart v. Wills, 50 Pac. 318, 320, 9 N. M. 263.

"Abandonment" is a matter of intention, and operates instantaneously. Where a miner gives up his claim, and goes away from it without any intention of repossessing it, and regardless as to what becomes of it or who takes possession of it, an abandonment takes place, and the property reverts to its original status as a part of the unoccupied public domain. Derry v. Ross, 5 Colo. 295, 300.

Of railroad station.

Under Pub. St. c. 112, § 156, prohibiting a railroad company from abandoning an established station, the removal of the station to another place in the same town and neighborhood, with the design of furnishing better accommodations does not constitute an abandonment, since such change is a relocation, and not an abandonment of the station. Attorney General v. Eastern R. Co., 137 Mass. 45, 48.

Of right of way.

"Abandonment," as used in relation to the abandonment of a right of way by a railroad company, means simply a permanent cessation of the use of the right of way for railroad purposes; that is, a cessation to use with an intent not to resume the use. McClain v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 57 N. W. 594, 595, 90 Iowa, 646.

Of trade-name.

To establish the defense of "abandonment" of a trade-name, it is necessary to show not only acts indicating a practical abandonment, but an actual intent to abandon. Acts which, unexplained, would be sufficient to establish an abandonment, may be answered by showing that there was never an intention to give up or relinquish the right claimed. Saxlehner v. Eisner & Mendelson Co., 21 Sup. Ct. 7, 11, 179 U. S. 19, 45 L. Ed. 60.

"Abandonment" in industrial property is an act by which the public domain originally enters or re-enters into the possession of the thing (commercial name, mark, or sign) by the will of the legitimate owner. The essential condition to constitute abandonment is that the one having a right should consent to the dispossession. Outside of this, there can be no dedication of the right, because there cannot be abandonment in the juridical sense of the word. Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co., 16 Sup. Ct. 1002, 1009, 163 U. S. 169, 41 L. Ed. 118.

"Abandonment," as applied to the doctrine of appropriation of water to a beneficial use, may be defined to be an intentional relinquishment of a known right. Thus, where the owners of mining premises allowed them to be sold for taxes, and no claim was made of the water right for eighteen years, intention to abandon such right was established. Oviatt v. Big Four Min. Co., 65 Pac. 811, 812, 39 Or. 118.

"Abandonment" is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury or court sitting as such. Evidence that the owner of an irrigation water right had for several years used but little water for irrigating, though using it continuously for domestic purposes, and had allowed the ditch to become so obstructed that it would convey but little water, does not show an abandonment. Utt v. Frey, 39 Pac. 807, 809, 106 Cal. 392.

The "abandonment" of water rights occurs when the party in possession deserts the property without an intention to reclaim it, and such intention is not shown by mere non-user or failure to maintain. Butterfield v. O'Neill, 72 Pac. 807, 808 (citing Putnam v. Curtis, 7 Colo. App. 457, 43 Pac. 1056).

The right is not abandoned to the use of a ditch to convey water for purposes of irrigation merely because water does not flow in it every day in the year. Hesperia Land & Water Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209.

Where a person who owned a water right quitclaimed his possessory right to the land without reservation of a water right, and left the state for three years, claims no interest in the water until after his return, he will be held to have abandoned it. Nichols v. Lantz, 47 Pac. 70, 72, 9 Colo. App. 1.

ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Abandoned property is property which has been thrown away or the possession of which is voluntarily forsaken by the owner, in which case it becomes the property of the first occupant. Eads v. Brazleton, 22 Ark. 499, 509, 79 Am. Dec. 95.

ABATE—ABATEMENT.

Of action.

To "abate," as applied to an action, is to cease, terminate, or come to an end prematurely. Bouv. Law Dict. When, upon the return day of a summons issued from the district court in the city of New York, the plaintiff fails to appear or pay the trial fee, and the defendant makes no motion for a dismissal, the action abates, or is in effect discontinued, and its pendency cannot therefore be pleaded in bar of a new action for the same cause between the same parties. Goldstein v. Loeb, 21 Misc. Rep. 72, 73, 46 N. Y. Supp. 838.

The entry "Action abated" is simply a statement of the legal effect of overruling a demurrer and sustaining a bill in abatement. It is an appropriate entry to inform the clerk of the legal status of the case in the event no exceptions are taken, or the exceptions taken are overruled and no amendment allowed. Fleming v. Courtenay, 49 Atl. 611, 614, 95 Me. 128.

"Abatement," in the sense of the common law, is an entire overthrow or destruction of the suit, so that it is quashed and ended, but in the sense of courts of equity an abatement signifies only a suspension of all proceedings in the suit for the want of parties capable of proceeding therein. At common law when a suit is abated it is absolutely dead, but in equity a suit when abated was merely in a state of suspended animation and might be revived. Witt v. Ellis, 42 Tenn. (2 Cold.) 38, 39, 40 (citing Story, Eq. Pl. 354).

St. Conn. p. 35, provided that if any writ, etc., shall be directed to an indifferent person, except in certain cases, it shall "abate." It was held that the word "abate" was not synonymous with "plea of abatement," the two expressions having very different meanings. "Abate" is a generic term, derived from the French word "abattre," and signifies to quash, to beat down, or destroy. The modes of abatement are various, but the thing is simple and uniform; a plea of abatement is only one mode of quashing a writ, while there are others, such as in some cases it is the duty of the court to abate a writ ex officio, and in case the writ is a nullity, so that the judgment thereon would be incurably erroneous, it is de facto abated. When it was declared that a writ should "abate" the term was used in its most comprehensive sense, not prescribing a mode, but commanding a thing. Hence the statute did not require a plea of abatement. Case v. Humphrey, 6 Conn. 130, 140 (citing Earl of Clanrickard's Case, Hobart, 288; Case on Fines, 3 Rep. 85; Hughson v. Webb, Cro. Eliz. 121; Cooke v. Gibbs, 3 Mass. 193; Wood v. Ross, 11 Mass. 271).

Of freehold.

"Abatement" is a figurative expression, used to denote that the rightful possession of the freehold by the heir or devisee has been overthrown by the intervention of a stranger, and is always consequent on the descent or devise of an estate in fee simple. Brown v. Burdick, 25 Ohio St. 260, 268 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 167, 169).

Of legacy.

An "abatement of a legacy" is a pro rata diminution of general legacies made necessary in order to pay debts and specific legacies. Brown v. Brown, 79 Va. 648, 650.

"The reduction of a legacy, general or specific, on account of the insufficiency of the estate of the testator to pay his debts and legacies. When the estate of a testator is insufficient to pay both debts and legacies it is the rule that the general legacies must abate proportionately to an amount sufficient to pay the debts. If the general legacies are exhausted before the debts are paid, then, and not till then, the specific legacies abate, and proportionably." Bouv. Law Dict. (citing 2 Shars. Bl. Comm. 513, and note; approved Neistrath's Estate, 5 Pac. 507, 508, 66 Cal. 330).

Where a bequest is made in the form of a general legacy, and of pure bounty, and there are no expressions in the will or inferences to be derived therefrom manifesting an intention to give any of them priority, in the event of a deficiency of assets they will all abate pro rata. Titus' Adm'r v. Titus, 26 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 111, 114, 117, 119.

Of nuisance.

In Rev. Code, § 4027, providing that a public nuisance may be abated on the application of any citizen of the district, and a private nuisance on the application of the party injured, "abated" is a technical term, meaning to destroy the nuisance, and does not mean the prevention of a nuisance by injunction, nor a verdict for damages against the one maintaining it as by way of punishment. Ruff v. Phillips, 50 Ga. 130.

The words "abate" and "suppress" in a statute giving a city power to abate nuisances and suppress gambling houses are practically synonymous. Town of Nevada v. Hutchins, 13 N. W. 634, 635, 59 Iowa, 506.

Of taxes.

The terms "exemption" and "abatement," in their literal sense, have different shades of meaning, and this is so to a certain extent in the meaning of these terms as employed in the constitution and statutes; for an exemption prevents any assessment or levying of taxes in the first instance, and in that way relieves the property from the burden of taxation, while in the case of an abatement the property is relieved of its share of the burden of taxation after the assessment has been made and the tax levied. The difference in the sense of these terms, therefore, relates to the method rather than to the effect; for the ultimate result, whether by exemption or abatement, is precisely the same. In either case, the property is relieved from the burden of taxation. Hence a statute providing that the board of county commissioners may abate the taxes of certain persons is in conflict with the constitution forbidding exemptions of property except such as are of the laws of the United States and under this constitution. State v. Armstrong, 53 Pac. 981, 982, 17 Utah, 166.

An abatement of taxes supposes the assessment not duly made. If the tax be wholly abated it is as if no assessment had been made, and if the tax be partially abated, and the residue paid, all that was duly assessed has been paid. Inhabitants of Billerica v. Inhabitants of Chelmsford, 10 Mass. 394, 396.

The requirement of Act March 25, 1889, that corporations, companies, and persons engaged in the business of operating or constructing railroads and railroad bridges, and contractors and subcontractors engaged in the construction of any such road or bridge, to pay their employes on the day of discharge the unpaid wages then earned by them at the contract rate, "without abatement or deduction," means without discount for paying in advance of the time fixed by the contract, and does not prevent the corporation from offsetting the damages sustained by the employe's failure to perform his contract. Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 25 S. W. 75, 84, 58 Ark. 407, 23 L. R. A. 264, 41 Am. St. Rep. 109.

ABATOR.

The term "abator" is synonymous with an occupier without color of title, and signifies a stranger who has taken possession of a freehold on the death of a person seized of an inheritance, thereby preventing the entry of the heir or devisee. Brown v. Burdick, 25 Ohio St. 260, 268.

ABDUCTION.

"The term 'abduction' means in law the taking and carrying away of a child, a ward, a wife, etc., either by fraud, persuasion, or open violence. Webster's Dict." State v. George, 93 N. C. 567, 570; State v. Chisenhall, 11 S. E. 518, 519, 106 N. C. 676; Humphrey v. Pope, 54 Pac. 847, 848, 122 Cal. 253; Carpenter v. People (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 603, 606.

The word "abduction" is from the Latin "abduco," to lead away. In private or civil law it is the act of taking away a man's wife by violence or by persuasion. Our criminal statutes as to the crime of abduction for the purposes of prostitution use the words "take away" for the word "abduct." It has been held that a physical carrying away is not required to constitute the taking, but that inducements are sufficient. In the decisions of courts generally the word "abduction" and the words "take away" are used as equivalents of each other, as we think in fact they are, and such is its meaning as used in the statute relating to the abduction of a husband from his wife or of a parent from his child. Humphrey v. Pope, 54 Pac. 847, 848, 122 Cal. 253.

It is not necessary, in order to constitute "abduction," that the taking should be by force; it being sufficient "if such moral force was used as to create a willingness on the girl's part to leave her father's home." Wightman, J. Reg. v. Handley, 1 Fost. & F. 648.

In order to constitute "abduction" the law does not require that the taking away of a female for unlawful purposes shall be by force. "If the child was induced by defendant to go away from the custody and care of her mother it is a sufficient 'abduction' or taking away"; the gist of the offense being the taking away of the child against the will of the person having lawful charge of her, for the purpose of prostitution. People v. Demousset, 12 Pac. 788, 71 Cal. 611.

It is not necessary to the commission of the crime of abduction that the accused should in any case use any force or practice any fraud or deception. The offense may be committed without actual manual capture of the female, and it is not necessary that she be taken against her will. People v. Seeley (N. Y.) 37 Hun, 190, 192, 193.

Pen. Code, § 282, provides: "A person who . . . (subdivision 2) inveigles or entices an unmarried female of previous chaste character into a house of ill fame, or of assignation, or elsewhere, for the purpose of prostitution or sexual intercourse, * * * is guilty of abduction, and punishable by imprisonment," etc. People v. Crotty, 9 N. Y. Supp. 937, 938, 55 Hun, 611.

ABET.

See, also, "Aid and Abet."

To abet is to countenance, assist; to give aid. State v. Walker, 9 S. W. 646, 652, 98 Mo. 95.

Abetting the commission of an offense involves the idea of the use of force, physical or moral, joined with that of the actual perpetrator in producing it. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 92, 101.

The word "abet" includes knowledge of the wrongful purpose of the perpetrator and counsel and encouragement in the crime. People v. Dole, 55 Pac. 581, 584, 122 Cal. 486, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50 (quoted and approved in State v. Corcoran, 61 Pac. 1034, 1042, 7 Idaho, 220).

In Act Cong. April 20, 1818, § 3, prohibiting the slave trade, and declaring that whosoever shall in anywise be "aiding or abetting" in the fitting out of a slaver shall severally forfeit, etc., the terms "aid and abet" are not used as technical phrases belonging to the common law, the offense not being made a felony, and therefore the words require no such interpretation. "The statute punishes them as substantive offenses, and not as accessorial, and the words are therefore to be understood as in the common parlance, and import 'assistance, co-operation, and encouragement.'" United States v. Gooding, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 460, 476, 6 L. Ed. 693.

In True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 90 Ky. 651, the words "encourage, aid or abet, counsel, advise, or assist," were said to be words in appropriate use to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it to be done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. Omer v. Commonwealth (Tex.) 25 S. W. 994, 996.

Aid distinguished.

The word "aid" does not imply guilty knowledge or felonious intent, whereas the definition of the word "abet" includes knowledge of the wrongful purpose of a person, and counsel and encouragement in the crime. People v. Morine, 72 Pac. 166, 168, 138 Cal. 626 (citing People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 682, 63 Pac. 87).

The words "aid" and "abet" are not synonymous. To abet is to encourage, counsel, incite, or instigate the commission of a crime. The word indicates an act of an accessory before the fact. To aid is to support. State v. Empey, 44 N. W. 707, 79 Iowa, 460.

The words "aid" and "abet," as used in Code 1876, § 4802, providing that all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid or abet in its commission, though not present, must be indicted, tried, and punished as principals, "are nearly synonymous, and comprehend all assistance given by acts, words of encouragement, or by presence, actual or constructive." Raiford v. State, 59 Ala. 106, 108.

Consent distinguished.

See "Consent."

ABETTOR.

See, also, "Aider and Abettor."

In criminal law an abettor is one who is present at the time the offense was committed, and aids in its commission, although he is not the actual perpetrator, or who, while not present, is in such a situation as to be able readily to come to the assistance of the perpetrator. Green v. State, 13 Mo. 382, 392.

To abet is to countenance, assist, to give aid; and hence an instruction that if defendant was near enough to and did give immediate assistance in the killing of deceased, or intentionally aided, countenanced, or encouraged it, or waited upon or stood watch for those who did it, acting in one common purpose with them, he was guilty as an abettor, was correct. State v. Walker, 9 S. W. 646, 652, 98 Mo. 95.

Abetting the commission of an offense involves the idea of the use of force, physical or moral, joined with that of the actual perpetrator in producing it. The abettor must stand in the same relation to the crime as the criminal, approach it at the same direction, and touch it at the same point. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 92, 101.

A person may be guilty of crime as an abettor even though he cannot be a principal. Bishop v. State, 45 S. E. 614, 118 Ga. 799.

ABEYANCE.

"Sometimes the fee may be in abeyance—that is, in expectation or contemplation of law—there being no person in esse in whom it can vest and abide at the time, though the law considers it as always potentially existent and ready to vest whenever a property owner appears. Thus, in a grant to J. for life, and afterwards to the heirs of R., the inheritance is plainly neither granted to J. nor R., nor can it vest in the heirs of R. till his death. Nam nemo est hæres viventis. It remains therefore in waiting or 'abeyance' during R.'s life." 2 Bl. Comm. 107. In the civil law the legal conception is slightly different. Pothier says: "The dominion of property, the same as all other rights, as well in re as ad rem, necessarily supposes a person in whom the right subsists and to whom it belongs. * * * When an owner dies, and no one will accept the succession, this dormant succession is considered as being a civil person, and as the continuation of that of the deceased, and in this fictitious person subsists the dominion or ownership of whatever belongs to the deceased, the same as all other passive and active rights of the deceased. Hæreditas jacens personæ defuncti locum obtinet." Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Bosworth, 10 Sup. Ct. 231, 233, 133 U. S. 92, 33 L. Ed. 550 (quoting Droit de Domaine de Propriete, cc. 1, 15).

ABIDE.

In an indictment charging that defendants "did lewdly and lasciviously abide and cohabit" together, the term "abide" was synonymous with the word "associated," as used in Pub. St. c. 214, § 27, prohibiting persons from lewdly and lasciviously associating and cohabiting together. Commonwealth v. Dill, 34 N. E. 84, 159 Mass. 61.

A recognizance to await the action of the court of appeals is not equivalent to a condition to abide the judgment of such court. Wilson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 38, 39.

As be governed by.

A docket entry under an action at law to "abide" the decision in a certain equity suit means not that the action at law should be dependent on the final determination of the suit in equity, but that so much of the issue as was common to both should be decided in the former the same as in the latter. Hodges v. Pingree, 108 Mass. 585, 587.

A stipulation that certain cases shall "abide" the event of another case, both in the trial court and on appeal, means the final outcome and the end of the litigation, and that the side finally successful in the first case should be successful in all. Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Scammon, 35 Ill. App. 659, 660.

As conform to, execute, or perform.

"Abide," as used in a recognizance binding the defendant to appear and "abide" the order of the court, meant obedience, compliance, to perform, to execute, to conform to such order. Jackson v. State, 30 Kan. 88, 1 Pac. 317, 318.

As used in Rev. St. c. 49, providing that the accused in bastardy proceedings shall appear and abide the order of the court, "abide" means that the accused shall perform, execute, and conform to such order. Hodge v. Hodgdon, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 294, 297.

The condition of a bond given in a prosecution for bastardy, conditioned that the principal defendant should appear at the next court, and "abide" the order of the court, extends to performance of the order of court consequent on the adjudication of the accused as the father. Taylor v. Hughes, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 433, 434.

In Weeks v. Trask, 16 Atl. 413, 415, 81 Me. 127, it was held that defendant's entry on land in dispute, and the erection of a fence after the land had been awarded to plaintiff under an arbitration by agreement "binding both parties to abide the award," did not constitute a breach of the award. In discussing the meaning of the words "to abide by" the court adopts the language of Richardson, C. J., in Shaw v. Hatch, 6 N. H. 162: "The words 'abide by' do not mean to acquiesce in, but simply to await the award without revoking the submission. The award is conclusive between the parties, and the defendant may be liable in trespass for what he has done." A like view was adopted in Marshall v. Reed, 48 N. H. 36. Doubtless a revocation of the authority of the arbitrators before the award is made is a breach of such a stipulation. King v. Joseph, 5 Taunt. 452; Brown v. Leavitt, 26 Me. 251. So is putting it beyond the power of the arbitrators to make an award, as the marriage of the female party. Charnley v. Winstanley, 5 East, 268. Or preventing one of the arbitrators from taking part in the award as to costs. Quimby v. Melvin, 35 N. H. 198. So is refusing to pay money in accordance with the award. Thompson v. Mitchell, 35 Me. 281; Plummer v. Morrill, 48 Me. 184. Also refusing to do any act other than the payment of money required by the award, such as transferring a piece of a vessel, and, when the submission is not under seal, assumption will lie. Gerry v. Eppes, 62 Me. 49, 51, 52. The debtor's stipulation in his bail bonds to abide the judgment means, said Peters, J., "to stand to," "to submit to," or "to abide." Hewins v. Currier, 62 Me. 236, 239. "While these illustrations show that these words take some shade of meaning from the subject-matter with which they are connected, our opinion is that in cases of this sort they mean, in substance, that the parties will not in any wise revoke or prevent the making and publication of the award, and when made and published it shall be final, and that they will perform any act required by the award which is within the scope of the authority conferred on the arbitrators by the submission."

As pay or satisfy.

"Abide and satisfy," within the meaning of Gen. St. 1878, c. 86, § 10, providing that an appeal bond shall be conditioned to pay the costs of said appeal and damages sustained by the respondent in consequence thereof, if said order or any part thereof is affirmed, or said appeal is dismissed, and abide and satisfy the judgment or order which the appellate court may give therein, must be construed, not only to require payment of the costs and damages, but also the judgment which may be rendered on appeal, with interest, as, if the term be construed to apply only to the costs and damages incident to the appeal, that part of the provision requiring the payment of costs of said appeal and the damages sustained would be without meaning. Erickson v. Elder, 25 N. W. 804, 34 Minn. 370.

Comp. Laws Kan. 1879, c. 47, § 5, relating to illegitimate children, requires that the defendant charged with being the father of such child shall appear at the district court, and give a recognizance not to depart without leave, and to abide the judgment and orders of the court. Held, that the word "abide" in such act does not mean that the person charged shall pay or satisfy the final judgment rendered in the action, but that he will attend court so long as the action is pending, and when final judgment is rendered surrender himself or give bond to perform such judgment, or be committed to prison; citing Shaw v. Hatch, 6 N. H. 162; Marshall v. Reed, 48 N. H. 36. The court says: "It is believed that the word 'abide' never means 'pay' or 'satisfy,' while it does sometimes mean 'endure' or 'suffer'; and to construe the word to mean 'to pay or satisfy' is to give the statute in which it is found a harsh and needlessly severe construction. The Supreme Court of Maine seems to hold * * * that the word 'abide' in a statute similar to ours means 'pay,' and that when the final judgment is rendered the defendant and his sureties commit a breach of their bond unless they pay or satisfy the judgment." Taylor v. Hughes (Me.) 3 Greenl. 433, 434; Corson v. Tuttle, 19 Me. 409. These cases were decided prior to the case of Towns v. Hale (Mass.) 2 Gray, 199, 201, in which they were cited and disapproved, the court holding in that case that the word "abide" cannot mean more than a willingness and readiness to have the judgment of the court enforced against the defendant, and not that the defendant or his sureties shall perform the final judgment or order of the court, but only that defendant will attend the court so long as the action is pending, and when final judgment is rendered that he will surrender himself to the court to give bond or be committed. McGarry v. State, 14 Pac. 492, 493, 37 Kan. 9.

ABIDE AND PERFORM.

A bond conditioned that the maker would "abide and perform the orders and decrees of the court" in a cause in which a writ of ne exeat had been issued cannot be construed as equivalent to "abide the event of the suit," for to do so would be to wholly ignore the word "perform," and hence the maker cannot be discharged from the bond on his principal's placing himself within the jurisdiction of the court and subject to its orders and decrees. Hazard v. Durant, 13 R. I. 125.

ABIDE BY.

A stipulation in a condition in an arbitration bond that the parties consent to and "abide by" such a line as the arbitrator should establish is the same in legal effect as if the language of the parties had been "to abide by and perform the award of the arbitrator," which means only that the parties shall await the award of the arbitrators before revoking the submission, and not that they shall acquiesce in the award when made, and cannot be construed to mean that the party shall not be at liberty to dispute the validity of any award when made, but such award will stand as conclusive on the parties until impeached for good cause. Marshall v. Reed, 48 N. H. 36, 41; Shaw v. Hatch, 6 N. H. 162, 163.

A condition in an arbitration agreement to abide by the award is broken where a party took measures to prevent the attendance of a witness. Quimby v. Melvin, 35 N. H. 198, 204.

The obligation in a bond to "abide by" a money judgment cannot in reason mean that the obligors stipulated to acquiesce in a condition of things which was beyond their power to change; that they would not complain of a judgment after its affirmance in the appellate court, when, after its affirmance, they could have no other alternative but acquiescence. Every judgment debtor must abide by a final money judgment without contracting to do so. It is stripped of all signification unless it requires payment of the judgment. Harris v. Kansas Elevator Co., 71 Pac. 804, 805, 66 Kan. 372.

As perform.

"These words have a settled fixed meaning. Webster's International Dictionary says: 'Abide,' when followed by 'by,' as 'abide by,' means to stand to, to conform to, as 'to abide by a decision or an award.' Soule's Synonyms gives as synonymous for 'abide by' the words 'act up to'; 'fulfill'; 'discharge.' Roget's Thesaurus, in like manner gives synonymous of 'abide by,' meet; fulfill, carry out; carry into execution; execute; perform; discharge; satisfy." Hence, where an arbitration bond was conditioned that the parties should abide by the award, the obligor and sureties were liable for the payment of the award to the extent of the penalty of the bond. Pass v. Critcher, 17 S. E. 9, 10, 112 N. C. 405.

In an arbitration agreement of a boundary dispute binding the parties to "abide by" such lines as the arbitrators might decide on, the words "abide by" were construed to require the parties to perform the award, and in order to enforce the same the court decreed specific performance by the execution of deeds of release up to such lines. Thompson v. Deans, 59 N. C. 22.

A condition in an arbitration bond, that the party shall well and truly "submit, stand to, and abide by" the decision and award of the arbitrators, is construed to extend to the performance by the principal of the award after it is made, the court remarking, in the course of discussion, that to speak of submitting to and abiding by a law, an order, a decision, means in common parlance to obey it, to comply with it, to act in accordance with it and perform its requirements. Washburne v. Lufkin, 4 Minn. 466, 471 (Gil. 362, 364).

A condition of a bond, on obtaining certiorari, that the obligor would "abide by" and stand to the judgments of the court, is equivalent to a condition that he would perform the judgment of the court. Molton v. Hooks, 10 N. C. 342, 350.

ABIDE, DO, AND PERFORM.

A bail bond was conditioned that the person charged should appear and answer the writ and should "abide, do and perform" the judgment of the court, or the judgment of any other court before whom such process in due course of law shall be finally determined. Held, that the words "abide, do and perform" mean "to stand to," "to submit to," or "to abide." They are evidently a useless reiteration, and at most an inaccuracy of language employed to add force and expression to the idea conveyed by the words "to abide," and the phrase "to abide, do and perform and not avoid" is no more than "to abide and not avoid." The contract or bail is in effect that the debtor shall pay the judgment or surrender his body to be taken, or that the bail shall pay the debt. If the debtor gives the creditor the means of taking his body in execution, he does "abide, do and perform the judgment and not avoid it," in the meaning of those words in the condition of the bond. Hewins v. Currier, 62 Me. 236, 239.

ABIDE THE EVENT.

See "Cost to Abide Event"; "Event."

ABIDING CONVICTION.

An abiding conviction of guilt is not the equivalent of belief beyond a reasonable doubt. Williams v. State, 19 South. 826, 73 Miss. 820.

A verdict, wherein the jury returned that they had "an abiding conviction of defendant's guilt," signified settled and fixed conviction which follows a careful examination and comparison of the whole evidence, and was equivalent to a finding that they had no reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt; and hence such verdict was sufficient to support a judgment of conviction. Griffith v. State, 8 South. 812, 814, 90 Ala. 588; Battles v. Tallman, 11 South. 247, 249, 96 Ala. 403.

An instruction in a criminal case on the doctrine of reasonable doubt stated that if, after an impartial comparison and consideration of the evidence, the jury could truthfully have an "abiding conviction" of the defendant's guilt such as they would act on in the weightier affairs of their own life, they then had no reasonable doubt. Held, that the word "abiding" as there used meant "settled and fixed"—a conviction which may follow a careful examination and comparison of the whole evidence. Hopt v. People, 120 U. S. 430, 439, 7 Sup. Ct. 614, 618, 30 L. Ed. 708.

ABIDING FAITH.

"Abiding faith" would be a belief or confidence in the guilt of the accused which remains or continues in the minds of the jury. It is certainly true that before a jury can convict a person charged with a crime they must have an abiding faith of the truth of the charge of his guilt, but what degree of faith, how strong must that faith be before it crosses the line which separates the realm of doubt from that of moral certainty, is a question which should be explained to the jury in connection with the instruction that in order to be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt the jury must be able to feel that they have an abiding faith of the truth of the charge of the guilt of the accused. Patzwald v. United States, 54 Pac. 458, 460, 7 Okl. 232.

ABIDING PLACE.

See, also, "Place of Abode."

The expression "abiding place," as used in an opinion of a court reciting that the engines and cars of a railroad company have no "abiding place" or permanent location in the state, is an equivalent term for "permanent location." Hopkins v. Baker, 28 Atl. 234, 285, 78 Md. 363, 22 L. R. A. 477.

ABILITY.

See "Best of Ability"; "Pecuniary Ability"; "Present Ability"; "Sufficient Ability."

In Or. Code, § 475, declaring "that the use of any unlawful violence on the person of another with intent to injure him is an assault and battery," and any attempt to commit a battery, or any threatening gesture "coupled with an ability to commit" a battery, is an assault, "ability" means (1) that the person committing the assault must be in such a position that if not prevented he may inflict a battery on the person assaulted, and (2) that he must be at such a distance from the person assailed as to be able to commit a battery by the use of the means with which he attempts it. Jarnigan v. State, 6 Tex. App. 465, 467; Farrar v. State, 15 S. W. 719, 720, 29 Tex. App. 250.

Laws 1885, c. 422, § 2, makes it a misdemeanor for a husband, "being of sufficient ability," to neglect to support his wife. Held, that the words include as well the capacity or skill to earn or acquire money as to property actually owned, the court saying: "A husband may and often does gain a fortune, or receive a large salary in consequence of his skill in some direction, and thus becomes able to support his wife and family. Ability and refusal to support constitute one act of delinquency, and where a man has physical and mental power to acquire means he comes within the intent of the law." State v. Witham (Wis.) 35 N. W. 934, 935.

"Ability," as used in the divorce act authorizing the granting of a divorce for the willful neglect of the husband to provide the wife with the common necessities of life, he having the "ability" to provide the same, means "the possession by the husband of the means and property to provide such necessities," not to his capacity of acquiring such means by labor. Washburn v. Washburn, 9 Cal. 475, 478.

St. 9 Geo. IV, c. 14, § 6, providing that no action shall be brought to charge any person on or by any representation or assurance made or given concerning or relating to the conduct, credit, "ability," trade, or dealings of any other person to enable such person to obtain credit, means the party's ability according to the extent of his property, and the amount of the charges to which that property has been subjected. Lyde v. Barnard, 1 Mees. & W. 101, 103.

ABJURATION.

"Abjuration, which was connected with the law of sanctuary, was a method by which a criminal escaped punishment by taking an oath of abjuration and leaving the realm forever." "Both sanctuary and abjuration were abolished by St. Jac. I, c. 25, and 20 Jac. I, c. 18." Avery v. Everett, 18 N. E. 148, 152, 110 N. Y. 317, 1 L. R. A. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 368.

ABJURE.

To "abjure the state" implies a total abandonment of the state, a departure without the intention of returning, but does not mean a renunciation of one's country on an oath of perpetual banishment, as the term originally implied. Meade v. Hughes' Adm'r, 15 Ala. 141, 148, 50 Am. Dec. 123.

ABLE.

See "When able."

Feel able, see "Feel—Felt."

A promise to pay a debt "when able" must be construed as relating to financial ability. Richardson v. Bricker, 1 Pac. 433, 434, 7 Colo. 58, 49 Am. Rep. 344.

Where, in negotiations for the settlement of an action, the defendant informed plaintiff of his financial condition and his inability to pay any part of plaintiff's claim out of his salary so long as certain obligations continued, and a settlement was effected wherein defendant promised to pay when he should "be able to do so," the expression "able to do so" will be deemed to mean that the defendant should be required to pay only when his circumstances were changed for the better either by an accession of fortune or a decrease of obligation. Work v. Beach, 12 N. Y. Supp. 12, 17.

Rev. St. c. 14, § 1, providing that nurses and necessities to an infected person be furnished at his charge "if able," otherwise that of the town to which he belongs, means on his ability to pay the expenses, although they may be a large portion of his means. Inhabitants of Hampden v. Inhabitants of Newburgh, 67 Me. 370, 371.

The words "if able" in the statute providing that any town which has paid for the commitment and support of an insane person may recover the amount paid of the insane person, if able, means if able to pay the entire amount, and cannot be construed to authorize the town to recover a portion of the expense from such person if he is not financially able to pay the entire sum. Inhabitants of Cape Elizabeth v. Lombard, 72 Me. 492, 493.

"Able," when used in a promise to pay when "able," is to be reasonably interpreted. On the one hand, "It does not imply ability to pay without embarrassment, or even without crippling the debtor's resources or business; while, on the other hand, ability to pay cannot be fairly implied while the debtor, although he may be in possession of property sufficient to pay the particular debt, is insolvent, or, when payment is enforced, would strip him of his means of support." Tebo v. Robinson, 100 N. Y. 27, 29, 2 N. E. 383.

"Able to pay," within the meaning of a statute that a sick person may be provided with nurses and necessaries at his charge if he is able to pay therefor, or to the town to which he belongs, is to be construed as limited to his ability to pay the entire expenses, and if he is not able to pay all of such expenses he is not chargeable with any part thereof. Inhabitants of Orono v. Peavey, 66 Me. 60, 61.

ABLE-BODIED.

The act relating to the militia required the enrolling officer to enroll all "able-bodied citizens" of a certain age, but authorized a citizen to disenroll on a certificate of a surgeon to the acceptance of the officer. Held, that the term "able-bodied" in this connection was of difficult definition; that it did not imply absolute freedom from all physical ailment, but imported merely the absence of those palpable and visible defects which incapacitate a person from performing ordinary duties of a soldier. Darling v. Bowen, 10 Vt. 148, 152.

St. Vt. 1797, vol. 1, p. 383, providing that every "able-bodied" person should be deemed legally settled in the town in which he should have first resided for the space of one year, does not refer to ability or inability during the time mentioned to perform ordinary labor and thereby support himself and family, but that a person is to be deemed not to have been able-bodied during the year he received an injury which afterward resulted in permanent disability, although not incapacitating him during the year for ordinary labor. Town of Marlborough v. Sisson, 26 Conn. 57, 59.

Act 1797, § 1, relating to legal settlements, and providing that the applicant should be "an able-bodied and healthy" person and of quiet and peaceable behavior, does not require that the person should invariably continue in good health throughout the year, or that he should remain wholly exempt from those accidents which for a time would impair his physical energies, but means that the person should be in ordinary health and strength in his usual and habitual condition. Town of Starksboro v. Town of Hinesburgh, 15 Vt. 200, 209.

ABODE.

See "Actual Place of Abode"; "Permanent Abode"; "Place of Abode"; "Usual Place of Abode."

An "abode" is the place where a person dwells. Dorsey v. Brigham, 52 N. E. 303, 307, 177 Ill. 250, 42 L. R. A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228.

ABOMINATION.

Webster defines the word "abomination" to mean anything wicked. A charge that another committed an abomination in the sight of the Lord is not libelous per se. People v. Isaacs, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 148, 153.

ABORTION.

Abortion is, technically speaking, the expulsion of the ovum or embryo from a female at any time between 6 weeks and 6 months after conception. Smith v. State, 33 Me. 48, 59, 54 Am. Dec. 607.

Abortion is the act of giving premature birth, particularly the expulsion of the human foetus prematurely or before it is capable of sustaining life; miscarriage. "Procuring an abortion," in common language, means substantially the same as procuring a miscarriage, and by our statute is meant the criminal act of destroying the foetus any time before birth. State v. Crook, 51 Pac. 1091, 1093, 16 Utah, 212.

The term "abortion" does not itself import a crime. It simply means, according to Webster, the act of miscarrying; the expulsion of an immature product of conception; miscarriage; the immature product of an untimely birth. And an eminent law-writer defines it to be the act of bringing forth what is yet imperfect, and particularly the delivery or expulsion of the human foetus prematurely, or before it is yet capable of sustaining life; also, the thing prematurely brought forth, or produced of an untimely process. Belt v. Spaulding, 20 Pac. 827, 830, 17 Or. 130 (citing 1 Abb. Law Dict. 3).

The word "abortion" is synonymous and equivalent to "miscarriage" in its primary meaning, which means the bringing forth the foetus before it is perfectly formed and capable of living, and is rightly predicated of the woman instead of the child. "Abortion" has a secondary meaning, in which it is used to denote the offspring, but it is not used in that sense here. It is a flagrant crime at common law to attempt to procure the miscarriage or "abortion" of the woman, because it interferes with and violates the mysteries of nature in that process by which the human race is propagated and continued. It is a crime against nature which obstructs the fountain of life. It is not necessary that the woman had become quick. It is not the murder of a living child which constitutes the offense, but the destruction of gestation by wicked means and against nature. The moment the womb is instinct with embryo life, and gestation has begun, the crime may be perpetrated. Mills v. Commonwealth, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 631, 632; Wells v. New England

Mut. Life Ins. Co., 43 Atl. 126, 127, 191 Pa. 207.

A mere suggestion or advice to go to a physician and get some medicine to procure an abortion, without evidence of its being acted upon, does not constitute the crime. People v. Phelps, 18 N. Y. Supp. 699, 700, 63 Hun, 632; Id., 15 N. Y. Supp. 440, 441, 61 Hun, 115.

"A person who, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of a woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve the life of the woman, or of the child with which she is pregnant, either, first, prescribes, supplies, or administers to a woman, whether pregnant or not, or advises or causes a woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or second, uses, or causes to be used, any instrument or other means, is guilty of abortion, and is punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for not more than four years, or in a county jail for not more than one year." Pen. Code, § 294. People v. Van Zile, 26 N. Y. Supp. 390, 391, 73 Hun, 534.

The term "abortion" in Pen. Code, § 294, providing that any one who advises or causes a woman to use drugs, etc., with intent to produce a miscarriage, shall be guilty of "abortion," is not to be understood in its ordinary meaning of producing young before the natural time, but also includes the attempt to produce such result. People v. Phelps, 15 N. Y. Supp. 440, 441, 61 Hun, 115.

Consent as affecting.

Rev. St. c. 164, § 11, provided that any one who shall administer to a woman pregnant with a child any drug, or use any instrument on her or other means, with intent thereby to destroy the child, unless the same shall be necessary to preserve the life of the mother, shall be guilty of manslaughter. It was held that the use of violence on a woman with an intent to procure her miscarriage constituted an abortion notwithstanding she consented to the act, and that she was not quick with child at the time of the attempted abortion. State v. Dickinson, 41 Wis. 299, 309.

Death of foetus as affecting.

"Abortion," as used in St. 1845, c. 27, relating to procuring or attempting to procure an "abortion," cannot be construed to mean that the mother on whom it is attempted must be quick with child, but it would not be an abortion if the foetus with which the woman was pregnant had lost its vitality so that it could never mature into a living child. Commonwealth v. Wood, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 85, 92.

Under Comp. St. c. 108, § 8, punishing any one who maliciously, "with intent to cause and procure the miscarriage of a woman then pregnant with a child," shall administer to her or advise her to take or swallow any drug, or shall use any instrument with like intent, it is not essential to the commission of the offense that the foetus should be alive at the time the attempt is made. State v. Howard, 32 Vt. 380, 399, 78 Am. Dec. 609.

ABORTIVE CHILD.

An "abortive" child is one which by an untimely birth is either born dead or is incapable of living, and it is not necessary that the child should live 24 hours, as required by the Spanish law, in order that the child should be considered as naturally born and not abortive. Cottin v. Cottin (La.) 9 Mart. (O. S.) 93, 95.

ABOUT.

See "At or About."

See, also, "In and About"; "On or About."

"About," used to describe the location of land in an entry or grant, signifies "at," unless something can be shown to evidence a contrary intention. Simms' Lessee v. Dickson (U. S.) 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 137, 140, 22 Fed. Cas. 158, 159.

A conveyance of all of a woman's stock in trade, materials, and other articles "in and about her said business" included a horse and gig which were kept for trade and not for pleasure. Dean v. Brown, 5 Barn. & C. 336, 338.

Disregarded in courses and distances.

In ascertaining a place to be found by its distance from another place, the vague words, "about," "nearly," or the like, are to be discarded, if there are no other words rendering it necessary to retain them, and the distance is to be taken positively. Kincaid v. Blythe's Heirs, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 479, 480; Grubbs v. Rice, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 107, 109; Sanders' Heirs v. Morrison's Ex'r, 18 Ky. (2 T. B. Mon.) 109, 110, 15 Amer. Dec. 140; Wise v. Burton, 14 Pac. 678, 681, 73 Cal. 166; Purinton v. Sedgley, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 283, 291; Johnson v. Pannel, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 206, 211, 4 L. Ed. 221; Bodley v. Taylor, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 191, 210, 3 L. Ed. 75; Simms v. Dickson, 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 137, 140.

The calls of a grant, beginning "on D. river about three-quarters of a mile below" the mouth of a creek, "at a beech," will, if no beech can be found at the place indicated, locate the place of beginning at the end of three-quarters of a mile, meandering the river from the mouth of the creek. Simms' Lessee v. Dickson (U. S.) 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 137, 140, 22 Fed. Cas. 158, 159.

A description of land as extending "about 30 feet from a road where an old dwelling house now stands" will be construed to mean that exact precision of the length of the line was not intended, and that, if the place where the house stood could not be determined, the distance must be limited to the number of feet given. Cutts v. King, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 482, 486.

"About" has no effect upon the question of boundaries, nor will it control monuments, courses, and distances where the language is clear and obvious. Wheeler v. Randall, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 529, 533; Whitaker v. Hall, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 72; Stephens v. Hedden, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 107, 108.

In a land entry one of the courses was given as "about" a north course. It was held that "about" should be rejected and the course run due north. Shipp v. Miller, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 316, 323, 4 L. Ed. 248.

As estimate of distance.

"About," as used in a grant to a railroad company of a strip of land "about" 50 perches in length, shows that the length was estimated instead of measured. Mt. Pleasant Coal Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 50 Atl. 251, 253, 200 Pa. 434.

Where the description in a deed described a line as extending "about" a certain number of feet to a monument, the term "about" will be understood to imply that exact precision in the length of the line was not intended, and the grantee will take to the monument; but if the place where the monument stood cannot be established, the grantee must be limited to the number of feet given. Cutts v. King, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 482, 486.

The use of the word "about," in a reservation in a deed of a gate or passageway "about" five feet wide, was held to indicate that the width of the gate was not intended to be definitely fixed by the instrument, and that the reservation was only of the right of a suitable and convenient passage for the purposes indicated. Atkins v. Bordman, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 457, 466, 37 Am. Dec. 100.

A call in a description for "at or about" the head of a certain stream was sufficiently accurate, though it might extend a few rods either way from the place originally intended. State v. Coleman, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 98, 103.

A deed describing a boundary line as running at a right angle with another line to connect with a third line "about" 50 feet long should be construed to render the measurement approximate, so that where the third line would be 53½ feet long the measurement was controlled by the angle. Iverson v. Swan, 48 N. E. 282, 283, 169 Mass. 582.

"About," in a description describing the distance of a boundary as "about 216 poles more or less to the A. river aforesaid," construed not to restrict the distance to 216 poles, but that the line would extend to the river. Purinton v. Sedgley, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 283, 291.

A deed describing a lot as "about five chains and 25 links in depth," where the entire description is intelligible and the intention manifest, will include the entire lot, though it be a few lengths greater in depth. White v. Woodruff, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 753, 755.

In a contract for the sale of "about" 45 feet in a certain property, the use of "about" indicates that the parties only contracted for a number of feet that would be a near approximation to those mentioned, and negatives the conclusion that entire precision was intended. Maryland Const. Co. v. Kuper, 45 Atl. 197, 201, 90 Md. 529.

A deed of land being "about" 30 feet wide does not fix the dimensions with sufficient certainty to convey the property. Fine-lite v. Sinnott, 5 N. Y. Supp. 439, 440, 57 N. Y. Super. Ct. (25 Jones & S.) 57.

As estimate of quantity.

"About so much," as used in a contract, while not precise, nevertheless indicates an approximation in quantity. Sample v. Upton, 42 N. W. 54, 56, 74 Mich. 416.

In a contract of sale of lumber estimated to be "about" a certain number of feet, more or less, obtained from "about" a certain number of feet of white pine saw logs banked and being banked at a certain place, the word "about" makes the naming of the quantity but an estimate of the probable amount, and that the amount sold is fixed by the amount at the place named. Rib River Lumber Co. v. Ogilvie, 89 N. W. 483, 485, 113 Wis. 482.

In sales of merchandise, especially in large quantities, where it is impossible to ascertain with precise accuracy the number or weight of the articles before concluding a contract for their purchase, it is necessary and usual to insert the words "more or less" or "about" in connection with the specific amount which forms the subject of the contract, in order to cover any variations from the estimate which are likely to arise from differences in weight, errors in counting, diminutions by shrinkage, or other similar causes. But in such cases parol evidence is not admitted to show that the parties intended to buy and sell a different quantity or amount from that stated in the written agreement. On the contrary, it is held to be a contract for the sale of the quantity or amount specified, and the effect of the words is only to permit the vendor to fulfill his contract by a delivery of so much as may reasonably and fairly be held to be a compliance with the contract, after making due allowances for the excess or short delivery.

arising from the usual and ordinary causes which prevent an accurate estimate of the weight or number of the articles sold; or, as it is sometimes briefly expressed, it is an absolute contract for a specific quantity within a reasonable limit. Cabot v. Winsor, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 546, 450.

Where a contract is made to sell or furnish certain goods identified by reference to independent circumstances, such as an entire lot deposited in a certain warehouse, or all that may be manufactured by the vendor in a certain establishment, or that may be shipped by his agent or correspondent in certain vessels, and the quantity is named with the qualification of "about," or words of like import, the contract applies to the specific lot, and the naming of the quantity is not regarded as in the nature of a warranty, but only as an estimate of the probable amount, in reference to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it, a slight deviation being allowable according to the circumstances of the case or nature of the articles. In such cases the governing rule is somewhat analogous to that which is applied in the description of lands, where natural boundaries and monuments control courses and distances and estimates of quantity. Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. (6 Otto) 168, 171, 24 L. Ed. 622; Norrington v. Wright, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 15, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. Ed. 366.

"About," as used in a contract for the shipment of about so many tons of goods of a certain quantity, means a margin for a moderate excess or diminution of such quantity. Salmon v. Boykin, 7 Atl. 701, 703, 66 Md. 541.

The term "about," in a finding that one-half a car load of lumber is about so many feet, means "not far from." Indianapolis Cabinet Co. v. Herrman, 34 N. E. 579, 581, 7 Ind. App. 462.

"About," as used in a letter in which the writer stated that a certain person had been advised that he was in need of "about" a certain number of dollars worth of red rock stock, and saying that the writer would attend to the payment of such orders as the person might give, shows that entire accuracy as to the amount was not intended. Maine Red Granite Co. v. York, 35 Atl. 1014, 1015, 89 Me. 54.

Same—Variations allowed.

A contract for the sale of "about" 300 quarters of foreign rye did not authorize the seller to deliver, nor require the buyer to accept, so large an excess as 50 over the 300 quarters, but the excess should bear a very small proportion to the amount named; a smaller proportion than that of 45 to 300. Cross v. Eglin, 2 Barn. & Adol. 106.

A contract of sale described the property as "all iron contained in the seller's yard, about 150 tons." Held, that the phrase "about 150 tons" could be construed as words of expectation and estimate only, as the contract was not for the delivery of 150 tons, but for all the iron in the yard, and therefore a delivery of 144 tons only was not a breach of the contract. McLay v. Perry, 44 Law T. (N. S.) 152.

In an agreement to sell a cargo of railroad iron, to be delivered at a ship, "about 300 or 350 tons" expresses an estimate only, and where a party delivered a full cargo he performed his contract, though the total amount which the vessel was able to carry was only 227 tons. Pembroke Iron Co. v. Parsons, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 589, 590.

An agreement to transport stores supposed to amount to "about" 3,700 barrels should be construed to mean only that the probable amount was 3,700 barrels, but that the amount stated did not amount to a warranty; and hence the delivery of 3,105 barrels constituted a fulfillment of the contract, good faith only being required. Robinson v. Noble, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 181, 196, 8 L. Ed. 910.

In a charter party, agreeing that the ship should load as may be required by the master, "about" 5,000 barrels, the word "about" meant any amount between 4,500 and 5,500. Alcock v. Leeuw, 1 Cab. & El. 98, 99.

A charter party, providing that a ship should load a complete cargo of iron ore, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow, etc., "say about 1,100 tons," was construed to mean that the shipowner would be content with a cargo of "about 1,100 tons." If the ship should hold more, and if she could only carry less the undertaking of the charterer would be fulfilled by loading a complete cargo. The court said: "The reasonable meaning seems to be that the shipowner undertakes, if the ship is of much greater capacity than 1,100 tons, to accept a cargo of about 1,100 tons as equivalent to a full cargo, and thus effect is given to the words 'say about,' etc., as words of contract. When the word 'about' is used, it always implies that the deviation must not be very large." And therefore a stowage of only 1,080 tons was not a fulfillment of the charterer's contract to load about 1,100 tons. Morris v. Levison, 1 C. P. Div. 155, 158.

A chattel mortgage on "about 6,000 hides," then laden or to be laden on a certain vessel on the coast of Africa, construed to render the exact number of hides intended to be covered by the mortgage indeterminate, and therefore it covered the whole lot belonging to the grantor, though numbering 7,040. Pollard v. Saltonstall (U. S.) 56 Fed. 861, 864.

The words "about," or "more or less," when used in a contract, are used as estimate of an otherwise designated quantity, and the object of the party is the purchase or sale of a particular lot, and is susceptible of a broad construction. A contract designating the amount of timber to be cut and delivered as about 2,750,000 feet, more or less, cannot be glossed over by the words "about," or "more or less," so as to cover 17,000,000 feet. Pine River Logging & Imp. Co. v. United States, 22 Sup. Ct. 920, 924, 186 U. S. 279, 46 L. Ed. 1164.

As estimate of quantity of land.

In stating the number of acres conveyed in a conveyance, it is usual to represent it as "about" so many. Yet the word "about," although it negatives the conclusion that entire precision is intended, is without any legal operation whatever. Purinton v. Sedgley, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 283, 286.

A contract containing the words "about 65 acres" construed to mean 65 acres, with a slight variation of actual measurement, and that the qualifying word "about" imported the actual quantity mentioned, or perhaps a slight discrepancy of perhaps 1 or 2 acres, and that therefore the conveyance of 36 acres did not satisfy the contract. Baltimore Permanent Building & Land Soc. v. Smith, 54 Md. 187, 204, 39 Am. Rep. 374.

Where a deed purported to convey all the real estate owned by the grantor in certain counties, and described "to be about 2,600, more or less," the latter clause is to be construed as a warranty of the quantity of land, and will entitle the grantee to relief in equity if there is a material difference between the real and represented quantity of land, as 1,000 acres. Thomas v. Perry (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 964, 965 (cited in Solinger v. Jewett, 25 Ind. 481).

A contract describing the land conveyed as containing "about" 140 acres means that the actual quantity is a near approximation to that mentioned in the contract; and where the amount of the land was 134.74 acres, valued at $55 per acre, the variation was too great. Stevens v. McKnight, 40 Ohio St. 341.

It is well settled that a vendee of land, when it is sold in gross or with the description "more or less," or "about," does not thereby ipso facto take all risk of quantity in the tract. The use of the words "more or less," or "about," or similar words, in designating quantity, although they show a sale in gross and not by the acre, covers only a reasonable excess or deficiency. Bigham v. Madison, 52 S. W. 1074, 1075, 103 Tenn. 358, 47 L. R. A. 267 (citing Belknap v. Sealey, 14 N. Y. [4 Kern.] 143, 67 Am. Dec. 120; Harrell v. Hill, 19 Ark. 102, 68 Am. Dec. 212; Drake v. Eubanks, 32 S. W. 492, 61 Ark. 120; Stebbins v. Eddy [U. S.] 22 Fed. Cas. 1192; Couse v. Boyles, 4 N. J. Eq. [3 H. W. Green] 212, 38 Am. Dec. 514; Pratt v. Bowman, 17 S. E. 210, 37 W. Va. 715; Wheeler v. Boyd, 6 S.

W. 614, 69 Tex. 293; Newton v. Tolles, 19 Atl. 1092, 66 N. H. 136, 9 L. R. A. 50, 49 Am. St. Rep. 593).

Where a vendor agrees to convey a farm in gross, amounting to about 115 acres of land, and the deed executed describes the land by boundaries, and adds, "containing about 115 acres of land," a deficiency of 6½ acres will not entitle the purchaser to an abatement of the purchase price. Weart v. Rose, 16 N. J. Eq. (1 C. E. Green) 290, 297.

As estimate as to time.

A charter of a steamer, providing that the vessel should be delivered for the charterer's use at a certain port "about" a certain day, gave the owner only such additional time as might be necessary by accidents of navigation arising on the voyage after a seasonable start. The Alert (U. S.) 61 Fed. 504, 505.

A steamship was chartered at New York through brokers for use in the fruit trade, and the brokers understood that the charterer insisted on a delivery at Santa Marta by April 15th, and by the charter party, executed by them as agents for both parties, the owner agreed to let and the charterer to hire the steamer "from the time of delivery at Santa Marta, 'about' April 10th, for a period of four months." Held, that the use of the word "about" in the clause relating to the time of delivery did not make the time immaterial, but that the word was inserted to allow for contingencies of navigation which might protract the voyage, and that the steamer was nevertheless required to leave New York in time to reach Santa Marta by April 10th under ordinary conditions. Sanders v. Munson (U. S.) 74 Fed. 649, 651, 20 C. C. A. 581.

Defendant agreed to ship cattle by a vessel "sailing about the middle of September." The vessel then was at sea. On September 14th defendant inquired the steamer's probable sailing day, and was told about September 27th, to which he made no objection. On September 22d the defendant, being notified that the steamer would sail on the 29th, declined to ship on the ground that his contract did not require him to ship at so late a day. Held, that the ship having construed the indefinite phrase, "about the middle of September," to mean as late as the 27th of the month, and defendant having acquiesced therein, his refusal to ship was a breach of the contract. Bennett v. Lingham (U. S.) 31 Fed. 85.

As estimate of value.

Where an assignment was made in trust to pay the grantor's debts, set out in a schedule, one of which was put "about" $1,100, when in fact the debt was upwards of $1,300, such excess was not so great that the creditor would not be entitled to a dividend on the whole amount due. Browne v. Weir (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 401, 402.

Where a contract was for the payment of a claim of "about $150," the intention being that relief should be had from the entire claim, whatever the amount should be, the contractor was liable to pay the claim, though it amounted to $196. Turner v. Whidden, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 121, 124.

The amount of a mortgage on assured's property was stated in the policy to be "about $3,000," and, though the statement had been made in good faith, the mortgage actually amounted to $4,425. Held to constitute a material misrepresentation, which would avoid the policy; the discrepancy being too large to be covered by the latitude inferred from the use of the word "about." Glade v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 9 N. W. 320, 321, 56 Iowa, 400.

An application for an insurance policy contained a statement that the premises were mortgaged for "about" $4,000. Held that, where the mortgage in fact amounted to a little less than $4,700, it amounted to a misrepresentation which avoided the policy. Brown v. People's Mut. Ins. Co., 65 Mass. (11 Cush.) 280, 282.

The word "about," in a deed in trust made for the purpose of securing or satisfying a number of debts, each of which is described to be for about a certain sum, shows that the exact amount of the deed was not known at the time the deed was executed; and, the debts being otherwise sufficiently described by the description of the debtor and creditors, the deed operates as security for a debt of $1,481, though it was described in the deed of trust as "about $1,000." Canaday v. Paschall, 38 N. C. 178, 180.

Where a resolution of a county board recited that the county indebtedness was "about" $100,000, and that an additional tax should be levied until a sufficient amount was raised to meet the indebtedness, the power conferred by a vote under such resolution was exhausted by levies for three years producing $115,000, and a further levy could not be had, though it appeared that the indebtedness was $132,000; that amount not being "about" $100,000. Peoria & P. U. Ry. Co. v. People, 64 N. E. 969, 971, 198 Ill. 318.

As exact quantity of personality.

Where defendant sold plaintiff "about" 500 tons of nitrate of soda, "to form the full and complete cargo of the John Phillips, 345 tons' register, and, in the event of her being unable to prosecute her voyage from any casualty, then the seller agreed to deliver another cargo or cargoes of about equal quantity," meant that the defendant was to deliver 500 tons, and that the John Phillips, which was supposed to be large enough to carry that quantity, should be employed for that purpose, and the defendant's contract was not performed by the delivery of 400 tons, though that amount was all that the John Phillips could carry. Bourne v. Seymour, 16 C. B. 337, 353.

A contract to furnish 5,000 tons of iron rails provided that they were to be shipped at the rate of "about" 1,000 tons per month, beginning February, 1880, but the whole contract to be shipped before August 1, 1880. Held, that the contract required a shipment of 1,000 tons in each month from February to June, and that a shipment of 400 tons in February and 885 tons in March justified a rescission of the contract. Norrington v. Smith, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 15, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. Ed. 366.

As not exceeding.

Act March 13, 1883, declares that a city of the sixth class must be one "not exceeding" 3,000 inhabitants. Held, that a notice by county supervisors of an election to decide on the incorporation of the city, stating that the number of inhabitants therein was "about 3,000," was a sufficient notice to enable the voters to classify the city as one of the sixth class under the act, since, if it contained "about 3,000," it could not exceed 3,000, prohibited by the statute. People v. City of Riverside, 11 Pac. 759, 70 Cal. 461.

"About" means "nearly," "approximately," "almost," and where plaintiff, in an action for the loss of baggage, alleged the value of the articles as being "about" a certain sum, he is limited to such sum in his recovery. Simpson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. R. Co., 38 N. Y. Supp. 341, 342, 16 Misc. Rep. 613.

In the settlement of an estate of an assigning debtor, who had described the claim of A. as "about $4,500," when it was in fact $5,867, the other creditors claimed that the claim of A. was limited by the schedule to the amount inserted thereon, or at most to a small amount thereover, and that such other creditors, who had become parties to the assignment after A., had a good right to rely on the accuracy of the schedule. It was held, however, that A. was entitled to prove his entire claim, as it was expressly declared in the assignment that it might not be practical to make a schedule entirely full and accurate, and the provision was made therein for corrections by the parties. Dedham Bank v. Richards, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 105, 112.

As immediately or soon.

In a statute allowing an attachment when a debtor is "about" to remove his stock, "about" must be taken in its common acceptance as defined by lexicographers—"near to in action, or near to in the performance of some act." Wrompelmair v. Moses, 62 Tenn. (3 Baxt.) 467, 474; Jackson v. Burke, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 610, 614.

To authorize an attachment on the ground that defendant is "about" fraudulently to dispose of his property, the charge in the affidavit must import that defendant is on the eve of such fraudulent disposition, and the charge that defendant will dispose of his property to defraud his creditors is insufficient. Jackson v. Burke, 51 Tenn. (4 Helsk.) 610, 614.

"About," as used in the attachment law, is not meaningless. It indicates the time the contemplated breach will be perpetrated. A creditor may not be able to swear that his debtor is about to leave the state permanently, while he could safely state that he will leave the state permanently. If the debtor contemplates leaving in six or ten months, the latter statement could not well be considered false, but not so with the former; and "about," in the statute, as connected with an averment that a fraudulent assignment will be made, gives a further indication of the time of making it, that it is about to be made, or that it will immediately be made. Frere v. Perret, 25 La. Ann. 500.

The phrase, "about to remove," in a statute giving a right of attachment against a debtor about to remove from the state, means a debtor who is engaged in the act, or is near to the performance of the act, of removing. Myers v. Farrell, 47 Miss. 281, 283.

Within an act requiring the Governor to fill by appointment, with the consent of the Senate, all officers when the term is "about to expire," requires the Governor to make his nominations to the Senate at a session immediately preceding the expiration of the term. That satisfies the intent of the words. The idea is that, if a term of a judicial officer will come to an end before the next regular session of the Senate, then the nomination shall be made to the body in session just before or preceding such ending of the term. Brady v. Howe, 50 Miss. 607, 617.

As too indefinite in petitions for roads and ditches.

"About" signifies "nearly," "approximately," "in the neighborhood of," so that a petition for a road, stating that the place of beginning is "about" 150 yards from the dwelling, is equivalent to saying it is approximately 150 yards, and hence is not sufficiently definite to comply with Hill's Ann. Laws Or. § 4062, requiring a petition to specify the place of beginning. Sime v. Spencer, 47 Pac. 919, 920, 30 Or. 340.

In an application for a road, qualifying the courses which would otherwise be specified, as running north "about" 63 degrees west, etc., renders the description indefinite. Adams v. Rulon, 14 Atl. 881, 882, 50 N. J. Law, 526.

The word "about," in a case in which the court was construing a petition for the establishment of a highway, which described a portion of the highway as running in a certain direction, about 69 rods, around a certain marsh, said that the word "about," where the context limits and restrains its meaning, does not materially impair the certainty of a description. Technical accuracy is not necessary in a description of a proposed line of road. It is enough that the general description shall be such that a surveyor can, with the assistance of the points definitely named, trace and designate the proposed route. Adams v. Harrington, 14 N. E. 603, 606, 114 Ind. 66.

In a petition for a ditch, wherein the description is as follows: "Said ditch to commence at a certain point 'about' 30 rods south of the north line of the southeast quarter of said section"—"about," taken in connection with the words restraining and limiting its meaning, does not materially impair the certainty of the description, and is a compliance with a provision requiring the petition to set forth "a general description" of the starting point. Corey v. Swagger, 74 Ind. 211, 212.

Same—in pleading and proof.

The word "about," used in connection with an allegation of time when a traversable fact occurred, takes all certainty from the allegation, and practically leaves the declaration without any allegation as to the time. Platt v. Jones, 59 Me. 232, 241; State v. Baker, 34 Me. 52, 53; Cole v. Babcock, 2 Atl. 545, 78 Me. 41.

A demand in trespass on the case set forth that "about the month of September" defendant took away, etc. Held that, while not indefinite as to time, it was "carrying the matter too far," as the day was not material. Lippencott v. Smith, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 95.

An answer, alleging the making of an agreement "about two weeks prior" to the time when a note became due, is as much indicative of a little less as of a little greater period, and, in connection with an allegation of payment "in about ten days thereafter," falls to show with sufficient certainty payment before maturity. Colter v. Greenhagen, 3 Minn. 126, 130 (Gil. 74, 76).

An abstract on appeal, stating that one count in a declaration alleged "about" the same facts as several preceding counts, is too indefinite in its meaning to afford a satisfactory understanding of what the paragraph contained, and insufficient to review a ruling on such paragraph. City of Birmingham v. Coleman, 20 South. 383, 384, 111 Ala. 407.

In a complaint, alleging that plaintiff was injured while attempting to descend the steps when the train was "about arriving," means "nearly," "not far from," the arrival of the train, and does not imply that the time had come when it was reasonably or apparently necessary that plaintiff should descend from the platform and place himself in readiness to enter a car without undue haste, and did not sufficiently aver that the time had arrived when it became the duty of the railroad company to have the depot lighted, failure to do which was the negligence complained of in the action. Alabama & G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 4 South. 359, 364, 84 Ala. 159, 5 Am. St. Rep. 354.

"About" is a very comprehensive term, and, when used with regard to time, may cover a considerable extent thereof, so that, under the rule permitting evidence of a contemporaneous theft to prove one alleged, evidence of the theft "about" the time of the theft charged is admissible. James v. State, 49 S. W. 401, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 190.

Proof as to a debtor prisoner being within the limits "about eight weeks before" a given date held to be very indefinite, but, in view of a construction given to the phrase by the trial court on certiorari, the court refused to say that the trial court erred. Tunison v. Cramer, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 498, 499.

An allegation in an indictment that an offense was committed "on or about" a certain day is too indefinite to sustain the indictment; the exact time in such cases being an essential element, and the expression "on or about" a day would not sufficiently advise the defendant which offense he was required to answer, in the event that he might have been engaged in an altercation with the same person on two different, or even more, successive days, but under very different circumstances. Territory v. Armijo, 37 Pac. 1117, 1118, 7 N. M. 571.

An allegation in an answer, denying that a certain person, on and prior to the 25th day of April, 1898, was the owner of the land in controversy, and that she died on or "about" said day, is entirely consistent with ownership after April 25th and before she died, and also with ownership before and at said date, subject to a right of possession in some one else as tenant and licensee. Knight v. Denman, 90 N. W. 863, 864, 64 Neb. 814.

The use of the words "on or about," in a statement filed by the claimant of a mechanic's lien with the clerk of a district court in order to preserve his lien, that the contract under which he claims was made on or about a certain day, does not preclude the claim in a contest with a mortgagee of the property on which the lien is claimed from introducing evidence showing the exact date of the contract. Mitchell v. Penfield, 8 Kan. 186, 188.

The petition in an action stated that since the cause of action accrued defendant had been absent from the state at different times, amounting in all to a period of "about two years." The court held the word "about," as here used, to be equivalent to the words "more or less," and therefore deprived the other words of the clause of any binding effect which rendered the petition insufficient to take the notes out of the statute of limitation. Hedges v. Roach, 21 N. W. 404, 406, 18 Neb. 673.

Same—In verdicts and awards.

The finding of a jury for "wood and timber to the amount of about 40 cords" meant any quantity between 30 and 50 cords, and hence rendered the verdict too indefinite to enable execution of process founded thereon. Baird v. Johnson, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 120, 123.

"About," as used in arbitration and award, allowing "on about 88 tons country damaged wheat, 15 per 500 lb.," denotes an approximation merely, and is therefore insufficient to furnish data by which the amount to be allowed could be ascertained to a certainty. Alexander v. McNear (U. S.) 28 Fed. 403, 405.

A special verdict recited that "about the time" defendant received certain money, etc., plaintiff demanded an accounting. Held that, although the word "about" had an uncertain meaning, it would not control the definite meaning as to the time of the demand. Woodward v. Davis, 26 N. E. 687, 127 Ind. 172.

As intended for.

"About," as used in a will devising to testator's sons all the corn and other articles which should be "in or about" his mill, or "in or about" his dwelling house, did not include a cargo of wheat consigned to testator, which was in transitu at the time of his death, since such cargo could not be considered "in or about," or in the vicinity of, the mill. Lane v. Sewell, 43 Law J. Ch. 378.

In a will in which testator left all the furniture, household effects, etc., "in, upon, or about" the premises, such term included articles which had been upon the property and had been temporarily sent away for repairs, but did not include articles which had been intended for, but which were never in, the house. Brooke v. Warwick, 12 Jur. 912, 913, 12 Law T. 41.

Intent or purpose indicated.

In the codicil to a will, stating in effect that the testator is "about to convey" certain real estate, the grant not to be charged as an advancement, the clause "about to convey" is a mere expression of an intent to convey, and not a devise. Hurlbut v. Hutton, 6 Atl. 286, 295, 42 N. J. Eq. 15.

Code 1873, § 2019, relating to party walls, and providing that he who is "about" to build contiguous to the land of his neighbor, etc., does not mean merely intends to build, since "about" is defined as "nearly," "approximately," "almost," so that an allegation that plaintiff intends to build the wall does not bring the pleading within the statute. Switzer v. Davis, 66 N. W. 174, 175, 97 Iowa, 266.

"About," as used in Rev. St. 1879, § 398, subdiv. 6, providing that an attachment will issue where the defendant is "about" to remove out of the state with intent to change his domicile, means substantially that if a purpose exists to remove, a scheme may be carried out in one, two, three, or several weeks or months, and, if contemplated with a view to evade or delay creditors, a writ may be taken out. Elliott v. Keith, 32 Mo. App. 579, 585 (citing Drake, Attachm. [6th Ed.] § 108).

The meaning of the phrase "about to abscond," as distinguished from "absconded," is that the former is complete without action, while the latter requires action without animus. Bennett v. Avant, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 152, 153 (cited in Elliott v. Keith, 32 Mo. App. 579).

"About," as used in statute authorizing attachment where the debtor is "about" to remove, is where the debtor entertains a purpose to remove and is making preparations to carry out such purpose. Myers v. Farrell, 47 Miss. 281, 284.

The word "about" means "in contiguity or proximity to; not far from; in connection with; nigh or near; in concern with; engaged in; dealing with; occupied upon;" and hence a debtor cannot be regarded as "about" to dispose of his property, so as to authorize an attachment, unless he had formed a purpose or design to do so. Dueber Watch Case Mfg. Co. v. Young, 40 N. E. 582, 583, 155 Ill. 226.

About to convert property for the purpose of disposing of it to defraud creditors, within attachment statutes, constitutes the making preparation on the part of the debtor to transfer his property or convert the same into cash with the intent to defraud. Williams v. McDonald, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 392, 395, 7 Atl. 866.

"About," in Swan's St. p. 646, authorizing the arrest of a debtor who is "about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors," means actually about to dispose of property, and not merely circumstances leading the creditor to suppose or believe it. Hockspringer v. Ballenburg, 16 Ohio, 304, 312.

As more or less.

A petition stated that since the cause of action had accrued the defendant had been absent from the state at different times, amounting in all to "about" two years. It was held that the word "about" was equivalent to "more or less," and hence too indefinite. Hedges v. Roach, 21 N. W. 404, 406, 16 Neb. 673, 675.

As near to.

The words "in and about," in an agreement by a street railway company to pave the street in and about the rails in a permanent manner and keep them in repair, must be regarded as if written "within and about the rails," and requires the company to keep in repair, not only that portion of the streets immediately adjoining its rails, but so much as is included between them, and, where it has laid double tracks, the space between such tracks. In McMahon v. Second Ave. R. Co., 75 N. Y. 231, where the words in question were under consideration, the court said, "Clearly, all the space within the defendant's rails fell within its agreement," although it was subsequently said, "But we need not put so wide a construction as that upon the agreement. In or about the rails means at least within the two rails of each track and some space outside of each rail. Beyond doubt it means so far outside as the street surface was disturbed in the act of laying the track." City of New York v. Second Ave. R. Co., 31 Hun, 241, 245.

ABOUT THE PERSON.

Code, § 1005, prohibits the carrying of a concealed weapon "about" one's person while off his own premises. Held, that where a person carried a pistol in a basket, which he held in his lap, he was carrying a concealed weapon "about his person," within the statute. State v. McManus, 89 N. C. 555, 558.

One who carries a pistol, concealed in a satchel supported and carried by a strap over his shoulder, is guilty under an act making it unlawful to carry a weapon concealed about the person. The weapon was being carried about the person in the sense of moving with the person, and this is the distinct principle which that act has determined. Warren v. State, 10 South. 838, 839, 94 Ala. 79.

"About the person," as used in a statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons "about the person," includes the carrying of a pistol concealed in a hand basket, which defendant carried in his hand or on his arm from his residence to a street railway station, and that when he entered the car he placed the basket on the seat beside him. Diffey v. State, 5 South. 576, 86 Ala. 66.

Code, § 4109 (Sess. Acts 1880-81, p. 38), provides that any person who carries concealed "about his person" a pistol, etc., on conviction, shall be fined. Held, that proof that defendant carried a pistol in his saddle bags while riding horseback along a road did not constitute "carrying about the person," within the statute, since, in order to have been carried about the person, the weapon must have been so connected with the person that the locomotion of the accused would carry the pistol with him. Cunningham v. State, 76 Ala. 88.

"About their person," as used in Dig. Fla. 498, § 5, declaring that it shall be unlawful for any person to carry arms secretly on or about their person, construed to include a case where defendant carried a pistol in his trousers' pocket so that at the time it was concealed by his coat. Sutton v. State, 12 Fla. 135, 136.

Where the evidence shows defendant had a pistol in his hand, it sufficiently shows that he had it about his person. Woodward v. State, 5 Tex. App. 296, 297.

A conviction under a statute providing a penalty for carrying a pistol on or about the person may be sustained on evidence that the defendant had a pistol on a wagon seat on which he sat. Garrett v. State (Tex.) 25 S. W. 285.

ABOUT THE PREMISES.

Liquor purchased from a storekeeper and drank in a public road within five or six steps of his store, and in full view thereof, is drunk about the storekeeper's premises, within Code 1886, prohibiting the sale without license of liquor to be drunk on or about the seller's premises. Whaley v. State, 6 South. 380, 381, 87 Ala. 83.

An indictment charged that defendant, not having procured a license as a retail liquor dealer, did sell liquor, which was drunk on or "about" his premises. Held, that the defendant was properly convicted, though the liquor was sold from a jug which defendant had about a mile from his house and about a mile from another. Powell v. State, 63 Ala. 177.

A statute prohibiting the sale of liquor to be drunk on or "about the premises" includes a place in a public highway within 15 or 20 steps of the seller's store, in front and in full view of it. Brown v. State, 31 Ala. 353, 356.

Defendant's buggy, in which he carried liquor for sale at a public administrator's sale in the country, constituted his premises within the meaning of the statute forbidding the sale of liquors "about the premises." Pearce v. State, 40 Ala. 720, 724.

A condition of an insurance policy required the insured to employ a watchman, to be "in or about the premises" by day or night during the time that they are idle. Held, that the terms of the statute are not complied with, where the insured premises were idle for two months, by employing one watchman, who habitually slept in a building 300 feet away, and "it is too much to say that he was a watchman employed 'to be in or about the premises' during the nighttime." Rankin v. Amazon Ins. Co. (Cal.) 25 Pac. 260, 262.

The words "on or about," in a lease of a mill privilege, consisting of land, water power, etc., and giving the lessee the privilege of laying logs, boards, and other lumber on or about said privilege, does not operate as a permission for the lessee to occupy lands of the lessor lying outside the mill privilege. Though the word "about" may frequently have the meaning of "around; on the outside of; without the limitations," etc., yet it as frequently in common conversation means through or over, in various directions or in various parts of the whole, promiscuously. To travel about the country means to go from place to place in the country and not out of town. A man about town is not a man out of town. Thompson v. Banks, 43 N. H. 540.

ABOUT TO SAIL.

The statement in a charter party, stipulating that a vessel is "about to sail," with cargo, is equivalent to a statement that she has her cargo on board and is ready to sail. The Wickham, 5 Sup. Ct. 346, 350, 113 U. S. 40, 28 L. Ed. 885.

The phrase "about to sail," used in a charter party, implies that the vessel is loaded, and hence warranty to that effect is not fulfilled where the vessel was not more than three-elevenths loaded and the time for finishing was subject to all the contingencies of wind, weather, labor, and boats incident to the trade on the north coast of Africa. Von Lingen v. Davidson (U. S.) 4 Fed. 346, 350, reversing s. c. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 178, construing the words to mean "to sail as soon as a cargo could be got on board with reasonable diligence."

ABOVE.

The natural meaning of the term, in a statute forbidding the erection of a bridge or the keeping of a ferry within a certain distance "above or below" another bridge, would seem to be above or below in the course of the river. The ordinary meaning of these words, in such connection, is not that of location, but that of course or direction, and would mean that such distance should be measured on such course. McLeod v. Burroughs, 9 Ga. 213.

"Above" as used in a charter of a bank, providing that it should invest no money in bonds and mortgages, except on real estate worth at least double the amount of the sum invested "above" incumbrances, means "in excess of," so that such real estate should be worth at least double the investment and double the incumbrances. Williams v. McKay, 18 Atl. 824, 828, 46 N. J. Eq. 25; Williams v. McDonald, 7 Atl. 866, 868, 24 N. J. Eq. 392.

"Above agreement," as used in the condition of a bond given to secure the performance of a contract, and reciting that the bond shall be void if goods are delivered under the "above agreement," construed to mean the agreement previously set out in the bond. Booske v. Gulf Ice Co., 5 South. 247, 250, 24 Fla. 550.

A stipulation for value was given on the discharge of a vessel from custody in libel proceedings, which fixed her value at $1,750 and contained an agreement that, in case of default on the part of the claimant, execution might issue for the "above amount." The stipulation bore a heading that it was entered into pursuant to the rules of the court, and by a rule thereof interest on the stipulated value was payable in case of default. Held, that the phrase "above amount" meant, not only the stipulated value, but interest, pursuant to the rule. The Belle (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 128, 129.

The phrase, "the above named" A., appearing in the affidavit to a petition, construed to mean the person of the same name mentioned in the body of the petition. Clement v. Bullens, 34 N. E. 173, 159 Mass. 193.

ABRASION.

An "abrasion" is the breaking of the skin. People v. De Garmo, 76 N. Y. Supp. 477, 480, 73 App. Div. 46.

ABRIDGMENT.

See "Fair Abridgment."

Compilation distinguished.

To abridge means to epitomize, to reduce, to contract, and, to constitute a true and proper abridgment of the work, the whole of it must be preserved in its sense, and therefore the act of abridgment is an act of understanding employed in carrying a larger work into a smaller compass. The mere selection or different arrangement of the part of an original work, so as to bring it into a smaller compass, is not a fair and bona fide abridgment, but there must be a real and substantial condensation of the materials, and the bestowal of labor and judgment thereon, not merely the facile use of the scissors or extracts of the essential parts of the original work. A fair abridgment of any work is considered a new work, since to write it requires labor and the exercise of judgment; but it is only new in the sense that the views of the author are given in a condensed form, and an abridgment must not only contain the arrangement of the original work, but the ideas must be taken from its pages, and it must be in good faith an abridgment, and not a treatise interlarded with citations. Story v. Holcombe (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 171, 173; per Story, J., in Folsom v. Marsh (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 342, 345; Lawrence v. Dana (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 26, 59.

A compilation consists of selected extracts from different authors, while an abridgment is a condensation of the views of the author. A compilation cannot be extended, so as to convey the same knowledge as the original work, while an abridgment contains an epitome of the work abridged, and consequently conveys substantially the same knowledge. A compiler cannot adopt the arrangement of the work cited, while in an abridgment the arrangement of the original work must be used. A compilation infringes the copyright, if the matter transcribed, when published, shall impair the value of the original book; but a fair abridgment, though it may injure the original, is lawful. The work of the abridger is therefore different from that of a mere compiler, and his labor is of a different kind and of a higher order. Story v. Holcombe (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 171, 173.

ABSCOND—ABSCONDING DEBTOR.

A party may "abscond," and subject himself to the operation of the attachment laws against absconding debtors, and still not depart from the limits of the state. Field v. Adreon, 7 Md. 209, 213.

To "abscond" means to go in a clandestine manner out of the jurisdiction of the courts, or to be concealed in order to avoid their process; to hide, conceal, or absent one's self clandestinely, with intent to avoid legal process. Smith v. Johnson, 62 N. W. 217, 218, 43 Neb. 754 (citing Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262; Ware v. Todd, 1 Ala. 200; Fitch v. Walte, 5 Conn. 121; Field v. Adreon, 7 Md. 209); Malvin v. Christoph, 7 N. W. 6, 54 Iowa, 562 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.); Bennett v. Avant, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 152, 153; Gandy v. Jolly, 52 N. W. 376, 377, 34 Neb. 536; McMorran v. Moore, 71 N. W. 506, 506, 113 Mich. 101; Thompson v. Newton, 2 La. 411, 413; Norman v. Zieber, 3 Or. 197, 205.

"Absconding" is withdrawal or absenting one's self privately. Kingsland v. Worsham, 15 Mo. 657, 660.

An "absconding debtor," within Const. art. 1, § 17, providing that there shall be no imprisonment for debt except in cases of absconding debtors, is one who leaves or is about to leave the jurisdiction, or who conceals himself within the jurisdiction, for the purpose of avoiding the process of the courts. Burrichter v. Cline, 28 Pac. 367, 368, 3 Wash. St. 135.

An absconding debtor, within an act allowing attachment of goods of an absconding debtor, includes a debtor who was shut up in his own house. Ives v. Curtis, 2 Root (Conn.) 133.

An absconding debtor is one who, with intent to defeat or delay the demands of his creditors, conceals or withdraws himself from his usual place of residence beyond the reach of process. It is not necessary that he depart from the limits of the state in which he has resided. If one eludes his creditors, he intends to defraud or delay them. If one eludes his creditors, then he can be held to the intent of evading process, and all the law requires in order to constitute an "absconding debtor" is that he shall put himself in such a position that he can and does successfully evade the service of process. In one case it may be by concealment in his own house. It may consist in going from place to place so quickly as to evade meeting with the service of process anywhere. Stafford v. Mills, 32 Atl. 7, 8, 57 N. J. Law, 574.

A man may be absent or absent himself without absconding or intending to elude his creditors. Conard v. Conard, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 154, 156.

Concealment.

The term "abscond," in a statute requiring a creditor in attachment to make complaint on oath that he is his or her debtor, hath removed or is removing out of the state, or so absconds, etc., that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on him, has been considered as equivalent to the term "conceal," which is used in connection with it. Wallis v. Wallace, 7 Miss. (6 How.) 254, 255.

The term "absconding," as used in reference to concealment or absconding of the debtor as ground for attachment, is not strictly synonymous with "concealment"; but concealment for the purpose of defrauding creditors or avoiding service of summons is always "absconding," and both of the terms are used separately and conjunctively. The one refers to the absconding within the state, and the other without the state; so that an affidavit, using the term "absconds or conceals himself," states but one real ground for attachment, the terms being for that purpose equivalent. Garson v. Brumberg, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1003, 1005, 75 Hun, 336.

Departure from state.

Rev. St. 1879, § 2348, declaring that, when a married man shall have "absconded" or absented himself from his place of abode at the time of levy, his wife may claim exempt articles, should be construed to mean a fleeing from his place of abode; and hence where a man became apprehensive of arrest, and fled from the state, and it did not appear that he went for the purpose of changing his domicile, he had absconded, within the meaning of the statute, and the wife was entitled to claim his exemption. Griffith v. Bailey, 79 Mo. 472, 475.

"An absconding debtor is one who is about to leave the state, either openly or secretly, with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors of their just debts." A debtor who is about to leave his state of residence without any definite motive to return will be presumed to have such intent. The term grammatically includes debtors who have actually absconded, as well as those who intend to do so. Norman v. Manciette (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 307.

Where a statute authorized an attachment against the goods of one about to abscond, an affidavit stating that defendant was about to leave the state was insufficient, inasmuch as an open and undisguised departure does not fall within the meaning of the word "abscond." Alken v. Richardson, 15 Vt. 500, 502.

An affidavit for an attachment which avers that defendant is about to abscond himself and his property out of the state is equivalent to averring that defendant is about to remove himself and his property out of the state privately, and therefore is substantially within the statute authorizing an attachment where defendant is about to remove himself from the state. Ware v. Todd, 1 Ala. 199, 200.

Remaining in state.

He who lives without the state, or he who has intentionally concealed himself from his creditors or withdrawn himself from the reach of their suits, with intent to frustrate their just demands; but where there has been no imagination of fraud, and the debtor has only removed from his permanent home to another town in the state in an honest pursuit after property, he cannot be held to be an absconding debtor. Fitch v. Waite, 5 Conn. 117, 121.

One who has departed secretly or clandestinely, and therefore, when used in an attachment statute, is not fulfilled by an affidavit that the debtor has absconded, where it is proved that he did not leave the state, but merely went to another town on business. Branson v. Shinn, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 250, 253.

The term "absconding debtor," in a statute authorizing attachments against "absconding debtors," means a debtor who has actually run away to avoid his creditors, but does not require that he should have left the state. Field v. Adreon, 7 Md. 209, 213.

ABSENCE—ABSENT.

See "Necessary Absence"; "Voluntary Absence."

Where plaintiff contracted to furnish defendant with board and lodging at a stipulated price, "with no deduction in case of absence," the phrase "with no deduction in case of absence" should not be construed to mean that there should be no deductions so long as defendant kept his agreement, but so that under the contract the plaintiff may recover for losses suffered by defendant's leaving before the expiration of the time agreed upon without notice to plaintiff. Wilkinson v. Davies, 40 N. E. 501, 146 N. Y. 25.

Rev. St. c. 24, § 1, cl. 4, providing that, on the division of a town, a person having a settlement therein and "absent at the time" shall have his settlement in that part of the town which includes his last dwelling place, does not apply to a person who had gone to sea, and had not been heard from for 16 years before the division of the town, since the law presumes, after an absence of 9 years, that the absentee was dead, and, being dead, he could not be considered absent. City of Rockland v. Inhabitants of Morrill, 71 Me. 455, 456.

As used in a statute of limitations, which provides that if, after the cause of action shall have accrued, the defendant shall depart from and reside out of the state, the time of his absence shall not be included in the period of limitation, the expressions "reside out of the state" and "the time of his absence" have the same meaning. They are correlative expressions, so that while the defendant resided out of the state he was absent from the state, and accordingly until he again became a resident of the state the suspension of the operation of the statute continued. Penfield v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 566, 569, 134 U. S. 351, 33 L. Ed. 940; Burroughs v. Bloomer, 5 Denio, 532, 535.

In section 1019 of the Revised Statutes, providing that service on corporations may be made on any business agent in the county, in the absence of any of the other representatives named, does not mean absence from the state, but merely from the county. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Luffman (Fla.) 33 South. 710.

Where a resident of a state against whom a cause of action has accrued removes his residence to another state, but continues his business in the state where he formerly resided, coming into the state openly, notoriously, and regularly each business day, and remaining there during working hours, he is not absent from the state within the meaning of a statute suspending the running of the statute of limitations as against parties absent from the state. Webster v. Citizens' Bank of Omaha (Neb.) 98 N. W. 118, 119.

Concealment.

Where a debtor was arrested, but escaped and fled to another house, denying himself to callers and remaining there until dark, intending to delay his creditors, and then, returning to his own house, remained in his room for nearly a month, he was guilty of "absenting" himself to defraud his creditors, within an attachment statute. Bayly v. Schofield, 1 Maule & S. 338, 349.

Within the statutes authorizing process of foreign attachment, an "absent and absconding debtor" is a person who lives without the state, or who has intentionally concealed himself from his creditors, or withdrawn himself from the reach of their suits, with intent to frustrate their just demands. Thus, if a person depart from his usual residence, or remain absent therefrom, or conceal himself in his house, so that he cannot be served with process, with intent to unlawfully delay or defraud his creditors, he is an absconding debtor; but if he depart from the state, or from his usual abode, with the intention of again returning, and without any fraudulent design, he has not absconded, nor absented himself, within the intentment of the law. Fitch v. Waite, 5 Conn. 117, 121.

Intention.

The "absence from the state," within the meaning of the attachment law, making absence from the state for four months a ground of attachment, includes the case of a debtor who leaves his home with the intention of going out of the state, who consummates such purpose, and is absent from his home pursuant to such intention, for the period of four months, notwithstanding some unlooked-for casualty may have delayed him a few days from passing beyond the territorial boundary of the state. Spalding v. Simms, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 285, 289.

Nonresidence.

"Absence" and "nonresidence" are not convertible terms, within the attachment act. Camman v. Bridgewater Copper Min. Co., 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 84.

St. 1838, p. 287, authorizing an attachment of debts due from any person to an "absent debtor," will be construed to include nonresident debtors, as well as resident debtors temporarily absent. Cochran v. Fitch (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 142, 144.

The word "absence," as used in Laws Wash. 1888, pp. 26, 27, § 5, providing for service by publication when other service cannot be had by reason of the "absence" of defendant, does not mean simply being away from a usual place of residence within the jurisdiction of the court, nor a simple absence from the county where the action is pending, but is intended as the equivalent of nonresidence, and only intended to authorize service by publication in cases where the defendant resides out of, and is therefore absent from, the state. State v. Superior Court of Pierce County, 33 Pac. 827, 828, 6 Wash. 352.

"Absent," as used in Rev. St. c. 120, § 6, providing that all actions of assumpsit or on the case must be brought within six years, unless the plaintiff is absent from the United States, extends to foreigners, who never were within the United States. Von Hemert v. Porter, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 210, 215.

"Absent," as used in Comp. St. c. 192, §§ 4, 9, declaring that if the defendant, at the time the cause of action accrued or afterwards, was "absent" from and residing out of the state, the time of such absence shall be excluded in the computation of the several times limited for the commencement of personal actions, refers only to the condition or situation of the person, without allusion to any prior condition or situation, and hence the statute applies to a person who has never been in the state. Paine v. Drew, 44 N. H. 306. 317.

Where a statute of limitation provides that the time of defendant's absence should not be a part of the time limited for the commencement of an action, such absence includes two different conditions, physical absence in the case of a resident, and residence without the state in the case of a non-resident. It was held in Fowler v. Hunt, 10 Johns. 464, that successive absences could be cumulated, and the aggregate deducted from the statutory period. Burroughs v. Bloomer, 5 Denio, 532, went further, and held that the expressions, "and reside out of the state" and "the time of his absence," have the same meaning, so that, while the defendant in this case resided out of it, he was absent from the state, and accordingly, until he again became a resident of the state, the suspension of the operation of the statute continued, and where a defendant was a resident of another state, doing business in New York and attending there on secular days, it was held that the statute did not run in his favor. Connecticut Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Wead, 65 N. E. 261, 262, 172 N. Y. 497, 92 Am. St. Rep. 756.

Presumption of death created.

"Absence," as used in reference to the absence of a person from his domicile unheard of for seven years creating a presumption of death, means that the person is not at the place of his domicile and that his actual residence is unknown. Removal alone is not enough. Francis v. Francis, 37 Atl. 120, 180 Pa. 644.

"Absents," as used in Comp. Laws S. D. § 5312, providing that, if any person on whose life any estate in real property depends "absents" himself, in the state or elsewhere, for seven years together, he shall be accounted naturally dead, means to take or withdraw one's self to such a distance as to prevent intercourse. Burnett v. Costello, 87 N. W. 575, 577, 15 S. D. 89.

In 2 Rev. St. p. 139, § 6, authorizing a widow to recover dower in real estate belonging to her husband in case he has absented himself for a space of five successive years, etc., "absented himself" means a withdrawal of the husband's whereabouts from the wife and his relations, and from the ordinary and usual opportunities of identification, which would naturally and ordinarily give rise to the presumption of death after the lapse of five successive years. Jones v. Zoller, 19 Wkly. Dig. 287.

Prior residence required.

As the term "absence" is used in statute of limitations, requiring that the time within which a debtor shall be "absent" from the state will not be considered as part of the time limited within which suit may be brought on the debt, it means and applies only to a person who has been a resident of the state and is temporarily absent, since a person not a resident and never having a domicile within the state cannot be considered to be absent within the meaning of the statute; such person not being entitled to the defense of the statute at all. White v. Hight, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 204, 205; Milton v. Babson, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 322, 325; Snoddy v. Cage, 5 Tex. 106, 107.

In Rev. St. c. 748, § 7, allowing wills to be contested by suit in chancery for three years after probate, and not afterwards, save to persons absent from the state, the words "absent from the state" do not apply to non-residents. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 25 N. E. 588, 589, 134 Ill. 522, 10 L. R. A. 613.

In Act 1796 (1 Dig. 58), providing that a chose in action may be subjected by a chancery proceeding to the payment of a debt in the proceeding against "absent defendants" and their debtors residing within the state, "absent defendants" means persons who had been resident within the state, but were temporarily absent therefrom. The difference in meaning between "absent defendants" and "nonresidents" is as striking as that between nonresidents and citizens. A man may be a citizen of the state and yet nonresident, and he may be a resident and yet an absent defendant; and as it is the duty of men who owe debts to pay them before leaving the state, or make arrangements for meeting them if the debts should become due in their absence, if they fail to do so, they may be proceeded against under the act. Curd v. Letcher, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 443, 445.

Acts 1777, c. 2, giving the right to attach property of an "absent debtor," had no other meaning than that of a debtor who had removed himself from his home to avoid process, and did not confer jurisdiction to render a judgment on an attachment against the inhabitant of another state. Den v. Deaderick's Ex'rs, 9 Tenn. (1 Yerg.) 125, 135.

In a statute providing that, if a defendant cannot be found and is not "absent from the island," it shall be deemed good service by leaving the summons at his usual place of abode, the words "absent from the island" meant only persons who had been present there and subject to jurisdiction of the court out of which the process issued. Buchanan v. Rucker, 9 East, 192, 194.

Hutch. Code, p. 764, authorizing notice by publication against any "absent" defendant, is to be construed as meaning defendants having their residence in the state, who are absent from the state or cannot be found at their usual place of residence. Wash v. Heard, 27 Miss. (5 Cushm.) 400, 405.

Temporary absence.

To an ordinary mind the term "absence," when applied to the occupant of a dwelling house, does not convey the same but a widely different meaning than "removal," and according to the common understanding persons leaving their houses on visits, excursions, or other temporary occasions do not remove from or cease to occupy them. Stone v. Granite State Fire Ins. Co., 45 Atl. 235, 236, 69 N. H. 438.

Absence from the state, within the meaning of the statute of limitations, must be not merely temporary and occasional, but of such a character and with such intent as to constitute a change of domicile. Hallet v. Bassett, 100 Mass. 167, 170; Barney v. Oelrichs, 11 Sup. Ct. 414, 415, 138 U. S. 529, 84 L. Ed. 1037.

With reference to a person in a statute other than that of limitation, absence means one who has been present, not a nonresident. The word conveys the idea of a temporary condition, a cessation of, and the probability or possibility of returning, presence. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 35 Ill. App. 123, 124.

While every casual or temporary absence of a debtor from his place of abode for a brief period may prevent the service of a summons, yet it is not ground of attachment. It may be asserted that, where the absence is such that, if a summons issue on the day the attachment is sued out, it will be served on the defendant in sufficient time before the return day to give the plaintiff all the rights which he can have at the return term, defendant has not so absented himself within the attachment statute as that ordinary process of law cannot be served upon him. Kingsland v. Worsham, 15 Mo. 657, 661. This rule was followed in Charlton County v. Moberly, 59 Mo. 238, 239, where it was held that, where defendant has merely left the state with his family temporarily for business, health, or relaxation, he has not absented himself within the meaning of the statute.

The absence of a debtor which is ground for domestic attachment does not apply to the absence in the regular course of his business of a theatrical manager, whose business takes him away from the state. Loesh v. Rivers, 5 Phila. 83.

Within the meaning of an attachment law, authorizing an attachment if the debtor is absent or absconding, the word "absent" will not be taken or understood in its literal sense; but what is understood by the word is that the debtor should not only be absent, but that he has absconded or is a nonresident. Mere absence from the state temporarily on business or pleasure certainly would not fall within the mischief of the act, and consequently could not be intended as having been meant by the Legislature. Mandel v. Peet, 18 Ark. 236, 243.

Under the provisions of the by-laws of a beneficial society that no sick benefits shall be granted to resident brothers for more than a week prior to application therefor, and an "absent" brother claiming benefits must send a statement of the case, attested by the sachem of a tribe near the place where he may be, one out of the jurisdiction of the tribe or lodge to which he belongs is an absent brother, without regard to the place of his residence, since the term "resident" does not have reference to the legal residence of a party, but designates one who at the time of claiming benefits is within the jurisdiction of the tribe, while an absent brother is one who happens at the time to be permanently or temporarily without the jurisdiction. Walsh v. Cosumes Tribe, No. 14, Improved Order of Red Men, 41 Pac. 418, 103 Cal. 496.

Executor.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 1354, providing that, where a person "absent from the state" is named executor, if there is another executor who accepts the trust and qualifies, the latter may have letters testamentary and administer the estate until the return of the absentee, who may then be admitted as a joint executor, "absent" means a person both actively and constructively absent; that is, a person who is out of the state and has made no application for letters. In re Brown's Estate, 22 Pac. 233, 234, 80 Cal. 381.

Foreign corporation.

Shannon's Code, § 4455, provides that, if the person against whom an action accrues be absent from the state, the time of such absence shall not be taken as part of the time limited for the commencement of the action. It was held that absence from the state meant such absence as renders it impracticable at all times to obtain the service of process, so that while a corporation may reside beyond the state, and be out of the state, still it may, through its officers and agents, subject itself to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state, and not be absent, within the sense of this provision of the statute. Turcott v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 45 S. W. 1067, 1069, 101 Tenn. 102, 40 L. R. A. 768, 70 Am. St. Rep. 661.

The term "absent from the state," as used in a statute authorizing the verification of an answer to be made by the agent or attorney of defendant if he is absent from the state, does not describe a foreign insurance company which has appointed an agent in the state upon whom process may be served for it, as provided in Foreign Corporation Act, §§ 7, 8. West v. Home Ins. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 622.

Civ. Code, § 61, declares that a subsequent marriage contracted with any person during the life of a former husband or wife is illegal, unless such former husband or wife was "absent" and not known to such person to be living for the space of five successive years immediately preceding such present marriage, etc. Held, that an absent spouse, within the meaning of the statute, is one who has left his or her residence, home, or domicile; and hence a wife, who had been living with her husband in Australia, and who left him and went to live with her parents, who subsequently moved to California, was an absent spouse after the expiration of the five years, entitling the husband to remarriage. Jackson v. Jackson, 29 Pac. 957, 94 Cal. 446.

"Absented himself," as used in Rev. St. p. 139, § 6 (volume 3, § 2332), providing that if any person, whose husband or wife shall have "absented himself," or herself, for the space of five years, without being known to such person to be living during that time, shall marry during the lifetime of such absent husband or wife, the marriage shall be void only from the time, etc., means a withdrawal of his or her whereabouts from the husband or wife and relatives, and from the ordinary and usual opportunities of identification. It means that withdrawal from the family which would, after the lapse of five successive years, lead naturally to the inference that death had ensued. The fact that a husband so absented himself still remained in the general locality in which he lived did not prevent his departure being an "absenting himself," within the meaning of the statute, if his whereabouts were unknown to his family or relatives. Jones v. Zoller (N. Y.) 29 Hun, 551, 554; Id., 32 Hun, 280, 283.

Judge.

"Absence, sickness, or other inability," as used in a statute giving a justice of the peace jurisdiction in the "absence, sickness, or other inability" of a municipal judge, cannot be construed to include an arbitrary refusal of the judge to act in a given case. Klaise v. State, 27 Wis. 462, 463.

Code 1851, § 111, providing that, in case of the "absence" of a county judge, the county clerk shall fill the place of such judge, means "absence" from the county seat, but does not mean that the judge is to be regarded as out of office while absent, or that he shall do no official act during that period. Judicial power is necessarily local in its nature, and its exercise, to be valid, must be local also; but it is otherwise as to ministerial power, and the act of a county judge in signing, sealing, and issuing bonds for the erection of a courthouse, which he was authorized to do, and was merely ministerial in its character, was properly done by him, instead of by the clerk, though he was without the state, for by being absent he did not wholly abdicate his office, certain powers thereof with which he was clothed merely falling into abeyance and continuing until his absence ceased. Lynde v. Winnebago County, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 6, 14, 21 L. Ed. 272.

Although a District Judge of a Circuit Court of the United States was on the bench at the time of the hearing of a cause, yet if he did not sit in the cause nor participate in the trial he was absent in contemplation of law. Bingham v. Cabbot, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 19, 36, 1 L. Ed. 491.

"Absent," as used in Acts 1888, p. 64, authorizing the chief justice to hold court in the absence of a law judge, means nonpresence in the courts. When the law judge is temporarily away, he must be presumed to be away by reason of some inability to attend, and he is absent in the statutory sense. State v. Engeman, 23 Atl. 676, 677, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 247.

Parties in judicial proceedings.

Comp. St. p. 645 (Code, § 1001), declaring that, when judgment shall have been rendered against a defendant in his "absence," the same may be set aside under certain conditions, means where a judgment is rendered against a defendant who did not appear. Strine v. Kauffman, 11 N. W. 867, 868, 12 Neb. 423.

Gen. St. c. 146, § 21, limits the right of review to petitions filed within a year from the date of the judgment complained of except where the judgment was rendered in the "absence" of petitioner. Held, that the word "absence" as so used should not be construed as meaning absent from the commonwealth, but that a defendant was absent within the meaning of the statute where his presence was not secured either by his appearance or by service of summons, in which case a judgment rendered on his involuntary default was rendered in his absence. James v. Townsend, 104 Mass. 367, 371.

In Comp. Laws 1879, c. 81, § 14, providing that, when judgment is rendered in justice court against defendants in their absence, it may be set aside, absence is not equivalent to the term "failed to appear," but is to be construed as meaning "not actually present at the time of the actual trial," and hence the section authorizes the setting aside of such judgment when the defendant appeared, but was not present at the time of the trial. Covart v. Haskins, 18 Pac. 522, 523, 39 Kan. 571.

Where defendant has been served with personal service, and enters his appearance, but fails to appear and defend, relying on a promise of notice, the judgment was not rendered in his "absence," within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 187, § 22, providing that a judgment so rendered may be reviewed within a year. Riley v. Hale, 16 N. E. 276, 278, 146 Mass. 465.

Protest.

"Absence of protest," as used in 1 Supp. Rev. St. U. S. 81, providing that whenever duties upon any imported goods shall have been determined and paid, and such goods shall have been delivered to the owner, such statement of duty shall, after the expiration of one year from the time of entry, in the absence of protest by the owner, be final and conclusive upon the parties, means "the absence of any existing protest pending and in force at the expiration of a year or at the date of the proposed repudiation; that is, a protest upon which proceedings are then pending, or which may serve as a basis for some future appeal to the Secretary or of some suit in the courts." United States v. Lang (U. S.) 18 Fed. 15, 18.

Many words of common use in our language have two or more meanings. It is not infrequent that a word having one meaning in its ordinary employment has a materially different or modified meaning in its legal use. The word "absence" is a fair example. It is held that one may be absent, though actually present, as where a judge, though on the bench, does not sit in the cause. Bingham v. Cabbot, 3 Dall. 19, 1 L. Ed. 491. It has also been held to mean not present. Paine v. Drew, 44 N. H. 306. It has been held, too, as not meaning out of the state only. "Absence" and "disability" are words which, from their use in statutes, may have two different meanings. They are quite frequently found in some form in the statutes of this and other states, as well as in the Constitutions of many of the states. The Legislature has not defined the sense in which either of them is to be construed. "Disability" is a word of scarcely less ambiguity, as generally used in common parlance, than "absence." It is a difficult task, if not an impossible one, to lay down a rule that could apply to all cases, defining the meaning of "absence" as used in the statute. The word "absence" as used in the statute providing that, on the "absence" of the mayor or of a city, the president of the board of aldermen shall act as mayor, means not merely physical absence of the mayor from the city, but such an absence as renders him incapable for the time being of performing the act that may be in question, which act must present such a necessity for immediate attention as to require it to be then executed. Watkins v. Mooney (Ky.) 71 S. W. 622, 624.

The words "necessarily absent," as used in the Louisiana statute authorizing district judges to appoint an attorney to represent the state when from any cause the district attorney is recused, "necessarily absent," or sick, means necessarily absent from the court, not from the parish; and the court was authorized to appoint an attorney to represent the state, where the district attorney was necessarily absent from the court, though not from the parish. State v. Smith, 31 South. 693, 694, 107 La. 129.

"Absence," as used in Act April 21, 1876 (1 Gen. St. p. 841), providing that a deputy clerk is empowered to take the verdict of a jury during the "absence" of the clerk, means the nonpresence in the courts. Manners v. Ribsam (N. J.) 41 Atl. 676, 677 (citing State v. Engeman, 54 N. J. Law, 247, 23 Atl. 676).

Gen. St. 1890, § 1931, providing that all writs, orders, and processes of the probate court shall be issued and directed to the sheriff to be served, except in the case of his "absence" or nonattendance, means absence from the county where the process is to be served. Skinner v. Board of Com'rs of Cowley, 66 Pac. 635, 637, 63 Kan. 557.

Act 1831 authorizes the deputy clerk of a county to perform the duties of clerk whenever the clerk shall be absent from his office. Held, that the word "absent," so used, should be construed at a distance, or to mean "a withdrawal of the clerk from the performance of his official duties, and hence the deputy has no authority to act if the clerk, though without the office, is in the place in which the office is situated at the time." Lucas v. Ensign, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 142, 143.

Servant.

St. 4 Geo. IV. c. 34, § 3, making it an offense for a person who has contracted to serve another for a certain term to absent himself from his service, means a willful absence from such service without lawful cause. In re Turner, 9 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 80, 90.

Soldier.

"Absented himself," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 1342 (Article of War, 103), providing that no person shall be liable to be tried and punished by a general court-martial for any offense which appears to have been committed more than two years before the issuing of the order for such trial, unless by reason of having "absented himself," or of some other manifest impediment, he shall not have been amenable to justice within that period, should be construed to mean such an absence as imposes an impediment to the bringing of the offender to trial and punishment. It means absence from the jurisdiction of the military courts—that is, absence from the United States; and the statute does not admit of the strict construction that the business referred to is limited to absence from post of duty. Hence the statute applies to desertions. In re Davison (U. S.) 4 Fed. 507, 509.

ABSENT FROM DUTY.

Act March 3, 1863, providing that any officer "absent from duty with leave" shall, during his absence, receive half of the pay and allowance prescribed by law, cannot be construed to apply to an officer ordered to proceed to a particular place and there to await orders; for, while absent from duty with leave, the officer is at liberty to go where he will during the permitted absence, to employ his time as he pleases, and to surrender his leave if he chooses. If he reports himself at the expiration of his leave, it is all that can be asked of him. The obligations of an officer directed to proceed to a place specified, there to await orders, are quite different. It is his duty to go to that place, and to remain at that place. He cannot go elsewhere. He cannot return until ordered. He is as much under orders, and can no more question the duty of obedience, than if ordered to an ambush to lie in wait for an enemy, to march to the front in a particular direction, or to the rear by a specified time. United States v. Williamson, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 411, 414, 23 L. Ed. 89.

ABSENT WITHOUT LEAVE.

Absence without leave does not constitute the offense of desertion under the articles of war, or willful desertion. When committed by a soldier, it is a violation of duty; but, as it is accompanied always with an intent to return, and to submit himself, if necessary, to punishment, if it has been incurred, it is a very different offense to that of abandoning the service permanently, or for some indefinite time, unaccompanied by an intent to return, which constitutes a desertion. Inhabitants of Hanson v. Inhabitants of South Scituate, 115 Mass. 336, 339.

Absence of a patrolman from roll call because of serious illness, word having been sent giving information of such fact, but not until an hour after roll call, was not "absence without leave," for which such patrolman could be legally removed from office. People v. Board of Police, 8 N. Y. Supp. 640, 55 Hun, 445.

ABSENTEE.

An "absentee" is a person who has resided in the state and has departed without leaving any one to represent him. State v. Judge of Parish Court, 15 La. 81, 85; State ex rel. Denny v. Judge of Second Dist. Court of New Orleans, 16 La. Ann. 390, 392.

An absentee may be either a person who has resided in the state and has departed without leaving any one to represent him or a person who was never domiciled in the state and resides abroad. Samory v. Montgomery, 19 La. Ann. 333, 338; Dreville v. Cucullu, 18 La. Ann. 695, 696; Succession of Guillemin, 2 La. Ann. 634, 636; Hill v. Bowman, 14 La. 445, 447; Morris v. Bienvenu, 30 La. Ann. 878, 880.

The term is the opposite of "resident," and hence a person cannot be both a resident and an absentee at the same time. Therefore persons residing in a city within the state, who went outside the state to a resort during a part of the year without leaving an agent to represent them, could not be considered as absentees, authorizing proceedings against them in personam on being cited to a curator ad hoc. Dreville v. Cucullu, 18 La. Ann. 695, 696; Morris v. Bienvenu, 30 La. Ann. 878, 880.

One who has a dwelling in the state and resides in it for some months during each year, but is a citizen of another state, is an "absentee," who, if he have no known representative, may be legally represented in a suit brought against him by a curator ad hoc. Morris v. Bienvenue, 30 La. Ann. 878, 880.

An "absentee" is a person who has resided in the state, and has departed without leaving any one to represent him. It means, also, the person who never was domiciliated in the state and resides abroad. In matters of succession, the heir whose residence is not known is deemed an absentee. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 3.

ABSINTHE.

As a spirit, see "Spirit—Spirits."

"Absinthe," according to the Century Dictionary, is "the common name of a highly aromatic liqueur of an opaline green color and bitter taste," and is prepared by "steeping in alcohol or strong spirits bitter herbs," the chief of them being wormwood. It is used as a beverage, and is not a proprietary preparation. It appeared that the wormwood "has a medicinal effect upon the human system as a tonic" and that the article contains anisette, a cordial. Erhardt v. Steinhart, 153 U. S. 177, 179, 182, 14 Sup. Ct. 775, 777, 38 L. Ed. 678, 679.

ABSOLUTE.

"Absolute" came originally from the Latin, and means to "loose from." Webster gives many definitions of the word, as "completed, or regarded as complete; finished; perfect; total; as absolute perfection, absolute beauty. Freed or loosed from any limitation or condition. Positive; clear; certain. Unconditioned; unrelated." People v. Ferry, 24 Pac. 33, 34, 84 Cal. 31; Wilson v. White, 33 N. E. 361, 364, 133 Ind. 614, 19 L. R. A. 581.

The word "absolute" has various significations, which it receives in popular use. It means "complete, unconditional, not relative, not limited, independent of anything extraneous." In its signification of "complete, not limited," it is used in the law to distinguish an estate in fee from an estate in remainder. In its signification of "unconditional," it describes a bond, a conveyance, or estate without condition. In its signification of "not relative," it describes the rights of a man in the state of nature, as contradistinguished from those which pertain to him in the social relations. Johnson's Adm'r v. Johnson, 32 Ala. 637, 640.

The term "absolute," as used in insurance policies, has been held to be synonymous with "vested," and used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional." German Fire Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 42 N. E. 286, 289, 13 Ind. App. 627 (citing Hough v. City Fire Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10, 76 Am. Dec. 581); Woody v. Old Dominion Ins. Co., 31 Grat. (Va.) 362, 375.

A statute of South Carolina authorized the sale and conveyance of a canal and appurtenances, subject to certain conditions, among which was one that the state should be furnished with 500 horse power of water power and the right of the state to the free use of said 500 horse power shall be "absolute." It was held that "absolute" meant unrestricted and unconditional, so that the state was entitled to grant the right to third parties to use any part of the water power so reserved. "Absolute," as so used, does not mean merely "perpetual," or "for all time," but is to be construed in its usual legal sense. Thus an absolute estate in land is an estate in fee simple; in the law of insurance, an absolute interest in property is one which is so completely vested in the individual that there should be no danger of his being deprived of it without his own consent. Columbia Water Power Co. v. Columbia Electric St. Ry., Light & Power Co., 19 Sup. Ct. 247, 253, 172 U. S. 475, 43 L. Ed. 521.

An absolute conveyance, an absolute right, an absolute estate, or an absolute sale, is that which cannot be defeated or changed by any condition, restriction, or limitation. A conditional sale, and so on, as above specified, is one which is restricted or limited by some condition, the nonperformance of which will hinder it from operation and effect, if it be a condition precedent. Falconer v. Baltimore & J. R. Co., 69 N. Y. 491, 498.

ABSOLUTE CONVICTION.

In a prosecution for robbery, the court charged that the jury's opinion of the guilt of the accused must "approach absolute conviction," in consideration of which the court said that the word "absolute" was given many meanings, among others, "completed, or regarded as complete; finished, perfect, total; freed or loosed from any condition or limitation; positive, clear, certain." Hence absolute conviction means conviction beyond a possibility of doubt, which the law does not require a jury to attain in order to render a verdict against a defendant; but there was no error in directing the jury that their opinion must "approach absolute certainty," viz., a conviction so perfect and unconditional as to exclude the possibility of a doubt. People v. Ferry, 24 Pac. 33, 34, 84 Cal. 31.

ABSOLUTE DELIVERY.

Absolute delivery of a deed is one which is complete upon the actual transfer of the instrument from the possession of the grantor. Dyer v. Skadan, 87 N. W. 277, 278, 128 Mich. 348, 92 Am. St. Rep. 461.

ABSOLUTE DISPOSAL.

A devise in a will was in these words: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my wife, Mary, after payment of my debts and funeral expenses, all my estate, both real and personal, to be at her 'absolute disposal,' according to an agreement made with her," etc. Held, that the words "absolute disposal," as there used, were sufficient to carry the fee, and gave testator's wife the entire estate left by him. Jackson v. Babcock (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 389, 393.

ABSOLUTE DRUNKENNESS.

Absolute drunkenness, within the meaning of the rule that absolute drunkenness is a defense against contracts made while in a state of absolute drunkenness, does not mean complete insensibility. A man may be absolutely drunk, without being dead drunk. Cavender v. Waddingham, 5 Mo. App. 457, 465.

ABSOLUTE ESTATE.

By "absolute estate," as used in a will giving an estate absolutely and in fee to certain persons named, is intended a full and complete estate. Cooper v. Cooper, 38 Atl. 198, 200, 56 N. J. Eq. 48.

"Absolute" is not a word used to distinguish a fee from a life estate, but to distinguish a qualified or conditional from a simple fee; and in a devise to testator's son, with a provision that, should he have other children, "then the devise to him, his heirs and assigns, to be absolute," it means that, in the event of the son having other children, his estate should no longer be subject to certain executory devises over, but should be absolute. Greenawalt v. Greenawalt, 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 483, 487.

ABSOLUTE FEE.

See "Fee Simple Absolute."

ABSOLUTE GIFT.

There is a difference between an absolute gift and one made mortis causa. In the former case the donee becomes in the lifetime of the donor the absolute owner of the thing given; but donatio mortis causa leaves the whole title in the donor, unless the event occurs, to wit, the death of the donor, which is to divest him. Buecker v. Carr, 47 Atl. 34, 35, 60 N. J. Eq. 300.

ABSOLUTE GUARANTY.

An absolute guaranty is an unconditional promise of payment or performance on default of the principal. White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Powell (Ky.) 74 S. W. 746 (citing Mast v. Lehman, 100 Ky. 466, 33 S. W. 1056).

An "absolute guaranty," in the law of negotiable instruments, is an unconditional undertaking on the part of the guarantor that the maker will pay the note. Beardsley v. Hawes, 40 Atl. 1043, 1044, 71 Conn. 39.

An "absolute guaranty" of a bill or note is a guaranty of the payment of the bill or note, and one who guaranties payment becomes absolutely liable on any default of payment by its principal. Esberg-Bachman Leaf Tobacco Co. v. Heid (U. S.) 62 Fed. 962, 963.

An "absolute guaranty" is one simultaneously acted upon, as in the case of goods then sold and delivered to a third party on the credit of the guaranty, or that has no element of futurity in it. Farmers' Bank v. Tatnall, 31 Atl. 879, 880, 7 Houst. 287.

An absolute guaranty is an unconditional promise of payment or performance on default of the principal. To bind the principal, it is not necessary that there should be notice of acceptance of the guaranty and default of the principal, or that any steps should be taken to enforce the contract guarantied against the principal. The guarantee may proceed against the guarantor on default of the principal. Yager v. Kentucky Title Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2240, 2241, 68 S. W. 1027.

ABSOLUTE IMBECILITY.

The word "absolute," used in an instruction that the fact that testator's mind was impaired by age or disease, if not to the point of lunacy or "absolute" imbecility, would not take away his legal capacity to make a will, is defined as completed, or regarded as complete, finished, perfect, total; and the synonyms are "perfect; total; complete." The instruction was held erroneous, on the ground that such an extent of mental weakness was not required to avoid a will.—Campbell v. Campbell, 22 N. E. 620, 622, 130 Ill. 466, 6 L. R. A. 167.

ABSOLUTE INTEREST.

In a condition of a policy providing that any interest in property insured, not "absolute," must be represented to the company, the word "absolute" refers to the character or quality of the estate, and is synonymous with "vested," and used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional." Wooddy v. Old Dominion Ins. Co. (Va.) 31 Grat. 362, 375, 31 Am. Rep. 732; Hough v. City Fire Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10, 21, 76 Am. Dec. 531; German Fire Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 42 N. E. 286, 289, 13 Ind. App. 627; Gaylord v. Lamar Fire Ins. Co., 40 Mo. 13, 17, 93 Am. Dec. 289.

The owner of an "absolute interest" in property, within the meaning of a policy of insurance, is one who "has dominion of a thing, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal," with the right to enjoy, use, or destroy the same, as far as the law permits or he is not prevented by covenant or agreement. The owner of a fee may commit waste, but the owner of a life interest cannot lawfully do so. "Sole owner" must mean that no one else has or owns an interest in the real estate, and there is no distinction between sole owner and the owner of an "absolute interest." A sole interest and an absolute interest mean the same thing. Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 28 N. W. 555, 556, 69 Iowa, 202.

The term has no fixed, unvarying meaning, when used in connection with an interest in property. It is not always synonymous with "unqualified." Used in connection with an estate, it means an estate in lands not subject to, or defeasible on, any condition. It may be quite as often and pertinently used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional" as to "qualified" or "unincumbered," and in a contract of insurance requiring the interest, if not a leasehold or not absolute, to be noted in the policy, it is so used. It did not require that the policy should express a mortgage upon the property owned by the insured in fee simple. Washington Fire Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, 431, 3 Am. Rep. 149.

Equitable title.

An equitable title, that would be protected by a court of equity as such, may be an ownership as absolute as the legal title. Gaylord v. Lamar Fire Ins. Co., 40 Mo. 13, 17, 93 Am. Dec. 289.

The term "absolute interest," as used in an insurance policy, providing that, if the interest in the property to be insured is not absolute, it must be so represented to the company and expressed in writing, etc., should be construed to include the interest of a person in property the legal title to which was in another party, with whom the insured had, at the time of the application, made a parol contract for its purchase for a price agreed upon, which the insured had agreed absolutely to pay and a part of which he had paid, and where the insured had entered into possession as purchaser and had made valuable improvements on the property, so that he must sustain the loss. The subject of insurance was an interest, not a title. It is an interest, not a title, of which the conditions of insurance speak. The terms "interest" and "title" are not synonymous. Hough v. City Fire Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10, 19, 76 Am. Dec. 581.

When a policy provides that, if the title is not absolute, it must be so stated in the policy, or it shall be void, the question is, first, whether the insured had really an insurable interest in the property, and, second, whether, if the property is destroyed, the entire loss falls upon him. Hence, after a contract for the sale of real estate, the purchaser being the equitable owner thereof, and responsible for the purchase money, and liable to the whole loss that may befall it, including the loss of the buildings by fire, he has an "absolute interest." Elliott v. Ashland Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 12 Atl. 676, 678, 117 Pa. 548, 2 Am. St. Rep. 703.

Under a policy requiring the interest of assured, if less than the "absolute" ownership, to be so stated in the policy, an assured, who held an absolute, unconditional title in fee, but held such title as mortgagee only, did not hold the title absolutely, and was therefore not entitled to recover; his interest not having been so stated. Williams v. Buffalo German Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 63, 65.

Life estate.

A fire insurance policy providing that, if the interest of assured be a leasehold or other "interest" not "absolute," it must be so stated in the policy, must be construed to mean a complete and perfect interest, amounting to an estate in fee, and not an estate for life or for years; hence, where assured had but a life estate in the property, a policy not stating such fact and containing such condition was void. Davis v. Iowa State Ins. Co., 25 N. W. 745, 746, 67 Iowa, 494.

Under an insurance policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable if the interest of the assured is not one of absolute and sole ownership, no recovery can be had if such interest is only that of a tenant for life. Collins v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 46 N. W. 906, 907, 44 Minn. 440.

ABSOLUTE LIEN.

A lien in an attachment is dependent for its final effect on the result of the suit, and in that sense the lien is conditional and contingent; but it is not on that account any less an absolute and fixed lien. By the term "absolute" is not meant that the lien is unconditional, but that it is complete and perfect as a lien, during its continuance, as much so as a lien by judgment or any other lien. No lien whatever upon property is an absolute, indefeasible interest in the property; but all liens are in their nature defeasible. In re Reed (U. S.) 21 Vt. 635, 638, 20 Fed. Cas. 417, 419.

ABSOLUTE MORAL CERTAINTY.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, based on circumstantial evidence, the court was requested to charge that the prosecution's hypothesis should be established to an absolute moral certainty. The request was denied, which was held proper on appeal; the court saying: "A philologist may be able to say that the word 'absolute' in the instruction adds no force to the words 'moral certainty'; but the word suggests a degree of certainty greater than that moral certainty which can be reached on such evidence as securable in courts of justice." People v. Davis, 64 Cal. 440, 1 Pac. 889, 890 (cited in People v. Ferry, 24 Pac. 32, 34, 84 Cal. 31).

The word "absolute," used in connection with "moral certainty" in an instruction referring to the degree of proof, imports a degree of certainty greater than moral certainty, which can be reached on such evidence as is securable in a court of justice, and hence, in a prosecution for robbery, it was not error for the court to strike the word from a requested instruction that the identity of the accused must be established to an "absolute" moral certainty. People v. Nelson, 24 Pac. 1006, 1008, 85 Cal. 421.

ABSOLUTE NULLITIES.

Absolute nullities, prior to the revolution of Texas, consisted of two kinds—those resulting from stipulations derogating from the force of laws made for the preservation of public order, and those established for the interest of individuals. The former were not susceptible of ratification; but, if by subsequent dispositions of law or by succession of time they cease to be illegal, they may from that time be ratified. Clay v. Clay's Heirs, 35 Tex. 509, 530; Means v. Robinson, 7 Tex. 502, 516. But, in relation to absolute nullities established for the interest of individuals, the rule as to onerous contracts is without exception that the party in whose favor they are established may ratify the contracts, either expressly or impliedly, and that in all cases of executed contracts, susceptible of tacit ratification, the prescription or ratification juris et de jure results from silence and inaction during the time fixed for prescription; and hence a deed of a minor of his real estate may be ratified, either expressly or impliedly, after he becomes of age. Means v. Robinson, 7 Tex. 502, 516.

ABSOLUTE OWNER.

Until the death of the husband, leaving her surviving, the wife has no claim on realty owned by him in fee and conveyed by him alone after the marriage; and hence the husband's grantee becomes "absolute owner" of the property, within the meaning of a question in an application for insurance thereon, the answer to which was made a warranty. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Bevis, 46 N. E. 928, 18 Ind. App. 17.

ABSOLUTE OWNERSHIP.

The phrase "absolute ownership," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 773, § 1, declaring that the absolute ownership of personal property shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance and until the termination of not more than two lives in being, etc., signifies ownership without any condition or incumbrance. Steinway v. Steinway, 10 Misc. Rep. 563, 571, 572, 32 N. Y. Supp. 183.

The word "absolute," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 773, § 1, providing that the absolute ownership of personal property shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance and until the termination of not more than two lives in being, etc., was used as the opposite of "conditional," and in the same sense as "perfect." It signifies "without any condition or incumbrance." This construes the statute as if it read, "The unconditional and unincumbered ownership of personal property shall not be suspended," etc. Williams v. Lande, 26 N. Y. Supp. 703, 704, 74 Hun, 425; Converse v. Kellogg, 7 Barb. 590, 597.

The title to personal property cannot be said to be perfect, or the ownership "absolute," while one person is the general owner and another has possession with a right to possession. Converse v. Kellogg (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 590, 597.

The term "absolute ownership" hardly needs definition. An ownership liable to be divested by any contingency arising by any instrument creating the ownership is not absolute. The right to suspend the power of alienation of real property may continue through two lives and a minority. The absolute ownership of personal property, under Laws 1897, c. 417, § 2, can be suspended only for two lives; and where testator bequeathed his personal property to his two sons, in trust for their children, until they should attain the age of 21 years, and, if any of them should die before becoming 21 years old, then to go to the child who should attain that age, and when the will was executed and at testator's death one son had three minor children and the other none, the will provided for the suspension of absolute ownership for more than two lives in being. In re Howland's Will, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1025, 1027, 75 App. Div. 207.

The ownership of property is absolute when a single person has the absolute dominion over it, and may use it or dispose of it according to his pleasure, subject only to general laws. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3279; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 195; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 679.

ABSOLUTE POWER OF ALIENATION.

The word "absolute," in an Indiana statute prohibiting suspension of the "absolute" power of alienation for a longer period than the duration of a life or lives in being, has no reference to the time, but rather to the power or the privilege of aliening. The word "absolute" could not mean for all time, since that would disagree with the word "suspended," implying temporary denial, and with the declared right to suspend the power during the period of certain lives, and, by implication at least, not beyond such period. Fowler v. Duhme, 42 N. E. 623, 638, 143 Ind. 248.

The term "absolute power of alienation," as used in Rev. St. § 2039, declaring that the absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the creation of the estate, is defined by section 2038, as follows: "Such power of alienation is suspended where there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee of possession can be conveyed." Becker v. Chester, 91 N. W. 87, 93, 115 Wis. 90.

ABSOLUTE POWER OF DISPOSITION.

Every power of disposition is deemed absolute by means of which the holder is enabled in his lifetime to dispose of the entire fee, in possession or in expectancy, for his own benefit. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4142.

ABSOLUTE PREDESTINATION.

"Absolute predestination" means that God foreknew and predestined all things whatsoever that may come to pass, whether with reference to the material universe or the salvation of souls; that is, God predestined all things which happen. He foreknew and predestined that President McKinley would be assassinated in Buffalo, etc. Bennett v. Morgan, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1824, 1827, 66 S. W. 287, 289.

ABSOLUTE PROPERTY.

Property is absolute when an external object or thing is objectively and lawfully appropriated by one to his own use in exclusion of all others. Griffith v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 23 S. C. 25, 33, 55 Am. Rep. 1.

After a bequest for life, a limitation was granted to the issue of the beneficiary, to be their absolute property, forever. Held, that the word in this connection carried the fee. Myers v. Anderson (S. C.) 1 Strob. Eq. 344, 347, 47 Am. Dec. 537.

A deed to a trustee, to hold as the "absolute property" of the grantor's wife, conveyed a fee simple. Fackler v. Berry, 25 S. E. 887, 888, 93 Va. 565, 57 Am. St. Rep. 819.

The word "absolute," as defined by Webster, means "loosed from any limitation or condition," complete in itself, perfect, consummate; and hence, where a will bequeathed certain property to a legatee, to be her absolute property during her life, it belonged to her freed from any limitation or condition, and could not be used therefor to pay taxes on the property from which the interest sprang. Wilson v. White, 33 N. E. 361, 364, 133 Ind. 614, 19 L. R. A. 581.

A will giving to two grandchildren, on their arrival at age, "the entire and absolute property thereof," means undivided, unmingled, complete in all its parts, free, and not controlled by others. Williams v. Van Cleave, 23 Ky. (7 T. B. Mon.) 388, 393.

ABSOLUTE RIGHTS.

The word "absolute," in its significance of "not relative," describes the rights of man in a state of nature, as contradistinguished from those which pertain to him in his social relations. Johnson's Adm'r v. Johnson, 32 Ala. 637, 641.

The absolute rights of individuals may be resolved into the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property. These rights are declared to be natural, inherent, and unalienable. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 37, 40, 29 Am. Rep. 356.

By the "absolute rights" of individuals is meant those which are so in their primary and strictest sense, such as would belong to their persons merely in a state of nature, and which every man is entitled to enjoy, whether out of society or in it. The rights of personal security, of personal liberty, and private property do not depend upon the Constitution for their existence. They existed before the Constitution was made, or the government was organized. These are what are termed the "absolute rights" of individuals, which belong to them independently of all government, and which all governments which derive their power from the consent of the governed were instituted to protect. People v. Berberich (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 224, 229; McCartee v. Orphan Asylum Soc. (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 437, 511, 513, 18 Am. Dec. 516; People v. Toynbee (N. Y.) 2 Parker, Cr. R. 329, 369, 370 (quoting 1 Bl. Comm. 123).

Chancellor Kent (2 Kent, Comm. 1) defines the "absolute rights" of individuals as the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property. These rights have been justly considered and frequently declared by the people of this country to be natural, inherent, and inalienable, and it may be stated as a legal axiom that since the great laboring masses of our country have little or no property but their labor, and the free right to employ it to their own best interests and advantage, it must be considered that the constitutional inhibition against all invasion of property without due process of law was as fully intended to embrace and protect that property as any of the accumulations it may have gained. In re Jacobs (N. Y.) 33 Hun, 374, 378.

ABSOLUTE SALE.

An "absolute sale" is one where the property in personal chattels passes to the buyer upon the completion of the bargain or treaty between the parties. Where one party offers to sell at a certain price and the other agrees to give it, there is a complete bargain and sale, and the property passes from the bargainor to the bargainee; but, though the property passes, delivery cannot be required until the money is paid, where the sale is for cash. Truax v. Parvis, 32 Atl. 227, 228, 7 Houst. 330.

ABSOLUTE TITLE.

As applied to title to land "absolute" means an exclusive title, or at least a title which excludes all others not compatible with it. An absolute title to land cannot exist at the same time in different persons or in different governments. All our institutions recognize the absolute title of the crown, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and recognize the absolute title of the crown to extinguish that right. This is incompatible with absolute and complete title in the Indians. Johnson v. McIntosh, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 543, 588, 5 L. Ed. 681.

ABSOLUTE TOTAL LOSS.

An "absolute total loss" takes place when the subject insured wholly perishes, or there is a privation of it and its recovery is hopeless. An absolute total loss entitles the assured to claim from the underwriter the whole amount of his subscription. Murray v. Great Western Ins. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 414, 416, 72 Hun, 282 (citing 2 Arn. Ins. [6th Ed.] p. 951).

The meaning of "actual or absolute total loss," as distinguished from a technical or constructive total loss, is that an absolute total loss occurs when the subject insured wholly perishes or its recovery is rendered irretrievably hopeless, entitling the assured to claim the total amount of his policy without giving notice of abandonment, while a constructive total loss is one which entitles him to make such claims only on abandoning the ship or that which remains of her; she not having been "actually totally destroyed." Burt v. Brewers' & Maltsters' Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 383, 384.

An absolute total loss is an entire destruction of the thing insured; and hence, under a marine policy insuring "absolute total loss" only, a partial loss cannot be converted into a "constructive total loss" by abandonment. Monroe v. British & Foreign Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 777, 780, 8 C. C. A. 280.

An absolute total loss, within the terms of a marine policy, is not made out by a jettison of cargo, either to lighten the ship or for the purpose of saving it. Monroe v. British & Foreign Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 777, 780, 8 C. C. A. 280.

The loss of a cargo, resulting from the inability of the master to recover and protect the cargo after its damage by the perils of the sea, constitutes an "absolute total loss" within the meaning of the marine policy. "The loss is in the nature total to him who has no means of recovering his goods, whether his inability arises from their annihilation or from any other insuperable obstacle." Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266, 279.

The mere abandonment of a vessel by its crew while at sea does not constitute an "absolute total loss," within the meaning of a marine policy, when possession of the vessel is afterwards taken by persons acting in behalf of the owners of the cargo and vessel, and it is taken to port in a damaged condition, where it is libeled and sold for salvage. Thornely v. Hebson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 513, 519.

ABSOLUTE TRANSFER.

Civ. Code Cal. § 3047, declares that, where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for payment of all or part of the price, "an absolute transfer" of such contract by the seller waives his lien for the unpaid price. Held, that a transfer of a note by indorsement, which rendered the vendor liable for the debt remaining due, was not an absolute transfer within the statute, so that the lien for the payment of the balance of the purchase price of the land for which the note was given was not waived. Bancroft v. Cosby, 16 Pac. 504, 505, 74 Cal. 583.

ABSOLUTE VESTED INTEREST.

"Absolute vested interests" are not estates which, though vested, are liable to be subsequently divested by the happening of a contingent event. In re Allen's Estate, 109 Pa. 489, 496, 1 Atl. 82; Appeal of Pennsylvania Co., 1 Atl. 82, 83, 109 Pa. 489.

ABSOLUTELY.

"Absolutely," as used in the term "absolutely void," is equivalent to "utterly." Pearson v. Chapin, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 9, 14.

The will provided that the shares allotted to testator's different daughters should vest "absolutely" in them and their heirs tail. It was contended that this created an absolute estate in the daughters, who were femes covert, and excluded their husbands from any share in the legacy. Held, that the word "absolute" was not, in general, used to import an exclusion of marital rights, but that the most usual acceptation of the term "absolute," when used in reference to estates, is not independent, but the opposite of "partial" or "conditional," and used to define the kind of estate. It is never used to designate an estate vested in a married woman to the exclusion of her husband. Johnson's Adm'r v. Johnson, 32 Ala. 637, 640.

The word "absolutely," in a will giving to testator's wife all his personal property, except as otherwise disposed of, and directing that she take possession thereof immediately after his death without inventory or appraisement, and hold it as her own "absolutely," does not indicate an intention on the part of the testator that his wife should take the property free from liability for debts; but it was used in contradistinction to the phrase "for the term of her life." "Absolutely" was intended to define the duration and extent of the widow's estate. and was employed to guard against the idea of a life estate only. In re Thompson's Estate, 37 Atl. 940, 941, 182 Pa. 340.

Where a devise is to another "absolutely," accompanied with words of recommendation or request that the legatee would dispose of the gift as his own, the beneficiary will take the property in trust, provided the words of request are imperative and the objects and property certain; the word "absolutely," or one of equal signification, being necessary in such a case to create an interest in the beneficiary in the corpus of the estate, and to distinguish it from a power, which differs widely from the trust. Appeal of Coates, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 129, 133.

As conveying a fee simple.

A devise of so much of a man's real and personal estate as the law allows her to his wife "absolutely" gives the wife a fee simple as to such property, as to hold otherwise would give no effect whatever to a word of known signification. Oswald v. Kopp, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 516, 518 (cited in Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257).

"The testator gave a life estate in all his real and personal property, fully, freely, and absolutely to his son and daughter, the property at their deaths to be equally divided between their children. He here used terms that etymologically and in law import unlimited and independent bequests. An absolute estate is one free from incumbrance or condition of any description. It signifies complete and unqualified ownership and dominion. In order to give due effect to the word 'absolutely' as used by the testator, it is necessary to hold that he bequeathed the undivided one-half part of the use and income of his estate to his son and daughter in severalty." Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257, 38 Wkly. Notes Cas. 536.

A will bequeathed a certain sum to defendant "absolutely, to be distributed to him at the end of three years." Held, that the phrase "absolutely," etc., should be construed as giving defendant a vested interest in fee in the property, postponed merely as to its enjoyment. Williams v. Williams, 14 Pac. 394, 396, 73 Cal. 99.

Mr. Blackstone, in 2 Comm. p. 104, in speaking of freehold estates of inheritance, uses "absolutely" as synonymous with "fee simple." Rap. & L. Law Dict., in speaking of the owner of the estate in fee simple, said: "He is the absolute owner of the land or other realty." The same dictionary, in speaking of the legal definition of the term "absolute," says the meaning is "complete, final, perfect, unconditional, unrestricted." In Myers v. Anderson (S. C.) 1 Strob. Eq. 344, 47 Am. Dec. 537, after the bequest for life, the limitation to the issue, "to be their absolute property, forever." The word "absolute" carried the fee. In McLure v. Young (S. C.) 3 Rich. Eq. 559, the court quoted approvingly the language in the foregoing case, and held the words, after a life estate, "to lineal descendants absolutely and forever," to mean that such descendants took as purchasers. Therefore, where a will provides that an estate in land shall vest absolutely, the devisee will take the fee. Fuller v. Missroon, 14 S. E. 714, 718, 35 S. C. 314.

The terms "absolutely and forever," in a devise of testator's house to his wife, may be said to characterize the quality of the estate which the testator devised, and merely show an intention to give an absolute fee, as distinguished, for instance, from a life estate, or from some other qualified fee, and cannot be held to devise something which the testator had no right to give. Therefore such a provision is not inconsistent with the widow's right of dower, for the reason that the testator had no control over the dower, and could not dispose of that by will, any more than he could have disposed of a right of a mortgagee of the property. Fenton v. Fenton, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1083, 1088, 35 Misc. Rep. 479.

"The word 'absolute,' when used in connection with a gift or grant of personal or real property, has been frequently interpreted to carry a fee. But it is not to be given that as its fixed and unvaried meaning. The context of the instrument in which the word appears may determine the effect to be given it. It may be used in connection with an interest in property, and yet not be regarded as the equivalent of 'unqualified.' Williams v. Vancleave, 23 Ky. (7 T. B. Mon.) 393; Washington Fire Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, 3 Am. Rep. 149. In Smith v. Bell, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 72, 8 L. Ed. 322, the word 'absolutely,' used with reference to an estate in personality, was held to be qualified by other words of the bequest, and thereby explained to mean only such absolute rights as a tenant for life could enjoy. In Bradley v. Westcott, 13 Ves. 450, the word was given a similarly restricted meaning and operation. In Boyd v. Straban, 36 Ill. 355, the cases of Smith v. Bell, supra, and Bradley v. Westcott, supra, were cited with approval, and the doctrine of those cases applied to the controversy then under consideration. In Kratz v. Kratz, 189 Ill. 276, 59 N. E. 519, the words 'absolutely and unqualifiedly,' used in a will in connection with an estate in lands, were so qualified in meaning as to refer only the right to hold and enjoy an estate as a tenant for life, or during the widowhood of the devisee." The word "absolutely" in a devise of a tract of land, together with a right of way to the land from a highway not adjoining the land, to be his "absolutely," was construed not to operate to give the beneficiary a fee in such right of way, but only an easement. Truax v. Gregory, 63 N. E. 674, 677, 196 Ill. 83.

The term "absolutely," as used in a will providing that the property bequeathed to the wife shall be hers absolutely during her life, to use and enjoy as she may see proper, does not enlarge the estate. It must be construed as applying to the estate granted by the express words. In other words, it means that her life estate and the use and enjoyment of the property shall not be limited by any conditions. Underwood v. Cave, 75 S. W. 451, 454, 176 Mo. 1.

ABSOLUTELY DUE.

Rev. St. c. 86, § 55, cl. 4, providing that no trustee (garnishee) shall be charged unless at the time of the service of the writ the amount due the defendant is "due absolutely," was construed to require only that the debt should have been fully created, and did not require that the time for payment thereof had expired. Thus, where a railroad company was garnished on the 4th of June to subject an employé's pay earned in May, the company was properly charged, though by its contract with the employé the amount so earned was not payable until June 15th. Ware v. Gowen, 85 Me. 534, 535.

ABSOLUTELY INCOMPATIBLE.

An instruction that, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt from circumstantial evidence, the existence of the inculpatory facts must be "absolutely incompatible" with the innocence of the accused, means that the proof of defendant's guilt must be established beyond the possibility of a doubt. State v. Rover, 13 Nev. 17, 24.

ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY.

"Necessary" admits of all degrees of comparison. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, or absolutely or indispensably necessary; and the prefixing of the word "absolutely" to the word "necessary" must be construed as an intention to materially affect the meaning of the word. McCulloch v. State, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 414, 4 L. Ed. 579.

A will authorizing and empowering the executor to sell a part or all of the estate, where it is "absolutely necessary," means such a necessity as, being not conformed to, will result in irremediable injury or loss to the estate. It does not mean that a difference of opinion between the executor and his co-owners will entitle him to substitute his will for theirs, and justify the sale as one of absolute necessity. The necessity contemplated is imperative necessity, and, being such, must refer to some pressing exigency of the estate growing out of a deficiency of revenue to meet the demands upon it, such as might be brought about by some unexpected contingency or disaster. The testator, by emphasizing the word "necessary" by using the word "absolutely," designed to indicate a superlative degree of necessity. The bare advisability of such a sale as a mode of swelling the revenues already sufficient for demands in the judgment of the executor, or, it may be, of judicial financiers, would not meet the condition imposed by the testator. Moale v. Cutting, 59 Md. 510, 515.

In a statute authorizing a druggist to sell spirituous liquors, to specify that they are absolutely necessary, "absolutely" is used to emphasize the degree of necessity which is intended to express an extreme case. While in a general sense the word "necessary," like the word "perfect," implies a superlative degree, and when it is declared to be necessary no additional emphasis is given by the use of the word "absolutely," yet this use is sanctioned by custom, and it cannot be said to be improper or meaningless. State v. Tetrick, 11 S. E. 1002, 1003, 84 W. Va. 137.

ABSOLUTELY OWN.

Plaintiff, at the time of the execution of a note by her which was indorsed by defendants, and which was made to secure a loan to enable her to pay an assessment on certain stock, executed an instrument under seal by which she assigned the stock to defendants, which provided that, if she did not pay the note at maturity and defendants did pay, they should "absolutely own" the stock. Held, that the words "absolutely own" imported a sale of the stock, and not a pledge thereof as collateral security, and that on plaintiff's failure to pay the note and on payment thereof by defendant the latter became absolute owner of the stock. Morgenstern v. Davis, 14 N. Y. Supp. 31, 32, 59 Hun, 626.

ABSOLUTELY PRIVILEGED.

An absolutely privileged communication or publication is one in respect to which, by reason of the occasion upon which it is made, no remedy is provided for the damages in a civil action for slander or libel. George Knapp & Co. v. Campbell, 36 S. W. 765, 767, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 199; Ruohs v. Backer, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 395, 405, 19 Am. Rep. 598. Of such are the words spoken or written by judges in the exercise of their judicial functions, by legislators in the performance of their duties, and many others. Noonan v. Orton, 32 Wis. 106, 111.

Absolutely privileged publications are legislative and judicial proceedings and naval and military affairs. In case of absolute privileged communications, the law, out of regard for the public welfare, considers that all persons shall be permitted to express their sentiments, regardless of truth, and affords them absolute immunity from any prosecution therefor, either civil or criminal, though the publication may be knowingly and willfully false and with express malice. Finley

v. Steele, 60 S. W. 108, 109, 159 Mo. 299, 52 L. R. A. 852.

ABSORBED.

In an insurance policy providing that a policy did not cover injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, absorbed, and inhaled, the word "absorbed" does not apply to an accidental asphyxiation by illuminating gas which escaped into the room where assured slept; the word manifestly having reference only to the process of absorption by sucking up or imbibing through the pores of the body. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Waterman, 44 N. E. 283, 284, 161 Ill. 632, 32 L. R. A. 654.

ABSQUE HOC.

See "Covenants Performed Absque Hoc."

"Absque hoc" means "without this," and is used in pleading as a technical form of special denial by way of special traverse, and introduces the negative part of a plea following an admission or inducement. The phrase is also used in actions of covenant, where defendant, having pleaded "covenant performed," follows with the words "absque hoc" covenants nonperformed, which without this would not put plaintiff to proof of his allegation of covenant performed. Martin v. Hammon, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 270, 272; Zents v. Legnard, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 192, 194; Hite v. Kier, 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 72, 75; Reiter v. Morton, 96 Pa. 229, 239.

In an action of covenant against a corporation, a plea of covenants performed "absque hoc" admits the execution of the instrument declared on, and only puts in issue the performance on the part of the plaintiff as alleged in the declaration. Farmers' & Mechanics' Turnpike Co. v. McCullough, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 303, 304.

ABSQUE HOC WITH LEAVE.

See "With Leave."

ABSQUE INJURIA.

See "Damnum Absque Injuria."

ABSTRACT.

An "abstract" is defined to be that which comprises or concentrates in itself the essential qualities of a larger thing or of several things; an abridgment, compendium, epitome, or synopsis. Hess v. D. T. Draffen & Co., 74 S. W. 440, 441, 99 Mo. App. 580.

A charge is not abstract when there is any evidence, however weak, at all tending to support it. Hafr v. Little, 28 Ala. 236.

But unless there is some evidence tending to establish all the hypotheses upon which an instruction is based, or some evidence from which the jury might have inferred the existence of the facts stated, then the instruction was erroneous. Dixon v. Ahern, 14 Pac. 598, 601, 19 Nev. 422.

As a copy.

The word "abstract," in a certificate by a register of a land office that a certain plat is a correct abstract of the records in his office, though not as formal as the use of the word "copy" would have been, is still a sufficient compliance with the statute providing that copies of any entries made by the register of the land office shall be received in evidence. Willhite v. Barr, 67 Mo. 284, 286.

An abstract ordinarily means a mere brief, and not a copy of that from which it is taken; and hence an abstract of an alleged judgment, attested only as an abstract, is not a copy of such judgment, within Code, c. 130, § 5, providing that a copy of any record in the clerk's office of any court, attested by the clerk, may be admitted in evidence in lieu of the original. Dickinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390, 413.

The abstract of record required by Rev. St. 1899, § 813, does not require entries made by the clerk to be copied literally, but nothing more is required in an abstract than a recital of the various entries. Scott v. Black, 70 S. W. 523, 525, 96 Mo. App. 472.

Transcript distinguished.

An "abstract" of a record is a statement of the substantial contents thereof, and differs from a transcript, in that the latter is a copy of the record. Harrison v. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co., 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 278, 283.

ABSTRACT—ABSTRACTION.

The term "abstract," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5209, making it a crime for every president, director, etc., of a national banking association to embezzle, abstract, or willfully misapply any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association, is to be understood, in its ordinary and popular sense, as taking or withdrawing from, so that to abstract the moneys, funds, credits, and assets of a national bank by any of its officers named in the act is to take or withdraw the same from the possession or control of the association; but the mere taking or withdrawing of its funds or moneys or other assets from the bank's possession is not, in and of itself, sufficient to constitute the criminal offense of abstraction which is described in the statute. It must further appear, in order to complete the offense, that this taking or withdrawing was without the knowledge and consent of the association, and that the funds and assets so taken and withdrawn were converted to the use and benefit and advantage of the officer or agent of the bank abstracting the same, with intent to injure or defraud or deceive. The essential ingredients which go to constitute the criminal offense of abstraction are, therefore: First, the defendant's official relation to the bank; second, the taking or withdrawing, by him or by his direction, of the moneys, funds, credits, or assets of the association; third, that such taking or withdrawal was without the knowledge or consent of the bank or of its board of directors; fourth, that the moneys, funds, or effects so taken and withdrawn from the possession of the bank were converted to his own use, or to the use and benefit of some person other than the association; fifth, that it is done with the intent to defraud or injure the association. United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 479.

It is not material by what means or contrivances or devices the abstraction of its funds from the possession of the bank was effected, since the methods of its accomplishment do not change the character of the act; the ultimate result being to wrongfully obtain the funds of the bank. United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 479.

"Abstract," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5209, "is a word of simple popular meaning, without ambiguity. It means to take or withdraw from; so that to abstract the funds of a bank, or a portion of them, is to take and withdraw from the possession and control of the bank the moneys and funds alleged to be so abstracted. To constitute that offense, within the meaning of the act, it is necessary that the money and funds should be abstracted from the bank without its knowledge and consent, with intent to injure and defraud it, or some person or persons, or to deceive some officer of the association, or an agent appointed to examine its affairs." United States v. Northway, 7 Sup. Ct. 580, 584, 120 U. S. 327, 30 L. Ed. 664.

The verb "abstract" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "draw away; take away; withdraw; remove." Within this definition, the removing of cream from milk is an abstraction. Rose v. State, 5 O. C. D. 72, 76, 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 87.

Embezzlement distinguished.

The crime of "abstraction," provided for in Rev. St. U. S. § 5209, making it criminal for any president, director, teller, etc., of any national bank to be guilty of the abstraction of its funds, "applies to cases where one for his own benefit takes the property of another; but it is not necessary that any position of trust should exist between the parties, nor is it necessary that the property should come lawfully into the possession of the person abstracting it," as required in order to constitute the crime of embezzlement. United States v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed.

816, 818; United States v. Youtsey (U. S.) 91 Fed. 864, 867.

Larceny distinguished.

An indictment under Rev. St. U. S. § 5209, charged the president of a bank with willfully and unlawfully "abstracting" certain of its moneys with an intent to injure the bank. Held, that the word "abstracting" was not synonymous or equivalent to the word "larceny," and hence it was not necessary that the indictment under such section should describe the offense in words necessary to constitute a larceny. United States v. Northway, 7 Sup. Ct. 580, 584, 120 U. S. 327, 30 L. Ed. 664.

Misapply distinguished.

The fifty-fifth section of the national banking act of 1864 provides for the punishment of those who "embezzle, abstract, and willfully misapply" the funds of the bank "with intent to injure or defraud the association." Held, that the word "embezzle," and perhaps, also, the word "abstract," refers to acts done for the benefit of the actor as against the bank, while the word "misapply" covers acts having no relation to pecuniary profit or advantage of the doer thereof. United States v. Taintor (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 7, 9.

ABSTRACT BOOKS.

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

Books which contain only an index to the books of the recorder of deeds for the county, showing the different conveyances of land, and the books and pages where they might be found, not containing an abridgment of the contents of the different instruments, including the acknowledgments or the manner in which they were executed, nor their dates, are not complete abstract books. Hess v. D. T. Draffen & Co., 74 S. W. 440, 441, 99 Mo. App. 580.

ABSTRACT OF TITLE.

"It seems that 'abstract of title' has a somewhat different meaning in different countries. Warv. Abst. §§ 4-6. It is thus defined in Anderson's Law Dictionary, which is perhaps the most accurate definition for this country: 'A concise statement of the record evidence of one's title or interest in realty.'" Loring v. Oxford, 45 S. W. 395, 396, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 415.

"Abstract," as used by a vendor in an agreement to furnish an abstract, means an abstract of the records in the recorder's office and of all the records showing his title to the real estate. Stevenson v. Polk, 32 N. W. 340, 345, 71 Iowa, 278.

An abstract of title is a statement in substance of what appears in the public records affecting the title to real property. Union Safe Deposit Co. v. Chisholm, 33 Ill. App. 647.

By an "abstract of title" is meant a statement in substance of what appears on the public records affecting the title, and also a statement in substance of such facts as do not appear on the public records which are necessary to perfect the title. Hollifield v. Landrum, 71 S. W. 979, 982, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 187.

A contract for the sale of real estate, which requires the vendor to furnish an "abstract of title," requires the vendor to furnish a paper prepared by a skilled searcher of records, which will show an abstract of whatever appears on the public records of a county affecting the title. Smith v. Taylor, 23 Pac. 217, 219, 82 Cal. 533.

An abstract of title is a summary of the most important parts of deeds and other instruments composing the evidences of a title to real estate, arranged usually in chronological order and intended to show the origin, cause, and incidents of the title, without the necessity of referring to the deeds themselves. It also contains a statement of all charges, incumbrances, liens, and liabilities to which the property may be subjected, and of which it is in any way material for purchasers to be apprised. Banker v. Caldwell, 3 Minn. 94, 100 (Gil. 46, 52).

An abstract of title is "a summary or an epitome of the facts relied on as evidence of title. Such being its meaning, it might consist of a note of a single conveyance, as it always does where the patentee furnishes an abstract of his title. But an abstract, properly so called, must contain a note of all conveyances, transfers, or other facts relied on as evidence of the claimant's title, together with all such facts appearing of record as may impair it." Heinsen v. Lamb, 7 N. E. 75, 79, 117 Ill. 549.

In an order of county commissioners, authorizing and directing a certain person to trace up and compile a book of "abstracts of title," for the use of the county commissioners' office, of all unassessed lands in the county, the word "abstract" will be construed in its ordinary legal meaning, making it the duty of such person to ascertain the names of the owners and to give an epitome or short statement of the successive title deeds or other evidence of ownership. Tasker v. Garrett County, 33 Atl. 407, 408, 82 Md. 150.

As good title.

The term "abstract of title," as used in an agreement that the vendor should deliver an abstract of title, meant the delivery of an abstract showing a good title to convey. Sharland v. Leifchild, 4 C. B. 529, 537.

In a contract for the sale of lands, in which the vendor agrees to furnish the purchaser with a full and sufficient abstract of the title to said land, the term "full and sufficient abstract of title" did not mean a full and sufficient abstract of a complete marketable title, but only a full and fair abstract of all the muniments which the defendant had in his possession, power, or knowledge, and a fair statement of the deduction of his title; and, with respect to the identity of the land, the abstract referring to a map or plan in one of the deeds abstracted affords sufficient means of identification. A map or plan is not deemed to be necessary as a part of the abstract. Blackburn v. Smith, 2 Exch. 783, 790-792.

ABSTRACT POWER.

It is held and generally understood that, if any way is provided by law for accomplishing a desired purpose, "power in the abstract" may be said to exist for doing it. Thus, where statutory provisions provide some way for increasing the capital stock of a national bank, and authorize the increase under certain circumstances and subject to certain requirements, they thereby provide abstract power for doing the act. Latimer v. Bard (U. S.) 76 Fed. 536, 543.

ABSTRACTING.

As business, see "Business."

ABSURDITY.

By an "absurdity," as applied to a statute, is meant not only that which is physically impossible, but also that which is morally so; and that is to be regarded as morally impossible which is contrary to reason, or, in other words, which could not be attributed to a man in his right sense. State v. Hayes, 81 Mo. 574, 585.

ABUSE.

To "abuse," is composed of "ab" and "utor"; and in strictness it signifies to injure, diminish in value, or wear away by using improperly. Abuse includes misuse. Abuse or misuse of the corporate privileges of a corporation consists in any positive acts in violation of the charter and in derogation of public right, willfully done, or caused to be done, by those appointed to manage the general concerns of the corporation. City of Baltimore v. Cornellville & S. P. Ry. Co., 6 Phila. 190, 191, 8 Pittsb. R. 20, 23.

As the term "abuse" is used in the charter of a railroad company, reserving a right to the Legislature to repeal it if the franchises should be abused, it means to improperly use. The words are used in their popular sense, and are not terms of art or law. To "abuse" is compounded of "ab" and "utor," and in strictness signifies to injure, diminish in value, to wear away by using improperly. Catiline abused the ancients of the Roman Senate. A man abuses his constitution by excesses which impair his vigor. A judge abuses his office not only by taking bribes, but in misconduct which detracts from its dignity and usefulness. "To abuse the freedom of the press, or the right of debating, is a force from which we take a perfectly definite idea. We know very well what is meant when it is said that legislative authority or executive power has been abused," and hence we know that a corporate privilege has been abused when we see it used as a color and pretext for that which the law pronounces a wrong and injury to the public. Erie & N. E. R. Co. v. Casey, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 287, 318.

The word "abuses" in Const. art. 10, § 2, giving the Legislature power to regulate railroad freight and passenger tariffs, correct "abuses," and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion, means any improper use of a right or privilege, as abuse of a franchise. The words "to correct abuses" in the provision embrace everything which is expressed in the language that precedes and that which follows it, but they express more, and to give effect to them we must hold that they were intended to have the full force of their ordinary meaning. Railroad Commission v. Houston & T. C. R. Co., 38 S. W. 750, 753, 90 Tex. 340.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1798, authorizing the Attorney General to sue for forfeiture of the charter of a corporation which has violated any provision of law whereby it has forfeited its charter or been dissolved by an "abuse of its powers," is not satisfied by the failure of the railroad to run its trains for five days, since that is not an abuse of, but a mere failure to use, its corporate powers. People v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co., 26 N. E. 622, 623, 125 N. Y. 513.

ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The term as used in the decision of courts and in the books as implying, in common parlance, a bad motive or wrong purpose, is not the most appropriate. It is really a discretion exercised to an end or purpose not justified by, and clearly against, reason and evidence. "Where a court does not exercise a discretion in the sense of being discreet, circumspect, prudent, and exercising cautious judgment, it is an abuse of discretion." Murray v. Buell, 41 N. W. 1010, 1011, 74 Wis. 14.

"In a legal sense discretion is abused whenever, in its exercise, the court exceeds the bounds of reason, all the circumstances before it being considered." It does not necessarily imply "a willful abuse or intentional wrong." Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. 345, 366, 75 Cal. 1.

The "abuse of discretion," to justify interference with the exercise of discretionary power, implies not merely error of judgment, but perversity of will, passion, prejudice, partiality, or moral delinquency. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Heath, 62 N. E. 107, 111, 29 Ind. App. 395; Stewart v. Stewart, 62 N. E. 1023-1025, 28 Ind. App. 378; People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 29 N. Y. 418, 431.

The exercise of an honest judgment, however erroneous it may appear to be, does not constitute abuse of discretion, but the question is, has the result arrived at been produced by exercise of an arbitrary and unlawful discretion? People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 29 N. Y. 418, 431.

The term "abuse of discretion," in speaking of an abuse of discretion sufficient to authorize the setting aside of a decree, includes a case in which, in order to reach a decree, the court itself overrides the established law. Thus a decree setting aside a judicial sale on the ground of gross inadequacy of price shows an abuse of discretion, as such inadequacy does not authorize such a decree. Stroup v. Raymond, 38 Atl. 626, 627, 183 Pa. 279, 63 Am. St. Rep. 753.

Difference in judicial opinion is not synonymous with abuse of judicial discretion. Such discretion was not abused where, on a cross-examination of a defendant in a personal injury action who was testifying in his own behalf, the court permitted the question as to whether he was insured against loss in case the verdict went against him. Day v. Donohue, 41 Atl. 934, 935, 62 N. J. Law, 380.

ABUSE OF FEMALE CHILD.

"Abuse is stated by Webster to be a synonym of injury, and in its largest sense signifies ill use or improper treatment of another. Thus, in a statute making it an offense to carnally know and abuse a female child, it does not necessarily involve penetration, but includes any injury to the genital organs." Dawkins v. State, 58 Ala. 376, 379, 29 Am. Rep. 754.

"Abuse," as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 6524, making it a crime to carnally know and "abuse" a female child under the age of 16, refers to and characterizes an illegal rather than an honorable and proper relation, and hence the statute does not conflict with section 4769, authorizing contracts of marriage by females under the age of 15 years. State v. Rollins, 83 N. W. 141, 142, 80 Minn. 216.

"Abuse," as used in Cr. Code, § 12, providing that if any male person of the age of 17 years and upward shall carnally know and "abuse" any female child under the age of 12 years he shall be deemed guilty of rape, is synonymous with "ravish." Webster defines the verb "abuse" thus: "to violate; to ravish;" and the noun "abuse" he defines as "violation, rape; as abuse of a female child." Palin v. State, 57 N. W. 743, 745, 38 Neb. 862.

"Abuse," as used in the offense to carnal-ly know and abuse a female child is synonymous with "rape." In England the definitions of "rape" have sometimes included the statutory offense of carnal knowledge of a young child. Thus: "Rape is felony by the common law, declared by Parliament, for the unlawful and carnal knowledge and abuse of any woman above the age of ten years against her will, or of a woman child under the age of ten years with or against her will." 1 Hale, P. C. 628. See, also, page 631. In East, P. C. 436, it is said: "This last offense (viz., unlawful abuse of a child) is not, properly speaking, a rape, which implies a carnal knowledge against the will of the party, but a felony created by this statute (18 Eliz. c. 7, § 4), under which the consent or non-consent of the child under the age of ten years is immaterial." Other writers have directly, or by implication, included the statutory offense within the term "rape." See 4 Bl. Comm. 212; 1 Gabb. Cr. Law, 832; Roscoe, Cr. Ev. (7th Ed.) 289, 851. But, however it may have been elsewhere, in Massachusetts the offense of unlawfully and carnally knowing and abusing a female child under the age of 10 years is, and for more than 200 years has been, known and designated as rape. Commonwealth v. Roosnell, 8 N. E. 747, 750, 143 Mass. 32.

On the trial of defendant accused of carnal abuse of a female child under the age of 15 years, the judge instructed the jury that "carnal abuse does not necessarily mean abuse by sexual intercourse, or by attempted sexual intercourse." This instruction was held erroneous, and that the word "abuse," in the sense it is used in Cr. Code, § 12, is synonymous with "ravish." Chambers v. State, 64 N. W. 1078, 46 Neb. 447.

ABUSE OF PROCESS.

See "Malicious Abuse of Process."

An abuse of legal process is where a party employs it for some unlawful object, and not to effect the purpose for which it was intended by law; in other words, a perversion of it. Lauzon v. Charroux, 28 Atl. 975, 976, 18 R. I. 467; Mayer v. Walter, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 283, 285; King v. Johnston, 51 N. W. 1011, 81 Wis. 578; Bartlett v. Christhilf, 14 Atl. 518, 521, 69 Md. 219 (citing Grainer v. Hill, 4 Bing. [N. C.] 212; Sommer v. Wilt [Pa.] 4 Serg. & R. 19); Kilne v. Hibbard, 29 N. Y. Supp. 807, 809, 80 Hun, 50. Thus, if a man is arrested or his goods seized in order to extort money from him, even though it be to pay a just claim other than that in suit, or to compel him to give up possession of something of value not the legal object of the process, it is abuse of legal process. Lauzon v. Charroux, 28 Atl. 975, 976, 18 R. I. 467.

ABUTMENT.

As part of bridge, see "Bridge."

An abutment is a mass of stone or solid work at the end of a bridge, by which the extreme arches or timbers are sustained. The term is sometimes used to designate that which unites one end of a thing to another, and in this sense includes the part of the way which connects the abutment (proper) of the bridge with the land ordinarily called the "filling up." It is all a part of the bridge. Sussex County v. Strader, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 108, 112.

ABUTTING.

"Abutting" means "joined to" or "adjoining," but does not necessarily imply that the things spoken of are in contact. Thus, where a strip of land 92 feet wide was dedicated for a street, and the city improved 90 feet, leaving 1 foot unused on each side, which was not abandoned by the public, but could properly be used to obtain access to the street, the owners of property adjoining such strip own property "abutting" on the improvement, and were therefore liable for taxation for the same. Richards v. City of Cincinnati, 31 Ohio St. 506, 514.

A lot lying in the rear of a lot fronting on a street to be improved, and no part of which touches the street, is not an abutting property within the meaning of an ordinance directing the improvement of the street, and assessing the cost on the abutting property owners. City of Springfield v. Green, 11 N. E. 261, 263, 120 Ill. 269.

Mun. Code, § 564, providing that any owner or owners of lots or lands bounding or "abutting" on a proposed improvement shall file a claim for damages in writing, does not imply that the lots spoken of are necessarily in contact with the improvement, and has no such inflexible meaning as to require the lots to touch the improvement, though the usual meaning of the word is that the things spoken of do actually join; and, to ascertain the meaning of the word, regard must be had to the intent of the lawmaker. Where an elevated viaduct in the street in front was 45 feet above plaintiff's lot, the lot did not "abut" on the viaduct within the meaning of the statute. Cohen v. Cleveland, 1 N. E. 589, 593, 43 Ohio St. 190, 196.

An estate opposite a park, and separated therefrom by a county road, is not an "abutting estate," and therefore is not subject to a special assessment, which can only be levied against abutting estates. Holt v. City Council of Summerville, 127 Mass. 408.

Where a strip of land from one side of a street is appropriated for the purpose of widening such street, the lots and lands fronting on the opposite side of the street at the part widened will be held to "bound and abut" on the improvement, although the street may intervene between the abutting lots and lands and the strip of ground appropriated. City of Cincinnati v. Batsche, 40 N. E. 21, 24, 52 Ohio St. 324.

Where one has a private right of way connecting his premises with a public way, he may be held to be an "abutter" on the street by means of the private way, so that a discontinuance of the public way would work him a peculiar injury. Beutel v. West Bay City Sugar Co. (Mich.) 94 N. W. 202, 204.

As applied to the rights of parties on the use of a street by an elevated road, a lot bounded on the side by a public street, in the bed or soil of which the owner of the lot has no title, estate, or interest except such as are incident to a lot so situated, viz., a right to light, air, access, etc., is an abutting lot (Hughes v. Metropolitan El. Ry. Co., 28 N. E. 765, 767, 130 N. Y. 14), and the owner is an abutting owner. Abendroth v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 25 N. E. 496, 497, 122 N. Y. 1, 11 L. R. A. 634, 19 Am. St. Rep. 461.

The terms "abutting or adjacent property" and "property butting on," as used in the chapter relating to cities under special charters, shall be held to include the easement and right of way of any railroad company located along any street, or on lands abutting on or adjacent thereto, in all cases where no property of any person, firm, or corporation, except a municipal corporation, intervenes between such easement or right of way and the traveled portion of such street or highway. Code Iowa 1897, § 968.

As touching front or side of lot.

In a narrow and restricted sense "abutting" is used in reference to that which touches a lot at the end and adjoining to that which is on the side, but in a statute authorizing levying of assessments for improvements on the ground abutting on the improvement it includes everything which touches the lot, whether in front or on the sides. City of Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. 499, 511.

"Abutting," as used in an ordinance providing for a levy of assessment on all lots "abutting" on the line of a street to be improved, was intended to apply to lots whose sides, as well as ends, were bounded by the line of the street to be improved, and, where the streets in front and at the side were both to be paved, the corner lot should bear the expense of the improvement in front of the side as well as of the end of the lot. City of Springfield v. Green, 11 N. E. 261, 263, 120 Ill. 269.

Right of way in street.

A city charter, authorizing the assessment of lands "abutting" on a street for improvements thereof, does not apply to a railroad right of way which lies wholly within the street. Indianapolis & V. Ry. Co. v. Capitol Pav. & Const. Co., 54 N. E. 1076, 1077, 24 Ind. App. 114.

Act 1879, § 2, authorizing assessments for the improvement of public streets upon "contiguous property abutting" upon such streets, cannot be construed to include and authorize the assessment of the right of occupancy, franchises, property, and interest of a railroad corporation in a street which had been improved. Nothing but some tangible object or thing can with propriety be said to "abut" on a street. If the interests or rights of the railroad in the street have any corporate or physical existence, they must be represented by the street itself, and a street cannot be contiguous to and abut on itself. South Park Com'rs v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 107 Ill. 105, 108.

Streets.

Streets crossing one on which an improvement is made are not "abutting property" within the meaning of the statute authorizing special assessments on abutting property for the payment of the cost of local improvements, and hence a municipality cannot be assessed for the benefit done to cross streets. Holt v. City of East St. Louis, 37 N. E. 927, 150 Ill. 530.

ACADEMY.

See "Incorporated Academy."

As public school, see "Public School."

"Academy" originally meant a garden, grove, or villa where Plato and his followers held their philosophical conferences, but that is not the present meaning of the word. It has acquired by the usage of modern times a variety of meanings; it is sometimes used to designate a school for teaching a particular art or science, but it is most commonly understood to mean a school or seminary of learning, and held to range between a university and college and a common school in which arts and sciences in general are taught. The term, as used in a statute exempting from taxation universities, colleges, academies, and schoolhouses, does not include such an institution as an academy of fine arts. Academy of Fine Arts v. Philadelphia County, 22 Pa. (10 Harris) 496, 498.

The word "academy" is applied to institutions which are confined to some special grades of instruction. This word "academy" has become a common dictionary word, which may be appropriated by any person as a name for a school. Commonwealth v. Banks, 48 Atl. 277, 278, 198 Pa. 397.

Act March 2, 1875, which prohibits the sale or giving away of liquor within three miles of any "academy," college, university, or institute of learning, includes only the higher institutions of learning, such as those specifically enumerated. The act does not apply to the common schools provided for by the Legislature, though they are taught in the building of an academy or college. Blackwell v. State, 36 Ark. 178, 190.

ACCEPT.

See "Not Accepted."

In a complaint in an action in debt, founded on an act of the Legislature by which the state leased certain lands to defendant, to be occupied for the purposes of a railroad, in consideration of a certain amount, which complaint concluded with the averment that the defendant "accepted" the said act, by the force and effect of which act there became due to plaintiff from defendant the sum fixed, "accepted" must be construed to signify assent and agreement to all the terms and provisions contained in such act or charter. This is its usual and natural meaning, and in this sense it must be understood in this declaration, as the lease and its provisions constitute the entire body of the act; and hence there was a sufficient allegation that the defendants were liable as lessees. State v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co., 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 301, 303.

"Accepted," as used in an indictment charging a bank officer with having "accepted" and received deposits knowing that the bank was insolvent, implies that the bank received, and that he agreed and assented to the reception, so that he could not accept without knowing what was received; and hence proof of such fact is necessary to a conviction. State v. Warner, 55 Pac. 342, 344, 60 Kan. 94.

Act Cong. 1875, c. 137, as amended 1888, and chapter 866, relating to the removal of cases to the United States courts, and providing that it shall be the duty of the state court to "accept" the petition for removal and bond, construed to require the state court to act upon the petition and bond. Roberts v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 51 N. W. 478, 480, 48 Minn. 521.

The words "accept and agree" in a deed of land subject to mortgage, which deed contains a covenant against incumbrances except the mortgages, which mortgages the said second party accepts and agrees to pay, do not show an assumption of the mortgages by the grantee, in the absence of other evidence explaining the language. Hopper v. Calhoun, 35 Pac. 816, 817, 52 Kan. 703, 39 Am. St. Rep. 363.

The words "accepted" and "recorded" in Comp. St. c. 23, § 9, providing that commissioners to assign dower shall be sworn, etc., and shall set off the dower and make return of their doings in writing, which on being accepted and recorded shall cause the dower to remain fixed and certain, unless such confirmation be set aside, etc., are used in the sense of "confirmed"; that is, if the assignment of dower by the commissioners is satisfactory to the judge, then he shall accept and record the same. Serry v. Curry, 42 N. W. 97-100, 26 Neb. 353.

"Accept," in reference to the sale of goods, means receiving the possession of the goods with the intention of retaining them in performance of the contract. Ford v. Friedman, 20 S. E. 930, 932, 40 W. Va. 177.

It means more than a mere delivery by the vendor, and implies such acceptance as precludes the purchaser from thereafter objecting to the quantity, quality, etc., of the goods. Maxwell v. Brown, 39 Me. 98, 100, 63 Am. Dec. 605.

ACCEPT AND RECEIVE.

"Accept and receive," as used in the statute of frauds, providing that a parol contract for the sale of goods to the value of $50 shall be void unless in writing, or unless the buyer shall accept and receive a part of the goods, means such an acceptance and receipt by the purchaser as would amount to a final appropriation to himself of the whole or a part of the goods. Rodgers v. Phillips, 40 N. Y. 519, 530 (citing Story, Sales).

"Accept," as used in the seventeenth section of the statute of frauds, declaring no contract for the sale of merchandise shall be allowed to be good unless there be some memoranda, or the buyer accept part of the goods, means that there must not only be a delivery to the vendee with the intention of vesting title in him, but an actual acceptance on his part with intention of taking possession as owner. Maberley v. Sheppard, 10 Bing. 99.

The phrase "accept and receive," as used in the statute of frauds, means an actual physical receipt. Castle v. Swarder, 5 Hurl. & N. 281, 286.

The words "accept and receive" cannot be construed as requiring that there should be an actual manual taking or occupation of the goods, but that there may be a constructive accepting and receiving. But the delivery of goods on board a vessel, and the taking of them by the carrier, is not a "receipt" of them by the vendee within the provision of the statute, though he had ordered them to be forwarded in that way, nor is a consigning of the goods by the vendors to their agent. Frostburg Min. Co. v. New England Glass Co., 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 115, 118. They import some act done, aside from the mere verbal contract of sale. Woodford v. Patterson (N. Y.) 32 Barb. 630, 632.

Under a statute making sales of intoxicating liquors void unless a part of the goods have been "accepted and received" by the buyer, the acceptance and receipt contemplated may be constructive, and it is a question for the jury whether the circumstances proved do or do not amount to an acceptance or receipt within the statute. Garfield v. Paris, 96 U. S. 557, 563, 24 L. Ed. 821.

ACCEPTANCE

See "Actual Acceptance"; "Conditional Acceptance"; "Express Acceptance"; "General Acceptance"; "Implied Acceptance"; "Lend an Acceptance"; "Qualified Acceptance"; "Special Acceptance."

Receipt distinguished, see "Receipt."

"Acceptance" comprehends both physical receipt and mental assent. In re George M. Hill Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 866, 867, 59 O. C. A. 354.

The word "acceptance" fairly implies a piece of commercial paper which might then pass into the hands of an innocent holder, so that where the defendant ordered goods to be shipped on open account, and the seller's acceptance of the order stipulated that it should be sold on 30 days' "acceptance," there was a material modification of the offer. Russell v. Falls Mfg. Co., 82 N. W. 134, 135, 106 Wis. 329.

The word "acceptance," as used in a note by which a bank promised to pay the principal at 10 days' sight, with 3 per cent. interest to the day of "acceptance," did not mean the ordinary acceptance which is required in a bill of exchange, but the term as used in the note meant "at sight." Sutton v. Toomer, 7 Barn. & C. 416, 418.

To constitute an "acceptance" there must be an act of the will. Every receipt is not an acceptance. If the party accepts the thing, though but for a moment, he cannot afterwards, by dissatisfaction, get rid of the effect of it. Hardman v. Bellhouse, 9 Mees. & W. 596, 600.

Of award.

The "acceptance" of an award by the court to which it is returned in order that it may become the basis of a judgment undoubtedly requires an exercise of the judicial will of the court in its favor. "To accept" means to receive with approval; to adopt; to agree to. In re Curtis, 30 Atl. 769, 64 Conn. 501, 42 Am. St. Rep. 200.

Of bill of exchange.

The "acceptance" of a draft is the assent to the proposition contained in the draft, which on its part is an offer, and which offer and assent constitute a contract right or relation between the parties. Herter v. Goss & Edsall Co., 30 Atl. 252, 254, 57 N. J. Law, 42 (citing Swope v. Ross, 40 Pa. [4 Wright] 186, 80 Am. Dec. 567).

"An acceptance is an engagement to pay the bill according to the tenor of acceptance; a general acceptance is an engagement to pay according to the tenor of the bill." Cox v. National Bank of New York, 100 U. S. 704, 712, 25 L. Ed. 739 (quoting Bayley, Bills [5th Ed.] 154; Chit. Bills [13th Am. Ed.] 342); Thomas v. Thomas, 7 Wis. 476, 481.

"An acceptance is an assent or agreement to comply with the request or order contained in the bill, or, in other words, an assent or agreement to pay the bill, according to the tenor of the acceptance, when due." Gallagher v. Nichols, 60 N. Y. 438, 445; Ray v. Faulkner, 73 Ill. 469, 472; Woodard v. Griffiths-Marshall Grain Commission Co., 45 N. W. 433, 434, 43 Minn. 260.

"Acceptance," as the term is used with reference to bills of exchange, means a promise on the part of the drawees to pay the bill according to its tenor, and any promise or any words amounting to a promise to pay will amount to an acceptance. The acceptance or promise is usually evidenced by the word "accepted" written on the bill, and signed by the drawee named, but such writing is not required, since any act or word evidencing a promise to pay the bill according to its tenor is sufficient to constitute an acceptance. Boyce v. Edwards, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 111, 7 L. Ed. 799; First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343, 345, 24 L. Ed. 229; Kennedy v. Geddes (Ala.) 8 Port. 263, 268; Whilden v. Merchants' & Planters' Nat. Bank, 64 Ala. 1, 20, 38 Am. Rep. 1; First Nat. Bank v. Leach, 52 N. Y. 350, 352, 11 Am. Rep. 708; Meads v. Merchants' Bank, 25 N. Y. 143, 147, 82 Am. Dec. 331.

"By the 'acceptance' of a bill of exchange is meant the act or declaration by which the drawee therein named evinces—makes manifest—his assent and agreement to comply with and be bound by the request and order contained in the bill drawn to him, according to its tenor, if the 'acceptance' be absolute. It is in substance an agreement to pay the sum of money specified in the bill as therein directed. No particular words or form of words or manner are necessary to a valid acceptance, but it should generally be in writing, because that is orderly, promotes the convenience of business transactions, renders them more certain, and facilitates the proof of acceptance." Greenie v. Duncan, 15 S. E. 956, 958, 37 S. C. 239; Short v. Blunt, 5 S. E. 191, 192, 99 N. C. 49. However, writing is not essential, in the absence of statutory regulation requiring it. Either method is valid, but it must appear in express words or by reasonable implication. The intention of the acceptor to pay the bill must clearly appear, in whatever manner evinced. Usually the acceptance is made by writing across the face of the bill the word "accepted," with the signature of the acceptor, but it may be made by any word or phraseology which implies substantially the same thing, and, though the acceptor may not accept on presentment of the bill, if he afterwards does so it is sufficient to bind him. Short v. Blunt, 5 S. E. 191, 192, 99 N. C. 49.

An acceptance of an order for payment of money may be in writing or oral, but when it is conditional the acceptor is only liable upon the happening of the condition, and the terms of an acceptance in writing cannot be varied by contemporaneous parol agreement. Kervan v. Townsend, 49 N. Y. Supp. 136, 140, 25 App. Div. 256.

A promise to accept an existing bill of exchange is an acceptance. A promise to pay it is also an acceptance. A promise, therefore, to accept or to pay, cannot be less than an acceptance. It amounts, in effect, to this: "Whether we shall send for the bill again and accept it in form or not is uncertain, but at any rate you may depend on its being paid." Wynne v. Raikes, 5 East, 514, 521.

A promise in writing to accept a bill of exchange, made within a reasonable time before it is drawn, will amount to an acceptance of the bill in favor of a person to whom the promise is communicated, and who takes the bill, for a valuable consideration, on the faith and credit of the promise. Woodard v. Griffiths-Marshall Grain Commission Co., 45 N. W. 433, 434, 43 Minn. 260.

In an action on a bill as to which the drawee had written that the bill would meet with due honor from him, the court said: "It would have been much better doctrine if it had been originally determined that nothing else should amount to an acceptance than a written acceptance on the bill itself; but it is now too late to revert to that, it having been determined by many cases that an acceptance may be by parol. What is an acceptance, but an engagement to pay the bill when due? This, then, is stronger than a parol acceptance, because it is a written engagement"—and held that such promise to honor the bill was an acceptance. Clarke v. Cock, 4 East, 57, 72. So, also, a promise by parol to honor a bill is an acceptance. Powell v. Monnier, 1 Atk. 611, 612.

The acceptance of a bill of exchange raises no implication that the drawer has funds to meet it, for a bill of exchange is not drawn on deposits necessarily, and in this respect an acceptance differs from the indorsement that a bank check is good, for such an indorsement implies that when it was made there were funds there to pay the check. An acceptance of a bill of exchange is a new promise by the acceptor to pay, funds or no funds. The acceptor is supposed to know the signature of its correspondent, and cannot dispute the signature afterwards. By such acceptance the acceptor becomes primarily liable as if he were the maker of a promissory note. Espy v. First Nat. Bank, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 604, 605, 21 L. Ed. 947.

The acceptance of a draft is a promise to pay it according to its terms, and a promise to pay, coupled with a condition changing the terms, is not an acceptance. Bonnell v. Mawha, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 198, 200.

Payment of a check of the Treasurer of the United States on a national bank duly designated as a depositor of public moneys, on an unauthorized indorsement on the name of the payee, is not an acceptance of the check, so as to authorize an action by the real owner to recover its amount as on an accepted check. A payment is not an acceptance under any circumstances. The one is a promise to perform the act, and the other an actual performance. A banker may be ready to make actual payment of a check when presented, while unwilling to make a promise to pay at a future time. Many, on the other hand, are more ready to promise to pay, than to meet the promise when required. First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343, 345, 24 L. Ed. 229.

The word "acceptance," as used in the negotiable instruments act, means an acceptance completed by delivery or notification. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178; Code Va. Supp. 1898, § 2841a; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 562, c. 73, § 207; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1060.

The acceptance of a bill is the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer. Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3175w.

An acceptance of a bill must be made in writing, by the drawee or by an acceptor for honor, and may be made by the acceptor writing his name across the face of the bill, with or without other words. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4140.

In contracts.

An acceptance is an engagement of one party acceding to the proposition of the other. Jeune v. Ward, 1 Barn. & Ald. 653, 659.

"Acceptance," as the word is used to denote an element of a contract, to wit, the acceptance of the offer, comprehends the assent of the person to whom the offer was made to the whole proposition contained in the offer, coextensive with it in all its provisions, and not qualified or departed from it by insertion of any new matter. Hutcherson v. Blakeman, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 80, 81.

"Acceptance," as used in the law of sales of personality, where the bargain is conducted by mail, means a paper writing deposited in the mails by one of the contracting parties, whereby the bargain is closed. Vassar v. Camp (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 341, 354.

A mental determination, not indicated by speech or put in course of indication by the act to the other party, is not an acceptance which would bind the other, nor does an act which in itself is no indication of an acceptance become such because accompanied by an unevinced mental determination. White v. Corlies, 46 N. Y. 467, 469; Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 120, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Trounstine v. Sellers, 11 Pac. 441, 445, 35 Kan. 447.

An "acceptance" of an offer made by letter, to constitute a contract between the parties, does not consist of mere volitions or a determination to accept the proposal. The writing of a letter accepting the offer is no more an "acceptance" of such offer than a bare determination locked in the acceptor's own bosom, and not communicated, would have been. There was no "acceptance" of an offer by letter until it went into the post office, which must be done within a reasonable time after the receiving of the offer. Averill v. Hedge, 12 Conn. 424, 433.

"Acceptance," as used in the law of sales of personality, means anything that amounts to a manifestation of a determination on the part of the vendee to accept the offer of the seller which has been communicated or put in a proper way to be communicated to the party making the offer. Just what constitutes an acceptance depends naturally in a great measure upon the circumstances in each particular case. Keeping silent under some circumstances may amount to an acceptance. Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 120, 21 Am. Dec. 262.

An acceptance upon terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer, and puts an end to the negotiations, unless the party who made the original offer renews it or assents to the modified suggestion. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 168, 169, 119 U. S. 149, 30 L. Ed. 376; First Nat. Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 43, 50, 25 L. Ed. 822; Baker v. Johnson County, 37 Iowa, 186, 189; Fox v. Turner, 1 Ill. App. (1 Bradw.) 153, 159.

"An 'acceptance' of an offer, to constitute a binding contract, must be in the words of, or must be entirely accordant with the terms and conditions of, the offer; for, if not, it is the acceptance of a different thing than the offer." Myers v. Smith (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 614, 634.

In order to constitute an acceptance of an option or offer to sell, the acceptance must be unconditional. Washington v. Rosario Min. & Mill. Co., 67 S. W. 459, 464, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 430; Bruner v. Wheaton, 46 Mo. 363, 366, 367.

Of corporate charter.

The "acceptance" of a charter of a corporation need not be by formal vote of the incorporators, but it may be inferred from the exercise of corporate acts by them under the charter. Glymont Improvement & Excursion Co. v. Toler, 30 Atl. 651, 652, 80 Md. 278.

Of dedication.

The acceptance necessary to establish a highway by dedication is the use of such highway by the public in the manner intended, and not any act of the town manifesting an intention to adopt or accept it by repairing it, or in some other way. Green v. Town of Canaan, 29 Conn. 157, 163.

"Acceptance" requisite to establish a highway by dedication means an act by the town authorities manifesting an intention to take and use the road as a public highway. The acts of appropriating money and labor upon the making and repair of streets so dedicated is an act of acceptance of the dedication, and makes the place in question a complete highway. Wright v. Tukey, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 290, 295.

An action by municipal authorities to obtain possession of land dedicated to public uses has been repeatedly approved, and it is impossible to conceive how "acceptance" to such dedication could be more plainly disclosed than by such an action. Atlantic City v. Groff, 45 Atl. 916, 64 N. J. Law, 527.

The approval by the common council of the city of a plat of a proposed addition is a certificate that the plat conforms to the law, but is in no sense an acceptance of the street as a public highway, nor does it cast upon the city the duty of keeping it in repair. Downend v. City of Kansas, 56 S. W. 902, 904, 156 Mo. 60, 51 L. R. A. 170.

Within the rule that there must be an acceptance of property dedicated to public use, acceptance requires no formal act. A resolution of the mayor and common council of a city, asserting the right of control over property dedicated, is equivalent to an "acceptance" by the public of the use tendered by the dedication. Coast Co. v. Borough of Spring Lake, 36 Atl. 21, 28, 56 N. J. Eq. 615.

In order to establish a highway there must be, in addition to a dedication, an "acceptance" by competent authority, and such an acceptance may ordinarily be evidenced in one of three ways, viz., by deed or other record, by acts in pais, such as opening, grading, or keeping the road in repair at public expense, or by long-continued user on the part of the public. City of Baltimore v. Broumel, 37 Atl. 648, 649, 86 Md. 153 (citing State v. Kent County Com'rs, 83 Md. 377, 35 Atl. 62, 33 L. R. A. 291).

The individual recognition of a street by members of a common council cannot be regarded as a municipal "acceptance" of that street. While it is true that the acceptance need not be evidenced in any formal way, yet, if the act relied upon as constituting the acceptance is a legislative act, it must be evidenced with legislative formality. It must be either by ordinance or resolution passed at a legal meeting of the members of the legislative body. It therefore follows that an ordinance passed by the common council of a borough authorizing a railroad company to construct its road along a certain avenue, being ultra vires, is not an "acceptance" by the borough of the avenue as a street. Thompson v. Ocean City R. Co. (N. J.) 37 Atl. 129, 131.

Of deed.

When a grantee is aware of a conveyance and does not dissent, and the conveyance is positively beneficial to him or her, acceptance will be presumed. Kingman & Co. v. Cornell-Tibbetts Machine & Buggy Co., 51 S. W. 727, 735, 150 Mo. 282 (citing Appleman v. Appleman, 41 S. W. 794, 62 Am. St. Rep. 732).

A lunatic is presumed to accept a deed clearly beneficial to him, and it appears that the same rule applies also to infancy or any other legal disability. McCartney v. McCartney (Tex.) 53 S. W. 388, 389, 391.

Where an unconditional beneficiary deed is delivered, at the time of its execution, into the hands of the father of the grantee, the grantee at that time being but two years of age, a presumption is raised of acceptance by the infant. Hall v. Hall, 17 S. W. 811, 812, 107 Mo. 101 (citing Tobin v. Bass, 85 Mo. 654, 55 Am. Rep. 392; Rogers v. Carey, 47 Mo. 236, 4 Am. Rep. 322; Palmer v. Palmer, 62 Iowa, 204, 17 N. W. 463; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. [2 Gilman] 557; Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112; Masterson v. Cheek, 23 Ill. [13 Peck] 72; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 284).

Where a deed at the time of its execution was delivered to the father of a child non compos mentis, for the benefit of such child, and with an intent to pass title, an acceptance of the conveyance will be presumed, and the delivery is complete. Eastham v. Powell, 11 S. W. 823, 824, 51 Ark. 530.

In sales.

"Acceptance," in a sale of goods, "is an act done by two parties, one of whom is content to deliver, and the other to receive, the subject-matter of the contract." Acraman v. Morrice, 8 Man. Gr. & S. 449, 459.

Acceptance of articles sold is the receipt of goods by a purchaser thereof with an intention of retaining them, indicated by some act or words sufficient for that purpose. Schmidt v. Thomas, 44 N. W. 771, 772, 75 Wis. 529, 532.

In statute of frauds.

See, also, "Accept and Receive."

2 Rev. St. p. 136, § 3, providing that a contract for the sale of goods over a certain value will not be binding unless there is a note or memorandum in writing or earnest paid, or an "acceptance and receipt" of the whole or a part of the property by the buyer, does not require an actual delivery and acceptance of the goods, but is satisfied by a constructive or symbolical delivery. But in order to satisfy the statute there must be something more than mere words; the act of "accepting and receiving" required to dispense with a note in writing requires more than a simple act of the mind. The acts of the parties must be of such a character as unequivocally place the property within the power and under the exclusive dominion of the buyer. There must be not merely a delivery and acceptance of the property in the goods, but also a complete acceptance of the possession by the buyer. Shindler v. Houston, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 261, 267, 49 Am. Dec. 316.

Rev. St. c. 74, § 4, requiring an "acceptance" of goods of the value of more than $50, which have been sold without a memorandum in writing or a payment on the purchase price, in order to make the contract binding, cannot be construed to mean that the "acceptance" must be by the purchaser personally; but receiving of the property purchased by an agent duly authorized to purchase constitutes an acceptance by the purchaser, and hence, where the vendor had transported goods, and delivered them at the place where the purchaser's agents directed, and again shipped by the agent, there was a sufficient acceptance within the statute. Snow v. Warner, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 132, 137, 43 Am. Dec. 417.

An "acceptance" of goods, within the statute of frauds, must be an actual intentional receiving by a purchaser or his agent. The mere delivery of the goods to a carrier selected by the seller for transportation could not be construed as an "acceptance" by a purchaser, as that term is used in the statute, since such fact did not include any act on the purchaser's part. Hanson v. Armitage, 5 Barn. & Ald. 557, 558.

An "acceptance" of personality which has been made the subject of a verbal sale is not sufficient to take the sale out of the operation of the statute of frauds as long as the seller's lien on the goods for their price remains, and the buyer cannot maintain trover for their detention. To constitute a delivery and acceptance, something more than mere words is necessary. There must be some act of the parties amounting to a transfer of possession before there can be an acceptance by the buyer. Edwards v. Grand Trunk Ry. of Canada, 54 Me. 105, 111.

The acceptance and actual receipt of goods which make a written memorandum of the sale unnecessary under the statute of frauds is not such an acceptance and receipt as will preclude the purchaser from questioning the quantity or quality of the goods or in any way disputing the fact of the performance of the contract by the seller. The effect of such statutory acceptance and receipt is merely to dispense with the necessity of the written memorandum of the contract. Morton v. Tibbett, 15 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 428, 437.

The abandonment by a seller of his lien on the property by giving the buyer absolute control over it, so that he had a right to take the goods and dispose of them as he pleased, constituted an acceptance within the statute of frauds. Simpson v. Krumdick, 10 N. W. 18, 19, 28 Minn. 352.

Acceptance may be made without a receipt of the property where the sale is of a specific lot of goods, and the bargain itself identifies the goods as those sold, and of the quality which the buyer agrees to purchase. Simpson v. Krumdick, 10 N. W. 18, 19, 28 Minn. 355.

Of structure.

Under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring a materialman furnishing material to a contractor to file his lien claim within 30 days after the completion of the structure, and providing that the occupation of the structure by the owner or its "acceptance" by him should be deemed conclusive evidence of completion, acceptance should be construed to include the releasing of the contractor and the taking control of the work by the owner for the purpose of completing it. Giant Powder Co. v. San Diego Flume Co., 25 Pac. 976, 88 Cal. 20.

ACCEPTED.

A juror is "accepted" when he has passed successfully the scrutiny of examination and has been told by both sides to take a seat in the jury box, which he has done, neither being challenged by either side for cause or peremptorily. United States v. Davis (U. S.) 103 F. 457, 459.

An offer of a bargain by one person to another is not "accepted" by the latter unless it is done according to the terms in which the offer was made. Any qualification of or departure from those terms invalidates the offer unless the same be agreed to by the person who made it. Ellason v.

Henshaw, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 225, 228, 4 L. Ed. 556.

The words "accepted and recorded" in Comp. St. c. 23, § 9, providing that commissioners to assign dower shall be sworn, etc., and shall set off the dower and make return of their doings in writing, which on being accepted and recorded shall cause the dower to remain fixed and certain, unless such confirmation be set aside, etc., are used in the sense of "confirmed." That is, if the assignment of dower by the commissioners is satisfactory to the judge, then he shall accept and record the same. Serry v. Curry, 42 N. W. 97-100, 26 Neb. 353.

As acceptance of bill or note.

Where the acceptance of a bill of exchange is in writing, the words "accepted," "seen," "presented," written on the bill or on any other paper relating to the transaction, will amount to an acceptance. Barnet v. Smith, 30 N. H. (10 Fost.) 256, 266, 64 Am. Dec. 290; Spear v. Pratt (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 582, 38 Am. Dec. 600 (quoting Bayley on Bills, 163 [Am. Ed. 1836]).

The word "accepted," when written on the back of a bill of exchange, above the signature of the drawee, is to be construed as showing an acceptance of the bill by the latter. Miller v. Butler (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 814.

The party on whom an order to pay $140 was drawn wrote his name across the face, and over his signature were the words, "Paid on this order $40." In an action against him as acceptor to recover the balance of the order, in which he claimed he had not accepted it, the court said: "Our statute requires an acceptance to be in writing, but it does not prescribe in what form of words it shall be expressed. The authorities require very little to make out an acceptance. Anything written by the drawee indicating an intent to accept is sufficient. To say, 'accepted,' or 'honored,' or 'seen,' is sufficient, even though no signature is appended, and the mere writing of the drawee's name across the face of the bill is an acceptance, for this, as Judge Cowen well remarks, is a still clearer indication of intent to accept than any of the single words mentioned, and is a very common mode of acceptance." Peterson v. Hubbard, 28 Mich. 197, 199.

"The word 'accepted' on a bill of exchange is an engagement to pay the money when due." Cowan v. Hallack, 13 Pac. 700, 703, 9 Colo. 572.

Defendant arranged with a merchant for the furnishing of clothing to third parties. The bills therefor were made out against the persons purchasing the goods in the usual form, and across the face of each was written "accepted," and signed by the defendant. Held, that the word "accepted" could not be construed as importing a guaranty of the payment of the bill by defendant, such not being its usual meaning and connection when so written. Hatch v. Antrim, 51 Ill. 106, 108.

ACCESS.

Where property in a building is assigned and the key to the building is given to the assignee for the purpose of "access" to the property, the use of the word "access" in such relation means the right to approach and inspect the property. Gilkerson-Sloss Commission Co. v. London, 13 S. W. 513, 514, 53 Ark. 88, 7 L. R. A. 403; Rice v. Frayser (U. S.) 24 Fed. 460, 463.

ACCESS (Easement of).

An "easement of access" is the right which an abutting owner has of ingress and egress to and from his premises, in addition to the public easement in the street. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric Ry. Co., 70 N. W. 678, 680, 95 Wis. 561, 37 L. R. A. 856, 60 Am. St. Rep. 136.

An "easement of access" from the street of an abutting property holder is a property right existing by virtue of ownership of the land abutting upon the street, and cannot be impaired or taken away without compensation. Ferguson v. Covington & C. El. Railroad & Transfer & Bridge Co., 57 S. W. 460, 462, 108 Ky. 662.

The easement of "access" which the owner of property has cannot be the mere right of going out from his home or place of business on the street and returning therefrom on his own land, which he may do by virtue of his personal liberty, but means a certain convenience in the use of his property with respect to the rest of the world. If the landowner is a trader, an hotel keeper, a manufacturer, his easement of access is somewhat commensurate with the uses to which his property is devoted. The right of access includes the opportunity for a man's customers to come to his place of business without unreasonable hindrance or interruption. A property devoted to business is of little value when business is turned away by obstructions and barriers. The owner may stand his teams and wagons in the street in proximity with his land a reasonable length of time in a reasonable manner, and may occupy a portion of the street, reasonably, convenient for his purposes. This access is broad enough for the beneficial enjoyment of his property, so that if his place of business is situated so as to invite trade and custom from the opposite side of the street, or from places on the street beyond in either direction, such patronage ought not to be turned away from him by obstructions on his front. Reining v. New York, L. & W. Ry. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 238, 240.

ACCESSIBLE.

See "Inaccessible."

Act 1881, c. 649, amending the general act, gave the right to condemn land for earth and gravel for embankments, but limiting the right to lands which were contiguous to the road and reasonably "accessible" to where the same was to be used. Held, that "accessible," in connection with the other language, only authorized a condemnation of land so near as to permit the dirt and gravel to be carried away. In re Long Island R. Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 489, 490, 66 Hun. 631; In re Moran, Id.

ACCESSIO.

"Accessio" is defined by Bouvier as a manner of acquiring the property in a thing which becomes united with that which a person already possesses. Mather v. Chapman, 40 Conn. 382, 397, 16 Am. Rep. 48.

ACCESSION.

Accession is a right, derived from the civil law, to all of that which one's own property produces, and to that which is united to it either naturally or artificially. The civil law required the thing to be changed into a different species, and to be incapable of being restored to its ancient form, as grapes made into wine, before the original proprietor could lose his title; nor even then did the other party acquire any title by the accession, unless the materials had been taken away in ignorance of their being the property of another. By the English common law, whatever alteration of form any property has undergone, the owner may seize it in its new shape if he can prove the identity of the original material, as if leather be made into shoes, cloth into a coat, or trees squared into timber, the article in its altered form is still the property of the owner of the materials, if they can be identified. Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 348, 350, 4 Am. Dec. 368.

To deprive one of his right to things produced or made of the soil belonging to him by "accession," the change must be so great as to convert the materials themselves into a different species. Thus, the cloth of another made into a coat or other garment does not vest in the operator, but all the owner has to do to reclaim his property in its new shape is to identify the materials. But if corn were made into meal, the change is into a new species, and is so great that the original materials cannot be reproduced out of the articles, and the new article belongs to the operator. Hence bricks not burnt, which have been made from soil which the maker did not own when he made the bricks, belong to the original owner, for they are soil and earth still; and as to bricks which have been burnt, though they have undergone a considerable change, so great as to place them nearly on the boundary line of right, still the change is not sufficient to strip the original proprietor of the soil of his right to them, for they can be dissolved and made again into soil; therefore the property is not changed, and belongs to the owner of the soil, and not the maker of the brick. Lampton's Ex'rs v. Preston's Ex'rs, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 454, 455, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

It was a principle, settled as early as the time of the Year Books, that, whatever alteration of form any property had undergone, the owner might seize it in its new shape and be entitled to the ownership of it in its state of improvement, if he could prove the identity of the original materials; as, if leather be made into shoes, or cloth into a coat. Plaintiff delivered $40 worth of duck to H., who agreed to have it manufactured into a sail, and that it should remain the property of the plaintiff until it was paid for. He caused it to be manufactured as by agreement, at a cost of $18, and, without ever paying the plaintiff, sold the sail to C., who sold it to the defendant. Held, that replevin could be maintained on the principle of accession. Eaton v. Munroe, 52 Me. 63, 64.

It is a general rule of law that if the materials of one person are united to the materials of another by labor, forming a joint product, the owner of the principal materials will acquire the right of property in the whole by right of accession. Pulcifer v. Page, 32 Me. 404, 405, 54 Am. Dec. 582.

The ownership of a thing, whether it be movable or immovable, carries with it the right to all that the thing produces and to all that becomes united to it, either naturally or artificially. This is called the "right of accession." Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 498.

ACCESSORY.

An "accessory" is he or she who stands by and aids, abets, or assists, or who, not being present aiding, abetting, or assisting, had advised and encouraged the perpetration of the crime. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1168; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4665; People v. Schwartz, 32 Cal. 160, 164; Fixmer v. People, 38 N. E. 667, 668, 153 Ill. 123.

"An accessory is one who is not the chief actor in a felonious offense, not present at its performance, but is in some way connected therein, either before or after the act committed." State v. Berger (Iowa) 96 N. W. 1094, 1095; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 44; United States v. Hartwell (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 198, 199 (quoting 4 Bl. Comm. 34).

All persons who, after the commission of any felony, conceal or aid the offender, with knowledge that he has committed a felony, and with intent that he may avoid or escape from arrest, trial, conviction, or punishment, are accessories. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6826; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 28; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 1949.

All persons who, after full knowledge that a felony has been committed, conceal it from the magistrate, or harbor and protect the person charged therewith or convicted thereof, are accessories. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4075.

An accessory is one who, knowing that an offense has been committed, conceals the offender, or gives him any other aid in order that he may evade an arrest or trial or the execution of his sentence. But no person who aids the offender in making or preparing his defense at law, or procures him to be bailed, though he afterwards escapes, shall be considered an accessory. The following persons cannot be accessories: (1) The husband or wife of an offender; (2) his relations in the ascending or descending line by consanguinity or affinity; (3) his brothers or sisters; (4) his domestic servants. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, arts. 86, 87.

A person who, after the commission of a felony, harbors, conceals, or aids the offender, with intent that he may avoid or escape from arrest, trial, conviction, or punishment, having knowledge or reasonable ground to believe that such offender is liable to arrest, has been arrested, is indicted or convicted, or has committed a felony, is an accessory to the felony. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 30.

An accessory is one who stands by and aids and abets and assists, or who counsels and advises the perpetration of the crime. People v. Ah Ping, 27 Cal. 489, 490.

While certain crimes can only be committed by a particular class of the community, others not of the class may be principals in the second degree or accessories thereto, since one may assist in a crime he cannot commit. Bishop v. State, 45 S. E. 614, 118 Ga. 799.

"Mere silence or approval of the commission of an act after it is done does not constitute one an accessory." Harrel v. State, 80 Am. Dec. 97, note (citing Cooper v. Johnson [sub nom. People v. Johnson] 81 Mo. 483).

Under Cr. Code, div. 2, § 2 (Starr & C. Ann. St. par. 331), declaring that an accessory is he who stands by and aids, or who, not being present aiding, has advised the perpetration of the crime, and shall be considered as principal, an indictment alleging that one man murdered another, and that defendant did "feloniously, unlawfully, and maliciously incite, move, procure, counsel, advise, encourage, assist, aid and abet the said [mur-derer], the said felony and murder in manner and form aforesaid to do and commit," without alleging that defendant murdered the deceased, does not charge an indictable offense. Usselton v. People, 36 N. E. 952, 953, 149 Ill. 612 (following Baxter v. People, 8 Ill. [3 Gilman] 368).

"An 'accessory' is defined to be any one who, knowing that an offense has been committed, conceals the offender, or gives him any other aid in order that he may evade arrest, or trial, or the execution of his sentence." Anderson v. State, 45 S. W. 15, 16, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 83; Peeler v. State, 3 Tex. App. 533, 535; Schackey v. State, 53 S. W. 877, 878, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 255; Chitister v. State, 28 S. W. 683, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 635; Street v. State, 45 S. W. 577, 578, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 134. The person charged as an accessory must have given some personal help to the offender, and the naked fact that he receives stolen property, knowing it to have been stolen, does not render him an "accessory." Street v. State, 45 S. W. 577, 578, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 134. But a person who aids an offender in making or preparing his defense at law, or procures him to be bailed, though he afterwards escapes, is not an accessory. Tex. Pen. Code, art. 86. Schackey v. State, 53 S. W. 877, 878, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 255. The mere fact that accused gave witness property to secure his departure does not render the witness an accessory. Chitister v. State, 28 S. W. 683, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 635.

ACCESSORY AFTER THE FACT.

An accessory after the fact is a person who, after full knowledge that a crime has been committed, conceals it from the magistrate, and harbors, assists, or protects the person who is charged with or convicted of the crime. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 47; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4666; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1168.

Every person not standing in the relation of husband or wife, parent or grandparent, child or grandchild, brother or sister, by consanguinity or affinity, to the offender, who, after the commission of any felony, shall harbor, conceal, or maintain or assist any principal felon or accessory before the fact, or who shall give the offender any other aid, knowing that he had committed the felony, or had been accessory thereto before the fact, with intent that he shall avoid or escape from detection, arrest, trial, or punishment, shall be deemed accessory after the fact. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 6783; Rev. St. Fla. 1892, § 2356.

"An accessory after the fact is one who, knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, comforts, or assists the felon," United States v. Hartwell (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 196, 199 (quoting 4 Bl. Comm. 37; 1 Hale.

P. C. 618); Lloyd v. State, 42 Ga. 221, 225; Pearce v. Territory, 68 Pac. 504, 506, 11 Okl. 438. The absence of the party at the time the crime was actually committed is necessarily implied in this definition. United States v. Hartwell (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 196, 199.

"The true test whether one is an accessory after the fact or not is whether what he did was by way of personal help to his principal to elude punishment." Blakeley v. State, 7 S. W. 233, 235, 24 Tex. App. 610, 5 Am. St. Rep. 912 (quoting 1 Bishop Cr. Law [7th Ed.] § 695); Lloyd v. State, 42 Ga. 221, 225.

An accessory after the fact is one who, with knowledge that a felony has been committed by another, aids, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon, whether he be a principal or an accessory before the fact. Albritton v. State, 13 South. 955, 956, 32 Fla. 358.

At common law an "accessory after the fact" is one who, knowing a felony has been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon, to constitute which three things were requisite: The felony must be completed; the party relieving must know that the felon is guilty; and must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist him. State v. Davis, 14 R. I. 281, 283.

The offense of being an accessory to a felony after the fact is preserved by the Penal Code, and is defined in section 30 to be "a person who, after the commission of a felony, harbors, conceals, or aids the offender, with intent that he may avoid or escape from arrest, conviction or punishment, having knowledge or reasonable grounds to believe that such offender is liable to arrest, has been arrested, is indicted, or convicted, or has committed a felony, is an accessory to the felony." This is substantially the definition given by the common law to the offense of being accessory after the fact. People v. Sanborn, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 123, 127.

One cannot be convicted as an "accessory after the fact" unless the felony be complete, and, until such felony has been consummated, any aid or assistance rendered to a party in order to enable him to escape the consequences of his crime will not make the person affording the assistance an accessory after the fact. Harrel v. State, 39 Miss. 702, 705, 80 Am. Dec. 95.

One who has done no act which renders him liable for murder is only liable as an accessory after the fact by aiding and concealing the dead body of the victim. People v. Keefer, 3 Pac. 818, 821, 65 Cal. 232, 2 West Coast Rep. 878.

As to what shall be deemed to be within the general definition depends upon the facts in the particular case. To receive stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, does not fall under any of the definitions of the common law, and does not constitute the receiver an accessory, but is in itself a distinct and separate offense. Loyd v. State, 42 Ga. 221, 225.

Within the definition of Mansf. Dig. § 1507, as "a person who, after a full knowledge that a crime has been committed, conceals it from the magistrate, or harbors and protects the person charged with or found guilty of the crime," a woman who lived in the house with a husband and his wife, and who knew that the husband was about to kill his wife, and after he had killed her knew that he had done so, who failed to notify the authorities of the fact, not from any desire to shield the husband, but from fear that she would be killed if she did tell, is not an accessory after the fact. Carroll v. State, 45 Ark. 539, 545.

Any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to prevent his apprehension, trial, or punishment, is sufficient to make a man an accessory after the fact. Blakely v. State, 7 S. W. 233, 235, 24 Tex. App. 616, 5 Am. St. Rep. 912.

Accomplice distinguished.

An "accessory after the fact" does not come within Wharton's definition of an "accomplice" as one who "knowingly and voluntarily, and with a common intent with the principal offender, unites in the commission of the crime." Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440. The offense of an accessory after the fact is distinctly his own, and he is liable to a different punishment; nor can he be indicted jointly with the principal for the principal's offense. State v. Umble, 22 S. W. 378, 380, 115 Mo. 452 (citing Commonwealth v. Wood, 77 Mass. [11 Gray] 86).

One who is a principal cannot be an accessory after the fact, and so cannot be an accomplice. People v. Chadwick, 25 Pac. 737, 738, 7 Utah, 134.

ACCESSORY BEFORE THE FACT.

An accessory before the fact is one who, being absent at the time the crime is committed, yet procures, counsels, or commands another to commit it. United States v. Hartwell (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 196, 199 (citing 1 Hale, P. C. 615); Trial of Aaron Burr, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 470, 492, 2 L. Ed. 684; State v. Beebe, 17 Minn. 241, 246 (Gil. 218, 224); Albritton v. State, 13 South. 955, 956, 32 Fla. 358; Pearce v. Territory, 68 Pac. 504, 506, 11 Okl. 438; Komrs v. People, 73 Pac. 25, 31 Colo. 212; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 45.

Any person who shall feloniously move, incite, counsel, hire, command, or procure any other person to commit a felony is an accessory before the fact. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 6430.

"An 'accessory before the fact' is one who counsels, commands, or procures another to commit a crime, not being himself actually or constructively present at the time of its commission. It is not essential that any specific mode of perpetrating the crime should be counseled or commanded, or that it should be done in the particular way instigated. The inciter may be indicted, convicted, and punished under the statute if the principal commits the crime, though he may vary the mode or circumstances of perpetration, or though no particular manner, time or place may have been counseled or instigated." Griffith v. State, 8 South. 812, 814, 90 Ala. 583.

Foster (Crown Law, p. 349), in showing what acts of concurrence will make a man a principal, says: "He must be present at the perpetration, otherwise he can be no more than an accessory before the fact." There are no accessories in high treason; all are principals. Every instance of incitement, aid, or protection which in the case of felony will render a man an accessory before the fact, in the case of high treason, whether it be treason at common law or by statute, will make him a principal in treason. United States v. Burr (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 55, 171.

The bare fact of receiving information that a felony is likely to be committed has never been considered sufficient to make one an accessory before the fact. Edmondson v. State (Ark.) 10 S. W. 21, 22 (quoting 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 29, § 23).

An "accessory before the fact" is defined to be a person whose will contributes to a felony committed by another as principal, while himself too far away to aid in the felonious act. Pearce v. Territory, 68 Pac. 504, 506, 11 Okl. 438; Spear v. Hiles, 30 N. W. 511, 512, 67 Wis. 361.

In 2 Hawk. c. 29, § 16, it is said that: "It seems to be generally holden that those who, by showing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's felonious design of committing a felony, abet and encourage him to commit it, are all of them accessories before the fact, both to the felony intended and all other felonies which shall happen in and by the execution of it, unless they retract and countermand their encouragement before it is actually committed." One who basely conceals a felony which he knows to be intended is not an accessory. 2 Hawk. c. 29, § 23. Neither is tacit acquiescence when words which imply mere permission sufficient to constitute the offense. There must be some active proceeding on the part of him who is charged as an accessory, or he is not guilty of the offense. Spear v. Hiles, 30 N. W. 511, 512, 67 Wis. 361.

An accessory before the fact is one aiding and assisting in the carrying out of a crime before the commission thereof, and hence does not include the joining of an organization for the purpose of exposing it, and acts in carrying out such design. Commonwealth v. Hollister, 27 Atl. 386, 157 Pa. 13, 25 L. R. A. 349.

An accessory before the fact, as defined by the common law, is a person, being absent at the time the felony was committed, who procured, counseled, commanded or aided another to commit a felony; and he could not be tried and convicted until after the conviction of the principal offender. The common law recognizes a difference between the principal to a crime and the accessory thereto before the fact, and a person proven by the evidence to be a principal cannot be convicted on an indictment charging him with being an accessory before the fact. They were by the common law regarded as distinct offenses. People v. Sanborn, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 123, 126.

Accomplice synonymous.

See "Accomplice."

Principal distinguished.

The distinction between "principal" and "accessory before the fact" is this: The principal is the one who actually does the criminal act, or participates in the doing of it, whether actually or only constructively present, or who is actually present at the time of the doing of it, aiding and abetting; while the accessory is one who has such connection with the crime, by reason of preparation, procurement, advice, or encouragement, as to be deemed criminally liable therefor, but does not participate in the final commission of the crime, and is not present thereat. State v. Prater, 43 S. E. 230, 236, 52 W. Va. 132 (citing McClain, Cr. Law, § 204).

ACCESSORY CONTRACT.

An "accessory contract" is made for assuring the performance of the prior contract, either by the same parties or by others; such as suretyship, mortgage, and pledge. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1771.

ACCESSORY DURING THE FACT.

An "accessory during the fact" is a person who stands by without interfering or giving such help as may be in his or her power to prevent a criminal offense from being committed. Mills' Ann. St. 1891, § 1168. An indictment under such provision which fails to show that it was in the power of the defendant to prevent the commission of a crime without placing himself in danger is insufficient. Farrell v. People, 46 Pac. 841, 842, 8 Colo. App. 524.

Fortuitous accident, see "Fortuitous."

"An accident is a coming or falling; an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, and therefore not expected; chance; casualty; contingency." Webst. Dict. Henry v. Grand Ave. R. Co., 21 S. W. 214, 216, 113 Mo. 525; Burkhard v. Travellers' Ins. Co., 102 Pa. 262, 268, 48 Am. Rep. 205; Grant v. Moseley, 29 Ala. 302, 305; Ripley v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 823, 825; Schneider v. Provident Life Ins. Co., 24 Wis. 28, 30, 1 Am. Rep. 203; Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 44 Hun, 599, 606.

"Accident is defined by Worcester to be an event proceeding from an unknown cause, or happening without the design of the agent; an unforeseen event; incident; casualty; chance; so that death is accidental where the injury was not designed nor the danger known." Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 102 Pa. 262, 268, 48 Am. Rep. 205.

"Accidental" means "happening by chance, or unexpectedly taking place not according to the usual course of events; casual; fortuitous. We speak of a thing as accidental when it falls to us by chance, and not in the regular course of things, as an accidental meeting, accidental advantage," etc. North America Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. (19 P. F. Smith) 43, 51, 8 Am. Rep. 212.

An "accident" is an event happening without the concurrence or the will of the person by whose agency it was caused; any event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; anything occurring unexpectedly, or without known or assignable cause; that which happens without one's direct intention. The opposite of accident is design, volition, intent. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Vandecar (U. S.) 86 Fed. 282, 285, 30 C. C. A. 48.

"Accident," as used in an insurance policy providing for insuring against accidents, is to be construed "in its ordinary and usual signification, as being an event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation." Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 3 N. E. 818, 822, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298; Western Travelers' Acc. Ass'n v. Holbrook (Neb.) 94 N. W. 816, 818. It is often an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate char-

"Accidental," as used in an insurance policy providing for an indemnity whenever the death of a member occurred from an "accidental" cause, is an event happening without any human agency, or, if happening through human agency, an event which under the circumstances is unusual, and not expected, to the person to whom it happens. Carnes v. Iowa Traveling Men's Ass'n, 76 N. W. 683, 684, 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306; Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Ass'n, 78 N. W. 252, 253, 107 Iowa, 538, 43 L. R. A. 693, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212; McGlinchey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 14 Atl. 13, 14, 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190; Hey v. Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Co., 37 Atl. 402, 181 Pa. 220, 59 Am. St. Rep. 644; American Acc. Co. v. Carson, 36 S. W. 169, 170, 99 Ky. 441; Hutchcraft's Ex'r v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 8 S. W. 570, 571, 87 Ky. 300, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484; Lovell v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n, 28 S. W. 877, 878, 126 Mo. 104, 30 L. R. A. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638; Accident Ins. Co. of North America v. Bennett, 16 S. W. 723, 724, 90 Tenn. (6 Pickle) 256, 25 Am. St. Rep. 685.

An "accident," within the meaning of an insurance policy, is an event happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things; or not as expected. Newman v. Railway Officials' & Employees' Acc. Ass'n, 42 N. E. 650, 651, 15 Ind. App. 29; Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 42; United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Barry, 9 Sup. Ct. 755, 759, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. Ed. 60; Barry v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n (U. S.) 23 Fed. 712, 714; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Vandecar (U. S.) 86 Fed. 282, 285, 30 C. C. A. 48; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Selden (U. S.) 78 Fed. 285, 288, 24 C. C. A. 92; Konrad v. Union Casualty & Surety Co., 21 South. 721, 723, 49 La. Ann. 636; Standard Life & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Langston, 30 S. W. 427, 428, 60 Ark. 381; Atlanta Acc. Ass'n v. Alexander, 30 S. E. 939, 104 Ga. 709, 42 L. R. A. 188. If a result is such as follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means; but if the act preceding the injury is something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual, then the injury has resulted through "accidental" means. Atlanta Acc. Ass'n v. Alexander, 30 S. E. 939, 104 Ga. 709, 42 L. R. A. 188.

An accident is an unusual or unexpected result attending the operation or performance of a usual or necessary act or event. Hey v. Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Co. (Pa.) 40 Wkly. Notes Cas. 423, 424. "An unusual and unexpected result attending the performance of a usual and necessary act." Williams v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 14 N. Y. Supp. 728, 730, 60 Hun, 580.

Accidents are unforeseen, unexpected, and unthought of occurrences. Breed v. Glasgow Inv. Co. (U. S.) 92 Fed. 760, 764.

An accident is something which takes place without any intelligent or apparent cause, without design, and of course. Malory v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 47 N. Y. 52, 7 Am. Rep. 410; Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 42.

An accident is the result of an unknown cause, or an unusual and unexpected result of a known cause. Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 76 N. C. 320; Ripley v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 823, 825; Railford v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 41 S. E. 806, 130 N. C. 597; Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 513, 515, 8 App. Div. 127.

An accident is the happening of an event without the design and aid of the person, and which is unforeseen. Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 472, 478, 20 N. E. 347, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758; Williams v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 14 N. Y. Supp. 728, 730, 60 Hun, 580; Guldenkirch v. Same, 5 N. Y. Supp. 428, 430; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Vandecar (U. S.) 86 Fed. 282, 285, 30 C. C. A. 48.

An accident is any event which takes place without the foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event. Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 42; Ripley v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 823, 825; Providence Life Ins. & Inv. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 310, 315; United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Hubbell, 47 N. E. 544, 546, 56 Ohio St. 516, 40 L. R. A. 453.

The word "accident" in its popular meaning means "a casualty, something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly, without any design on the part of the person injured." Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 26 Pac. 762, 763, 89 Cal. 170, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455.

"Accidental" is that which happens without design or expectation. Williams v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 14 N. Y. Supp. 728, 730, 60 Hun, 580.

The term "accident," as used in a policy of insurance against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, means happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things. And therefore a result ordinarily and naturally flowing from the conduct of the party insured cannot be said to be accidental, even where he may not have foreseen the consequences. Dozier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York (U. S.) 46 Fed. 446, 449, 13 L. R. A. 114.

In Cyc. Law & Proc. vol. 1, 249, in treating of accidents, it is said: "Where, however, the effect is not the natural and probable consequence of the means which produce it—an effect which does not ordinarily follow and cannot be reasonably anticipated from the use of the means, or an effect which the actor did not intend to produce and which he cannot be charged with a design of producing—it is produced by accidental means." Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 72 S. W. 1047, 1049.

According to lexicographers, an accident is a sudden, unforeseen, and unexpected event. It has been held by courts, adopting this or any similar definition, that, where a man is killed by robbers, this was a case of death by accident, in the sense in which that word is used, in accident insurance policies. So, too, it has been held that death from a blow struck by one who has attempted to blackmail the assured was an accident covered by an accident insurance policy. In these and in all like cases in which death occurs by violent means, external to the man, and against or without intention or concurrence of will on the part of the man, death may probably be called an accident. A learned and laborious writer states the true rule for determining whether injuries are accidental. With great simplicity, clearness, and strength, Biddle says: "An injury may be said objectively to be accidental, though subjectively it is not, and, if it occurs without the agency of the insured, it may logically be termed 'accidental,' though it was brought about designedly by another person." Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Johnson, 17 South. 2, 3, 72 Miss. 333, 30 L. R. A. 206 (citing Bid. Ins. vol. 2, p. 780).

When something unusual occurs which injures an employé, but such unusual occurrence is not even inferentially the result of an unusual act, and the employer has, so far as he is concerned, been pursuing his usual course, which had theretofore been done in safety, then the unusual occurrence is what is called an "accident." Wendall v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 75 S. W. 689, 691, 100 Mo. App. 556.

An "accident" is an event from an unknown cause. Thus, where plaintiff was injured while unloading a car load of telephone poles, and there was evidence that the method of unloading was the usual one, and it did not appear that there was any lack of the necessary hands, or that the standards on the cars which broke were inferior, and everything was in proper condition, and no mishap or danger anticipated, it was an "accident." Keck v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 42 S. E. 610, 131 N. C. 277.

An accident is an event from an unknown cause, or an unusual or unexpected event from a known cause. Thus, where a piece of iron was fastened by a bolt and a nut, and another workman had removed the nut, but had not taken off the piece of iron, which fell while plaintiff was working, and injured him, such injury was accidental, for, while the cause of the injury was known, the event was most unusual and unexpected. It was almost miraculous that a piece of iron should have been held underneath a bumper to which it was fastened after the support had been removed. Ralford v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 41 S. E. 806, 130 N. C. 597.

The necessity for additional light caused by the subsequent construction of elevated railroads, and the additional expense of gas and electric lights caused by a combination of the gas and electric light companies, do not constitute "accidents," or casualties, so as to authorize a further appropriation under Rev. St. c. 24, § 90, providing that the expenditure of a city cannot lawfully exceed the amount provided for in the annual appropriation bill, unless an improvement is necessitated by an accident or casualty happening after such annual appropriation is made. City of Chicago v. Nichols, 52 N. E. 559, 360, 177 Ill. 97.

"An accident is an occurrence to which human fault does not contribute. This is a restricted meaning, for accidents are recognized as occurrences arising from the carelessness of man." Nave v. Flack, 90 Ind. 205, 210, 46 Am. Rep. 205 (quoting Browne, Jud. Interp. 4).

"That which is an accident in the law is something that occurs after the exercise of a care that the law requires to be exercised to prevent the occurrence." United States v. Boyd (U. S.) 45 Fed. 851, 855.

"Accident" is defined as an event happening unexpectedly and without fault. Osborne v. Van Dyke, 85 N. W. 784, 785, 113 Iowa, 557 (citing Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593); Kellar v. Shippee, 45 Ill. App. 377, 381.

Accident is any casualty which could not be prevented by ordinary care and diligence. Armijo v. Abeytia, 25 Pac. 777, 781, 5 N. M. 533.

Accident is an occurrence which human prescience and prudence cannot foresee or forestall. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Barnett, 45 S. W. 550, 551, 65 Ark. 255.

Where both parties used ordinary care, then a misfortune to one was an accident without the fault of either, and the law must rest where the misfortune placed it. Aurora Branch R. Co. v. Grimes, 13 Ill. (3 Peck) 585, 587.

To make an accident or casualty, or, as the law sometimes states it, an inevitable accident, it must be such an accident as the defendant could not have avoided by the use of the kind and degree of care necessary to the exigency and in the circumstances in which he was placed. Brown v. Kendall, 80 Mass. (6 Cush.) 292, 296.

An accident sufficient to excuse a collision on the highway exists only where the collision was unavoidable and entirely without the fault of the defendant. Thus, where defendant rode a young and spirited horse without a curb chain, and pulled the wrong rein, "it was not an accident. Center v. Finney (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 94, 98.

"Accident," in jurisprudence, means not merely inevitable casualty or act of God, but rather such unforeseen events, mishaps, losses, or omissions as are not the result of any neglect of his or misconduct in the party who seeks relief. Alexander v. Bailey, 70 Tenn. (2 Lea) 636, 639.

Rev. St. §§ 4386, 4388 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2995, 2996], forbidding interstate carriers of animals to confine them more than a certain length of time without unloading for water, etc., unless prevented by storm or "other accidental causes," means other unavoidable accidental causes, so that an effect attributable to the negligence of the carrier is not an unavoidable accident. Newport News & M. Val. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 61 Fed. 488, 490, 9 C. C. A. 579.

"Death by accident" is where one is engaged in doing a lawful act and unfortunately kills another. A familiar example is where a person is using a hatchet in a lawful manner, and it flies off the handle and kills another. This is pure accident, and not punishable. To justify a verdict of not guilty on the ground of accident, it must appear to the jury from the proof before them that the act done was the unfortunate result of a perfectly lawful act in itself, done with reasonable care and regard for the lives and persons of others. If there be any negligence or want of proper care, the loss of life or injury to the person cannot be said to be purely accidental, but partly the consequence of the default of the individual killing the other, and therefore subject to indictment for the casualty. State v. Becker (Del.) 33 Atl. 178, 180.

"Accident," as used in reference to an injury to a shipment of freight, where the bill of lading relieves the carrier from liability for loss except for its own negligence, is to be construed to mean "such happenings as the exercise of proper care would have prevented." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Raiordon, 13 Atl. 324, 326, 119 Pa. 577, 4 Am. St. Rep. 670.

A fire is accidental, and there is no liability on the person kindling such fire on his premises for damages caused by the spread thereof, unless there is negligence in its kindling or guarding. Read v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 280, 282; Dorr v. Harkness, 10 Atl. 400, 402, 49 N. J.

Law (20 Vroom) 571, 60 Am. Rep. 656; Webb v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 420, 427, 10 Am. Rep. 389; Brummit v. Furness, 27 N. E. 656, 658, 1 Ind. App. 401, 50 Am. St. Rep. 215; Filliter v. Phippard, 11 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 347, 357; Lothrop v. Thayer, 138 Mass. 466, 470, 52 Am. Rep. 286.

An instruction, in a personal injury case, that if the jury believed that the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were merely the result of accident, then the verdict should be for defendant, was not erroneous on the ground that the use of the word "accident" eliminated the question of negligence. Henry v. Grand Ave. Ry. Co., 113 Mo. 525, 537, 21 S. W. 214.

Chance distinguished.

There is a wide difference between chance and accident; the one is the intervention of some unlooked for circumstance which prevents an expected result, and the other is the uncalculated effect of mere luck. In fact, pure chance consists in the entire absence of all the means of calculating results, and an accident is the unusual prevention of an effect naturally resulting from the means employed. That the fleetest horse sometimes stumbles in the race course and leaves the victory to its more fortunate antagonist is the result of accident, but the gambler whose success depends on the playing of the cards or the throwing of dice trusts his fortune to chance. Harless v. United States (Iowa) Morris, 169, 173.

As injury.

In an action for injuries caused by the derailment of a car, the court charged that, in order to bar the plaintiff, the defendant must show that some negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the "accident" in such a way that if the plaintiff had not been negligent the "accident" would not have happened, and refused to charge that, if plaintiff was guilty of any negligence contributing to the "injury" for which recovery is sought, he cannot recover. It was argued that the use of the word "accident" instead of the word "injury" was erroneous, the argument being that the word "accident" referred to the derailment, while the "injury"—that is, the wounding of plaintiff—occurred by the fall of the car to the bottom of the embankment. It was held that the terms with respect to causation are practically indistinguishable. If the derailment was not caused by the air brakes being uncoupled, neither was the fall of the car from the bank so caused. So that, for the purpose of the case, it was proper to treat "accident" and "injury" as synonymous. Smith v. Erie R. Co., 52 Atl. 634, 638, 67 N. J. Law, 636, 59 L. R. A. 302.

The term "accident" includes not only the injury resulting therefrom, but the attendant circumstances. Griffen v. Manice, 59 N. E. 925, 928, 166 N. Y. 188, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630.

Intent excluded.

The word "accidental" in an accident insurance policy, in reference to accidental injuries, means not brought about by the purpose or intention of insured. Duncan v. Preferred Mut. Acc. Ass'n of N. Y., 13 N. Y. Supp. 620, 621, 59 Super. Ct. (27 Jones & S.) 145.

The word "accident," when used to express a result produced by human action, is generally, if not universally, understood to mean a thing done or disaster caused or produced without design or intention. The Blue Wing v. Buckner, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 246, 250.

An injury not anticipated, and not naturally to be expected as a probable result, by the insured, though intentionally inflicted by another, is "accidental" within the terms of the policy. Collins v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 63 Mo. App. 253-256.

"Accidental means," within the meaning of an accident policy, stipulating that it only covers injuries effected by external, violent, and accidental means, but which does not in terms provide against a recovery if the death is caused by injury intentionally inflicted by the insured or any other person, applies to an injury not anticipated nor naturally to be expected by the insured, though intentionally inflicted by another. Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 16 S. W. 723, 724, 90 Tenn. 256, 25 Am. St. Rep. 685.

An "accident," as the term is commonly understood, is an occurrence which is not intended, and therefore a thing which is done intentionally is not done accidentally. But the term in an accident policy limiting the insurer's liability has a narrower meaning, and applies only to the conduct of the insured. Thus, a murderous assault resulting in serious injury to insured is an accident, though the injuries were intended to be inflicted by assailant. Phelan v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 38 Mo. App. 640, 645.

An accident insurance policy providing that it did not insure against death or disablement arising from anything "accidentally inhaled" should be construed to include inhaling illuminating gas which accidentally escaped into an hotel room where the insured was sleeping. The words "accidentally inhaled" do not apply to the voluntary and intelligent act in inhaling of an anæsthetic in aid of a surgical operation. Mennelly v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp., 25 N. Y. Supp. 230, 231, 72 Hun, 477.

As mistake.

An accident is an unforeseen or unexpected event of which the party's own conduct is not the proximate cause, and hence the description of a block by one number, while the grantor's deeds described another block by the same number, is an "accident" within the meaning of the term. West Portland Homestead Ass'n v. Lonsdale (U. S.) 17 Fed. 614, 616.

Rev. St. c. 62, § 21, provides that when any testator shall omit to provide in his will for any of his children they shall take the same as if he had died intestate, unless it shall appear that the omission was intentional, and not occasioned by "mistake or accident." Held, that the word "accident" means a mistake, an accident in the expression of the will or in its transcription, and does not imply such an accident as would or might have caused the testator to entertain a different intention from that which omission from the will would show. Hurley v. O'Sullivan, 137 Mass. 86, 89. Under a like statute it was held that accident meant where the testator had, through forgetfulness or error, omitted to bestow anything on the child. Lorings v. Marsh, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 337, 350, 18 L. Ed. 802.

The terms "accident" and "mistake" may not import the same thing, and therefore it cannot be argued that the use of the word "mistake" in provision in the eighty-fourth section of the act of March 22, 1899, providing that goods entered in the office of the collector under a false denomination by "accident" or "mistake" shall not be forfeited, imports a mistake of law; and where it appears that sugar was wrongfully entered as "refined sugar," without any casualty or any unforeseen or unexpected occurrence which caused the use of this denomination, it cannot be said that it was so entered by "accident." United States v. Eighty-five Hogsheads of Sugar (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 991, 995.

"Accident," as used in a narrow sense, does not refer to the result of actionable negligence, but it is commonly used without any qualifying word in speaking of such result, and so may refer to the result of negligence. Ullman v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 88 N. W. 41, 46, 112 Wis. 150, 88 Am. St. Rep. 949.

The opposite to "accident" is said not to be "negligence," but "design." If accident and negligence be not opposites, we cannot regard them as identical without confounding cause and effect. Accident and its synonyms, "casualty" and "misfortune," may proceed or result from negligence or other cause, known or unknown. McCarty v. New York & E. R. Co., 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 247, 251.

"An accident is an event from an unknown cause, or an unusual and unexpected event from a known cause; chance; casualty. As if a railroad bed be in good order, and the engines and cars in good order, and the engineer and other attendants be skillful and careful, and yet a rail breaks, the train is crushed, and the employés and passengers are killed, that is an unusual and unexpected event from a known cause—an accident. But if the track be out of order, and the engine worn and unmanageable, and on account thereof there be a like result as above stated on a good road, that is not an unexpected event, but a usual and an expected event from such a cause, which is not an accident, but which is negligence." Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 76 N. C. 320, 322.

An accident is a result the inducing cause of which was not put in motion by the voluntary and intentional act of the person injured. It does not matter in this connection that negligence even may be made to appear. If involuntary and unintentional, the result cannot be characterized otherwise than as an "accident." Payne v. Fraternal Acc. Ass'n of America, 93 N. W. 361, 362, 119 Iowa, 342.

"Death as the result of accident imports an external and violent agency as the cause." Healey v. Mutual Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 52, 133 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637; Miller v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. (U. S.) 97 Fed. 836; Western Commercial Travelers' Ass'n v. Smith (U. S.) 85 Fed. 401, 405, 29 C. C. A. 223, 40 L. R. A. 653; Atlanta Acc. Ass'n v. Alexander, 30 S. E. 939, 104 Ga. 709, 42 L. R. A. 188; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 72 S. W. 1047, 1049; Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 399, 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748.

In its popular sense the term "accident" signifies an event or occurrence which happens unexpectedly from the uncontrollable operations of nature exclusively, or an event resulting undesignedly and unexpectedly from human agency alone, or an event resulting from the joint operation of both of the foregoing agencies. Conner v. Citizens' St. R. Co., 45 N. E. 662, 664, 146 Ind. 430; Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75, 85.

An "accident," in its application to insurance policies, has been defined as an injury which happened, by reason of some violence, casualty, or vis major, to the assured, without his design or consent or voluntary co-operation. Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 9 South. 869, 870, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 267.

The term "accident," in the provision of Louisiana Code relative to abatement of rents caused by the loss of crops through "accident," was construed as having the meaning of fortuitous event or irresistible force. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 902, 973, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

Some violence, casualty, or vis major is necessarily involved in the term "accident." It means an injury which happened by reason of some violence or casualty, without any design, consent, or voluntary co-operation. Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 42.

Willful distinguished.

See "Willful, Willfully."

Affray or altercation.

"Accident," as used in the relief fund laws of a mutual benefit accident association, means simply an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation, and one may be injured in a common-law affray and yet be entitled to recover as for an injury by accident, providing that it does not appear that he is in fault. Supreme Counsel Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 3 N. E. 818, 822, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

A policy of insurance relating to injury or death effected through external, violent, and "accidental" means covers the instance where the insured was shot by another while engaged in an altercation, the insured being at the time unarmed. Robinson v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n (U. S.) 68 Fed. 825, 826.

Where the insured came to his death in an altercation which he brought on himself, but there was nothing to indicate that at such time the insured had any cause to think death would result, such death is within the provisions of a policy insuring against death by accident. Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n, 28 S. W. 877, 879, 126 Mo. 104, 30 L. R. A. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638.

A benefit certificate insuring against "death by accident" does not cover a case where the assured was shot in a quarrel in which he was the aggressor and violently attacked his adversary with a pistol, accompanying the act with the exclamation that he must have revenge, and warning his adversary to "put himself in shape." Taliaferro v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n (U. S.) 80 Fed. 368, 25 C. C. A. 494.

Bodily injury or strain.

The bursting of an artery in attempting to close the shutters of a window will not be held to be accidental. Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Ass'n, 78 N. W. 252, 253, 107 Iowa, 538, 43 L. R. A. 693, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212.

"Accidental injury," as used in an insurance policy against death resulting from "accidental injury," construed to include an accidental strain resulting in death. North America Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. (19 P. F. Smith) 43, 51, 8 Am. Rep. 212.

The rupture of a blood vessel in the stomach of insured, from which death ensued, caused by a sudden wrench from an engine, was an accident within the meaning of a policy insuring against death from injuries sustained by external, violent, and accidental means. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 53 S. W. 49, 52, 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112.

The term applies to a death resulting in an hour from a physical and mental shock received in a runaway, though the person dying receives no outward bruises, and therefore a recovery may be had on an accident policy insuring against accidental death. McGlinchey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 14 Atl. 13, 16, 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190.

Whether an injury caused by the jarring of a buggy while insured was inserting a hypodermic needle, thereby causing it to penetrate more deeply, was accidental within the meaning of an insurance policy insuring against injuries caused by external, violent, and accidental means, was a question for the jury. Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 513, 515, 8 App. Div. 127.

The death of an insured from septic peritonitis resulting from an inflammation of the appendix, caused by the regular movement of the psoas muscle while riding a bicycle, was not a death from an "accidental" cause, within the meaning of such word in a policy on his life. Appel v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. Supp. 238, 240, 86 App. Div. 83.

Business misfortunes.

"Accident," as used in the statute relieving a defendant of imprisonment for debt in case he is prevented from paying the debt by accident, does not include ordinary business misfortunes. Langdon v. Bowen, 46 Vt. 512, 516.

Collision.

Where two parties driving on a highway exercise due care, and each keep to the right, but a collision occurred because of a standing team, it constitutes an accident, without negligence or fault. Strouse v. Whittlesey, 41 Conn. 559, 561.

Disease.

"Accidental death," as used in an accident policy, construed not to include death resulting from malignant pustules caused by the infection on the body of putrid animal matter containing poisonous bacillus anthrax, since such death is the result of a disease, and not of accident. Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 399, 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748 (reversing Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Assur. Ass'n, 50 Hun, 605, 606, 3 N. Y. Supp. 237).

"External, violent, and accidental means," within the meaning of insurance policies against death by such means, does not apply to the death of one subject to epileptic fits, who was found dead in the plunge bath in an almost direct standing position, although he has an abrasion between his eyes and the side of his head, in view of medical evidence that the entrance into the bath of one of his then condition would be likely to result in an epileptic attack, and that the fall or blow which caused the abrasion or bruise was not sufficient to have caused death. Tennant v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 322, 326.

Injuries caused by a fall due to a temporary and unexpected disorder are "violent, external, and accidental," within the meaning of such words in an insurance policy. Meyer v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 65 N. W. 328, 96 Iowa, 378, 59 Am. St. Rep. 374.

In an action on an "accident" insurance policy, the evidence showed that the death of assured was produced by blood poison, and that this was occasioned by the inoculation into a wound on his hand of some poisonous substance at or very soon after the wound was made. The court said: "If the inoculation occurred at the time the wound was made, so that it was in fact a part of the accident, I see no reason why the death might not be attributed to the accident as the sole and proximate cause, although blood poisoning ensued. The latter would be produced by the accident." Martin v. Equitable Acc. Ass'n, 16 N. Y. Supp. 279-281, 61 Hun, 467.

Drowning.

"Death by accident" is defined as an unexpected event, not according to the usual course of things. Applying this definition, it has been held that where a person is drowned while bathing it is an accidental death, although no proof is offered of the circumstances. Konrad v. Union Casualty & Surety Co., 21 South. 721, 723, 49 La. Ann. 636 (citing Trew v. Assurance Co., 6 Hurl. & N. 839).

"External, violent, and accidental means," within the meaning of an accident policy, includes involuntary death by drowning, though caused by a temporary, physical trouble, which was entirely unusual and uncommon, whereby deceased falls into the water. Manufacturers' Accident Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (U. S.) 58 Fed. 945, 954, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620.

Explosion.

A policy insuring a mill against "accidents" and explosions of a certain nature should not be construed to include only explosions of the kind stipulated in the policy, but is used in its ordinary sense as meaning any unusual occurrence, unpremeditated, and beyond the control of men, so as to include explosions of a different nature and from other causes than those specifically named. Chicago Sugar-Refining Co. v. American Steam-Boller Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 198, 200.

Floods.

A flood is an "accident" within the meaning of a policy insuring against loss arising from "accident" except by fire or lightning. Hey v. Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Co., 37 Atl. 402, 181 Pa. 220, 59 Am. St. Rep. 644; Hey v. Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Co. (Pa.) 40 Wkly. Notes Cas. 423, 424.

Hanging or shooting by third persons.

An insurance policy, insuring against injuries by extraordinary violence and "accidental means," means an injury unforeseen, unexpected, not brought about through the insured's agency designedly, or was without his foresight, or was a casualty or mishap not intended to befall him. A person who is unexpectedly shot by another without cause or provocation is injured by accidental means within such policy. American Accident Co. v. Carson, 36 S. W. 169, 170, 99 Ky. 441, 34 L. R. A. 301, 59 Am. St. Rep. 473.

It will not do to say that because a desperado waylays, assaults, and wounds a member intentionally, that wounding is not an accident to the member within the meaning of the laws of the order. Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 133, 140, 3 N. E. 818, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

An assault made upon insured by persons who have waylaid him in order to rob him is an accident. Ripley v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 823, 825.

"Accidental, external, and violent means," within the meaning of a life or accident policy insuring against such injuries, covers the case of a person who was unexpectedly shot by another without cause or provocation. Thus, where one was waylaid and assassinated for the purpose of robbery, his death was held to have been caused through accidental, external, and violent means. Hutcheratt's Ex'r v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 8 S. W. 570, 572, 87 Ky. 300, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484. So death by hanging at the hands of a mob was held to be an accident within the meaning of a policy against injuries through violent, external, and accidental means. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Johnson (Miss.) 17 South. 2. So the death of a person who is shot by one whom he is trying to eject by force from a hotel office is a death by accident, and not a risk voluntarily assumed, when he makes the attempt without knowing that the other person is armed. Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n, 28 S. W. 877, 879, 126 Mo. 104, 30 L. R. A. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 895; Railway Officials' &

Employees' Acc. Ass'n v. Drummond, 76 N. W. 562, 563, 56 Neb. 235.

It does not absolutely exclude the idea of design on the part of any person, as, for instance, injuries received by the victim of a highway robbery, though designed by the robber, are unexpected and without design on the part of the person insured, and are as to him an "accident." Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 26 Pac. 762, 763, 89 Cal. 170, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455.

Loss by theft.

Code, § 31, declaring that suit may be brought on a bond which has been lost or destroyed "by accident," apparently includes any loss of the paper not willfully caused by the owner, certainly including a loss by theft. Mobile County v. Sands, 29 South. 26, 29, 127 Ala. 493.

Poison or suffocation.

An accident policy, providing that an insurer should not be liable for bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, construed not to include death caused by taking an overdose of opium. Bayless v. Travellers' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1077, 1078.

"Accidental means," as used in an accident policy providing that the insurer should only be liable for injuries caused by external, violent, and accidental means, construed not to include the taking of poison by mistake. Pollock v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 102 Pa. 230, 234, 48 Am. Rep. 204.

Where death resulted from taking a dose of morphine, the court held that, if deceased took more than he intended, the death was accidental, but that, if he took the exact amount intended, and misjudged the effect, the death was not accidental. Carnes v. Iowa State Travelingmen's Ass'n, 76 N. W. 683, 684, 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306 (cited in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins [Tex.] 72 S. W. 1047, 1049).

Where insured knowingly ate oysters, but did not know that he was eating unsound oysters, his death, which was caused thereby, was not the natural and probable consequence of eating sound oysters, and the effect produced by the eating of the unsound oysters could not have been reasonably anticipated or foreseen by him. It was unexpected, unforeseen, unusual, and therefore it cannot be said that he voluntarily ate the unsound oysters. This being true, his death was caused by "accidental means," as that term is used in the policy of insurance. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 72 S. W. 1047, 1049.

Where a person descended into a driven well to repair a pump, and in a few minutes died from some deadly gas therein, and the dug out portion of the well was only 12 feet deep, his death was due to accidental injuries within the meaning of an accident policy insuring against that class of injuries. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 144 Pa. 79, 93, 22 Atl. 871, 13 L. R. A. 661, 27 Am. St. Rep. 618.

Sunstroke.

"Accidental," as used in a policy of insurance against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and "accidental" means, should be construed in its ordinary popular sense as meaning happening by chance, unexpectedly taking place, not according to the usual course of things, so that a result ordinarily naturally flowing from the conduct of the party cannot be said to be accidental, even where he may not have foreseen the consequences. Sunstroke or heat prostration contracted by the insured in the course of his ordinary duty as a supervising architect is not an injury by accidental means within the provisions of the policy. Dozier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York (U. S.) 46 Fed. 446, 448, 13 L. R. A. 114.

Suicide.

An accident policy, providing against bodily injuries effected through external, accidental, and violent means, construed to include a death by hanging one's self while insane. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandall, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 687, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. Ed. 740.

A presumption of accidental death will be entertained in an action on a life policy where deceased is found dead under such circumstances that his death may have been the result of either accident or suicide, as suicide is contrary to the general conduct of mankind, and shows moral turpitude in a sane person. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 8 Sup. Ct. 1360, 1363, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. Ed. 308; Same v. Melick (U. S.) 65 Fed. 178, 181, 12 C. C. A. 544, 27 L. R. A. 629.

An "accident" rather than suicide will be presumed when a man comes to his death in the manner which indicates either accidental drowning or suicide. Couadeau v. American Accident Co., 25 S. W. 6-8, 95 Ky. 280.

"Accident," as used in accident insurance policies, includes the taking of one's life by his own hand. Crandall v. Accident Ins. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 42.

ACCIDENT (In Equity).

The term "accident," in its legal signification, is difficult to define. Judge Story defines it as embracing "not merely inevitable casualty, or the act of Providence, or what is technically called vis major, or irresistible force, but such unforeseen events, misfortunes, losses, acts, or omissions as are not the result of any negligence or misconduct in the party" affected thereby. Mr. Pomeroy justly criticises this definition as including what are not accidents at all, but mistakes, and as omitting the very central element of the equitable conception, and defines it thus: "'Accident' is an unforeseen and unexpected event occurring external to the party affected by it, and of which his own agency is not the proximate cause, whereby, contrary to his own intention and wish, he loses some legal right or becomes subjected to some legal liability, and another person acquires a corresponding legal right which it would be a violation of good conscience for the latter person under the circumstances to retain. And the chief point of the thing is that, because of the unforeseen and unexpected character of the occurrence by which the legal relation of the parties has been unintentionally changed, the party injuriously affected thereby is, in good conscience, entitled to relief that will restore those relations to their original character, and place him in his former position." Kopper v. Dyer, 9 Atl. 4, 6, 59 Vt. 477, 59 Am. Rep. 742. Mr. Pomeroy's definition is held to be in accord with the adjudications of the courts in Gotthelf v. Stranahan, 19 N. Y. Supp. 161, 167, and is quoted and approved in Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665, 669; L. Buckl & Son Lumber Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (U. S.) 116 Fed. 1, 7, 53 C. C. A. 513; and Herbert v. Herbert, 22 Atl. 789, 793, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 70. Judge Story's definition is followed in Bostwick v. Stiles, 35 Conn. 195, 198; Simpson v. Montgomery, 25 Ark. 365, 373, 99 Am. Dec. 228; and Magann v. Segal (U. S.) 92 Fed. 252, 261, 34 C. C. A. 323.

"Accident" is defined by Judge Story to embrace misfortune, losses, accidents, or omissions. Vose v. Bradstreet, 27 Me. (14 Shep.) 156, 162.

In Smith, Man. Eq. Jur. p. 36, an "accident" is defined as an unforeseen and injurious occurrence, not attributable to mistake or neglect or misconduct. Magann v. Segal (U. S.) 92 Fed. 252, 261, 34 C. C. A. 323.

Lord Cowper, speaking on the subject of accident as cognizable in equity, says, "By accident is meant when a case is distinguished from others of a like nature by unusual circumstances;" a definition quite too loose and inaccurate, without some further qualification; for it is entirely consistent with the language that the unusual circumstances may result from the parties' own gross negligence, folly, or rashness. Simpson v. Montgomery, 25 Ark. 365, 373, 99 Am. Dec. 228.

If the party's own agency is the proximate cause of the event, it is a mistake rather than an accident; and where the very thing which has occurred could not, in a legal sense, have been unexpected, there can be no accident. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665, 669.

An accident, in equity, is distinguished from mistake, which, within the meaning of equity, is an erroneous mental condition, conception, or conviction induced by ignorance or misunderstanding of the truth, but without negligence, and resulting in some act or omission done or suffered erroneously by one or both parties to the transaction, but without erroneous character being intended or known at the time. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 839. Thus, where in an action the court decided that a set-off should be allowed, but in computing the amount of it a mistake was made, which was not discovered until after judgment had been rendered and too late for setting aside the judgment at that term, such erroneous computation constituted a mistake on the part of the judge, but an accident to the party. L. Buckl & Son Lumber Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (U. S.) 116 Fed. 1, 7, 53 C. C. A. 513.

ACCIDENT (In Practice).

Though not necessarily synonymous with "surprise," when used as a ground for new trial, "accident" has substantially the same meaning in legal practice, as each is used to denote some condition or situation in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed, to his injury, without any fault or neglect of his own, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. Zimmerer v. Fremont Nat. Bank, 81 N. W. 849, 850, 59 Neb. 661 (citing McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 229, 23 Pac. 313).

Residence in another state, and consequent failure to hear of the testator's death, or of the probate of his will until after the time for an appeal from such probate had elapsed, if notice of probate was duly published, is not an "accident" under Gen. St. c. 38, § 5, providing for special appeals in cases of fraud, accident, or mistake. Burbeck v. Little, 50 Vt. 713, 715.

It was not an "accident," within R. L. § 1428, allowing appeals after the time for appealing has expired, where a petitioner was prevented from appealing by fraud, accident, or mistake, that a petitioner did not hear of the proceedings because she lived out of the state, where all statutory provisions as to notice had been complied with. Congdon v. Congdon, 10 Atl. 732, 735, 59 Vt. 597.

Where a justice denied a defendant the right of an appeal on the ground that an offset filed by him was not filed in good faith, notwithstanding that defendant swore to the offset, and there was no evidence against it, it was held that defendant was entitled to a special appeal under the statute (R. L. § 1428) providing for special appeals in cases of fraud, accident, or mistake. The court said that the denial of defendant's right was a mishap, and for all practical purposes might be called an "accident" or "mistake." Wild-er v. Gilman, 55 Vt. 503, 504, 506.

Rev. St. c. 84, § 1, authorizing a review where, through accident, mistake, or misfortune, justice has not been done, ordinarily imports something outside of the petitioner's own control, or, at least, something which a reasonably prudent man would not be expected to guard against or to provide for. It has long been regarded as essential to public order, security, and confidence that when the parties have had their full day in court they should abide the result, though renewed efforts afterwards might secure other and better evidence which, if seasonably obtained, might have altered the result. Every mistake either of the tribunal or of the party is not such a mistake as the statute contemplates. Mere mistakes in opinion or judgment are outside of the statute. For such mistakes, which at the most are mere errors in reasoning, to be allowed as causes for reversing solemn judgment after hearing and deliberation, would destroy all their value as authoritative adjudications of title and rights. The fact that the result was not designed, foreseen, or expected did not make it accidental, if it was the natural or direct effect of voluntary acts or omissions or conditions voluntarily assumed. Pickering v. Cassidy, 44 Atl. 633, 634, 93 Me. 139.

Code, §§ 3161-3171, authorizing a new trial or rehearing after judgment, on the ground of surprise, accident, mistake, or fraud, does not include a mere oversight of counsel in the preparation or defense of the suit. Blood v. Beadle, 65 Ala. 103. Also the absence of counsel in another court when a cause was regularly called for trial, though necessitated by conflicting professional engagements, however urgent, was not within the term "accident," "mistake," etc. Brock v. South & N. A. R. Co., 65 Ala. 79.

The omission of a party pressed to trial to move for delay, when delay is needed for his preparation, is not such "accident, mistake, or misfortune" as will entitle him to a new trial. Couillard v. Seaver, 9 Atl. 724, 64 N. H. 614.

Under a statute providing that a person aggrieved by a decree who is prevented from appeal through mistake, accident, or misfortune may petition for leave to appeal, etc., it is held that the mere fact that petitioner had forgotten material facts at the time of the hearing does not constitute a mistake, accident, or misfortune within the meaning of the statute. In re French, 17 N. H. 472, 475.

A person, aggrieved by a decision of the judge of probate, who failed to appeal therefrom within 60 days from the time it was made, because he did not know it had been made, may be allowed an appeal on the ground of mistake, accident, or misfortune. Holton v. Olcott, 58 N. H. 598.

Where a decree of the probate court allowing the settlement of an administrator's account was made after the terms of the settlement were agreed to by counsel, and there was no fraud, the only error in the act being such as would have been discovered by reasonable diligence, there was no such mistake, accident, or misfortune as to bring the case within the terms of the statute authorizing a petition for a new trial after the time for perfecting an appeal had expired, where the petitioner had failed to appeal from the decree because of accident, mistake, or misfortune. Ahearn v. Mann, 63 N. H. 330, 331.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

One distinguishing feature of what is known as "accident insurance" is that it indemnifies against the effects of accidents resulting in bodily injury or death. Its field is not to insure against loss or damage to property, though occasioned by accident. So far as that class of insurance has been developed, it has been with reference to boilers, plate glass, and perhaps to domestic animals, and of injury to property by street cars, and is known as "casualty insurance." Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 29 N. E. 529, 531, 155 Mass. 404.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

An accident insurance company shall be deemed to be a corporation doing business under any charter involving the payment of money or other thing of value to families or representatives of policy holders, conditioned upon the injury, disablement, or death of persons resulting from traveling or general accidents by land or water. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

ACCIDENTAL CAUSES.

Other accidental causes, see "Other."

ACCIDENTAL DEATH.

See "Accident—Accidental."

ACCIDENTAL DELAYS.

"Accidental delays," as used in a bill of lading providing that a carrier shall not be liable for injuries resulting from "accidental delays," construed to include a delay caused by the necessity of taking a vessel off its usual run for the purpose of having it repaired. Lawrence v. New York, P. & B. R. Co., 36 Conn. 63, 76.

ACCIDENTAL FIRE.

A fire is accidental, and there is no liability on the person kindling such fire on his premises for damages caused by the spread thereof, unless there is negligence in its kindling or guarding. Read v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 280, 282 (cited in Lothrop v. Thayer, 138 Mass. 470, 52 Am. Rep. 286).

A statute exempting a tenant from liability for a loss by fire whenever the fire was accidentally begun, does not exonerate the tenant from liability for a fire which originated through his negligence. Webb v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 420, 427, 10 Am. Rep. 389; Dorr v. Harkness, 10 Atl. 400, 402, 49 N. J. Law, 571, 60 Am. Rep. 656; Brummit v. Furness, 27 N. E. 656, 657, 1 Ind. App. 401, 50 Am. St. Rep. 215.

"Accidental," as used in Building St. 14 Geo. III, c. 78, § 86, declaring that no action can be maintained against the owner of premises on which any fire shall "accidentally begin," does not include accidents in which the element of negligence enters, though it is true that in strictness the word "accidental" may be employed in contradistinction to "willful"; so the same fire might both begin accidentally and be the result of negligence. But it may equally mean a fire produced by mere chance or incapable of being traced to any cause. Filliter v. Phippard, 11 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 347, 355.

ACCIDENTAL INJURY.

See "Accident—Accidental."

ACCIDENTAL MEANS.

See, also, "Accident—Accidental."

The significance of the word "accidental" is best perceived by a consideration of the relation of causes to their effects. The word is descriptive of means which produce effects which are not their natural and probable consequences. The natural consequence of means used is the consequence which ordinarily follows from their use—the result which may be reasonably anticipated from their use, and which ought to be expected. The probable consequence of the use of given means is the consequence which is more likely to follow from their use than it is to fail to follow. An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action is not an accident, nor is it produced by accidental means. On the other hand, an effect which is not the natural and probable consequence of the means which produced it, an effect which does not ordinarily follow and cannot be reasonably anticipated from the use of those means, an effect which the actor did not intend to produce, and which he cannot be charged with the design of producing, is produced by accidental means. Western Commercial Travelers' Ass'n v. Smith (U. S.) 85 Fed. 401, 405, 29 C. C. A. 223, 40 L. R. A. 653.

An accident policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable unless death is caused by "accidental means" covers any injury which is not the result of misconduct or the participation of the injured party, but is unforeseen as far as he is concerned. In other words, the means need only be accidental as far as the party insured is concerned, and the fact that the injury was inflicted intentionally by a third person does not destroy its accidental character, if it is unexpected as to the insured and without his consent. Campbell v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 60 S. W. 492, 494, 109 Ky. 661.

In a policy insuring against "accidental" injuries, the term "accidental" is used in its ordinary popular sense as meaning "happening by chance, unexpectedly taking place, not according to the usual course of things, or not as expected." If the result is such as follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means; but if, in the act which precedes the injury, something unforeseen or unusual occurs which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 53 S. W. 49, 52, 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112; Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (U. S.) 34 Conn. 574, 578, 22 Fed. Cas. 810, 811.

ACCIDENTS OF NAVIGATION.

A bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for damages occasioned by the "accidents of navigation" does not include damage to the cargo caused by vermin on board the ship. The Miletus (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 288, 289.

Accidents of navigation, within the meaning of a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss or damage occasioned by an accident of navigation, do not include an injury resulting from an explosion of a portion of her cargo after she has reached her port of destination, and while she is engaged in unloading. The G. R. Booth, 19 Sup. Ct. 9, 13, 171 U. S. 450, 43 L. Ed. 234.

ACCIDENTS OF THE SEA.

A marine insurance policy, providing that the master shall not be responsible for any dangers and "accidents of the seas," means only those caused by the violence of the winds and waves (vis major) on a seaworthy and substantial ship, and does not cover damage to a cargo by rats, since such a destruction is not peculiar to the sea or navigation, but one which is equally liable to occur in a warehouse as in a ship at sea. The Carlotta (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 76, 79.

Running against a cape or a continent is not one of the usual accidents and unavoidable dangers of the sea. That cannot be termed an accident of the sea, within the exceptions of a bill of lading, which proper foresight and skill in the commanding officer might have avoided. Bazin v. Steamship Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1097, 1100.

ACCION.

In the Spanish law the term "accion" means "the right to demand anything, and the method of judicial procedure which we have for the recovery of that which is ours or which another owes us." Escrache, Dic. Leg. p. 49. And all choses in action owned by either of the consorts before marriage remained the separate property of such consort. Welder v. Lambert, 44 S. W. 281, 284, 91 Tex. 510.

ACCOMMODATE—ACCOMMODATION.

The expression "terms accommodating," as used in a letter of acceptance which stated that the buyer would take the vessel at the price fixed by the vendor, and that he expected the vendor would give him a long time for a part at least, as the vendor had said he would make the "terms accommodating," meant that the purchase money, or some part of it, should be permitted to remain in the defendant's name as if a loan for his convenience. Rice v. McLarren, 42 Me. 157, 163.

"Accommodation," as used in a deed reciting that a certain roadway was laid out for the "accommodation" of the lot owners, means that the use of the road is to be accorded only by way of accommodation, and that the roadbed was not conveyed. Peabody Heights Co. v. Sadtler, 63 Md. 533, 541, 52 Am. Rep. 519.

ACCOMMODATED PARTY.

An "accommodated party," in the law of negotiable paper, is the person to whom the credit of an accommodating party is loaned, not a third person who may receive an advantage by the loan of the credit. Thom v. Kibbee, 42 Atl. 729, 62 N. J. Law, 753.

ACCOMMODATION BILL OR NOTE.

An accommodation bill or note is one to which the accommodating party has put his name without consideration, for the purpose of accommodating some other party, who is to use it, and is expected to pay it. Jefferson County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 16 N. W. 561, 562, 66 Iowa, 385; Gillmann v. Henry, 10 N. W. 692, 694, 53 Wis. 465; Peale v. Addicks, 34 Atl. 201, 202, 174 Pa. 543; Vitkovitch v. Kleinecke (Tex.) 75 S. W. 544, 546. Thus where a county issued bonds in consideration of the construction of a railroad through it, and after the payment of such bonds it was decided that the county did not have authority to issue them, they do not become accommodation paper, as regards the railroad which had built its road as required. Jefferson County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 16 N. W. 561, 562, 66 Iowa, 385.

In order to render a bill or note accommodation, the indorser must lend his credit to the maker for the benefit of the latter, and without benefit to the indorser. Vitkovitch v. Kleinecke (Tex.) 75 S. W. 544, 546.

Between the accommodating and the accommodated parties, the consideration may be shown to be wanting, but when the instrument is passed into the hands of the third party for value, in the usual course of business, it cannot be done. Peale v. Addicks, 34 Atl. 201, 202, 174 Pa. 543.

To constitute a promissory note an "accommodation note," the maker must lend his credit without any restriction as to the manner of its use; and hence the maker cannot complain of a subsequent holder when called upon to perform all he has promised, even though the indorsee has purchased the note for less than appeared to be due upon its face. Moore v. Baird, 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 138, 139.

ACCOMMODATION INDORSER.

The term "accommodation indorser" is correctly used to designate a third person who indorses a note without any consideration, merely for the benefit of the holder thereof. Peale v. Addicks, 34 Atl. 201, 202, 174 Pa. 543.

ACCOMMODATION INDORSEMENT.

An accommodation indorsement is prima facie a loan of the indorser's credit without restriction; but it may be shown to have been otherwise understood by the parties. Cozens v. Middleton (Pa.) 4 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 37, 39; Id., 12 Atl. 566, 567, 118 Pa. 622.

From the very meaning of the term, no proof of consideration is requisite in a case of "accommodation indorsement." Low v. Learned, 34 N. Y. Supp. 68, 13 Misc. Rep. 150.

ACCOMMODATION MAKER.

An "accommodation maker" is one who receives nothing as consideration for the execution of a bill or note, and the accommodated party parts with nothing. Gillmann v. Henry, 10 N. W. 692, 694, 53 Wis. 465.

The "accommodation maker" of a note stands as a surety for the person for whose accommodation it was given. Robertson v. McKibbin, 46 N. Y. Supp. 380, 381, 20 Misc. Rep. 658.

ACCOMMODATION PAPER.

"Accommodation paper," in a legal sense, means paper made without consideration therefor. Blair v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 577, 579.

"Accommodation paper" is such as is made, accepted, or indorsed by one party for the benefit of another, without consideration. Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. Brady, 65 S. W. 303, 305, 165 Mo. 197. "Accommodation paper" is defined as such as is made, accepted, or indorsed by one party for the benefit of another, without consideration. It represents and is a loan of credit to the party accommodated. Rea v. McDonald, 71 N. W. 11, 12, 68 Minn. 187.

An "accommodation paper" is a loan of the maker's credit, without restriction as to the manner of its use. Moreland's Assignee v. Citizens' Sav. Bank, 30 S. W. 637, 639, 97 Ky. 211; Lenheim v. Wilmarding, 55 Pa. (5 P. F. Smith) 73, 75; Todd v. National Union Bank (Pa.) 19 Atl. 218; Rea v. McDonald, 71 N. W. 11, 12, 68 Minn. 187. An accommodation paper is a loan of the maker's name without restriction on the manner of its use. Van Brunt v. Potter & Co. (Pa.) 39 Wkly. Notes Cas. 262, 264.

An "accommodation paper" is a loan of credit by the accommodation party to the party accommodated; to the extent of the value of the paper. Farley Nat. Bank v. Henderson, 24 South. 428, 433, 118 Ala. 441. It is not necessary that the party accommodated shall be a party to the paper. Rea v. McDonald, 71 N. W. 11, 12, 68 Minn. 187.

Where the maker of a note loans it to the payee, with a view that the latter may negotiate it for his personal benefit, no limitation being made on the person for whose use it was made as to when or how he should use it, it is called "accommodation paper." It is not essential that such paper should have any consideration to support it. A recognized definition of "accommodation paper" is either a negotiable or nonnegotiable note or bill made by one who put his name thereto without consideration, with the intention of lending his credit to the party accommodated. The beneficiary of an accommodation note may transfer it either in payment of his indebtedness or as collateral security for a concurrent or even an antecedent debt, and the maker will have no defense. A note is none the less "accommodation paper" because the maker and indorser are secured against personal liability by a trust deed on real property owned by the party accommodated. Miller v. Larned, 103 Ill. 562, 569.

Accommodation paper is a loan of the maker's credit without restriction as to the manner of its use, and he cannot set up the want of consideration as a defense against the note in the hands of a third person, though it be there as collateral security merely. He who chooses to put himself in the front of a negotiable instrument for the benefit of his friend must abide the consequence, and has no more right to complain if his friend accommodates himself by pledging it for an old debt than if he had used it in any other way. Lord v. Ocean Bank, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 384, 386, 59 Am. Dec. 728.

ACCOMMODATION TRAIN.

The term "accommodation train" is in such common use as to be generally if not universally known. Webster defines it to be one running at moderate speed, and stopping at all or nearly all stations. Passenger travel is partly local, from station to station, and for different distances along the route as well as to the destination of the train. Through trains and limited trains do not meet the demands of such travel, and in the general understanding an "accommodation train" is one designed to accommodate the travel in that respect, and arranged to stop at most of the stations to effect that object. Gray v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 59 N. E. 950, 951, 189 Ill. 400.

ACCOMPANY.

"Accompanied" is not equivalent to "accomplished." Thus thunder often accompanies lightning, but is not the agency or means by which the results of lightning are accomplished, or the means of accomplishing an act may have accompanied the doing of it without being the efficient means or agency that is without accomplishing it. So that an instruction that robbery is the felonious taking of personal property, "accompanied" by means of force and fear, is erroneous, as robbery, under the statute, must be accomplished by means of force and fear. State v. Johnson, 66 Pac. 290, 291, 26 Mont. 9.

As annexed to.

Laws 1887, p. 29, § 2, requiring a proper bond to "accompany" a petition to establish an irrigation district, is satisfied by the filing of a bond on the day of the hearing of the petition before the supervisors, though the petition has been filed prior thereto, since "such a bond may be said to accompany a petition, in the sense of the statute." Central Irr. Dist. v. De Lappe, 21 Pac. 825, 827, 79 Cal. 351.

"Accompany," as used in Gen. St. c. 177, § 1, requiring sworn evidence to "accompany" the demand of a governor of one state on the governor of another state for the surrender of a fugitive from justice, construed not to require such evidence to be annexed to the requisition. Kingsbury's Case, 106 Mass. 223, 226.

ACCOMPLICE.See "Feigned Accomplice."

An "accomplice" is defined to be a person who knowingly, voluntarily, and with common intent with the principal offender unites in the commission of a crime. Clapp v. State, 30 S. W. 214, 216, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 186; People v. Bolanger, 11 Pac. 799, 801, 71 Cal. 17; State v. Umble, 22 S. W. 378, 380, 115 Mo. 452 (quoting Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440); State v. Kuhlman, 53 S. W. 416, 152 Mo. 100, 75 Am. St. Rep. 438; Carroll v. State, 45 Ark. 539-542; State v. Light, 21 Pac. 132, 133, 17 Or. 358 (citing Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440).

An "accomplice" is defined to be one who is concerned in the commission of a crime. The term in its fullness includes in its meaning all persons who have been concerned in the commission of a crime; all particeps criminis, whether they are considered in strict legal propriety as principals in the first or second degree or merely as accessories before or after the fact. Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152, 158, 95 Am. Dec. 474; In re Rowe (U. S.) 77 Fed. 161, 165, 23 C. C. A. 103; Polk v. State, 36 Ark. 117, 126; Miller v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky. 15, 22, 39 Am. Rep. 194; Barrara v. State, 42 Tex. 260, 263. Following this definition, it was held that, under a warrant of extradition, reciting that there are suspicions that a certain man is an accomplice in a crime, he can be tried either as a principal or accessory. In re Rowe (U. S.) 77 Fed. 161, 165, 23 C. C. A. 103.

An accomplice, within the meaning of the rule that the testimony for the state of an accomplice must be corroborated, "means any one connected with the crime committed, either as principal offender, as an accomplice, or an accessory, or otherwise. It includes all persons who are connected with the crime or unlawful act or omission on their part transpiring on or before, at the time, or after the commission of the offense, and whether or not he was present and participated in the commission of the crime." Crawford v. State (Tex.) 34 S. W. 927; Armstrong v. State, 26 S. W. 829, 830, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 417; Walker v. State (Tex.) 37 S. W. 423; Anderson v. State, 45 S. W. 15, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 83; Harris v. State, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 124, 126. This definition of "accomplice" was said by the court to be correct as relates to who constitutes an accomplice within the rule that no one can be convicted on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, but was criticised by the court because of its failure to distinguish an accomplice from a principal offender. Armstrong v. State, 26 S. W. 829, 830, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 417.

One who, being of mature years, and in possession of his ordinary faculties, knowingly and voluntarily co-operates with or aids or assists another in a commission of a crime, is an "accomplice," without regard to the degree of his guilt. State v. Carr, 42 Pac. 215, 216, 28 Or. 389; People v. Kraker, 14 Pac. 196, 197, 72 Cal. 459, 1 Am. St. Rep. 65.

Webster's definition of an "accomplice" is as follows: A co-operator or associate in general; an associate in crime; a participator or partner in guilt. Under such definition, the purchaser of liquors is not an accomplice of the person making the unauthorized sale. People v. Smith, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 72, 73.

"An accomplice is a person involved, either directly or indirectly, in the commission of a crime. To render him such he must in some manner aid or assist or participate in the criminal act, and by that connection he becomes equally involved in guilt with the other party by reason of the criminal transaction." People v. Smith (N. Y.) 23 Hun, 626, 627; People v. Emerson, 5 N. Y. Supp. 374, 376, 6 N. Y. Cr. R. 157. Following such definition, it was held that the buyer of a lottery ticket was not an accomplice with the seller. People v. Emerson, 5 N. Y. Supp. 374, 376, 6 N. Y. Cr. R. 157.

To constitute an "accomplice," one must be so connected with a crime that at common law he might himself have been convicted, either as the principal or as an accessory before the fact. To warrant such a conviction, the one accused must have taken part in the perpetration of, or preparation for, the crime, with intent to assist in the crime. The fact that one knew of defendant's purpose to commit a crime, and performed an act tending to assist in the perpetration of the offense, did not, as a matter of law, render him an accomplice, within the rule requiring testimony of accomplices to be corroborated, where it was in dispute whether he did the act with intent that it should aid in the commission of the crime. People v. Zucker, 46 N. Y. Supp. 766, 767, 20 App. Div. 363.

The term "accomplice" includes all who are particeps criminis, whether considered in a direct legal sense of the term as principals or accessories, and particularly includes any associate in the crime, and all assisting, co-operating, or aiding in its commission. State v. Roberts, 13 Pac. 896, 901, 15 Or. 187; Zollicoffer v. State, 16 Tex. App. 312, 318.

An accomplice is one who is in some way concerned or associated in the commission of a crime; one who aids or assists or is an accessory. State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 331).

An "accomplice" is one who is joined or united with another; one of several concerned in a felony; an associate in a crime; one who co-operates, aids, or assists in committing it. State v. Ean, 58 N. W. 898, 899, 90 Iowa, 534 (citing Black's Law Dict.).

One who admits that he aided in a crime, and testifies that defendant also participated, is called an "accomplice." State v. Tate, 56 S. W. 1099, 1101, 156 Mo. 119.

"One who is in some way concerned in the commission of a crime; one who in any manner participates in the act; one who unites in the commission of crime." State v. Henderson, 50 N. W. 758, 760, 84 Iowa, 161 (quoting Anderson's Law Dict.); State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55.

An "accomplice" is one who is guilty by complicity in the crime charged, either by being present and aiding or abetting in it, or by having advised and encouraged it, though absent from the place at which it is committed. State v. Spotted Hawk, 55 Pac. 1026, 1036, 22 Mont. 33.

The term "accomplice" is used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 741, providing that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is not sufficient to support a conviction, in a different sense from that in which it is used in Pen. Code, art. 219, defining an accomplice as one who is not present at the commission of an offense, but who before the act is done advises, commands, or encourages another to commit it, and furnishes other aid to the person actually committing such crime, as its use in the first statute includes principals and accessories as well as accomplices. Hornsberger v. State, 19 Tex. App. 335, 343.

A person who participates in the moral guilt of a crime, but is not connected therewith in such a way that he could be indicted for the offense, is not an accomplice. Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 523, 527, 86 Am. Dec. 319.

On a prosecution for taking money upon agreement to withhold evidence of a crime, under Cr. Code, § 112, the person who makes the agreement with and pays the money to the accused is not an accomplice, within the meaning of Gen. St. 1878, c. 73, § 104, requiring the testimony of an accomplice to be corroborated before a conviction can be had. State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55, 57.

Criminal intent is a necessary ingredient of crime, and is an essential to render one an accomplice. Walker v. State, 45 S. E. 603, 609, 118 Ga. 757.

Accessory after the fact.

"An 'accomplice' is a person who knowingly and voluntarily, and with common intent with the principal offender, unites in the commission of the crime." Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440. Under this definition, an accessory after the fact is not an accomplice. His offense is distinctly his own, and he is liable to a different punishment; nor can he be indicted jointly with the principal for the principal's offense. State v. Umble, 22 S. W. 378, 380, 115 Mo. 452 (citing Commonwealth v. Wood, 77 Mass. [11 Gray] 86).

One who does not participate in a crime as actual perpetrator, or as principal in the second degree, or as an accessory before the fact, is not an accomplice. Even if one is an accessory after the fact, this alone will not render him an accomplice so as to require his evidence to be corroborated before it can sustain a conviction. Lowery v. State, 72 Ga. 649, 654.

A person is an accessory after the fact only after he has full knowledge that a felony has been committed, and then conceals that knowledge from a magistrate, or harbors or protects the person charged or connected therewith. One who is a principal cannot be an accessory after the fact, and so cannot be an accomplice. People v. Chadwick, 25 Pac. 737, 738, 7 Utah, 134.

Accessory before the fact.

The term "accomplice," as used in Rev. Code, art. 79, providing that a person cannot be convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, is the same as an accessory before the fact at common law; and at common law there could be no accessory before the fact of manslaughter, because manslaughter was an offense which was considered in law sudden and unpremeditated, and therefore there can be no accomplice to manslaughter. Ogle v. State, 16 Tex. App. 361, 378.

An "accomplice" is one who is not present at the commission of the offense, but who before the act is done advises, commands, or encourages another to commit the offense, or who agrees with the principal offender to aid him in committing the offense, though he may not have given such aid. Thus, where a defendant entered into an agreement with others to meet them with stolen cattle at a certain place, and to ship them on the railroad on cars previously ordered, but did not in fact do so, but was absent from such place during such time, and the others during his absence drove the cattle, such person was not a principal, but an accomplice. Rix v. State, 26 S. W. 505, 506, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 353.

An "accomplice" "is one who is not present at the commission of an offense, but who before the act is done advises, commands, or encourages another to commit the offense. The acts constituting an accomplice are accessory only, all of which may be, and usually are, performed by him anterior and as an inducement to the crime, so that the offense of the accomplice is completed before the crime is actually committed, and his liability with respect thereto only attaching by virtue of his previous acts in bringing it about, through the agency or connection with the third party." West v. State, 11 S. W. 635, 28 Tex. App. 1; Smith v. State, 17 S. W. 552-554, 21 Tex. App. 107.

"The acts constituting an accomplice an auxiliary only, all of which may be and are performed by him anterior and as inducements to the crime about to be committed, while the principal offender not only may perform some antecedent act in furtherance of the commission of the crime, but when it is actually committed is doing his part of the work assigned him in connection with the plan and in furtherance of the common purpose, whether he be present when the main fact is to be accomplished or not." Cook v. State, 14 Tex. App. 96, 101; O'Neal v. Same, Id. 582, 591.

Detective.

A detective who enters into communication with criminals, without any felonious intent, but for the purpose of disclosing their designs for the benefit of the public, and who acts throughout the transaction with this original purpose, cannot be regarded as an "accomplice." State v. McKean, 36 Iowa, 343, 345, 14 Am. Rep. 530; People v. Bollinger, 11 Pac. 799, 801, 71 Cal. 17.

Knowledge of crime.

Mere knowledge on the part of a witness that the defendant committed the crime does not render such witness an accomplice, so as to require corroboration of his testimony. To require or warrant an instruction on accomplice testimony, there must be some evidence of a witness' complicity in the crime for which the defendant is being tried. Pitner v. State, 5 S. W. 210, 215, 23 Tex. App. 306; Kerrigan v. State, 2 S. W. 756, 757, 21 Tex. App. 487; Brown v. State, 6 Tex. App. 286, 309; Ham v. State, 4 Tex. App. 645, 675; Smith v. State, 12 S. W. 1104, 1107, 23 Tex. App. 309.

One may be an accomplice either as a principal or accessory; but it is not sufficient to have knowledge of a crime to be committed and be present at its commission. To be an accomplice, one must have co-operated in the commission of the crime; and hence one may be an accessory after the fact without being an accomplice. Allen v. State, 74 Ga. 769, 772.

An "accomplice" is one of many equally concerned in a felony, the term being generally applied to those who are tempted to give evidence against their fellow criminals for the furtherance of justice, which might otherwise be eluded; and hence, in a prosecution for the forgery of a check, one who was not a fellow criminal—that is, had not been accused of being in that relation to the prisoner or arrested for complicity, and nothing was shown to implicate him in any manner except the fact that he took the check to the bank, received the money on it, and paid it over to his employer, all the time supposing that the check was genuine, and that he did not immediately on discovering the forgery denounce the forger to the authorities—was not an "accomplice," but was rather the dupe of the forgery. Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152, 153, 95 Am. Dec. 474.

Principal distinguished.

The acts constituting an accomplice are auxiliary only, all of which may be and are performed by him anterior and as inducements to the crime about to be committed, while the principal offender not only may perform some antecedent act in furtherance of the commission of the crime, but when it is actually committed is doing his part of the work assigned to him in connection with the plan and furtherance of the common purpose, whether he be present where the main fact is to be accomplished or not; and, where the offense is committed by the perpetration of different parts which constitute one entire whole, it is not necessary that the offenders should be in fact together at the perpetration of the offense to render them liable as principals. The dividing line between the two is the commencement of the commission of the principal offense, and if the parties acted together, but did not act together in its commission, the one who actually committed it is the principal, while the one who was not present at the commission, and who was not in any way aiding in its commission, as by keeping watch, or by securing the safety or concealment of the principal, would be an accomplice. To constitute a principal, the offender must either be present where the crime is committed, or he must do some act during the time when the offense is being committed which connects him with the act of commission in some of the ways named in the statute. Where the acts committed occur prior to the commission of the principal offense, or subsequent thereto, and are independent of, and disconnected with, the actual commission of the principal offense, and no act is done by the party during the commission of the principal offense, such a party is not a principal offender, but is an accomplice or accessory, according to the facts. Smith v. State, 17 S. W. 552, 554, 21 Tex. App. 107; Bean v. State, 17 Tex. App. 60, 71; Dawson v. State, 41 S. W. 599, 600, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 50. Thus, one who advises and agrees to the burning of a building, but who was not present when the act was done, and did not act in furtherance of the design, is an accomplice, and not a principal. Dawson v. State, 41 S. W. 599, 600, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 50.

The distinction between "accomplice" and "principal" is a vexing one to always maintain. The general rule, however, seems to be that the act of the accomplice is a consummated act at the time the crime is committed. The act of the principal is somewhat in the nature of a continuous act. He is simply acting a part of a drama, so to speak, or a tragedy, as the case may be; but, in order to constitute one a principal when not actually present, he must be doing some act in pursuance of a common design at the time of the consummation of the crime, such as keeping watch or preventing detection by any means or manner. Mitchell v. State (Tex.) 70 S. W. 208, 209.

Refusal to testify.

That a witness refuses to testify as to what she knows about a crime, or attempts to conceal its commission, does not make her an "accomplice." Prewett v. State, 53 S. W. 879, 880, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 262.

In abortion.

The term "accomplice," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 399, providing that no person shall be convicted of a crime on the testimony of an accomplice without corroboration, must be construed as meaning one culpably implicated in the commission of the crime of which the defendant is accused—that is, one who could be indicted for the same offense; and hence the woman on whom an abortion is produced is not an "accomplice" of the person who produces it, since the statute says that a person who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a woman, either prescribes, supplies, or administers to a woman, or uses or causes to be used any instrument or other means upon her, is guilty of abortion, and clearly implies that the person on whom the operation is performed cannot be one of the persons guilty of the offenses, her crime being separately defined and punished in a different manner. People v. Vedder, 98 N. Y. 630, 631.

Where the statute making the procuring or attempting to procure a miscarriage or abortion a crime does not make the woman on whom it was attempted or procured indictable with the person attempting or procuring it, she is not technically an "accomplice"; and hence the rule as to corroboration of an "accomplice" does not apply to the testimony of the woman. Commonwealth v. Wood, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 85, 93.

In adultery.

Where two men procure separate rooms in a building, and take thereto two women, with one of whom the defendant spent the night, the other man was not an accomplice in the crime of adultery, thereby committed, though he may have committed an independent crime. State v. Ean, 58 N. W. 898, 899, 90 Iowa, 534.

In bribery.

An "accomplice" is an associate in crime; a partaker of the guilt; a participator in the offense; one involved directly or indirectly in the commission of a crime. It is held that a bribe-taker is an accomplice of the bribe-giver, though the bribery of a juror or offer to bribe a juror is a crime by itself, and the acceptance of the bribe by the juror is a separate crime. People v. Winant, 53 N. Y. Supp. 695, 697, 24 Misc. Rep. 361.

An "accomplice" in legal signification is one who co-operates, aids, or assists another in the consummation of the crime, either as principal or accessory. The general test to determine whether a witness is or is not an accomplice is, could he himself have been indicted for the offense either as principal or as accessory? If he could not, then he is not an accomplice. Each of the two parties to a transaction may be guilty of a crime, and yet, if the two crimes are separate and distinct crimes, the one is not the accomplice of the other. Thus, suppose A. asks B. for a bribe, and B. pays it. A. is guilty of the crime of asking a bribe, and B. of the crime of giving one. But the two crimes are entirely distinct, and neither party could be indicted, either as principal or accessory, for the crime committed by the other. Such a case would not be within the statute forbidding conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. State v. Durnam, 75 N. W. 1127, 1131, 73 Minn. 150.

In gaming.

An accomplice is a person who with a common intent unites with the principal offender in the commission of a crime, and may be such although in the commission of the crime his interests antagonize those of the principal offender; as, in a case where parties engaged in gambling with cards, each player, being equally guilty of the offense, is an accomplice of the other, though their interests are adverse. State v. Light, 21 Pac. 132, 133, 17 Or. 358.

In incest.

An "accomplice" is defined in Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440, as a person who "knowingly, voluntarily, and with common intent with the principal offender unites in the commission of a crime." While this definition has often been quoted, and is strictly accurate in the great majority of cases, it is not, we think, universally accurate. Two persons may be equally guilty in the commission of a crime, may both be present and equally participate in its commission. As between them there can be no principal offender, yet each is the accomplice of the other. Black's definition is preferable: "An associate in crime; one who co-operates or aids or assists in committing." That a female participant in incestuous intercourse, whose action in the matter is voluntary and uninfluenced by any elements of coercion, either by force, fear, fraud, or undue influence, is an accomplice in the commission of the crime of incest, is firmly settled by law. State v. Keller, 80 N. W. 476, 477, 8 N. D. 563, 73 Am. St. Rep. 776.

In a trial for the crime of incest, the party to the crime not on trial is an accomplice, and the other party cannot be convicted on her evidence, unless corroborated by other evidence. State v. Jarvis, 23 Pac. 251, 18 Or. 360.

In larceny.

An "accomplice" is strictly defined as one who is associated with others in the commission of a crime, all being principals. Participation in the commission of the same criminal act, and in the execution of a common criminal intent, is necessary to render one criminal in a legal sense an accomplice of another; and if between two persons who may be engaged in the criminal enterprise in the execution of which two separate offenses may be committed there is not this concurrence of acts or intent though each may commit a crime, neither is, in legal contemplation, the accomplice of the other. The actual thief, relatively to the receiver of stolen goods, is an independent criminal, and cannot participate with the receiver of such goods in the special offense committed by the latter, knowing them to be stolen. Springer v. State, 30 S. E. 971, 102 Ga. 447. So, also, State v. Kuhlman, 53 S. W. 416, 152 Mo. 100, 75 Am. St. Rep. 438.

Persons who receive goods knowing them to be stolen are guilty of a substantive crime, and were not accomplices with the thief. Harris v. State, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 124, 128; Walker v. State (Tex.) 37 S. W. 423.

The fact that one has received stolen goods knowing the same to have been feloniously obtained, while it makes him an accomplice in the simple larceny and an accessory after the fact, does not constitute him an accomplice in the burglary by which possession of the goods was acquired. State v. Hayden, 45 Iowa, 11, 17.

In seduction.

On a prosecution for seduction, the prosecutrix being an "accomplice," in order to warrant a conviction her testimony must be corroborated. McCullar v. State, 36 S. W. 585, 586, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 213, 61 Am. St. Rep. 847.

ACCOMPLISH.

"Accompany" is not equivalent to "accomplish," so that an instruction that robbery is the felonious taking of personal property "accompanied" by means of force and fear is erroneous, as robbery must be accomplished by means of force and fear. State v. Johnson, 66 Pac. 290, 291, 26 Mont. 9.

ACCORD.

"Accord is a satisfaction agreed upon between the party injuring and the party injured, which when performed is a bar to all actions on the same account." Rorer

Iron Co. v. Trout, 2 S. E. 713, 719, 83 Va. 397, 5 Am. St. Rep. 262 (quoting 3 Bl. Comm. 315); Sieber v. Amunson, 47 N. W. 1126, 1128, 78 Wis. 679; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 48 Ill. 31, 33; Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 576, 31 Am. Rep. 491; Oliwill v. Verdenhalven, 15 N. Y. Supp. 94, 96; Mitchell v. Hawley (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 414, 418, 47 Am. Dec. 260. "It must be advantageous to the creditor, and he must receive an actual benefit therefrom. Everything must be done which the party undertakes to do. To constitute a good accord and satisfaction, it must be accepted as such." Sieber v. Amunson, 47 N. W. 1126, 1128, 78 Wis. 679. The bar rests on the agreement, and not on the mere reception of property; for, whatever amount may have been received, the right of action is not extinguished, unless it is agreed that the property received is in satisfaction. Mitchell v. Hawley (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 414, 418.

An "accord" is an agreement, in the case of contracts, where the creditor agrees to accept some other thing in lieu of that which is contracted or promised to be done. Way v. Russell (U. S.) 33 Fed. 5, 7; Swofford Bros. Dry-Goods Co. v. Goss, 65 Mo. App. 55, 59.

An accord is an agreement, consent, or concurrence of the minds and intentions of two or more individuals. It is an agreement between a party injuring and a party injured to make satisfaction for the injury, which when performed is a bar to a recovery for the original claim. The principle is that the party who has a legal right of action against another may accept of some other thing in discharge of his claim or demand. Elkan v. Hitchcock, 36 N. Y. Supp. 788, 789, 15 Misc. Rep. 218.

An "accord" is an agreement, an adjustment, a settlement of former difficulty, and presupposes a difference, a disagreement, as to what is right. Harrison v. Henderson (Kan.) 72 Pac. 875, 876, 62 L. R. A. 760.

An "accord" is an agreement to accept, in extension of an obligation; something different from or less than that to which the person agreeing to accept it is entitled. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2060; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3824; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1177; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1521.

"An acceptance, in satisfaction of a debt, of an accord or agreement, with mutual promises to perform, on which the party has a legal remedy for its nonperformance, is a good satisfaction of such debt, although such promises are not performed. In order that such accord should be a defense to the original debt, it is necessary that the plaintiff should have agreed to accept the agreement itself, and that the performance of it is a satisfaction of his debt, so that if it is not performed his only remedy would be an action for the breach of it, and not a right to recur to the original debt. There must be a valid agreement, substituting a new cause of action in place of the old. It is not sufficient that there is a mere accord between the same parties as mutual promises, but there must be a new agreement with a new consideration." Goodrich v. Stanley, 24 Conn. 613, 621.

An accord executory, without performance accepted, is no bar, and tender of performance is insufficient; and part execution of an accord cannot be pleaded in satisfaction, but it must be completely executed. Bac. Abr. It was said in Peytoe's Case, 9 Coke, 79, that every accord ought to be full, perfect, and complete, for if divers things are to be done and performed by the accord, the performance of part is not sufficient, but all ought to be performed. Oliwill v. Verdenhalven, 15 N. Y. Supp. 94, 96.

"Accord executed" is satisfaction; accord executory is only substituting one cause of action in the room of another, which might go on to any extent. This has been so often ruled that a decision to the contrary would overthrow all the books. Russell v. Lytle (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 390, 391, 22 Am. Dec. 537.

"The accord must be executed, and a mere executory agreement can never be pleaded as an accord and satisfaction. If part of the consideration agreed on be not paid, the whole accord falls." City of Memphis v. Brown, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 289, 309, 22 L. Ed. 264.

"An accord executory, without performance accepted, is no bar, and tender of performance is insufficient. So, also, accord with part execution cannot be treated as a satisfaction, but the accord must be completely executed;" and hence a proposition in the alternative to accept certain things in full of a judgment, or to accept payment of the account in another fashion, the latter of which was accepted and partly acted on, is merely the case of an accord partly executed, and so far as not executed left the judgment in full force. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 576, 31 Am. Rep. 491.

Accord, to be good, must be in full satisfaction, and must be executed. Readiness to perform is not enough. In the language of one of our own cases, the legal notion of accord is a new agreement, on a new consideration, to discharge a debtor; and it is not enough that there be a clear agreement or accord, and a sufficient consideration, but the accord must be executed. Mere readiness to perform the accord, or a tender of performance, or even a part performance and readiness to perform the rest, will not do. Hosler v. Hursh, 25 Atl. 52, 53, 151 Pa. 415 (citing Hearn v. Kiehl, 38 Pa. [2 Wright] 147, 80 Am. Dec. 472).

Where a maker and a holder of a note agreed that the maker should execute a new note and mortgage in lieu thereof, and the maker tendered to defendant the new note and mortgage, but it was refused, such substituted mortgage and tender constituted but an accord executory. Tender of performance has never been held equivalent to execution for the purpose of a defense. Brooklyn Bank v. De Grauw (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 342, 344, 35 Am. Dec. 569.

An agreement or accord which is to operate as a satisfaction of an existing liability must, before it can have that effect, be fully executed, and as long as by the terms of the agreement something remains to be done in the future it will not be sufficient. So where the holder of a note secured by a mortgage promised the maker that, if he would purchase a certain demand against such holder, the note should be paid by an equal amount, to be indorsed on the demand, and the maker, relying on such promise, purchased the demand, but the holder of the note, in violation of his promise, negotiated the same, there was no payment or satisfaction of the note. Both demands remained in full force, and in possession of each party, neither being canceled in whole or in part by the other, the note being transferred before the agreement; for an accord and satisfaction was fully executed, and the transferee was entitled to receive and retain the amount due on it, no notice to him of the agreement being shown. Bragg v. Pierce, 53 Me. 65, 67.

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

An "accord and satisfaction" is the substitution of another agreement between the parties in satisfaction of the former one, and an execution of the latter agreement, and forms a complete bar to any further action on the original claim. Continental National Bank v. McGeoch, 66 N. W. 606, 614, 92 Wis. 286; Heath v. Vaughn, 53 Pac. 229, 230, 11 Colo. App. 384; Story v. Maclay, 13 Pac. 198, 201, 6 Mont. 492; Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Goss, 65 Mo. App. 55, 59. In later times, however, this definition has been modified, or, rather, a broader application of the doctrine has been made, that a new agreement or new plans may in some instances be held to be a satisfaction of a prior one. Heath v. Vaughn, 53 Pac. 229, 230, 11 Colo. App. 384.

An "accord and satisfaction" is defined to be an agreement between two persons, one of whom has a right of action against the other, that the latter should do or give and the former accept something, in satisfaction of the right of action, different from, and usually less than, what might be legally enforced. When the agreement is executed, and the satisfaction has been made, it is called an "accord and satisfaction." Rogers v. City of Spokane, 37 Pac. 300, 301, 9 Wash. 168; Davis v. Noaks, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 494, 497. There is another and more modern application of this principle, which has been sustained by the courts. It is that an "accord and satisfaction" is the substitution of another agreement between the parties in satisfaction of a former one; or probably a better definition would be where the promise to do a thing is set up in satisfaction of the prior right or claim. The fact that a person injured through the negligence of a city court agreed to accept a certain sum in satisfaction of his claim does not bar his right of action against the city when the city council afterwards merely authorized the comptroller to pay such sum, and he did not accept it, and no tender was made to him. Rogers v. City of Spokane, 37 Pac. 300, 301, 9 Wash. 168.

To constitute an "accord and satisfaction" it is necessary that the money should be offered in satisfaction of the claim, and the offer accompanied by such acts and declarations as amount to a condition that if the money be accepted it is accepted in satisfaction, and such that the party to whom it is offered is bound to understand therefrom that if he takes it he takes it subject to such condition. Preston v. Grant, 34 Vt. 201, 203. This definition has been quoted and followed in the following cases: Fuller v. Kemp, 33 N. E. 1034, 1035, 138 N. Y. 231, 20 L. R. A. 785; Strock v. Brigantine Transp. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 327, 329, 23 Misc. Rep. 358; Bloomington Min. Co. v. Brooklyn Hygienic Ice Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 699, 703, 58 App. Div. 66; Boston Rubber Co. v. Peerless Wringer Co., 5 Atl. 407, 408, 58 Vt. 551; Talbot v. English, 59 N. E. 857, 862, 156 Ind. 299. When the tender or offer is thus made, the party to whom it is made has no alternative but to refuse it, or accept it upon such condition; and hence where defendant stated to plaintiff that he tendered the sum as the balance due on a note there was nothing in the advancement which could fairly convey to the plaintiff the idea that it was offered on condition that if plaintiff took it he did so in satisfaction of the note; and where the amount offered was credited by defendant on the back of the note, and suit was afterwards brought for the balance, the transaction falls short of an accord and satisfaction. Preston v. Grant, 34 Vt. 201, 203.

An "accord and satisfaction" is a substitution, by agreement of the parties, of something else in place of the original claim, and when executed its effect is to extinguish the antecedent liability. Boston Newmarket Gold Min. Co. v. Orme (Colo.) 71 Pac. 885, 886 (citing Pulliam v. Taylor, 50 Miss. 251; Heavenrich v. Steele, 57 Minn. 221, 58 N. W. 982).

An "accord and satisfaction" has been defined to be an agreement "in the case of a contract where a creditor agreed to accept some other thing in lieu of that which is contracted or promised to be done. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 9 Ohio Dec. 235, 245.

Accord and satisfaction is the discharge of a contract or cause of action or disputed claim, arising either in contract or tort, by the satisfaction of an agreement between the parties in satisfaction of such contract, cause of action, or disputed claim, and the execution of that agreement. Like any other agreement, there must be a meeting of the minds of both parties. Hennessy v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 65 Minn. 13, 67 N. W. 635.

An "accord and satisfaction" is an executed agreement whereby one of the parties undertakes to give and the other to accept, in satisfaction of a claim arising either from contract or tort, something other or different from what he is or considers himself entitled to; but no invariable rule can be laid down with any degree of certainty as to what constitutes such an agreement. Each case must be determined largely on its peculiar facts. To constitute a valid accord and satisfaction, not only must it be shown that the debtor gave the amount in satisfaction, but that it was accepted by the creditor as such. The agreement need not be express, but may be implied from circumstances. Perin v. Cathcart, 89 N. W. 12, 13, 115 Iowa, 553.

An "accord and satisfaction" is the result of an agreement between the parties, and must be consummated by a meeting of the minds of the parties, accompanied by a sufficient consideration. A simple tender of a balance, as shown by an account tendered by the debtor, does not carry with it an implication that by such tender the debtor paid or the creditor agreed to receive the sum in full of the amount due, where there had been no prior disagreement as to such amount. Harrison v. Henderson (Kan.) 72 Pac. 875, 877, 62 L. R. A. 760.

Blackstone, to illustrate what constitutes an accord and satisfaction, says: "As if a man contract to build a house, or deliver a horse, and he fail in it, this is an injury for which the sufferer may have his remedy by action; but if the party injured accepts a sum of money or other thing as a satisfaction, this is a redress of that injury, and entirely takes away the action." Lindsay v. Gager, 11 N. Y. App. Div. 93, 96, 42 N. Y. Supp. 851, 853 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. c. 1, pp. 15, 16).

Accord and satisfaction is special matter of defense, and not available to the defendant unless specially pleaded, or unless, when pleading the general issue, the defendant gives notice in writing that he will give it in evidence under the general issue, and rely upon it as a defense to the action. Seaver v. Wilder, 35 Atl. 351, 352, 68 Vt. 423.

Accord and satisfaction is where the parties, by a subsequent agreement, have satisfied the former one, and the latter agreement has been executed. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3732.

Accord and satisfaction is something other than strict performance of payment. It is doing that by the covenantor which the covenantee accepts in lieu of a performance of the terms of the covenant. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Hamill, 5 Md. 170, 186.

Accord and satisfaction forms a complete bar to any further action on the original claim, but an accord without satisfaction does not bar the action. Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Goss, 65 Mo. App. 55-59.

A question of "accord and satisfaction" cannot arise in a contract the parties to which have fully performed their agreements under that contract. Story v. Maclay, 13 Pac. 198, 201, 6 Mont. 492.

"The rule of accord and satisfaction does not apply to a settlement embracing payment for property sold and delivered, as regards property concerning the delivery of which both parties were ignorant, though a receipt be given in full." Bloomington Min. Co. v. Brooklyn Hygienic Ice Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 690, 703, 58 App. Div. 66.

Defendant and plaintiff had an unsettled disputed account. Defendant sent plaintiff a statement of the account as it claimed it to be, to which plaintiff made no reply. Defendant then sent the statement, accompanied with its note to cover the admitted balance, and a letter in which it stated that the note covered the balance due, and hoped it would be satisfactory. The plaintiff replied to this letter, giving its version of the disputed items, but kept and used the note, which was paid at maturity. Held that, as there was no condition attached to the acceptance of the note for the admitted balance, it was not an "accord and satisfaction" of the debt. Boston Rubber Co. v. Peerless Wringer Co., 5 Atl. 407, 408, 58 Vt. 551.

Consideration.

An accord and satisfaction sufficient to constitute a defense to a cause of action requires not only an agreement, which the creditor agrees to accept, but there must be a reasonable satisfaction in addition thereto. Cumber v. Wane, 1 Strange, 426; Davis v. Noaks, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 494, 497.

"An accord and satisfaction may be briefly defined as the settlement of a dispute or the satisfaction of a claim by an executed agreement between the party injuring and the party injured; or, to give a definition indicating more definitely its peculiar nature, it is something of legal value to which the creditor before had no right, received in full satisfaction of the debt, without regard to the magnitude of the satisfaction." Bull v. Bull, 43 Conn. 455, 462 (quoting Smith's Leading Cases [10th Am.

Ed.] 558); Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Clark (U. S.) 92 Fed. 968, 975, 35 C. C. A. 120.

An "accord and satisfaction" requires a new agreement and the performance thereof. It must be an executed contract, founded upon a new consideration. If the claim is liquidated, the mere acceptance of a part of the balance to discharge the whole is not enough, for there is no reconsideration. If the claim is unliquidated, the acceptance of a part and an agreement to cancel the entire debt furnishes a new consideration, which is founded on compromise. Nessioy v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 331, 42 N. E. 715, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695. The acceptance of a check, which had been sent for the amount of a bill, less deductions, which defendant claimed, though such acceptance was stated to be subject to the settling of the matters now in dispute, was a satisfaction of the claim. Lestienne v. Ernst, 39 N. Y. Supp. 199, 200, 5 App. Div. 373.

An accord and satisfaction "is the substitution of another agreement in satisfaction of the former one, and an execution of the latter agreement; but an agreement or promise of the same grade will not be held to be a satisfaction of a prior one, unless it has been expressly accepted as such, and the creditor is not bound by an agreement to accept a smaller sum in lieu of a liquidated ascertained debt of a larger amount, unless it is supported by some new and additional advantage to the creditor." Where the parties intend that performance of a subsequent agreement, and not the promise itself, is to constitute the satisfaction, there will be no satisfaction without performance. — Pulliam v. Taylor, 60 Miss. 251, 257.

Executed or executory.

The essence of an "accord and satisfaction" is that it should be executed as agreed. It is, of course, competent for the parties, as in the case of any other contract, to vary it by subsequent agreement, or either party may waive stipulation in his favor. — Prest v. Cole, 67 N. E. 246, 247, 183 Mass. 283.

An accord is an agreement to accept, in extinction of an obligation; something different from or less than that to which the person agreeing to accept is entitled. Though the parties to an accord are bound to execute it, yet it does not extinguish the obligation until it is fully executed. To establish a plea of "accord and satisfaction" under the statutory or common law, it must not only appear that there was an agreement to accept in full settlement of an obligation something different from or less than that to which one of the parties is entitled, but it must be shown that such agreement has been fully executed, and the obligation extinguished by the creditors, actual acceptance of the consideration specified in the agreement constituting an accord. Arnett v. Smith, 88 N.

W. 1037, 1041, 11 N. D. 55 (citing Carpenter v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 64 N. W. 1120, 7 S. D. 584; Hoxsie v. Empire Lumber Co., 43 N. W. 476, 41 Minn. 548).

The accord is the agreement for the reception of the thing in discharge of the debt, and the satisfaction is the actual reception of the thing; and hence the mere agreement on the part of plaintiff to accept a deed from a third party in satisfaction of his claim does not afford a defense of accord and satisfaction in an action on the claim, since such defense could be made out only by proof that the deed was actually received by the plaintiff. Burgess v. Denison Paper Mfg. Co., 9 Atl. 726, 727, 79 Me. 266.

"When a party makes an offer of a certain sum to settle a claim, and the sum in controversy is open and unliquidated, and attaches to his offer the condition that the sum, if taken at all, must be received in full or in satisfaction of the claim in dispute, and the other party receives the money, he takes it subject to the condition attached to it, and it will operate as an accord and satisfaction, even though the party at the time he receives the money declares that he will not receive it in that manner, but only in part satisfaction of his debt so far as it will extend." Berdell v. Bissell, 6 Colo. 162, 165; Towslee v. Healey, 39 Vt. 522, 523; Talbott v. English, 50 N. E. 857, 862, 156 Ind. 299; Tompkins v. Hill, 14 N. E. 177, 178, 145 Mass. 379. Thus, where there was a dispute between a landlord and tenant as to the amount of rent due, and the tenant transmitted a check for the amount, which he claimed to be correct according to a statement he had previously submitted, and the remittance was accompanied by a note which merely stated that he inclosed a certain amount for rent, but the landlord acknowledged the receipt of the amount as part payment of the rent for a certain month, such remittance did not amount to an accord and satisfaction. Talbott v. English, 59 N. E. 857, 862, 156 Ind. 299.

The mere acceptance of a smaller sum than that which is actually due on a contract, though it purport to be in full, cannot be said to be an "accord and satisfaction." City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 6 Ohio N. P. 140, 9 S. & C. P. 235, 245 (citing Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225, 8 Am. Rep. 546; Harriman v. Harriman, 78 Mass. [12 Gray] 341).

An "accord and satisfaction" must be a satisfaction of the entire debt, so as to completely extinguish it, and where, by agreement, part of the debt remains, there can be no "accord and satisfaction." Line v. Nelson, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 358, 362.

An agreement to accept part of an unliquidated and disputed claim in full satisfaction of the whole demand, executed by the payment of a sum agreed upon, is a good "accord and satisfaction." A part payment of an unliquidated claim is not a discharge of the whole, unless accepted upon an agreement and understanding to that effect. Burrill v. Crossman (U. S.) 91 Fed. 543, 544, 33 C. C. A. 663; Clark v. Dinsmore, 5 N. H. 136.

The doctrine that the receiving a part of a debt due, under an agreement that the same shall be in full satisfaction, is no bar to an action to recover the balance, does not apply to any cases, except where the plaintiff's claim is for a fixed and liquidated amount, or where the sum due could be ascertained by mere arithmetical calculation. But when a party makes an offer of a certain sum to settle a claim, when the sum in controversy is open and unliquidated, and attaches to his offer the condition that the same, if taken at all, must be received in full, or in satisfaction, of the claim in dispute, and the other party receives the money, he takes it subject to the condition attached to it, and it will operate as an accord and satisfaction, even though the party, at the time of receiving the money, declare that he will not receive it in that manner, but only in part satisfaction of his debt so far as it will extend. McDaniels v. Lapham, 21 Vt. 222.

ACCORDANCE.

See "In Accordance With."

ACCORDING TO.

In a recognizance reciting that the obligor was recognized in a certain sum as bail "according to" act of assembly, the words "according to" must be construed as making the act of the assembly which fixes the condition of the recognizance by prescribing the duty of the bail part of the recognizance, making the recognizance good in substance, though there was no further recital of conditions, since there was in it substance from which a formal recognizance could be molded. Harvey v. Beach, 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 500, 502.

A contract providing that an improvement should be made "according to" such direction as the city engineer may, from time to time, give in superintending the construction, means such directions as he may give looking to the completion of the work according to its plans and specifications. Burke v. City of Kansas, 34 Mo. App. 570, 580.

Code, § 469, provides that when any city or town shall have established the grade of any street or alley, and improvements have been erected "according to the established grade" thereof, the property owners shall be entitled to damages resulting from a change of grade. Held, "that the property is improved according to the established grade of the street, within the statute, whenever it is so improved that it can be comfortably and conveniently used for the purpose to which it is devoted while the street on which it abuts is maintained at that grade." It does not require the property to be erected on the grade of the street. Conklin v. City of Keokuk, 35 N. W. 444, 447, 73 Iowa, 343.

Const. art. 4, §§ 3-5, requiring the Legislature to apportion the senate and assembly districts "according to the number of inhabitants," and requiring the assembly districts to be bounded by county, precinct, town, or ward lines, to consist of contiguous territory, and to be in as compact form as practicable, and requiring the senate districts to be of convenient contiguous territory, requires the apportionment of a state into assembly and senate districts "according to the number of inhabitants," as near as can be done consistently with the other provisions. State v. Cunningham, 53 N. W. 35, 56, 83 Wis. 90, 17 L. R. A. 145, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27.

An averment in a declaration that the defendants subscribed for certain shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff company, "according to the statute" incorporating the company, will be held on demurrer to mean that he had done everything required by the charter in order to become a subscriber. Fiser v. Mississippi & T. R. Co., 32 Miss. 359, 370.

The words "according to its value," in the constitutional provision providing that all property subject to taxation shall be taxed according to its value, means that property of every character and description must be taxed upon its true value, and upon that basis must contribute to the revenue of the state, and that no portion of any distinct genus or species of property upon which such tax is imposed can ever be exempt therefrom. Pike v. State, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 204, 206.

Where an indictment charges that the overt act was done "according to and in pursuance of said conspiracy," something more is intended by the use of the words than that the overt act was done after the formation of the conspiracy, or that it was simply a result of the conspiracy. It implies that the act was one contemplated by the conspiracy, "according to," and was done in carrying it out "in pursuance of," something which the conspiracy provided should be done, something which when done should tend to accomplish the purpose of the conspiracy. Dealy v. United States, 152 U. S. 539, 546, 14 Sup. Ct. 680, 38 L. Ed. 545.

Where a layout of land for a burying place is made "according to pitch," the expression in this connection means according to a previous selection. Inhabitants of East-on v. Drake, 65 N. E. 393, 394, 182 Mass. 283.

ACCORDING TO COMMON USAGE.

See "Common Usage."

ACCORDING TO THE COURSE OF COMMON LAW.

The various interpretations in effect determine that the phrase "judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law" means that the right of a person to his life, liberty, or property shall not be divested except by a judicial determination, after due notice, in pursuance of a general law. Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 261, 267.

ACCORDING TO LAW.

See "Sworn According to Law."

A certificate of a royal Prussian judge, in proceedings to extradite a forger, that the proceeding against the forger which he certifies to is "valid evidence according to the laws existing in Prussia," is to be construed as meaning that the certificate is valid evidence of the crime in Prussia. In re Behrendt (U. S.) 22 Fed. 699, 700.

A will by which testator devised property to his son for life, remainder to be divided among the son's children "according to law," meant according to the law as it exists at the time of the division, for, unless it be divided according to existing law, it is not divided according to law in any sense. To perform any act according to law, necessarily refers to the law existing at the time of the performance of the act, since law as it once was is not now law at all. Van Tilburgh v. Hollinshead, 14 N. J. Eq. (1 McCart.) 32, 35.

Act July 2, 1822, prohibiting any revocation of any will unless proved by some other will or codicil executed with the like formalities, or by some other writing declaring the same, or by canceling, tearing, obliterating, or otherwise destroying such will, but that nothing in the section shall be construed to control or affect any revocation of a will to be implied "according to law" from any change in the circumstances of the testator, his family, devisees, legatees, or estate, occurring between the time of the making of the will and the death of the testator, will be construed as only intended to except such revocations as are approved by English decisions on an implication not consistent with the English statute of frauds. Morey v. Sohler, 3 Atl. 636, 638, 63 N. H. 507, 56 Am. Rep. 538.

Act Cong. July 8, 1886, referring claims to the court of claims for adjudication "according to law," means a formal, regular, and final judgment of the judicial tribune to which the matter is submitted, acting on the acknowledged principles of law applicable to the circumstances of the case. United States v. Irwin, 8 Sup. Ct. 1033, 1035, 127 U. S. 125, 32 L. Ed. 99.

The phrase "according to law" can have but one meaning as used in the statute for the distribution of land of a decedent, and that is by an action in partition in the court having jurisdiction in cases of that character. Schick v. Whitcomb (Neb.) 94 N. W. 1023, 1026.

An administrator's bond provided that he "shall administer according to law." It was held that, the functions of an administrator being ex vi termini to administer, to "administer according to law" meant to fulfill the functions of an administrator, or, in other words, to perform all his duties, and hence, as it was an administrator's duty to pay over money on demand, his failure to do so was a breach of the bond. Balch v. Hooper, 20 N. W. 124, 126, 32 Minn. 158.

"According to law," as used in Act No. 82 of 1884, § 3, declaring that a tax title executed before a notary shall be conclusive evidence that the property was assessed "according to law," and of other facts, necessarily implies merely that all the essentials have been fulfilled, and that the tax title is conclusive evidence that if they are performed they are performed "according to law," but does not preclude an inquiry as to the fact of performance of such actual essentials at all, the act and phrase being only to conclude inquiry into the nonessential requisites to the exercise of the taxing power. In re Lake, 3 South. 479, 483, 40 La. Ann. 142.

As legal process.

The expression "according to law," as used in Code Pub. Loc. Laws, art. 7, § 180, providing that where state and county taxes are in arrear, and the collector shall find it necessary to enforce the collection thereof, he shall first leave with the party by whom the taxes are due a notice warning the delinquent that unless paid within 30 days the collector will proceed to collect the same "according to law," means by legal process. Condon v. Maynard, 18 Atl. 957, 958, 71 Md. 601.

As opinion on appeal.

The phrase "according to law" in the decision on appeal of a case, remanding it for further proceedings according to law, means the opinion of the court filed upon the appeal, for, without regard to the merit or demerit of the opinion, it necessarily becomes the law of the case. Winner v. Hoyt, 32 N. W. 128, 130, 68 Wis. 278.

As statute law.

In a bond of a county treasurer providing that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his office and pay over the money which shall come into his hands "according to law," the phrase according to law embraces statute law in force during the term of office, whether enacted before or after the execution of the bond. Dawson v. State, 38 Ohio St. 1, 3.

The words "according to law" as used in the Constitution, providing that every person holding any civil office under the state or any municipality therein shall, unless removed "according to law," exercise the duties of such office, can have no other construction than that such officer shall be removed as provided by the Constitution or statutory law. Trimble v. People, 34 Pac. 981, 984, 19 Colo. 187, 41 Am. St. Rep. 236.

As statute of descent or distribution.

The words "according to law" in a will in which testatrix demised lands in trust for her son for life, and at the time of his death to leave all the property of all kinds to be equally divided among her nephews and nieces on her father's side "according to law," was held not to operate to incorporate as a part of her will, and as a qualification of the devise, the provisions of the statute of descent relating to the division of estates between the children and grandchildren of brothers and sisters of the whole blood; and therefore a grandniece, the daughter of a nephew dead at the time of making the will, was held not entitled to any interest in the lands. Buzby v. Roberts, 32 Atl. 9, 11, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 566.

A will by which a plantation, after a life estate in another, was to come to the next male heir nearest in kindred and relation to the testator "according to law," and so on in succession on that line, must be construed to mean that the estate should come to such beneficiary in the same manner as the law would have given it to the heirs of the testator, and not that the testator meant that the law was to be regarded in ascertaining who the next male heir nearest in kindred and relation to him was. McIntyre v. Ramsey, 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 317, 319.

Where testator bequeathed to his wife "one third of my whole estate according to law," the phrase referred to the statute of distribution, which gives a widow one-third of all the personal property of the husband after the payment of debts. Morris v. Morris' Ex'r (Del.) 4 Houst. 414, 441.

ACCORDING TO TENOR AND EFFECT.

In an agreement for the release of a purchase on a condition precedent that they should pay a certain percentage of their original indebtedness "according to the tenor and effect" of certain notes they were to give, the phrase "according to their tenor and effect" is equivalent to "at maturity." 1 Rev. St. p. 665, § 23, providing that no person shall by printing, writing, or in any other way publish an "account" of any lottery, stating when and where the same is to be drawn, or the prizes drawn in any of them, or the price of a ticket or share therein, or where any ticket may be obtained therein, or in any way aiding or assisting in the same, does not mean an editorial or other commentary upon the law or its violation, or one pointing out violators and condemning their conduct, or a mere narrative of such violation as matter of news, but means publications to aid and assist lotteries by publishing accounts to operate as advertisements or notices of illegal lotteries, and to point out in some form when the same are to be drawn, or the prizes therein, or the price of tickets or shares, or where tickets may be obtained, or in some other way to aid or assist them. *Hart v. A policy provided that all persons insured and sustaining loss or damage by fire should forthwith give notice thereof, and as soon after as possible deliver "a particular account" of such loss or damage. Held, that the words quoted should be construed to require only a particular account of the articles lost or damaged, and did not include a statement of the cause or manner of loss. Catlin v. Springfield Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 310, 311.

The term "accounts," as used technically in evidence relating to a quarterly meeting of the Society of Friends, is understood to be a written return of a monthly meeting, authenticated by its clerk to the quarterly meeting, stating answers to queries respecting its condition, notice of any business to which the attention of the quarterly meeting is asked, and also the names of the rep-representatives chosen to attend and form the quarterly meeting. Earle v. Wood, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 430, 465.

ACCOUNT (In Commercial Law).

The word "account" has no clearly defined legal meaning. Ordinarily it is a detailed statement of mutual demands, if they exist in the nature of debit and credit between the parties, arising out of contract or of some fiduciary relation, showing a balance by comparison between receipts and payments. The term "account" includes goods sold and delivered or consigned to be sold, money had and received, and work done and materials furnished. There is no distinction between the word "account" as used in a limitation of actions on account to three years, and in the provisions authorizing the defendant, upon proper notice, to require a list of items composing an account when it is the foundation of a suit, and it is used in its ordinary commercial usage to mean claim or demand grown out of the sale of goods, the performance of services, or the like, and applies to an action of assumpsit brought by a physician to recover for medical services rendered, in the absence of a special contract. Morrisette v. Wood, 30 South. 630, 631, 128 Ala. 505.

"The primary idea of account, computation, whether we look to the proceedings of courts of law or of equity, is some matter of debt and credit, or demands in the nature of debt and credit, between parties. It implies that one is responsible to another for moneys or things, either on the score of contract, or some fiduciary relation of a public or private nature, created by law or otherwise." Whitwell v. Willard, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 216, 217; Nelson v. Posey County, 4 N. E. 703, 704, 105 Ind. 287; Stringham v. Winnebago County, 24 Wis. 594, 599.

"Anything may enter into an account. The sum due on a bond of several years standing, on which there has been various payments, may be said to rest in account and to be unliquidated. An account is no more than a list or catalogue of items, whether of debits or credits." Rensselaer Glass Factory v. Reid (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 587, 593.

An account is a list or statement of monetary transactions, such as payments, losses, sales, debits, credits, etc., in most cases showing a balance or result of comparison between items of an opposite nature, e. g., receipts and payments. Purvis v. Kroner, 23 Pac. 260, 261, 18 Or. 414.

An account "is a formal statement in detail of the transactions between two parties, made contemporaneously with the transactions themselves." Richardson v. Wingate (Ohio) 10 West. Law J. 145, 146.

An "account" is a detailed statement of items of debt and credit, or of debt arising out of contracts between parties. Turgeon v. Cote, 33 Atl. 787, 88 Me. 108.

A computation or statement of debts and credits arising out of personal property bought or sold, services rendered, material furnished, and the use of property hired and returned. McMaster v. Booth, 4 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 427, 428.

"An account is defined to be a detailed statement of mutual demands in the matter of debt and credit between parties, arising out of contracts or some fiduciary relation." McWilliams v. Allan, 45 Mo. 573, 574; Preston Nat. Bank v. George T. Smith Middlings Purifier Co., 60 N. W. 981, 982, 102 Mich. 462; Madison County v. Collier, 30 South. 610, 611, 79 Miss. 220.

An account is "a sum stated on paper; a registry of a debt or credit; an entry in a book of things bought or sold, of payments, services, etc." "A list or catalogue of items, whether of debts or credits." Theobald v. Stinson, 38 Me. 149, 152.

The word "account," as used in N. Y. Code, § 158, declaring that a party may, when an account is alleged in adverse pleading, demand a bill of particulars, means the entry of debts and credits in a book, or upon paper, of things bought and sold, of services performed, with date, and price or value. Dowdney v. Volkening, 37 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Jones & S.) 313, 318.

An account, under a mechanic's lien statute requiring a just and true account of the demand to be filed and a statement of the lien, is sufficient if it comes within the ordinary meaning of that term, or is one that is a fair and substantial compliance with the law. Turner v. St. John, 78 N. W. 340, 344, 8 N. D. 245.

A will devising testator's accounts construed not to include the testator's bank account. "The term 'accounts,' in the ordinary and popular understanding, with which the testator must be understood to have used it, is that statement of mutual demands in the nature of debt and credit which arises out of contracts and dealings between parties, and the items of which are entered from time to time in the books commonly known as the 'account books,' and entered in a book or on paper, of things bought or sold, of payments, services, etc., including the names of the parties of the transaction, date, and price or value of the thing." Gale v. Drake, 51 N. H. 78, 84.

In Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, providing that an executor or administrator of a deceased partner is entitled to demand an "account" from the surviving partner of the firm's business, the right to demand an account includes the right to have all that the term imports, viz., a detailed statement of the partnership business, which shall afford full information of the condition of the business —the assets, the credits, and indebtedness of the firm as such, and the condition of the account as between the partners themselves. Andrade v. Superior Court, 17 Pac. 531, 532, 75 Cal. 459.

Code, § 2599, declares that on proof of citation by a distributee to an executor or administrator the ordinary may proceed to "make and account," hear evidence on any contested question, and settle finally between the distributee and administrator. Held, that the term "make an account" should be construed as an ascertainment by figures of what is due after expenses to the complaining heir or the heirs complaining, or requiring its payment by the administrator. Cook v. Weaver, 77 Ga. 9, 15.

By "account," as used in Laws 1891, c. 100, § 2, authorizing a reference when the examination of a long account is required, is meant an account in the ordinary acceptation of that term; that is, charges and credits between the parties. Betcher v. Grant County, 68 N. W. 163, 9 S. D. 82; Ewart v. Kass (S. D.) 95 N. W. 915.

Balance or total.

The term "account," used in statutes requiring a claimant of a mechanic's lien to file a just and true account of his demands, means a detailed statement of mutual demands, debit and credit, and hence a statement which does not show the aggregate of the different items or the aggregate of the credits, but simply sets down in a round sum what plaintiffs claim as the balance due them, is insufficient. McWilliams v. Allan, 45 Mo. 573, 574; Graves v. Pierce, 53 Mo. 423, 428. See, also, Morrisette v. Wood, 30 South. 630, 631, 128 Ala. 505.

"An account is a statement of two merchants and others who have dealt together, showing the debits and credits between them, and hence a statement merely showing a balance due one of the parties is not an account, as the term is used in Act 1886, § 171, requiring a statement of the particulars of defendant's indebtedness to be filed with the declaration as condition precedent to the rendition of a default judgment." Thillman v. Shadrick, 16 Atl. 138, 140, 69 Md. 528.

Gen. St. tit. 21, c. 2, provides that fence viewers may recover double the expense of making a fence for a delinquent proprietor, if he shall neglect to pay or take an appeal for 10 days "after an account shall be presented and payment demanded." Held, that a statement of the appraisal of the fence at a gross sum was a sufficient "account," in the absence of any objection or request for a more detailed statement by the proprietor at the time. Hollister v. Hollister, 35 Conn. 241, 248.

The duty of an agent to "account" for expenses which he is to receive in addition to salary is not fulfilled "by reporting to his principal that he has spent a round sum of money in prosecuting his employment, and then swearing to the fact in a suit to recover the sum. His duty to keep and preserve true and correct statements of account is a necessary consequence of his duty to account. An account is a detailed statement. It must be something which will furnish to the person having the right thereto information of a character which will enable him to make some reasonable test of its accuracy and honesty, otherwise the obvious design of requiring it must be virtually fruitless." Fred W. Wolf Co. v. Salem, 33 Ill. App. 614, 617.

Rev. St. c. 90, § 79, declaring that in an action for the recovery of a money demand plaintiff shall state "a just and true account of the debt or demand," is not satisfied by a statement setting forth that plaintiff held a mortgage to secure the payment of the mortgagor's note to him for a specified sum, there being no statement of the amount due. Sprague v. Branch, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 575, 577.

An account for balance due on the price of a horse is such an account as may be proven under Code, § 3780, providing that an account on which an action is brought, coming from another county or state, with the affidavit of plaintiff as to the correctness of the account, and certified as required, is conclusive evidence against the party sought to be charged, unless he shall by oath deny the account. Hunter v. Anderson, 48 Tenn. (1 Heisk.) 1, 2.

As debt or demand.

An account is a mere incorporeal right to a certain sum or to the collection of a debt. It has no tangible entity, and neither the thing itself nor any evidence of it is capable of delivery. It only exists in contemplation of law, and is transferred only by assignment. Preston Nat. Bank v. George T. Smith Purifier Co., 47 N. W. 502, 506, 84 Mich. 364.

The word "accounts," as used in Poor Debtor Act (Rev. St. c. 148, § 29), declaring that whenever from the disclosure it shall appear that he possesses "accounts," if the debtor and creditor cannot agree to apply the same in discharge of the debt, appraisers shall be appointed, etc., shall be construed to apply to such claims as the debtor might have against other persons which were the proper subjects of charge, as book debts, and for the payment of which no written contract or security had been taken. Robinson v. Barker, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 310.

The word "account" has various meanings and shades of meanings, and is used in various ways. Where used alone, without words of limitation, extension, qualification, or explanation, it is almost equivalent to the word "claim" or "demand," but the word is generally so used that it can be known precisely what is meant by it. We have accounts, mutual accounts, book accounts, bank accounts, long accounts, open accounts, running accounts, accounts current, accounts rendered, and accounts stated, each referring to a claim or demand in a different status. And as used in section 84 of the justices' act it does not mean book accounts or mutual accounts, but includes any claim or demand. Southern Kan. Ry. Co. v. Gould, 24 Pac. 352, 44 Kan. 68.

The term "account," when applied to transactions between persons, denotes a claim arising from contract, or from some fiduciary relation in which the parties meet and attempt to settle their pecuniary demands. If the items be agreed upon, it is said to be "stated." If not agreed to, the account is "open." Lexicographers define the word as coming from the Latin "computare," which in the primary sense means to "cleanse," to "prune," and figuratively, to "adjust," "settle," etc. The term carries the idea that it denotes an indebtedness arising from contract or from a trust relation, as bailiff, receiver and guardian, etc. A claim against a county for services as a member of the board of supervisors is not an account. Madison County v. Collier, 30 South. 610, 611, 79 Miss. 220.

Debits or credits alone.

"The word 'account' is a word of wide and varied signification. An account in its most general meaning is a reckoning or a statement of items or details. It is not necessary that there should be * * * items on both sides, for there may be a long account of sales of merchandise, or of materials furnished, embracing only the items of the merchandise delivered or of the work done." Van Orden v. Tilden (N. Y.) 13 Daly, 396, 397.

It is none the less an account that all the items of charge are by one person against another, instead of being a statement of mutual demand of debits and credits, provided the contract arise out of charges express or implied, or from some duty imposed by law. Nelson v. Posey County, 4 N. E. 703, 105 Ind. 287.

Rev. St. § 2864, authorizing a reference on the ground that the trial involves an examination of a long "account," requires that the account shall be in reference to the mutual dealings and transactions between the parties, and does not authorize a reference for the purpose of determining accounts with third persons for the purpose of showing plaintiff's damages. Andrus v. Home Ins. Co., 41 N. W. 956, 957, 73 Wis. 642.

An account may be a statement of debits by one person to another without credits, especially when there are no mutual demands. Morrisette v. Wood, 30 South. 630, 631, 128 Ala. 505.

As the term "account" is used to define one branch of equity jurisdiction, it means a series of transactions constituting mutual demands between both parties. A single matter, therefore, cannot be the subject-matter of an account as thus used, but there must be a series of transactions on one side and payments on the other. No mutual demands exist where on the one hand the claim is for work and labor, and on the other payment and set-offs alone. Smith v. Marks (Va.) 2 Rand. 449, 452.

An executrix's account, where there is an estate, and allowances are expected, must show both debits and expected credits, and therefore a paper filed by an executrix which only showed the money expended by her was not a compliance with an order of the probate court requiring rendition by her of the account. Maxwell v. McCreery, 41 Atl. 498, 499, 57 N. J. Eq. 287.

Manner of keeping.

The word "account" has no inflexible technical meaning, being defined by Webster to mean "a registry of pecuniary transactions; a written or printed statement of business dealings of debts and credits, and also of other things subjected to a reckoning or review." Preston Nat. Bank v. Emerson, 60 N. W. 981, 982, 102 Mich. 462.

The term "account" involves the idea of debit and credit. The particular mode of keeping the account, whether on books or loose scraps of paper, or without any written charges, or whether it is all kept in one shape or in different forms, is unimportant. Millet v. Bradbury, 41 Pac. 865, 866, 109 Cal. 170.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2864, authorizing the court to refer a case requiring examination of an "account," the term "account" means an account in fact kept by one of the parties. Druse v. Horter, 16 N. W. 14, 16, 57 Wis. 644.

Number of items.

The word "account," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 551, providing that it is not necessary for a party to set forth in the pleadings the items of "account" therein alleged, but in such case he must deliver to the adverse party, after a written demand therefor, a copy of the account, is said to apply to almost every claim or contract which consists of several items. Badger v. Gilroy, 47 N. Y. Supp. 669, 671, 21 Misc. Rep. 466 (citing Barkley v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. [N. Y.] 27 Hun, 515).

The term "accounts," as used in the expression that a reference may be ordered where the action involves long accounts, may be properly held to include a schedule or schedules attached to a complaint of a railroad company against the operators of an elevator to recover demurrage, which schedules contained 88 items as to cars, dates, hours of detention of each, and charge for demurrage, aggregating over $1,000, which was attached to the complaint, defendant's duty to dispose of the cars after delivery within a reasonable time being admitted, and the only issue being on the defendant's denial of the detention. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Faist, 58 N. W. 744, 745, 87 Wis. 360.

The stating of a single demand, the amount and validity of which has become unalterably fixed, is not an account within the meaning of Comp. St. 1897, c. 18, § 23, requiring the board of county commissioners to examine and settle all "accounts." Perkins County v. Keith County, 78 N. W. 630, 631, 58 Neb. 323.

The term "account," as used in a statute providing that all actions in which matters of "account" are in controversy may by rule of court be referred to a referee, does not mean every affair that could be called an "account" in common parlance, for that would bring within its compass almost the entire field of commercial transactions. It embraces only that fraction of such transactions as is comprised within the term "account" in its legal signification, which denotes items and not a single fact. First Nat. Bank v. American Saw Co. of New Jersey, 34 Atl. 1, 2, 58 N. J. Law (29 Vroom) 438.

An account, within Code, § 158, declaring that a party may demand a bill of particulars when an account is alleged in an adverse pleading, may be of a single entry or of a great number, and for a short or long period. Dowdney v. Volkening, 37 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Jones & S.) 313, 318.

The word "account," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 531, providing that it is not necessary for a party to set forth in a pleading the items of an account therein alleged, but in that case he must deliver to the adverse party within 10 days after a written demand a copy of the account, is used in its ordinary language, and applies to almost every claim on contract consisting of several items. Barkley v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 515, 516.

As paper containing statement.

The term "account," as used with reference to the use of an account stated, as evidence of the items thereof, means the paper upon which the items composing the account are stated. Nelms v. Steiner, 22 South. 435, 437, 113 Ala. 562.

As written instrument.

See "Written Instrument."

Bank account.

A contract of dissolution of a partnership by which one partner sold to the other all his interest in the store, with all the "accounts due," was construed to include the balance standing to the credit of the firm in the firm's bank account. Burress v. Blair, 61 Mo. 133, 140.

A bequest "of all my accounts" could not be construed to pass a deposit in the savings bank. Gale v. Drake, 51 N. H. 78, 84.

Claims not founded on contract.

Claim distinguished, see "Claim."

The term "account" will be construed not to include an examination of numerous articles of damage between the parties in an action for tort. Dewey v. Field (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 437, 439.

The words "claim or account," used in speaking of statutory requirement that claims or accounts be presented to a city before suit is brought thereon, was said in Harrigan v. City of Brooklyn, 23 N. E. 741, 119 N. Y. 156, affirming Id., 5 N. Y. Supp. 673, 52 Hun, 615, to naturally indicate claims on contracts which can in ordinary course be adjusted by the comptroller or chief financial officers or officer of the city. In Calvin v. City of Brooklyn, 23 N. E. 741, 119 N. Y. 156, affirming Cavan v. Same, 2 N. Y. Supp. 21, 22, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 760, the court, in passing on the same question, stated that the construction adopted was controlled by the fact that the word "account" was used as well as "claim," and it was said that when they are associated together the latter is restricted to the genus of demands to which the former belongs—those on contracts. Pulitzer v. City of New York, 62 N. Y. Supp. 587, 588, 48 App. Div. 6.

The words "account or claim," as used in statute providing that no "account or claim" or contract shall be received by a city for audit or allowance unless it shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the person rendering it, are not enough to cover unliquidated claims for personal injuries in an action ex delicto. Griswold v. City of Ludington, 74 N. W. 663, 667, 116 Mich. 401 (citing Lay v. City of Adrian, 75 Mich. 443, 42 N. W. 959).

Code Civ. Proc. § 531, providing that it is not necessary for a party to set forth in a pleading the items of an "account" therein alleged, but he must deliver a copy thereof to the adverse party on demand, which shall be verified by affidavit, construed not to include part of a claim for damages arising from the breach of a contract. Blake v. Harrigan, 11 N. Y. Supp. 209, 210.

"Accounts or demands," as used in a city charter requiring all accounts or demands against the city to be verified by affidavit before the comptroller before the same shall be acted on or paid, construed only to include claims arising from contract, and not claims sounding in tort. Hill v. City of Fond du Lac, 14 N. W. 25, 26, 56 Wis. 242.

The term "account," as used in Rev. St. c. 13, § 27, cl. 2, authorizing the county board to examine and settle all "accounts" of the receipts and expenses of the county, and to settle all "accounts" chargeable against the county, implies that one is accountable to another for money or other things, either by contract or by virtue of some fiduciary relation of a public or private nature, and does not include a petition to the board of supervisors to have certain taxes paid by the petitioner refunded to him on the ground of illegality in the assessment. Stringham v. Winnebago County Sup'rs, 24 Wis. 594, 599.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1013, providing that in a compulsory reference, where the trial will involve the examination of a long account on either side, there can be no reference unless there is an account between the parties in the ordinary acceptance of the term, although there may be many items of damage. Untermeyer v. Belhauer, 105 N. Y. 121, 11 N. E. 847. In order to justify the application of the statute, the cause of action must arise upon contract. Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Prac. 143. Under these principles an account to recover money lost on stock gambling under the guise of the purchase and sale of shares of stock in oil certificates, though covering many transactions and numerous items, is not an action involving the examination of accounts, so as to justify a compulsory reference. Willard v. Doran & Wright Co., 1 N. Y. Supp. 345, 48 Hun, 402 (citing Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433; Silmsen v. Redfield, 19 Wend. 21).

As merchants' accounts.

In Sayles' Civ. St. art. 2323, providing that verified open accounts shall be prima facie evidence of the existence of the debt, the term "account" applies to transactions between persons in which, by sale on the one side and purchase on the other, the title to personal property is passed from one to another, and the relation of debtor and creditor is thereby created by a general course of dealing, and does not apply to a verified account of a physician for his services. Garwood v. Schlichenmaier, 60 S. W. 573, 574, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 176.

Rents.

A testator bequeathed to a legatee all accounts "which might be owing" to the testator at the time of his death. Held that, while the term "accounts" had no very clearly defined legal meaning, the primary idea conveyed by it is some matter of debt, or a demand in the nature of a debt arising out of a contract, which could not include rents accruing to the testator from real estate, such rents being chattels real, and not accurately described as "accounts" until they have accued and become due. Until then they will be annexed to the real estate, and an incident of the reversion. Watson v. Penn., 8 N. E. 636, 638, 108 Ind. 21, 58 Am. Rep. 26.

Sum due on bond.

Anything may enter into an account. The sum due on a bond of several years' standing on which there have been various payments may be said to rest in account and to be unliquidated. An account is no more than a list or catalogue of items, whether of debts or credits. Rensselaer Glass Factory v. Reid (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 587, 593.

ACCOUNT (Action of).

"Account," sometimes called "account render," was a form of action at common law against a person who, by reason of some fiduciary relation, was bound to render an account to another, but refused to do so. In England, the action early fell into disuse. And, as it is one of the most dilatory and expensive actions known to the law, and the parties are held to the ancient rules of pleading, and no discovery can be obtained, it never was adopted to any great extent in the United States. But the action of account was adopted in several states principally because there were no courts of chancery, in which a bill for an accounting lay. Field v. Brown, 45 N. E. 404, 466, 146 Ind. 293.

The action of account is a writ brought against one who, by means of his office or by some business he has undertaken, or some money he has received for another, is obligated to render an account to him, and refuses so to do. Griffith v. Willing (Pa.) 3 Bin. 317.

An action of account is somewhat peculiar in its proceedings, and in such an action there are two judgments—one that the defendant do account with the plaintiff, the other after the accounting for the balance found due. Travers v. Dyer (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 142.

"Actions of account" are of a civil nature. An action of account at common law cannot be maintained to settle partnership matters between three or more partners having separate and distinct interests, for the reason that no separate judgments can be rendered in such an action. In such case the remedy is in equity. Stevens v. Coburn, 44 Atl. 354, 71 Vt. 261.

ACCOUNT BOOK.

See "Book of Account."

ACCOUNT CLOSED.

An "account closed" is an account to which no further additions can be made on either side, but which still remains open for adjustment and set-off; which distinguishes it from an "account stated." Bass v. Bass, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 187, 193; Volkening v. De Graaf, 81 N. Y. 268, 270.

An account closed is an account ended by a cessation of dealings between the parties or some other cause, but does not constitute an account stated. Mandeville v. Wilson, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 15, 18, 3 L. Ed. 23.

ACCOUNT FOR.

The rule of law to the effect that it is a bailee's duty to restore the property to the bailor or to "account for," means to show some lawful reason why he has parted with the possession other than by a delivery to the bailor, and he so properly accounts where he shows that he has yielded the property to one having a right paramount to the bailor. The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575, 579, 23 L. Ed. 978.

"Accounted for," as used in Rev. St. c. 3, § 70, permitting a creditor not presenting his claim within two years to subject property not "accounted for" to the payment thereof, means that the property in question has been devoted by the executors to the purposes of the proper and due administration of the estate in pursuance of the will of the deceased, where a decedent's property is disposed of by will, and hence, where certain executors affixed an appraised value to an insufficient description which they intended to represent certain land which testator had owned, and subsequently they conveyed the land to the parties entitled to take under the will and reported to the court, they had "accounted for" the land within the meaning of the statute. Auburn State Bank v. Brown, 50 N. E. 144, 172 Ill. 284.

"Account," within the meaning of Laws 1872, c. 688, requiring every person receiving any property of a corporation by means of prohibited acts or deeds to "account" therefor, merely means that such person shall be required to account in a proper action, and does not limit the remedy to a suit in equity for an accounting. McQueen v. New, 61 N. Y. Supp. 464, 466, 45 App. Div. 579.

As pay.

A guardian's bond requiring the guardian to "account for" certain money means that he must pay over such money to the person entitled thereto, and is not satisfied by the act of the guardian in charging himself with such money in his annual settlements. State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 463, 471.

The phrase "account for and pay over" in an officer's bond rendering him liable to account for and pay over moneys do not create two distinct grounds of liability, one to account and the other to pay over, the accounting being merely preliminary to the payment. Town of Franklin Sup'rs v. Kirby, 25 Wis. 498, 502.

A contract providing that defendant, in consideration of having purchased of plaintiff certain shares of stock in a bank, and having received plaintiff's obligation therefor and power of attorney to transfer the same, promised and agreed to "account" to plaintiff "for" one-half the proceeds or avails of a certain mortgage held by the bank on certain real estate, must be construed as importing an obligation to pay plaintiff one-half the proceeds or avails of the mortgage which came to defendants. Cushman v. Richards, 100 Mass. 232, 233.

As be responsible for.

The expression "holden to account for" means not only to "render an account of," but "to be responsible for," and stands in opposition to the right of appropriation for one's own use and benefit. Thomas v. Mahan, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 513, 520.

ACCOUNT OF WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

See "Whom It May Concern."

ACCOUNT RENDER (Action of).

As civil suit, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

The "action of account render" is founded upon contract, and the engagement between partners is that each partner shall account to every other for himself, and not for his copartner. It is a several liability, and no two partners are responsible to another jointly. Each partner contracts with the other for himself alone, and hence where defendants, who were partners of plaintiff in a nursery, removed trees, from a lot in which they have first been planted, during the continuance of the partnership, against the remonstrance of plaintiff, the removal was in law the act of all the partners, for which they were liable to account severally and not jointly, and for which the "action of account render" will not lie against defendants jointly. Portsmouth v. Donaldson, 32 Pa. (8 Casey) 202, 204, 72 Am. Dec. 782.

ACCOUNT RENDERED.

An account of mercantile dealings or financial statement made out and transmitted by the creditor to the debtor, showing a statement of debits and credits, which, not being objected to by the debtor for a reasonable time, is regarded as admitted by the party to be charged as being prima facie correct. Wiggins v. Burkham, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 129, 131, 19 L. Ed. 884; Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 285, 289.

An account is "rendered" when it is presented. Rendering an account and proving an account are separate and distinct transactions under Act Feb. 22, 1875, c. 95, 18 Stat. 333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 648], requiring a marshal to "render" his accounts to the court, and to "prove" them by his own affidavit. The former does not include the latter. Butler v. United States (U. S.) 87 Fed. 655, 668.

An "account rendered" becomes an account stated from the presumed approbation or acquiescence of the parties, unless objection is made thereto within reasonable time. Stebbins v. Niles, 25 Miss. (3 Cushm.) 267, 268.

The phrases "bill for account" and "account rendered" were formerly employed in common-law practice to denote the procedure by which the account was secured, and the frequent inadequacy of the remedy at law or by jury trial gave rise to the equitable remedy of account. Field v. Brown, 45 N. E. 464, 465, 146 Ind. 293.

ACCOUNT SETTLED.

An account "stated" or "settled" is a mere admission that the account is correct. It is not an estoppel. The action is still open to impeachment for errors or mistakes. Its effect is to establish prima facie the accuracy of the items without other proof, and the party seeking to impeach it is bound to show affirmatively the mistake or error alleged. An account stated, which is shown to have been examined by both parties and expressly assented to or assigned by them, would afford stronger evidence of the correctness of the items than if it merely appeared that it had been delivered to the party or sent by mail and accepted for a sufficient length of time to entitle it to be considered an account stated. So, too, an account settled—that is, when the balance it exhibits has been paid or adjusted between the parties—is stronger evidence and requires more proof to overcome it than a mere account stated; but the party is never precluded from giving evidence to impeach the action, unless the case is brought within the principles of an estoppel in pais, or of an obligatory agreement between the parties, as, for instance, where upon a settlement mutual compromises are made. First Nat. Bank v. Honeyman, 42 N. W. 771, 772, 6 Dak. 275 (citing Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 292).

Where the parties have reckoned and settled their back accounts correctly and mutually agreed on the balance due, and the books are balanced accordingly, it is a settled account. Gibson v. Sumner, 6 Vt. 163, 164.

An account settled is stronger evidence than an account stated that the party with whom it is settled was satisfied with the account, and requires more proof to overcome it. Chicago M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Clark (U. S.) 92 Fed. 968, 986, 35 C. C. A. 120.

As between a bank and a depositor, the entry of debts in the depositor's passbook and striking a balance thereon constitute a statement of the account, and the delivery of the book to the depositor and his retention of it without objection make it a stated account; and, where the book has been retained many months without objection, and the precise balance it exhibits has been drawn out, these facts afford clear evidence of a "settled" as well as a "stated" account, which establishes prima facie the accuracy of the items. Clark v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 239.

ACCOUNT STATED.

An account stated is an agreement between persons, who have had previous transactions, fixing the amount due in respect to such transactions, and promising payment. Zacarino v. Pallotti, 49 Conn. 86, 88 (citing Chit. Cont. p. 562); Gerding v. Funk, 64 N. Y. Supp. 423, 428, 48 App. Div. 603; Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 17 N. Y. Supp. 587, 588; McDowell v. North, 55 N. E. 789, 791, 24 Ind. App. 435.

An "account stated" exists only when the accounts of both parties have been examined and the balance found admitted as the true amount between the parties remains unpaid. Stebbins v. Niles, 25 Miss. (3 Cushm.) 267, 268.

Stated or liquidated accounts are such as have been examined and adjusted by the parties and a balance due from one of them has been ascertained and agreed on as correct. McLellan v. Crofton, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 307, 337.

A settlement of an account between parties by which a balance is struck in favor of one of them. James v. Fellowes & Co., 20 La. Ann. 116, 118.

An account stated is an agreement between both parties to an account that all the articles thereof are true and the balances just. Fox v. Fisk, 7 Miss. (6 How.) 328, 348; Davis v. Tiernan, 3 Miss. (2 How.) 786; Claire v. Claire, 4 N. W. 411, 412, 10 Neb. 54.

A stated account is an agreement, after an examination of the accounts between the parties, that the items are true and the balance correct; and such an account, which shows itself satisfied, is evidence of payment. Anding v. Levy, 57 Miss. 51, 62, 34 Am. Rep. 435.

To constitute an account stated, two things are necessary: First, that there be a mutual examination of the claims of each other by the parties, and, second, that there be a mutual agreement between them as to the correctness of the allowance and disallowance of their respective claims, and of the balance as it is struck on the final adjustment of the whole account and demands on both sides. The minds of the parties must meet on the allowance of each item or claim allowed, and on a disallowance of each item or claim rejected. They must mutually concur on the final adjustment, and nothing short of this in substance will fix and adjust their respective demands as an account stated. Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 285, 288; Williams v. Glenny, 16 N. Y. 389, 391; Hatch v. Von Taube, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1031, 1032, 31 Misc. Rep. 30; Reinhardt v. Hines, 51 Miss. 344, 346; Clark v. Marbourg, 6 Pac. 548, 551, 33 Kan. 471.

To make an account stated there must be a mutual agreement between the parties as to the allowance or disallowance of their respective claims, and, to establish such an account so as to preclude a party from impeaching it, he must assent to the account as rendered, either expressly, or by implication by reason of his failure to object within a reasonable time after presentation. Stenton v. Jerome, 54 N. Y. 480.

It is essential to an account stated that the party to be charged should either expressly or by implication admit the correctness of the account as a claim against him. An account presented by plaintiff against the estate of a decedent showed that the principal item in it originated in a contract between plaintiff and one P. There was evidence that when the account was presented to decedent he showed surprise at the amount of it, said that P. ought to have paid it, and suggested a counterclaim, but afterwards said that he would pay it and have no trouble about it. Held insufficient to show an account stated between plaintiff and decedent. Stephens v. Ayers, 57 Hun, 51, 53, 10 N. Y. Supp. 502.

An account stated arose where plaintiff went over the account in the defendant's presence and found a certain sum due to the plaintiff, which result was not objected to by the defendant. Kock v. Bonitz (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 117.

It must appear that at the time of the accounting there existed some demand between the parties respecting which the account was stated, and that a balance was then struck and agreed on, and that the defendant expressly admitted that a certain sum was then due from him as a debt. Zacarino v. Pallotti, 49 Conn. 36, 38 (citing 2 Greenl. Ev. § 120).

An account stated is an account rendered by the creditor which has been assented to by the debtor as correct, either expressly, or by implication of law from failure to object thereto. Holmes v. Page, 23 Pac. 961, 962, 19 Or. 232; Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 170, 174, 62 Am. Dec. 81.

To make an "account stated," it is sufficient that the account has been examined and assented to as correct by both parties. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 6 Ohio N. P. 235, 245.

The expression "account stated" has in law a well-understood meaning, and an allegation in a complaint that the defendant and plaintiff had a settlement, and defendant made and rendered to plaintiff an account stated of the balance of net profits due plaintiff, and which said defendant then and there agreed to pay, sufficiently alleges the existence of the account stated. Hale v. Hale, 86 N. W. 650, 651, 14 S. D. 644.

An "account stated" is where the account is closed by the assent to its correctness by the party charged, and where there are mutual dealings between the parties involving items of debit and credit on each side or debts on one side and credits on the other, and an agreement as to the balance due on the account is made, the account becomes a stated account, and the term "stated account" is used in opposition to "open account." McCamant v. Batsell, 59 Tex. 363, 369.

A letter containing a statement of an amount due plaintiff for withdrawing a suit and for help in various ways which he has rendered or may render, and providing that the agreement is subject to the ratification of other persons, is not strictly an account stated, because it refers to future services and is subject to ratification. Gerding v. Funk, 64 N. Y. Supp. 423, 428, 48 App. Div. 603.

When two persons, having had monetary transactions together, close the account by agreeing to the balance appearing to be due from one of them, this is called an "account stated." It is of importance from the fact that it operates as an admission of liability by the person against whom the balance appears; or, in the language of the common law, "the law implies that he against whom the balance appears has engaged to pay it to the other, and on this implied promise or admission an action may be brought. But if one of the parties does not agree to the balance, an action upon an account stated cannot be maintained." To make an account stated there must be a mutual agreement between the parties as to the allowance of their respective claims, and to establish such an account there must be proof of assent to the account as rendered. Where a merchant renders a statement of goods sold which is assented to by the debtor, and payments are made on account at different times thereafter, he cannot recover the balance due in an action on a stated account without proof that a new account showing the balance claimed has been rendered and assented to. Loventhal v. Morris, 15 South. 672, 673, 103 Ala. 332.

An "account stated" grows out of commercial transactions, being the rendition of a running account by one party to the other, and his acceptance or acquiescence in its accuracy or amount. It is therefore, in legal effect, but the liquidation of fractional items into a single amount by the agreement of parties, express or implied. In the official report of an executive officer there is no single element of an account stated. Nutt v. United States (U. S.) 23 Ct. Cl. 68, 73.

Acquiescence or silence as implying.

In proving an account stated, it is not necessary to show an express examination of the respective demands or claims of the parties or an express agreement to the final adjustment. All this may be implied from circumstances. If the account be rendered by one party, and the other party on examining it makes no objection, an inference might legitimately be drawn that he was satisfied with it as rendered; so, also, if the account should be made out by one party and transmitted to the other party by mail, and the latter should omit to communicate objections to the party rendering the account within a reasonable time, an inference might be drawn that he was satisfied with it. Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 285, 288; Williams v. Glenney, 16 N. Y. 389, 391; Reinhardt v. Hines, 51 Miss. 344, 346; Clark v. Marbourg, 6 Pac. 548, 551, 33 Kan. 471.

An account stated is where an account is made up and rendered and examined by the party receiving it and admitted by him to be correct, and, if the party receiving it keeps it without objecting to its correctness within a reasonable time, his silence will be construed into an acquiescence in the justness of the account, and he will be bound by it as if it were a stated account. Phillips v. Belden (N. Y.) 2 Edw. Ch. 1, 23; Freeland v. Heron, 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 147, 3 L. Ed. 297; Langdon v. Roane's Adm'r, 6 Ala. 518, 527, 41 Am. Dec. 60-62; Standard Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 1 Sup. Ct. 178, 185, 107 U. S. 325, 27 L. Ed. 319.

The assent to an "account stated" may be express, or implied from circumstances. As a general rule, where an account showing a balance is duly rendered, the one to whom it is rendered is bound within a reasonable time to examine it, and object if he dispute its correctness. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 6 Ohio N. P. 235, 245.

An "account stated" is an admission of the correctness of an account. The weight of this kind of admission depends upon circumstances. If both parties personally examine an account and assent to its correctness, it furnishes very clear evidence of the fact. If an account is delivered to a party, and he makes no objection to it for a period sufficient to enable him to do so, it may be inferred that he assented to its correctness, and it would prima facie prove the account. Quincey v. White, 63 N. Y. 370, 377.

If an account has been transmitted from one person to another, and no objections made after several opportunities of writing have occurred, it is treated as an acquiescence of the correctness of the account transmitted, and therefore it is deemed a stated account. Thus, in Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 427, it is said, if an account be presented to the debtor and he does not object to it within a reasonable time, his acquiescence will be taken as an admission that the account is truly stated; hence, where it appears that an account against defendant has been presented and examined by him, and no objections made thereto for several months, it is an account stated. Hendy v. March, 17 Pac. 702, 75 Cal. 566.

An account stated is an account which has been examined and assented to as correct by both parties. The assent may be either express or implied. It is not necessary, in order to make an account stated, that it should be signed by the parties. It is sufficient that it is examined and accepted by them. "It is said to be a general rule that, when an account is made up and rendered, he who receives it is bound to examine it or procure some one to examine it for him." If he admits it to be correct it becomes an "account stated," and is binding on both parties, the balance being the debt which may be sued for and recovered by law on the basis of an insinual computassent; so if, instead of an express admission of the correctness of the account, the party receiving it keeps the same and makes no objection within a reasonable time, his silence will be construed into an acquiescence in its justness, and he will be bound as if it were a "stated account." In fact, the rule as laid down by authorities would seem to be that if one does not object to a stated account, which has been furnished him, within a reasonable time, he shall be bound by it, unless he can show its incorrectness. Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 170, 174, 62 Am. Dec. 81.

That one party had sent to another an account current in which he admitted a balance against himself, and that the other had made a draft at sight on the party rendering the account for the amount to be admitted to be due, directing the payment to be charged to the drawer's account, did not establish an account stated between the parties, there being no evidence of acquiescence in the correctness of the account so entered, as to preclude the one receiving it from disputing it, or preventing him from suing for the amount claimed to be due. Lockwood v. Thorne (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 487, 490.

A stated account is an agreement between both parties that all the items are true, but this agreement may be implied from circumstances, as where merchants reside in different states and one sends an account to the other, who makes no objection to it within a reasonable time. Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. 371, 372, 74 Cal. 60.

An account stated is an admission that the amount is correct, and, if the party to whom it is rendered omits to communicate objections to the other party within a reasonable time, the inference may be drawn that he was satisfied with it; but there is no arbitrary rule of law which renders the omission to object in a given time equivalent to an actual agreement or a consent to the correctness of the account. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Clark (U. S.) 92 Fed. 968, 986, 35 C. C. A. 120; Burrill v. Crossman (U. S.) 91 Fed. 543, 544, 33 C. C. A. 663.

When the passbook of a depositor is written up and delivered to him, or the bank renders an itemized statement of his account, and he retains the same without objecting thereto within a reasonable time, it constitutes an "account stated." Nodine v. First Nat. Bank, 68 Pac. 1109, 1111, 41 Or. 386; Clark v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 239.

Merely rendering an account does not make it an account stated, but an account rendered to the debtor exhibiting in detail the demand of the creditor, unless objected to within a reasonable time, becomes an account stated. Truman v. Owens, 21 Pac. 665, 667, 17 Or. 523.

An account made by one of the parties against the other is not an account stated between the parties, and the mere retention by the plaintiff of such an account without objection is but slight evidence of its correctness in charging him with money paid for his account by defendant, or with a balance of money due to the defendant by another. Spangler v. Stringer, 22 Pa. (10 Harris) 454.

Balance.

Mere presentment of an itemized account for a balance due, and a payment on account, does not constitute an account stated. Hatch v. Von Taube, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1031, 1032, 31 Misc. Rep. 30.

A balance struck in a broker's passbook is an "account stated." Marye v. Strouse (U. S.) 5 Fed. 483, 489.

Cessation of dealings as creating.

An account stated does not include an account closed by the cessation of dealings between the parties. Mandeville v. Wilson, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 15, 18, 3 L. Ed. 23; Whitlsey v. Spofford, 47 Tex. 13, 17.

Death closes accounts in one sense; that is, there can be no further additions to them on either side, but they remain open for adjustment and set-off, and therefore do not become accounts stated by such death. Bass v. Bass, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 187, 193.

Conclusiveness.

An "account stated" is a mere admission that it is correct. It is not an estoppel.

Its effect is simply to establish prima facie accuracy of items without other proof, and the party seizing, to impeach it, is bound to show affirmatively the mistake or error alleged. Sedgwick v. Macy, 49 N. Y. Supp. 154, 156, 24 App. Div. 1; Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 17 N. Y. Supp. 587, 588; First Nat. Bank of Grand Haven v. Honeyman, 42 N. W. 771, 772, 6 Dak. 275; Green v. Thornton, 30 Pac. 965, 966, 96 Cal. 67.

An "account stated" is conclusive on the parties, unless impeached for fraud or mistake. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 6 Ohio N. P. 235, 245.

An "account stated or settled" is an admission that the amount is correct. It is not an estoppel. The act is still open to impeachment for mistakes or errors. Its effect is to establish prima facie the accuracy of the items without other proof, and the party seeking to impeach it is bound to show affirmatively the mistake or error alleged. Donald v. Gardner, 60 N. Y. Supp. 668, 671, 44 App. Div. 235 (citing Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 285).

An account stated which is shown to have been examined by both parties and expressly assented to or assigned by them would afford stronger evidence of the correctness of the items than if it merely appeared that it had been delivered to the party or sent by mail and accepted for a sufficient length of time to entitle it to be considered an account stated. The party is never precluded from giving evidence to impeach the action unless the case is brought within the principles of an estoppel in pais or of an obligatory agreement between the parties, as, for instance, where upon a settlement mutual compromises are made. First Nat. Bank v. Honeyman, 42 N. W. 771, 772, 6 Dak. 275 (citing Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 292).

The original account becomes the consideration for the agreement, and it is not necessary to prove the items of such account, nor can they be inquired into or surcharged except for some fraud, error, or mistake, and such grounds must be according to the want of authority set forth in the pleading. Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. 371, 372, 74 Cal. 60.

Though an account rendered becomes an account stated, exempting the creditor from proving the items, in an action of the account on the debtor's failure to object within a reasonable time that fact does not preclude the debtor from setting up fraud as a defense to the action on such account, whether he obtains knowledge of the fraud at the time the account was rendered or did not acquire such knowledge until some time after the account became the "account stated." Baxter v. Lockett, 6 Pac. 429, 431, 2 Wash. T. 228.

An "account stated" is an admission made by one party to another that the accounts between them, consisting of the various items which enter into that account, are as therein stated; and from the necessities of the law merchant it has become a part of the law that after a lapse of time such an account and such an admission shall be conclusive between the parties, unless impeached because of fraud or mistake in reference to some of the items contained in the account; and by the statute of limitations such an admission becomes absolute between the parties after the lapse of 10 years unless tainted by fraud, and even then it becomes conclusive unless attacked within a certain period after the discovery of the fraud. Kingsley v. Melcher, 10 N. Y. Supp. 63, 65, 56 Hun, 547; Kingsley v. Melcher, 10 N. Y. Supp. 63, 65, 56 Hun, 547.

Mutual demands required.

An "account stated" may be defined in general terms to be where an account is rendered and a debt in a specified sum is acknowledged as due from one party to another, or where parties who have had previous transactions agree upon a definite balance as due. It is not essential that there should be cross or mutual demands, but when there are mutual demands there must be an adjustment, a balance struck, and an assent to its correctness. Ware v. Manning, 5 South. 682, 684, 86 Ala. 238.

An "account stated," in its proper meaning, implies a mutual account, and striking the balance acknowledged on one side and accepted by the other. Schmidt's Ex'rs v. Leiby (S. C.) 11 Rich. Eq. 329, 341 (citing Story, Eq. Pl. § 798).

An account stated does not necessarily consist of an account containing charges on each side besides money, and may consist of and be applied to a single bill of goods sent by the seller to the buyer, and retained by him without judgment. Cobb v. Arundell, 26 Wis. 553, 559.

An "account stated" is defined as an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties. It is said that it must appear that at the time of the accounting certain claims existed of and concerning which an account was stated, that a balance was then struck and agreed upon, and that defendant expressly admitted that a certain sum was then due from him as a debt. Hence it follows that an account cannot be stated with reference to a debt payable on a contingency, but that it is not essential that there should be cross or reciprocal demands between the parties, or that the defendant's acknowledgment that a certain sum was due from him to the plaintiff should relate to more than a single debt or transaction. An account stated is none the less such because the debtor agrees to pay the amount which he concedes to be due at a future day after he has done other acts. Baird v. Crank, 33 Pac. 63, 85, 98 Cal. 293.

New promise or obligation implied.

The term "stated account" is but an expression to convey the idea of a contract having an account for its consideration, and is no more an account than is a promissory note or contract having a like consideration for its support. Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. 371, 372, 74 Cal. 60.

An "account stated" is the mutual adjusting, settling, and balancing of accounts between the parties thereto, in which the law implies a promise to pay the balance found due. Watkins v. Ford, 37 N. W. 300, 69 Mich. 357.

Where the parties to an account have examined it and have expressly agreed on a certain sum of money as the balance justly due from one to the other, such an account thereby becomes an "account stated," and an action thereon is not founded on the original item, but on the balance ascertained by the mutual accounting of the parties. Benites v. Bicknell, 3 Pac. 206, 208, 3 Utah, 369.

"An account stated is an account balanced and rendered with an assent to the balance, express or implied, so that the demand is essentially the same as if a promissory note had been given for the balance." Volkening v. De Graaf, 81 N. Y. 268, 270; Hatch v. Von Taube, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1031, 1032, 31 Misc. Rep. 30; Bass v. Bass, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 187, 193.

"An account stated is an acknowledgment of the existing condition of liability between the parties. From it the law implies a promise to pay whatever balance is thus acknowledged to be due. It thereby becomes a new and independent cause of action, so far as that a recovery may be had upon it without setting forth or proving the separate items of liability from which the balance results." Chace v. Trafford, 116 Mass. 529, 532, 17 Am. Rep. 171.

An "account stated" is an agreement between persons who have had previous transactions, fixing the amount due in respect to such transactions, as distinguished from a mere admission or acknowledgment. It is a new cause of action. It is not a contract on a new consideration, and does not create an estoppel, but establishes prima facie the accuracy of the items charged without further proof. McKinster v. Hitchcock, 28 N. W. 705, 706, 19 Neb. 100.

An "account stated" is an agreement, express or implied, wherein parties who have had previous transactions with each other fix and determine the amounts due in respect to such transactions, and when made becomes a new agreement, and takes the place of the obligations resting upon either party by reason of the prior account. Harrison v. Henderson (Kan.) 72 Pac. 878, 879.

An account stated is an agreement between parties who have had previous transactions of a monetary character that all the items of the account representing such transactions, and the balance struck, are correct, together with a promise, express or implied, for the payment of such balance. An account stated is in the nature of a new promise or undertaking, and raises a new cause of action between the parties. An account for which a note has been given for the amount due becomes an account stated. Morse v. Minton, 70 N. W. 691, 692, 101 Iowa, 603.

"An account stated alters the nature of the original indebtedness, and is itself in the nature of a new bond or undertaking. An action upon an account stated is not founded upon the original item, but upon the balance ascertained by the consent of the parties." Hendy v. March, 17 Pac. 702, 75 Cal. 566 (citing Foster v. Allanson [Eng.] 2 Term R. 479; Holmes v. De Camp [N. Y.] 1 Johns. 34, 36, 3 Am. Dec. 296; Carey v. Philadelphia & C. Petroleum Co., 33 Cal. 694, 697).

An account rendered becomes an account stated unless objected to within a reasonable time, and after the lapse of that time cannot be impeached except for fraud or mistake. Standard Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 1 Sup. Ct. 178, 185, 107 U. S. 325, 27 L. Ed. 319.

An "account stated" is one where an account is rendered by one party to another, which is received by such other, who admits the correctness of the items, and claims the balance or offers to pay it, as it may be in his favor or against him; but the mere rendering an account does not make it a stated one. To constitute a "stated account" it is not important that the account was not made out as between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff having received it, made no complaint as to the items or the balance, but on the contrary claimed such balance, for he thereby adopted it, and by his own act treated it as a stated account, and the statute of limitations began to run on such account when the balance was demanded. Toland v. Sprague, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 300, 335, 9 L. Ed. 1093.

An account stated is an agreement between parties to an account that all the items thereof are correct. The simple rendering of an account between the parties and agreeing upon the amount due are sufficient facts on which to maintain an action. Claire v. Claire, 10 Neb. 54, 57, 4 N. W. 411, 412. Where parties to a written contract, requiring installments to be paid at various times and the payment of interest on installments not so paid, had an attorney calculate the amount of principal and interest due on such contract, and agreed that the amount arrived at was correct, there was an account stated. Krueger v. Dodge, 87 N. W. 965, 967, 15 S. D. 159.

Signature not required.

It is not necessary that an account should be signed by the parties to make it a stated account; it is enough that it has been examined and accepted by the parties; and such acceptance need not be express, but may be implied from the circumstances. Bruen v. Hone (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 586, 594; Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 585, 607.

ACCOUNTABILITY.

A provision in a contract by which defendant assumed control of plaintiff's business declared that defendant should act as plaintiff's representative "without accountability" of the matter in the manner of conducting the same, or for any errors of judgment in the conduct thereof. Held, that the words "without accountability," as they stood alone, would not justify defendant's claim of nonliability for losses caused by his neglect of plaintiff's interest and the mode of conducting the business; also could not be construed to mean a neglect of it, either partial or entire; and hence the term only covered losses from errors of judgment made in good faith.—Geisse v. Franklin, 13 Atl. 148, 152, 56 Conn. 83.

ACCOUNTABLE.

See "Eventually Accountable."

Dig. 1844, c. 138, requires that guardians appointed by will, before proceeding to act, shall give bond with sufficient sureties, and be "accountable in the same manner as if appointed by the court." Held, that the word "accountable" as there used, making testamentary guardians subject to the jurisdiction of the probate court, gave ample jurisdiction to such court to remove such officers of their offices to the same extent as guardians appointed by the court. McPhillips v. McPhillips, 9 R. I. 536, 537.

"Accountable," when written on the back of a note after an indorser's name, means "subject to pay," "responsible," or "liable for," and that the indorser would make good the amount of the note when it became due and payable, without subjecting the payee to a previous demand on the maker. Furber v. Caverly, 42 N. H. 74, 76.

ACCOUNTABLE RECEIPT.

An accountable receipt is a receipt for money to be accounted for; for property in store, or ship receipt, etc. People v. Bradley (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 245, 247.

A writing which does not acknowledge that anything has been received which is to be accounted for is not an accountable receipt. Commonwealth v. Lawless, 101 Mass. 32.

An "accountable receipt," within Gen. St. 1878, c. 69, § 1, authorizing the punishment of forgery thereof, is a written acknowledgment of the receipt by the maker of it of money or other personal property, coupled with a promise or obligation to account for or pay to some person the whole or some part thereof. State v. Riebe, 7 N. W. 262, 263, 27 Minn. 315.

ACCOUNTING.

An "accounting" means a statement of an acknowledgment of an existing debt from which a promise to pay is implied sufficient to maintain an action. It does not imply the creation of any new debt. Buxton v. Edwards, 134 Mass. 567, 578.

"The accounting to which a guardian may be subjected by proceedings before a surrogate is not only a statement of his receipts and disbursements with the amount of the trust fund still remaining in his hands, but it is, in addition to such account stated, a rendering and giving up to the party entitled the moneys and property in respect to which the accounting party is liable. The payment is a part of the accounting." Pyatt v. Pyatt, 18 Atl. 1048, 1050, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 285.

An act directing the proceedings in causes in chancery involving an accounting does not extend to a suit to foreclose a mortgage, in which a reference to compute the amount due becomes needful, but only to suits where the bill is filed for an accounting. People v. Randall, 37 Mich. 473.

ACCOUNTING OFFICER.

The term "accounting officer," as used in Rev. St. § 7075, which provides that whoever knowingly presents a false and fraudulent claim to the auditor or other accounting officer of any municipal corporation for the purpose of procuring the allowance of the same is guilty of a crime, construed to mean "such an officer as may lawfully pass upon or allow a claim or account against a municipal corporation, upon the authority of which allowance the comptroller may issue his warrant upon the treasury." Hauck v. State, 14 N. E. 92, 45 Ohio St. 439.

ACCRETION.

Alluvial accretions, see "Alluvial."

To land.

Accretion is the right of one owning land on the border of a stream to the additions imperceptibly made to his land by the action of the water. Jefferies v. East Omaha Land Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 518, 521, 134 U. S. 178, 33 L. Ed. 872.

Accretion "is the increase of real estate by the addition of portions of soil by gradual deposit, through the operation of natural causes, to that already in the possession of the owner." St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Ramsey, 13 S. W. 931, 933, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, 22 Am. St. Rep. 195; Benne v. Miller, 50 S. W. 824, 149 Mo. 228.

Accretion is the imperceptible accumulation of land by natural causes, and the owner of the property to which the addition is made becomes the owner of such ground, as, where land is bounded by a stream of water which changes its course gradually by alluvial formation, the owner of the land still holds the same boundary, including the accumulated soil. Inhabitants of New Orleans v. United States, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 662, 717, 9 L. Ed. 573.

"It seems to be a settled doctrine of common law that an accretion to land is an imperceptible increase thereto on the bank of a river by alluvial formations occasioned by the washing up of sand or earth, or by dereliction, as when the river shrinks back below the usual water mark, and when this is done it should be so gradual that no one can judge how much is added each moment of time; and, when the formation of land is thus imperceptibly made at the shore of a stream by the force of water, it belongs to the owner of the land immediately behind it, in accordance with the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex." Lammars v. Nissen, 4 Neb. 245, 250.

Accretion is an increase by imperceptible degrees. "The lord of the manor claims when there is a gradual accession to land adjacent." A test of what is gradual, as distinguished from what is sudden, seems to be that, though witnesses are able to perceive from time to time that the land has encroached on the sea line, it is enough if it was done so that they could not perceive the progress at the time it was made. It is said in Emans v. Turnbull (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 313, 314, 3 Am. Dec. 427, that if the marine increase be by small and almost imperceptible degrees it goes to the owner of land, but if it be sudden and considerable it belongs to the sovereign. Mulry v. Norton, 3 N. E. 581, 583, 100 N. Y. 424, 53 Am. Rep. 206.

"Accretion" signifies an addition of land to a shore line so gradually and imperceptibly that the amount added in each moment of time cannot be perceived, and excludes the idea of the sudden disruption of ground from one man's land to another, which may be followed and identified. The length of time during which the formation takes place is, however, not material, if the increment resulting is such as to be beyond the power of identification. Coulthard v. Stevens, 50 N. W. 983, 984, 84 Iowa, 241, 35 Am. St. Rep. 304.

"Accretion" is the changing of the banks of a stream by a gradual process, and when such stream is a boundary the boundary line still remains the stream, although during the years by such accretion the actual area of the possession of the owner of the land bordering thereon may vary. "Accretion," no matter to which side it adds ground, leaves the boundary the center of the channel. Nebraska v. Iowa, 12 Sup. Ct. 396, 397, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. Ed. 186.

"An accretion becomes a part of the land to which it is built, and follows whatever title covers the mainland, whether it be title by deed or title by possession. In its nature it is not susceptible, during its forming, of that kind of possession which distinguishes the occupation of dry land. But it attached to the dry land even while it is under water, and belongs to the owner of the land, and is in the actual possession of him who holds the actual possession of the mainland. If the mainland is in fact unoccupied, it is in the constructive possession of the owner of the true title, and that gives constructive possession of the forming accretion. But if the mainland is held in adverse possession to the true owner, he is not in constructive possession of the accretion; and, since the accretion in its formative state is not susceptible of actual occupancy in the sense of a pedis possessio, the indicia of the actual possession of him who held on the mainland are extended over the forming accretion, and bring it within his actual possession." Ewing v. Burnet, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 41, 53, 9 L. Ed. 624; Bellefontaine Imp. Co. v. Niedringhaus, 55 N. E. 184, 186, 181 Ill. 426, 72 Am. St. Rep. 269.

"Accretion," as used in 1 Code, art. 54, providing that the proprietor of land bounding on any of the navigable waters of this state shall be entitled to all "accretions" to said land, does not include new land formed by the waters of a stream until such land emerges and becomes visible. Hess v. Muir, 5 Atl. 540, 541, 65 Md. 586.

Accretion is soil which is gradually deposited in the water opposite upland, whereby the water line is carried further out into the ocean or other public water. Such addition belongs to the upland owner, so that he will not be shut off from the water and thus converted into an inland rather than a littoral owner. Steers v. City of Brooklyn, 4 N. E. 7, 8, 101 N. Y. 51.

The reasons usually given for the rule that a riparian owner is entitled to "accretions" in front of his land are, either that it falls within the maxim, "De minimis lex non curat," or that, because the riparian owner is liable to lose soil by the action or encroachment of the water, he should also have the benefit of any land gained by the same action. But it seems to us that the rule rests upon a much broader principle and has a much more important purpose in view, viz., to preserve the fundamental riparian right on which all others depend, and which often constitute the principal value of the land—of access to the water. The incalculable mischiefs that would follow if a riparian owner is liable to be cut off from access to the water, and another owner sandwiched in between him and it, whenever the water line had been changed by accretions or relictions, are self-evident, and have been frequently animadverted on by the courts. These considerations certainly apply to riparian ownership on lakes as well as on streams. Lamprey v. Metcalf, 53 N. W. 1139, 1142, 52 Minn. 181, 18 L. R. A. 670, 38 Am. St. Rep. 541.

"Accretion is an increase of real estate by the addition of portions of soil by gradual deposition through the operation of natural causes," and differs from alluvion in that the latter term is applied to the deposit itself, while accretion rather denotes the process by which it is deposited. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Ramsey, 13 S. W. 931, 933, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, 22 Am. St. Rep. 195.

A meteor falling on real estate construed to be an accretion, and to belong to the owner of the land. Maas v. Amana Soc. (N. Y.) 16 Alb. Law J. 76.

In law of successions.

The right of "accretion" is the right to unite or aggregate with his portion the portion of him who refuses it and cannot acquire it, or the right which the coheirs or co-legatees have over those portions which remain vacant by reason of renunciation, or by reason that some of them have not the capacity to take. The right of accretion takes place among legitimate heirs, i. e., among the heirs called to succession by law by reason of relationship in the collateral as in the direct line, so that the portion which remains vacant is added to the mass of inherited property, and is divided with it. And, further, it is understood that there is a failure of one of the coheirs or co-legatees if he is not living at the time the will is made; if he rejects the inheritance or legacy; if he dies before the testator; if he omits to comply with the condition; or becomes incapable in any other way. Escrive's Dictionary. Emerie v. Alvarado, 2 Pac. 418, 440, 64 Cal. 529.

The right of accretion, as used in the civil law, "is based upon the theory that the title to the thing bequeathed is conveyed in its entirety to each and every one of the legatees, and hence that, when one or more of these legatees happen to die before the legacy vests, this fact leaves the title intact with each of the survivors in its entirety, but with simply fewer persons to share it." Succession of Hunter, 12 South. 312, 313, 45 La. Ann. 262.

ACCRUE.

Webster defines the word "accrue" as (1) "to increase; to augment." (2) To come to by way of increase; to arise or spring as a growth or result; to be added as increase, profit, or damage, especially as the produce of money lent." "Interest accrues to principal." Anderson v. Richards' Ex'rs, 37 S. W. 62, 99 Ky. 661.

"Accrue weekly," as used in the by-laws of a mutual benefit insurance association, providing that the dues of members shall "accrue weekly," means that the dues are to be established or measured weekly, and does not mean payable weekly. Strasser v. Staats, 13 N. Y. Supp. 167, 168, 59 Hun, 143.

In a statute providing that the executor of a tenant for life who leases real estate so held, and dies on or before the day on which the rent is payable, may recover the proportion of rent which had "accrued" at the time of his death, the word "accrued" must be construed to mean an apportionment of the rent between the executor and reversioner pro rata as to time, because, if accrued is held to mean "due," then the statute is deprived of all vitality. Gudgel v. Southerland, 90 N. W. 623, 624, 117 Iowa, 304.

"Accrued claims," as used in St. 1890, c. 421, § 14, providing that a receiver of an assessment insurance company shall use its emergency fund in the payment of "accrued claims," means claims which have accrued through the death of the persons insured. Knowlton v. Massachusetts Ben. Life Ass'n, 50 N. E. 520, 171 Mass. 193.

As become absolute or vested.

The word "accrued" as used in the wills act, § 79, repealing all prior laws on the subject, saving all rights that had "accrued" under them, was equivalent in meaning to the word "vested," and implied that something had been imparted to or conferred on a third person over which he might have the immediate control by possession, or the present right to future possession, of which he cannot be deprived without his assent. It must be a right he cannot legally assert independent of any future condition of things as well as any subsequent change of the existing law. Hartshorne v. Ross, 13 Ohio Dec. 10, 14, 2 Disn. 15.

One meaning of the word "accrue" is to vest, and a claim accrues to a party when it ceases to be the property of another and becomes the property of such party. Napa State Hospital v. Yuba County, 71 Pac. 450, 451, 138 Cal. 378.

As arise or become enforceable.

A cause of action accrues from the time the right to sue for the breach attaches. Amy v. Dubuque, 98 U. S. 470, 476, 25 L. Ed. 228.

One of the definitions of "accrue" in the Century Dictionary is "arise in due course," and another is "in law, to become a present and enforceable demand." A cause of action may properly be said to accrue when the liability arises so far as to become enforceable. McGuigan v. Rolfe, 80 Ill. App. 256, 259.

Applied to a cause of action, the term "to accrue" means to arrive; to commence; to come into existence; to become a present enforceable demand. Eising v. Andrews, 33 Atl. 585, 586, 66 Conn. 58, 50 Am. St. Rep. 75.

It is held that a right of action for a personal injury accrues upon the infliction of the injury. Fowlkes v. Nashville & D. R. Co., 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 829, 830.

Where a right of action is given for causing the death of a person in favor of his representative, such action cannot accrue until the appointment of the representative, so as to set in motion the statute of limitation. Barnes v. City of Brooklyn, 48 N. Y. Supp. 36, 37, 22 App. Div. 520.

As used in R. S. 1855, p. 647, providing that an action for a wrongful death must be commenced within one year after the cause of action "accrued," the term means the time when the defendant's liability became perfect and complete, and whenever the defendant had done the act which made him liable in damages, and there was a person in being to whom the damages ought to be paid and who might sue for and recover the same, the cause of action had accrued. Kennedy v. Burrier, 36 Mo. 128, 130.

"Accrues," as used in Rev. St. § 1069, providing that claims against the United States shall be barred unless a petition for payment is presented within a certain period after the claim "accrues," means the time at which an enforceable legal right arises, so that a suit might be brought thereon. Rice v. United States, 7 Sup. Ct. 1377, 122 U. S. 611, 30 L. Ed. 793.

As become due and payable.

"Accrue," as used in a stipulation authorizing the appointment of a receiver to pay taxes thereafter "accruing," means the same as to become due and payable. Moyer v. Badger Lumber Co., 62 Pac. 434, 435, 10 Kan. App. 142.

In the mechanic's lien law of 1876, requiring every original contractor to file his demand within six months after the indebtedness had "accrued," accrued means "having come to maturity, or to be due and payable; or, in other words, it indicates the time when the work contracted for is completed, or the materials furnished, one or both, as the case may be, and the account for the sale is past due." Cutcliff v. McAnally, 7 South. 331, 332, 88 Ala. 507.

In 2 Rev. St. p. 82, § 6, providing that rent reserved to the deceased, which had "accrued" at the time of his death, shall be deemed assets and shall go to the executors and administrators, "accrued" is synonymous with "due and payable," and signifies rents that had become due and payable at the time of the testator's death. Fay v. Holloran (N. Y.) 35 Barb. 295, 297.

"Accrues," as used in a statute providing that no action shall be commenced to foreclose any mortgage except within 10 years after the right of action "accrues," means the time when a debt secured by the mortgage becomes due and collectible, and a payment on the debt will revive the right to foreclose the mortgage. Schiffenstein v. Allison, 15 N. E. 275, 276, 123 Ill. 662.

Under a statute requiring a notice to be given within 30 days after a claim shall "accrue," where it was customary for laborers to receive payment on a certain day of each month for the whole of the previous month's work, the claim did not accrue until the usual day of payment. Mundt v. Sheboygan & F. du L. R. Co., 31 Wis. 451, 464.

The technical meaning of the word "accrue," as defined in the dictionary, is the possession of a present enforceable right. A note is said to accrue when it becomes due and payable. Profits have accrued when they are paid, or when the right to enforce them presently exists. Profits may not be said to have accrued until they have become fixed and payable, and therefore a contract requiring the payment of a certain sum when profits "have accrued" means when they have become fixed or payable. Allen v. Armstrong, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1079, 1081, 58 App. Div. 427.

Within the common-law procedure act, enabling a judge, on it being made to appear that any person is indebted to the judgment debtor, to order that all debts "owing or accruing" from such third person to the judgment debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment debt owing, applies only to a debt perfected. When the words "owing or accruing" are used to designate two classes of debts, they can each receive a distinct meaning only by taking one as denoting debts which are not yet payable and the other as denoting those which are. There is no existing debt until judgment, and, where orders were obtained to attach moneys in the hands of the company which were to become payable to the debtor on a verdict recovered by him in his action against the company, there was no debt owing or accruing from the company, the judgment not then having been entered. Dresser v. Johns, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 429, 434.

The phrase "debts owing or accruing" in Common-Law Procedure Act 1854, § 61, authorizing an attachment of all debts owing or accruing from the garnishee to the judgment debtor, includes all debts, though not presently payable. Jones v. Thompson, 1 El. Bl. & El. 63, 64.

The right of action or the liability on a note accrues, within the Georgia statute of limitations, not at its date, but at its maturity. Black v. Swanson, 49 Ga. 424, 425.

As exist.

"Accrue," as used in Code, § 2529, providing that certain actions may be brought within the time therein limited after their causes "accrue," and not afterward, means the time when the right to bring an action on the cause exists. Weiser v. McDowell, 61 N. W. 1094, 1095, 93 Iowa, 772.

In a statute of limitation providing that the state would not sue any person for or in respect of any real estate, or the issues or profits thereof, by reason of the right or title of the people to the same, unless such right or title "shall have accrued" within 10 years before any action or other proceeding for the same shall be commenced, "shall have accrued" are used in the sense of "shall have existed" within the period designated, and hence an action by the state to recover for an encroachment upon soil in the tide waters of a bay, the title to which accrued to the state on her admission to the Union 23 years before commencement of the action, is not barred if the right to sue for such encroachment has existed within 10 years. Weber v. State Harbor Com'rs, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 57, 68, 21 L. Ed. 798.

As become a fixed demand.

The word "accrue," as used in a fire policy, relative to the accruing of a loss, is not to be taken literally, as meaning when the property is destroyed, but means when the loss has become a fixed demand. Steen v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 61 How. Prac. 144, 146.

As synonymous with occur.

"Accrue" is not synonymous with "occur" as used in a policy of fire insurance providing that no action can be maintained on such policy unless commenced within 12 months next after the loss shall occur. The word "accrue" in its generally received sense is to be "added to" or "attached to" something else, while the word "occur" means "to happen" in its general and most popular sense, and refers to the time when fire destroyed the property. Johnson v. Humboldt Ins. Co., 91 Ill. 92, 95, 33 Am. Rep. 47.

"Accrue" is synonymous with the term "occur" as used in a policy of fire insurance providing that no action can be maintained on a policy unless it shall be commenced within the term of 12 months next after such loss or damage shall "occur," meaning that the limitation commences when the loss was due and payable, and not from the time of the physical burning of the property. Steen v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 89 N. Y. 315, 324, 42 Am. Rep. 297; Hay v. Star Fire Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 235, 243, 33 Am. Rep. 607.

ACCRUED COSTS.

"Accrued costs," as used in an offer for judgment in favor of plaintiff for a specified sum, is a sufficient compliance with Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 259, requiring an offer for judgment for the sum named "with costs." Petrosky v. Flanagan, 35 N. W. 665, 666, 38 Minn. 26.

The expression "costs that have accrued," as used in a compromise of a pending suit, or in a private statute providing for such compromise, means costs that would follow the judgment, and do not include attorney's fees. Tallassee Mfg. Co. v. Glenn, 50 Ala. 489, 491.

An offer to confess judgment for a definite sum with "accrued costs" includes costs as up to the time of the offer, and the costs of carrying the offer into effect, if accepted. Holland v. Pugh, 16 Ind. 21, 23.

The word "accrue," as used in a bond given to pay all costs and damages that may accrue in consequence of an injunction, implies an account or inquisition, and only such as were decreed to a party could be said with propriety to have accrued to him in consequence of an injunction, and only those damages which were adjudged to him by the decree of the court on the dissolution of an injunction can with any propriety be said to have accrued. Adams v. Brown, 14 Ky. (4 Litt.) 7, 8.

ACCRUED PENSIONS.

The term "accrued pensions," as used in Act March 3, 1873, providing that accrued pensions shall not be considered a part of the assets of the decedent, but shall inure to the sole benefit of his widow or children, is synonymous with "arrear of pensions," as used in Act Jan. 25, 1875, wherein the pensions thereby granted are called "arrear of pensions." Donnelly v. United States, 17 Ct. Cl. 105, 110.

ACCRUED RIGHT.

An accrued or established right is one which cannot be wholly taken away by statute. Richards v. Bellingham Bay Land Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 209, 213, 4 C. C. A. 290.

"Accrued right" or title, as used in a statute providing that no person at any time thereafter shall make entry into any lands or tenements except within 15 years next after his right or title shall first accrue, means that the title against which the statute runs is a present right of entry—that is, a new right or title first accruing to the party, and not a transfer of an old title—and cannot be limited solely to the commencement of the original title under which the party claims, but includes his own accession to the title. Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.) 59, 117, 5 L. Ed. 398.

ACCRUING INTEREST.

An agreement whereby plaintiff, purchasing a lot, agreed to assume a mortgage thereon and to pay the "accruing interest," does not refer to nor in any manner embrace any part of the six months' interest overdue and unpaid. As generally understood, "accruing interest" means running or accumulating interest, as distinguished from accrued or matured interest. When we speak of interest which is from day to day accumulating on the principal debt, but which is not yet due and payable, we call it "accruing interest." Gross v. Partenheimer, 28 Atl. 370, 371, 159 Pa. 556.

ACCRUING RIGHT.

An accruing right is one that is increasing, enlarging, or augmenting. Richards v. Bellingham Bay Land Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 209, 213, 4 C. C. A. 290.

ACCT.

The abbreviation "acct." stands for account, and has been in common use in commercial transactions for so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and its meaning is as well understood as though the word had been written out; and the courts will certainly take notice of that which every one else knows. Heaton v. Ainley, 78 N. W. 798, 108 Iowa, 112.

ACCUMULATE—ACCUMULATION.

"Accumulated is simply amassed, collected, heaped up." People's Fire Ins. Co. v. Parker, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 575, 577.

Of corporations.

The "accumulations" of a corporation are its yearly earnings and profits, in whatever form they may exist, which have not been distributed in dividends among the owners of stock at the time it goes into liquidation. Equitable Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Rogers, 44 Atl. 789, 792, 7 Del. Ch. 398.

Of estates or funds.

Accumulation is the adding of the interest or income of a fund to the principal pursuant to the provision of a will or deed, preventing its being expended. Cent. Dict.

Thorn v. De Breteuil, 83 N. Y. Supp. 849, 853, 86 App. Div. 405.

The law imposes restrictions on the power of a testator or creator of a trust to prohibit thus the present beneficial enjoyment of a fund to increase it for a future generation, and will not allow part of the income of an estate to be set aside to pay a mortgage. Hascall v. King, 56 N. E. 515, 517, 162 N. Y. 134, 76 Am. St. Rep. 302.

"Accumulation," as used in a statute prohibiting the direction of "accumulation" by a testator, implies a withholding of the income of the property for the purpose of creating an increased and constantly increasing fund for distribution at a future time. A present beneficial gift of income until a certain sum shall have been received by the donee is not within the prohibition of the statute. A direction to apply rents or income in payment of a specified sum to a designated person is no more a direction to accumulate than a gift of the estate until all of the rents the donee has received an equivalent amount would be. In re Rogers' Estate, 36 Atl. 340, 342, 179 Pa. 609.

When an executor or other trustee masses the rents, dividends, or other income which he receives, treats it as capital, invests it, makes a new capital of the income derived therefrom, invests that, and so on, he is said to accumulate the fund; and the capital and accrued income thus procured constitute accumulations. Hussey v. Sargent, 75 S. W. 211, 215, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 315.

A deed of trust of a mortgage belonging to a testator provided for the payment to the testator's widow of all the interest on the mortgage, or so much thereof as she might desire, and the balance to testator's two children, and on the widow's death the mortgage, with "all accumulations of interest," should be assigned equally to the children. It was held that at least the interest at the death of the tenant for life was included in the accumulation, and it could not be limited solely to the interest which had accumulated in the trustee's hands as interest already paid to them, but held by them as interest not desired by the life tenant. Lewis v. Towar (N. J.) 45 Atl. 999, 1000.

A testator provided by will that after the decease of his daughter, in case she should marry and have children living at her death or descendants of such children, then it was his will that, of what remained undisposed of of the last-mentioned fourth part of the residue of his personal estate, its "accumulated interest" should belong to and vest in the children of such daughter. Held, that the term "that its accumulated interest" as so used did not mean the interest accrued and unpaid, but such interest only as at the death of the legatee had not become due and payable to her, which remained undisposed of. Lippincott v. Ridgway, 11 N. J. Eq. (3 Stockt.) 526, 534; Lippincott v. Stokes, 6 N. J. Eq. (2 Halst. Ch.) 122, 152.

ACCUMULATED EARNINGS.

As capital stock, see "Capital Stock."

ACCUMULATED PROFITS.

As capital, see "Capital."

ACCUMULATED SURPLUS.

"Accumulated surplus," as used in Tax Act 1866 (Rev. p. 1156, pl. 74), providing "that all private corporations except banking institutions, etc., shall be assessed and taxed at the full amount of their capital stock paid in, and accumulated surplus," includes the property and funds which the corporation has in excess of its capital stock and above all debts and liabilities. Trenton Iron Co. v. Yard, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 357, 359.

"Accumulated surplus," as used in Laws 1862, p. 349, providing that all private corporations are to be assessed at the full amount of their capital stock paid in, and their "accumulated surplus," must be construed to refer to the fund stock companies have in excess of their capital and liabilities, and hence it includes all the assets of a mutual life insurance company over and above all liabilities; and, where such company had no liabilities except their liabilities to themselves, it cannot in the true sense of the word be said to be indebted at all. As they owe themselves these liabilities, they may be well considered an "accumulated surplus" within the meaning of the statute. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Utter, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 480, 491.

"Accumulated surplus," as applied to an insurance company whose "accumulated surplus" is subject to taxation at its full amount, must be construed to mean the fund which it has in excess of its capital stock after payment of its debts. Such fund is the accumulation of interest received and premiums for insurance, and is not limited to only such moneys as the company has received for interest on investments and earned premiums on expired risks, though it may be liable to the contingency of loss upon the policies issued, for it is as much the property of the company and as fully under its control as the capital stock paid in. People's Fire Ins. Co. v. Parker, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 479, 482.

The accumulated surplus of a bank is such portion of its earnings as is reserved by the directors "as a fund to increase the capital employed in conducting the business of the company and to provide against contingent losses." People's Fire Ins. Co. v. Parker, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 575, 577.

"Accumulated surplus," as applied to an insurance company, means the assets of the company not represented by the capital stock, but which stand distinct from it and beyond it. The word "surplus" is synonymous with "overplus"; that which remains when use is satisfied; excess; beyond what was prescribed or wanted; in law, the residue of an estate after debts and legacies are paid; while "accumulated" means simply "amassed, collected, heaped up." People's Fire Ins. Co. v. Parker, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 575, 577.

"Accumulated surplus," so long as it is retained by a corporation, either as surplus or increased stock, can in no proper sense be called "income." Mills v. Britton, 29 Atl. 231, 236, 64 Conn. 4, 24 L. R. A. 536; Equitable Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Rogers, 44 Atl. 789, 793, 7 Del. Ch. 398.

ACCURATELY ADDRESSED.

A letter or envelope containing a notice of protest cannot be said to have not been "accurately addressed" where it was addressed to both members of a firm instead of being addressed in their firm name. It is not every change or mistake in the direction of a notice that vitiates it; if the error is merely nominal, and is not calculated to mislead or does not mislead the party, the mistake will not be fatal. The word "accurately," as applied to direction and address of notice of dishonor, has not been so defined that a court can in each case say as matter of law just what alteration constitutes an inaccuracy. A change may be so violent as to exclude the idea of accuracy, or so slight as to exclude the idea of inaccuracy. United States Nat. Bank v. Burton, 3 Atl. 756, 760, 58 Vt. 426.

ACCUSE—ACCUSED—ACCUSATION.

Prosecution, criminal prosecution, criminal accusation, and criminal action synonymous, see "Criminal Action."

Though frequently used in the sense of imputing a charge of crime by judicial procedure, "accuse" in its popular sense is used to express a charge or imputation merely, and in this sense one may be accused of that which is no legal offense, viz., he may be charged with immoral or disgraceful conduct or official delinquency. It is certainly not synonymous with "arrested under criminal process." A slave is accused, within the meaning of an act making it an offense for a master to conceal or convey away his slave accused of a capital felony, when the felony is charged or imputed to him. State v. South (S. C.) 5 Rich. Law, 489, 492.

There are many authorities that hold that the term "accuse" means, in the law, to charge with an offense, judicially or by a public process. The word, in an information alleging that defendant did threaten to accuse complainant of a crime, is sufficient to charge a threat to prosecute for a crime. People v. Frey, 70 N. W. 548, 112 Mich. 251.

An indictment alleged that defendants falsely and maliciously conspired "to charge and accuse" one F. that he had committed the crime of adultery with the defendant A., etc. Held, that the words "to charge and accuse" in the indictment did not mean to make a complaint before a magistrate, but to impute to F., and accuse him of, the crime, as a means of inducing him to pay money to avoid prosecution or exposure. Commonwealth v. Andrews, 132 Mass. 263, 264; Commonwealth v. O'Brien, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 84, 90.

"Accuse," as used in Comp. Laws Mich. § 7528, providing that, if any person shall maliciously threaten to accuse another of any crime with intent to extort money, he shall be punished, etc., is not restricted in its meaning to an accusation in court, but includes any public accusation. The fear excited and the attempted profit from it constituted the ingredients of the offense, and in many cases of peculiar possessions of trust or employment, where even a well-grounded suspicion might be ruinous, the probability of a judicial investigation in which the truth might be sifted would not be likely to add to the contrary of the charge, and might even tend to mitigate it. "Accused" only implies a formal complaint where it is used in its restricted technical sense, and ordinarily refers to any charge publicly made. People v. Braman, 30 Mich. 460, 468.

A person is said to be accused of an offense from the time that any criminal action shall have been commenced against him. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 240.

The word "accused," as used in Kan. Bill of Rights, § 11, providing that the liberty of the press shall be inviolate; and all persons may freely speak, write, or publish their sentiments, being responsible for the abuse of such right; in all civil or criminal actions for libel the truth may be given in evidence, and, if it appear that the libelous matters were published for justifiable ends, the accused party shall be acquitted—means one who is charged with the crime, and cannot apply to a defendant in a civil action. Castle v. Houston, 19 Kan. 417, 426, 27 Am. Rep. 127.

The word "accused" is intended to refer to any person who in a legal manner is held to answer for any offense at any stage of the proceeding, or against whom complaint in a lawful manner is made charging the commission of an offense, including all proceedings from the order for arrest to the final execution of the law; and the word

The term "accusation" is a broad term; it includes indictment, presentment, information, and any other form in which a charge of a crime or an offense can be made against an individual. As used in reference to trials in courts having jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases, it is but the equivalent of an information in common law, so that in some cases accused is not guaranteed the right to demand an indictment by the grand jury. Gordon v. State, 29 S. E. 444, 446, 102 Ga. 673.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2060, providing that a person who stands charged upon a criminal "accusation" with a bailable offense is entitled to bail upon an appeal, cannot be construed to apply to a person who had been convicted. The word "accusation" implies that the person is alleged to be guilty, not proved or adjudged to be so. "The complaint of a prosecutor or an indictment by a grand jury is an accusation, but, when the person has been tried and adjudged to be guilty, the charge is determined and he stands convicted. The judgment has taken the place of the accusation." People v. Bauman, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 454, 457.

"Accusation," though commonly used with reference to all accusations, whether oral, by newspaper, or otherwise, is limited in legal phraseology to such accusations as have taken shape in a prosecution. United States v. Patterson, 14 Sup. Ct. 20, 21, 150 U. S. 65, 37 L. Ed. 999.

The word "accusation," as used in the Penal Code, means a charge made in a lawful manner against any person that he has been guilty of some offense which subjects him to prosecution in the name of the state. Pen. Code 1895, art. 240. An accusation under the statute applies to a pending prosecution, and when that prosecution has been terminated in conviction it ceases to be an accusation. Brannan v. State (Tex.) 72 S. W. 184, 185.

ACCUSTOMED.

The use of the word "accustomed," in a definition of ordinary care, as that degree of care and caution that a person of ordinary prudence is accustomed to use under like or similar circumstances, in place of the word "ordinarily," does not render the definition objectionable. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. of Texas v. Brown, 69 S. W. 1010, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 57.

One of the primary meanings of the word "accustomed" is "usual," and the word is so used in a charge defining ordinary care as that which a person of ordinary prudence is accustomed to exercise. St. Louis S. W.

R. Co. of Texas v. Smith, 70 S. W. 789, 790, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 336.

"Accustomed to navigate," as used in a count in a declaration in an action against owners of a dam and lock in a river, alleging that plaintiffs were the owners of boats and crafts for the navigating of said river, and "accustomed to navigate" the same, etc., is synonymous with "usually navigating," as used in Act Feb. 12, 1818, authorizing certain persons to erect and maintain a dam and lock across a certain river; section 3 directing them, so long as they make use of the same for the purpose aforesaid, to maintain the said dam, lock, etc., in good and sufficient repair, fit, safe, and convenient for the passage of boats and crafts "usually navigating" the said river, freely, without toll or any expense of any kind or nature whatsoever. Farwell v. Smith, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 133, 137.

The formula used in text-books and in forms given for pleadings in actions for injuries by "ferocious dogs, accustomed to bite," does not mean that the keeper of such a dog is exempt from all duty of restraint until the dog has effectually mangled or killed at least one person, but, as he is held to be a man of common vigilance and care, if he had good reason to believe, from his knowledge of the ferocious nature and propensity of the dog, that there was ground to apprehend that he would under some circumstances bite a person, then the duty to restrain attached, and to omit it was negligence. Godeau v. Blood, 52 Vt. 251, 252, 36 Am. Rep. 751.

ACCUSTOMED RANGE.

See "Range."

ACCUSTOMED USE.

The phrase "accustomed use," when employed or dwelt upon as indicative of the circumstances under which the owner or occupier of land is liable for injuries to persons coming thereon as by his implied invitation, in its broad sense is apt to be misleading, for it would apply to the case of the owner who suffers his land to lie waste over which the public by his passive acquiescence is permitted to pass and repass at pleasure—a condition under which it is well settled that no liability is imposed on the owner for the safety of the premises. Phillips v. Library Co. of Burlington, 27 Atl. 478, 481, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 307.

ACETANILID.

"Acetanilid" is a chemical compound prepared from aniline oil, a product of coal tar, by treatment with carbolic acid, and derives its characteristics purely from coal tar, the acetic acid being merely a medium for its manufacture. It contains no alcohol.

United States v. Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 313, 24 C. C. A. 604.

ACID.

The phrase "acids used for manufacturing purposes" in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 473, does not include sulphotoluic acid, a remote derivative of coal tar by combination with sulphuric acid, its dominant element being derived from coal tar, the chief use of the article being in the construction of coal-tar dyes by combining with a base. William J. Matheson & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 422, 423.

In Lutz v. Magone, 153 U. S. 105, 14 Sup. Ct. 777, 38 L. Ed. 651, it was held that saccharine, a substance 300 times as sweet as sugar, although scientifically an acid, was not an acid for revenue purposes. United States v. Buffalo Natural Gas Fuel Co. (U. S.) 78 Fed. 110, 112, 24 C. C. A. 4.

ACKNOWLEDGE — ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

See "Public Acknowledgment."

The word "acknowledge," besides the legal sense in which it has for centuries been used, has also a common meaning, understood by every one, which uniformly relates to something past; it is a confession or admission of some prior act. Roanes v. Archer (Va.) 4 Leigh, 550, 557.

"Stated" signifies told, recited; whereas the word "acknowledged" means received with approbation, owned before authority. The use of the word "stated" in a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed by the grantor, which states that the grantor stated before the officer, etc., cannot be used as a substitute for the word "acknowledge." Dewey v. Campau, 4 Mich. 565, 567.

One of the conditions of a fire policy issued by the Ontario & Livingston Mutual Insurance Company was that, in case the assured should make any other insurance on the same property, and should not with all reasonable diligence give notice thereof to the company, and have the same indorsed on the policy, or otherwise "acknowledged" and "approved" by them in writing, the policy should cease and be of no further effect. Within a few months afterwards the insured effected a further insurance in another company on the property, at the same time forwarding a written notice of the fact to the secretary of the Ontario & Livingston Mutual Insurance Company; and on the next day the insured received a letter from the secretary in these words, "I have received your notice of additional insurance." Held, in an action on the policy, that the letter imported both an acknowledgment and an approval in writing, within the meaning of the condition as to further insurance, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover. Potter v. Ontario & L. Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 147.

As action or proceeding.

See "Action"; "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."; "Proceeding."

Of assignment for benefit of creditors.

In Laws 1860, p. 594, c. 348, § 1, providing that every assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be in writing, duly acknowledged before an officer authorized to take the "acknowledgment" of deeds, and the certificates of such "acknowledgment" shall be duly indorsed on the instrument before the delivery thereof to the assignee, the word "acknowledgment" has a well-known legal signification, and means the act by which a party who has executed an instrument declares or acknowledges it before a competent officer to be his act and deed, and hence proving the execution of the assignment by subscribing witnesses is so totally different from an "acknowledgment" by a party that it cannot be held to be equivalent to "acknowledgment," for it cannot be presumed that the expression "acknowledgment" was used without intending it to be understood in its plain and obvious sense. Cook v. Kelley (N. Y.) 12 Abb. Prac. 35, 36.

Of contract by corporation.

The word "acknowledge" in Pub. Laws, p. 158, 2 Gen. St. p. 2706, requiring contracts by a corporation to be acknowledged, included a case where there was an affidavit proving the signature of the president of the corporation, and the corporate seal was affixed. General Electric Co. v. Transit Equipment Co., 42 Atl. 101, 103, 57 N. J. Eq. 460.

Of debt.

An acknowledgment of a debt sufficient to take a claim out of the operation of the statute of limitations implies a meeting of minds, and must amount to a new promise to pay the debt. An acknowledgment cannot be regarded as an admission of indebtedness if the accompanying circumstances are such as to leave it in doubt whether the party intended to prolong the time of legal limitation. The acknowledgment must in general be in writing, and must be of an existing liability with respect to the contract on which a recovery is sought. City of Ft. Scott v. Hickman, 5 Sup. Ct. 56, 64, 112 U. S. 150, 163, 28 L. Ed. 636. Such acknowledgment must be an unqualified and unconditional one, and must show positively that the debt is due in whole or in part. Wetzell v. Bussard, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 309, 311, 6 L. Ed. 481;

Bell v. Morrison, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 351, 361, 7 L. Ed. 174.

The "acknowledgment of pre-existing debt," to take such debt out of the bar of the statute of limitations, must be a direct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of a debt which a party is liable and is willing to pay. The most positive acknowledgment of a pre-existing debt is insufficient if accompanied by a declaration which is inconsistent with an intention to pay. Curtis v. City of Sacramento, 11 Pac. 748, 749, 70 Cal. 412, 414, 415; McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 184, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Howes v. Lynde, 19 Pac. 249, 250, 7 Mont. 545. An arbitration agreement reciting that whereas the city was indebted to a certain firm, and whereas the board of trustees of the city and such firm differed as to the amount of indebtedness, etc., is not such an "acknowledgment of pre-existing debt" as will operate to prevent the running of the statute of limitations, for the acknowledgment is not direct and general, but qualified and conditional. Curtis v. City of Sacramento, 11 Pac. 748, 749, 70 Cal. 412.

Where a debtor, in answer to letters requesting payment of his debt, states that he regrets that he let the debt run so long, that he might have paid it but for carelessness, that he will get around to it as soon as he can, that the security is ample, and that he is obliged to ask time, it is an "acknowledgment" of a subsisting debt, from which the law will imply promise of payment on his part, so as to take the case out of the operation of the bar of the statute of limitations. Acers v. Acers, 56 S. W. 196, 198, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 584.

At common law, and in the absence of a statute, a part payment was held to toll the statute of limitations, on the principle that it was an "acknowledgment" of an existing liability at the time the payment was made. Indeed, this court has recognized that principle, and held that a part payment, to so operate, must rise to the dignity of such an acknowledgment. Steele v. Souder, 20 Kan. 42. In United States v. Wilder, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 254, 20 L. Ed. 681, it was held that the principle on which part payment takes a case out of the statute is that the party paying intended by it to acknowledge and admit the greater debt to be due. Good v. Ehrlich (Kan.) 72 Pac. 545, 546.

The mere reference to the indebtedness, although consistent with its existing validity, and implying no disposition to question its binding obligation or a suggestion of some action in reference to it, is not such an "acknowledgment" as is contemplated by the statute of limitations. There must be an unqualified and direct admission of a present subsisting debt on which the party is liable. Cook v. Farley (Neb.) 95 N. W. 683 (citing Nelson v. Becker, 32 Neb. 99, 49 N. W. 962).

Of deed or mortgage.

"Acknowledge," as used when speaking of the acknowledgment of a deed, means "to approve; to own the validity of." Blair v. Sayre, 2 S. E. 97, 103, 29 W. Va. 604.

"Acknowledge," as used with reference to an execution of a deed, means that the parties affirmed the signing and sealing to be their act before witnesses. Hogans v. Caruth, 19 Fla. 84, 90.

"Acknowledgment," as commonly used by the Legislature, the courts, and the bar, means both the act and the written evidence thereof made by the officer. Bouvier's, Burrill's, Black's, and Anderson's Law Dicts. tit. "Acknowledgment"; Statutory Construction Act (Laws 1892, c. 677, § 15). An instrument is not "duly acknowledged" unless there is not only the oral acknowledgment but the written certificate also, as required by the statutes regulating the subjects. 1 Rev. St. p. 759; Laws 1848, c. 195; Laws 1863, c. 246; Laws 1865, c. 421; Laws 1870, c. 208; Laws 1896, c. 547, §§ 255, 258. Rogers v. Pell, 49 N. E. 75, 78, 154 N. Y. 518.

An "acknowledgment" of a deed is a declaration or admission made by the party executing the deed to a public officer, having authority to take such acknowledgments, that it is his deed and executed by him. Steers v. Kinsey, 58 S. W. 1050, 1052, 68 Ark. 360.

An acknowledgment is an act of the grantor in a deed in going before a competent officer and declaring the instrument to be his act and deed and a certificate of the officer on the instrument that such declaration has been made him is also properly termed an "acknowledgment." Strong v. United States (U. S.) 34 Fed. 17, 21; White v. Magarahan, 13 S. E. 509, 510, 87 Ga. 217; Short v. Conlee, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 219, 225; Cook v. Kelley, 12 Abb. Prac. 35, 37. The mere fact that the grantor appeared before the officer, and that the officer personally knew him as the identical person who executed and whose name is subscribed to the deed as having executed the same, does not amount to a declaration that the grantor in fact executed the deed. Short v. Conlee, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 219, 228.

An acknowledgment is the declaration of one who has executed a deed, made before some competent court or officer, to the effect that the execution is his act or deed. The function of an acknowledgment is twofold—to authorize the deed to be given in evidence without further proof of its execution, and to entitle it to be recorded. The acknowledgment is no part of the deed itself, and the certificate is sufficient if it shows that the requirements of the statute have been in substance complied with. Burbank v. Ellis, 7 Neb. 156, 164; Linderman v. Axford, 38 App. Div. 488, 56 N. Y. Supp. 456, 457. The failure of a notary to make a proper certificate of acknowledgment will not invalidate it. Linderman v. Axford, 38 App. Div. 488, 56 N. Y. Supp. 456, 457.

The authentication of the notary's seal is as essential to a perfect acknowledgment as is his signature, and when the deed lacks this it cannot properly be recorded. Koch v. West, 92 N. W. 663, 664, 118 Iowa, 468, 96 Am. St. Rep. 394.

The duty of an officer in taking and certifying to the acknowledgment of a deed by the party executing it is to examine such party touching his signature, and to certify, not that he did or could sign the instrument of his own free will and accord, but simply that he "acknowledged," meaning thereby that he stated or admitted the signature to have been so made. The officer is not required to pass on the mental capacity of the party to give his voluntary assent, and his certificate cannot be conclusive of the question. Thompson v. New England Mortg. Sec. Co., 18 South. 315, 317, 110 Ala. 400, 55 Am. St. Rep. 29.

The "acknowledgment," while not necessarily a part of the deed, was a necessary ingredient in order to admit it of record, and to admit it in evidence without further proof. It has reference to the proof of execution, not to the force of the deed itself, especially where third parties were not concerned. Murray v. Beal, 65 Pac. 726, 728, 23 Utah, 548.

The acknowledgment, by one who signed a deed by making her mark, that the same was her free act and deed, includes an acknowledgment of her signature, and, though the signature is not witnessed, the certificate of such acknowledgment is evidence of the fact that she signed the instrument. Meazels v. Martin, 18 S. W. 1028, 1029, 93 Ky. 50.

Comp. St. c. 36, § 4, providing that the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and "acknowledged" by both the husband and wife, requires that both the husband and wife shall execute and acknowledge a deed or mortgage of the homestead, and as between the parties this requirement is essential to the validity of the instrument, in the absence of countervailing equities, and requires that the grantors must acknowledge the instrument to be their voluntary act and deed, since acknowledgment has been defined to be the act of one who has executed a deed in going before some competent officer or the court and declaring it to be his free act and deed. Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Jenkins, 27 N. W. 117, 118, 19 Neb. 209.

In Pennsylvania the reception of an "acknowledgment" of a sheriff's deed is a judicial act in the nature of a judgment of confirmation of all the acts preceding the sale, curing all defects in process or its execution, which the court has the power to act upon. Thompson v. Phillips (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 1070, 1082.

Comp. Laws, § 3288, requiring an acknowledgment to be in the following form: "(Venue.) On this — day of —, in the year —, before me personally appeared —, known to me, or proved to me on oath of —, to be the person described in and who executed the within instrument, and acknowledged to me that he (or they) executed the same"—requires at least four essential facts to appear in the certificate of acknowledgment: (1) That the person making the acknowledgment personally appear before the officer who makes the certificate; (2) that there was an acknowledgment; (3) that the person who made the acknowledgment was identified as the one who executed the instrument; (4) that such identity was either personally known or proved to the officer taking the acknowledgment. Hence the identity of the party making the acknowledgment must appear in the certificate. Cannon v. Deming, 53 N. W. 863, 864, 3 S. D. 421.

The acknowledgment of a mortgage is not part of its execution, but only evidence of it. Benninghoff v. Stephenson, 29 Atl. 87, 88, 161 Pa. 440.

Of note.

To make a copy of a note is not an "acknowledgment" of such note nor a promise to pay the same, and this is so whether the copy is made by the maker or a stranger, and, where a note in the hands of the payee has become much worn, and the maker at request makes and delivers a true copy, it is not an acknowledgment thereof. The acknowledgment or promise which takes a note out of the statute of limitations is an acknowledgment or promise outside of the note itself or a mere copy thereof. Goodrich v. Case, 67 N. E. 295, 297, 68 Ohio St. 187.

Of relation of parent and child.

"Acknowledged," as used in Laws 1885, c. 483, which imposes a tax on legacies to certain collateral kindred, unless the legatee is a person to whom testator had for 10 years before his death stood in the mutually "acknowledged" relation of a parent, means admitted or recognized the existence of parental relations, either by agreements in writing or by verbal declarations and statements in public or to each other, or by the life, acts, and conduct of the parties, or in any manner which will satisfy the court that the parties admitted such relation. In re Spencer, 4 N. Y. Supp. 395, 400, 1 Con. Sur. 208; In re Birdsall's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, 455, 22 Misc. Rep. 180.

"Acknowledged" is defined as to own or admit the knowledge of, to recognize as a fact or truth, to give recognition to, and is not always used in the sense of admitting some secret truth or fact, so that, as used in Laws 1892, c. 399, § 2, exempting from taxation a transfer to a person standing in the mutually acknowledged relation of parent, it includes a person who, though not formally adopted, has been recognized and treated as a child by the grantor. In re Stilwell's Estate, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1123, 1125. It is never applied to the admission of a fiction, but only in relation to a fact; so that, when a fact is spoken of as being acknowledged, it means that the fact exists, and its existence is acknowledged. Thus a statute exempting from taxation and transfer to the transferor's child, the person to whom he has stood in the mutually acknowledged relation of parent, refers only to his legitimate children. In re Hunt's Estate, 33 N. Y. Supp. 256, 257, 86 Hun, 232.

"Acknowledging," as used in Civ. Code, § 230, providing that the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly "acknowledging" it as his own, receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such, has no technical meaning, and in its ordinary acceptance is defined by Webster as "owning or admitting the knowledge of." Blythe v. Ayres, 31 Pac. 915, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40.

Within 1 Ind. Rev. St. 1876, p. 410, § 9, providing that "if a man shall marry the mother of an illegitimate child, and acknowledge it as his own, such child shall be deemed legitimate," the act of marrying and afterwards living and cohabiting with the woman is an acknowledgment, although at the marriage the man denies that the child with which she is pregnant is his own. Bailey v. Boyd, 59 Ind. 292, 297.

Of signature or will.

Any act, sign, or gesture of the testator will suffice as an "acknowledgment" of the will which indicates an acknowledgment with unmistakable certainty, and such acknowledgment need not be in language. Gould v. Chicago Theological Seminary, 59 N. E. 536, 539, 189 Ill. 282.

ACQUAINTED.

See "Well Acquainted."

"Acquainted," as used in Wagner's St. 275, §§ 13, 14, providing that no acknowledgment of a married woman shall be taken unless she shall be first "made acquainted" with the contents of the instrument, means that it is the duty of the officer to see that the woman understands the nature and effect of the instrument, but it does not require him to explain its contents to her, when from her own statements made at the time it plainly appears that she understands the nature and effect. Bohan v. Casey, 5 Mo. App. 101, 107.

"Acquainted," as used in a certificate that a married woman was made acquainted with the contents of the deed, means familiar, known, and is a sufficient compliance with a provision that the contents should be made known and explained to her. Chauvin v. Wagner, 18 Mo. 531, 544.

ACQUAINTANCE.

See "Intimate Acquaintance."

An "acquaintance" with a person means a familiar knowledge of the person; more than slight or superficial knowledge. A mere introduction would not make one acquainted with the person introduced. Wyllis v. Haun, 47 Iowa, 614, 621.

ACQUEST.

"Acquest property," as used in the chapter relating to the distribution of estates of decedents, comprises all property, both real and personal, acquired by either the husband or wife during the existence of the marriage community, except such property as is declared to constitute the separate estate, and is declared to be liable for the common debts. Comp. Laws N. M. § 2030.

ACQUIESCE—ACQUIESCENCE.

Webster gives the principal definition of "to acquiesce" as to accept or consent by silence, or by omitting to object. Where the master found that at a certain interview a married woman acquiesced in all that her husband said, and said that a certain sum should be paid, the word "acquiesce" used in such connection is quite equivocal; it may mean that she made some response, or acquiesced by her silence. Pierce's Adm'r v. Pierce, 29 Atl. 364, 366, 66 Vt. 369.

"Acquiescence is where a person, who knows he is entitled to impeach a transaction or enforce a right, neglects to do so for such a length of time that, under the circumstances of the case, the other party may fairly infer that he has waived his right." Scott v. Jackson, 26 Pac. 898, 899, 89 Cal. 258 (citing Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

A patent which is not molested simply because it is for no one's interest to infringe is not "acquiesced" in within the legal acceptance of that term. Consolidated Fastener Co. v. American Fastener Co. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 523.

A charge that if an insurance agent took the whole responsibility of fixing the value of the property upon himself, and was not induced to fix the amount of insurance by rep-representations or "acquiescence" of the assured, the company were bound to pay the amount stated in the policy, and defining "acquiescence" in this connection to be "a refusal to answer a question, or in any other way deceiving or misleading the agent," and refusing to rule that "acquiescence" might also be if in any way the assured allowed the agent to be deceived as to the value of the property, or if he knew that the agent was putting on an amount of insurance substantially greater than the value of the property, was sound. Perry v. Mechanics' Mut. Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. 485, 486.

As acceptance or approval.

That the board of trustees of a college "acquiesced" in an act passed by the Legislature, legislating the president out of office, shows mere submission to the legislative will, and not approbation; a course which might naturally be adopted to avoid a direct collision with the Legislature, and as a respective appeal for a future revision of the act by the Legislature itself. Allen v. McKean (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 489, 502.

In an instruction that where a master allowed an independent contractor to erect appliances on his premises for the use of the contractor, and the master adopted and used such appliances himself, or "acquiesced in their use by his servants while engaged in his work," he was as responsible for his servants' safety as if he had erected the appliances himself, the term "acquiesces" means in the sense of being satisfied with, involving the assent of the will, and such acquiescence would amount to an adoption of such appliance and structures. Rinake v. Victor Mfg. Co., 36 S. E. 700, 701, 58 S. C. 360.

The use of the term "acquiescence" in an instruction on the question of the acquiescence of a bank in the illegal act of its cashier so as to bind the bank and render it liable for the cashier's act, without expressly defining the term "acquiescence," was not objectionable, since the word was not a word of rare use, nor was it also a technical term applicable to any branch of learning or science, but was a word in common use and commonly understood, and is applicable to the case, and, as used in the instruction, it was used in its usual and ordinary acceptation to mean "acceptance," etc. Iowa State Sav. Bank v. Block, 59 N. W. 283, 284, 91 Iowa, 490.

As assent or consent.

Acquiescence—that is, "assent"—is tantamount to an agreement. It is an implied contract, and it requires for its validity the power to contract. Matthews v. Murchison (U. S.) 17 Fed. 760, 766.

Acquiescence means "a resting satisfied with or submission to an existing state of things, and implies active assent." Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 678, 69 Cal. 255.

Acquiescence is a silent permission to do the thing done. Cass County Com'rs v. Plotner, 48 N. E. 635, 637, 149 Ind. 116; Thomson v. Thomson, 53 Pac. 403, 121 Cal. 11.

Acquiescence implies active consent, and is not to be spelled out from doubtful or ambiguous acts. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Kane, 45 N. Y. Supp. 543, 547, 17 App. Div. 542.

Acquiescence is a consent inferred from silence; a tacit encouragement. Scott v. Jackson, 26 Pac. 898, 899, 89 Cal. 258.

"Acquiescence" has been well defined as quiescence under such circumstances that assent may be reasonably inferred from it. Assent thus given is as irrevocable as if expressly stated in words. Assent is a necessary inference from acquiescence, and estoppel is generally the necessary consequence of assent. Lowndes v. Wicks, 36 Atl. 1072, 1079, 69 Conn. 15.

If a person having a right, and seeing another person about to commit, or in the course of committing, an act infringing upon that right, stands by, and in such manner as really to induce the person committing the act, and who might otherwise have abstained from it, to believe that he assents to its being committed, he cannot afterwards be heard to complain of the act. This is the proper sense of the term "acquiescence," and in that sense it may be defined as quiescence under such circumstances as that assent may be reasonably inferred from it, and is no more than an instance of the law of estoppel by words or conduct. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Perdue, 21 S. E. 755, 758, 40 W. Va. 442.

Delay.

Acquiescence is mere silence—a refusal to speak when one ought to speak for the protection of others, or to act in time to prevent others from doing acts of which the dilatory one afterwards complains. Delay in pursuing a remedy is not acquiescence, though it often is strong evidence of acquiescence. De Hereu v. Hereu (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 871, 876.

Acquiescence is where a principal, with knowledge of all the facts, adopts the acts of his agent, though his acts were contrary to his duty and instructions; and if the principal, after being informed of what his agent has done, does not dissent or give notice of disapproval within a reasonable time, he will be presumed to have acquiesced in what the agent has done. Cairnes v. Bleecker (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 300, 304.

"Acquiescence," such as raises an equitable estoppel preventing one from being heard as against an act in which he acquiesced, means neglect to promptly and actively condemn the act. Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co., 78 N. Y. 159, 187.

"Acquiescence," as used in the statement of the principle that, in order that the enjoyment of an easement in another's land may be conclusive of the right, it must have been under claim of title, with knowledge and "acquiescence" of the owners, means conduct recognizing the existence of a transaction, and intended, in some extent at least, to carry the transaction or permit it to be carried into effect. Acquiescence must necessarily exist while the transaction is going on for which a right of action would otherwise arise, and its operation necessarily is to prevent a right of action from thus arising, and not to defeat the right after it has arisen. Mere delay therefore—merely suffering time to elapse—without doing anything, is not acquiescence, although it may be evidence, and sometimes strong evidence, of acquiescence. Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 753, 790.

As estoppel.

"Acquiescence" is not always treated as an estoppel, but as a quasi estoppel, as it was called in City of Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind. 531, 49 Am. Rep. 109. It is a release or abandonment of one's rights, if, having rights, he stands by and sees another dealing with his property in a manner inconsistent with such rights, and makes no objection while the act is in progress. Duke of Leeds v. Earl of Amberst, 2 Phil. Ch. 117. Acquiescence is like permission to do the thing done, and equity will treat as unconscionable the denial of that to which one has assented or acquiesced. Cass County Com'rs v. Plotner, 48 N. E. 635, 637, 149 Ind. 116.

"Acquiescence" is a breach of the law of estoppel, and is used to defeat a party's action on the principle of equitable estoppel; that is, it must appear that because of something that was done, or because nothing was done, the party invoking the estoppel will sustain loss unless it is allowed. Mere silence or inaction short of the limitation period will not bar relief. St. Louis Safe Deposit & Savings Bank v. Kennett's Estate, 74 S. W. 474, 483, 101 Mo. App. 370; Purdy v. Bankers' Life Ass'n, 74 S. W. 486, 492, 101 Mo. App. 91.

Knowledge implied.

Acquiescence means a tacit consent to acts or conditions, and implies a knowledge of those things which are acquiesced in. One cannot acquiesce in a wrong while ignorant that it has been committed, and the knowledge must be of facts. Current suspicion and rumor are not sufficient. Pence v. Langdon, 99 U. S. 578, 581, 25 L. Ed. 420.

A mistake in a note for which another signer was responsible cannot be held to have been acquiesced in by the signer by merely signing the note, she being in ignorance of the fact, for "acquiescence" implies a knowledge of such facts. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co. v. Caldwell, 58 S. W. 355, 360, 68 Ark. 505.

Laches distinguished.

Acquiescence implies active assent, and is distinguishable from laches, which imports a merely passive assent. Kenyon v. National Life Ass'n, 57 N. Y. Supp. 60, 74, 39 App. Div. 276.

Acquiescence is a resting satisfied with, or submission to, the existing state of things, and differs from "laches," in that the latter term implies neglect to do that which ought to be done, so that laches may be evidence of acquiescence. Laches imports a merely passive, while acquiescence implies active, assent. Lux v. Haggin (Cal.) 10 Pac. 674, 678.

"Acquiescence" is akin to the doctrine of laches, but implies a more definite assent to the acts complained of than the latter. It is one phase of the law of estoppel, and, in order for a party's action to be defeated by estoppel, his behavior, either by silence, words, or actions, must have been such as to induce his adversary to pursue a line of conduct which will redound to the latter's loss unless the inducing party is denied relief. Johnson-Brinkman Commission Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. R., 126 Mo. 345, 28 S. W. 870, 871, 26 L. R. A. 840, 47 Am. St. Rep. 675; Purdy v. Bankers' Life Ass'n (Mo. App.) 74 S. W. 486, 492.

"Acquiescence," properly speaking, relates to inaction during the performance of an act. The defenses of laches and acquiescence are cognate, but not correlative. Lord Cottenham, in Duke of Leeds v. Amberst, 2 Phil. Ch. 117, says of the use of the term "acquiescence": "If a party having a right stands by and sees another dealing with the property in a manner inconsistent with that right, and makes no objection while the act is in progress, he cannot afterward complain. That is the proper sense of the word 'acquiescence.'" Hall v. Otterson, 28 Atl. 907, 912, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 522.

ACQUIRE.

See "Hereafter Acquired."

Otherwise acquired, see "Otherwise."

Where the articles of incorporation of a manufacturing corporation authorizes it to "acquire," own, etc., electric plants, the word "acquire" is broad enough to cover the definition given by Webster that it is "to gain by any means." Anchor Inv. Co. v. Columbia Electric Co., 63 N. W. 1109, 61 Minn. 510.

The word "acquired," as found in Code 1880, § 1195, providing that a quitclaim and release "shall estop the grantor and his heirs from asserting a subsequently acquired adverse title to the lands conveyed," is used in the sense of "obtained." We cannot yield to the extreme technical meaning, urged upon us by counsel, that acquirement can be had only by the act of the party. Mr. Blackstone in his Commentaries, book 2, pp. 200, 201, speaks of where an heir "acquires" by descent, and gives two methods of acquiring, one of which is by descent; and again he uses this language: "Descent is the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires his estate by right of representation as his heir at law." The Legislature used the word in this general sense. Leflore County v. Allen, 31 South. 815, 816, 80 Miss. 298.

To "acquire" is, in the law of contracts and descents, to become the owner of property; to make property one's own. Wulzen v. Board of Sup'r of City & County of San Francisco, 35 Pac. 353, 356, 10 Cal. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"Acquired," as used in a statute providing the manner in which the lands of an intestate shall be inherited, is used in a broad sense so as to cover lands which may come to the testator in any other way than by gift, devise, or descent from a parent or the ancestor of a parent. In re Miller's Will, 70 Tenn. (2 Lea) 54, 60.

The expression "acquired jurisdiction," as used in the act of Congress dividing Indian Territory into judicial districts and fixing their jurisdiction, and providing that in all criminal cases where courts outside of the Indian Territory shall have "acquired jurisdiction" they shall retain it, implies more than the mere filing of an indictment. Two things are essential to the jurisdiction: (1) The criminal case; that is, the finding of an indictment. (2) The acquiring by the court of jurisdiction in the case; and, since there is no property involved in a criminal case, the only jurisdiction which could be acquired after the finding of an indictment is jurisdiction of the defendant's person. And, as thus stated, the only other element of jurisdiction is the service of process upon the defendant, or, more accurately, his arrest under capias. United States v. Lee (U. S.) 84 Fed. 626, 630.

The word "acquire," as used in the statute authorizing certain park commissioners to acquire rights of fishing common to all, is used in a broad sense, involving the permanent vesting in trustees, for the public benefit, of common rights of fishing; meaning, not such rights as are already given to all, but such rights as shall be, after acquisition, common to all. Albright v. Sussex County Lake & Park Commission, 53 Atl. 612, 614, 68 N. J. Law, 523.

As obtain by adverse possession.

A statute providing that property acquired by either husband or wife during marriage shall be deemed community property does not apply to property held by adverse possession until the limitation period has run. Bishop v. Lusk, 27 S. W. 306, 307, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 30.

As obtain actual possession.

"Acquire," as used in the statute securing to a woman the property acquired during marriage as her separate estate, refers to the actual possession and control of the property, rather than to the acquisition of mere title. Such seems to have been the construction of a somewhat similar statute by the Supreme Court of New York. In that case the court held that all personal property and rights of personal action acquired by any woman which by statute would be her own property applies to a distributive share to which she was previously entitled but which subsequently came into her actual possession, on the ground that the particular property did not absolutely vest in her until the decree of the proper court making distribution of the estate absolute. Alexander v. Alexander, 7 S. E. 335, 341, 85 Va. 353, 1 L. R. A. 125.

As obtain by descent or devise.

Personal property of a married woman obtained by a decree of distribution in an estate is "acquired" by her within an act providing that property acquired by a married woman shall be her own separate estate. White v. Waite, 47 Vt. 502, 507.

A charter of an academy, authorizing the corporation to "acquire," hold, and convey real and personal property, entitles the corporation to take by will, since the word "acquire" is broad enough to include taking by devise, though the word implies some element of effort on the part of one who acquires. In judicial opinions and by law-writers the term is not unfrequently used to describe the taking of property by devise or descent, and in 2 Bl. Comm. 201, descent or hereditary succession is defined as the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, "acquires" his estate by right of representation as his heir at law. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Sullivan, 6 N. E. 183, 190, 116 Ill. 375, 56 Am. Rep. 776.

As obtain new interest.

"Acquire," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1887, providing for the forfeiture of lands thereafter acquired by aliens, construed to mean the acquisition of a new interest in lands, and not the addition of a legal to an already existing equitable title. Potter v. Rio Arriba Land & Cattle Co., 17 Pac. 609, 613, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 322.

As obtain by purchase.

"Acquire," as used in Acts 22d Gen. Assem. c. 85, § 2, providing that any nonresident alien may "acquire" and hold real property to a certain extent, provided that within five years from the date of purchase of such property the same be placed in the actual possession of a relative of such purchaser, will not bear such limited definition as meaning only obtaining property under sale. Bennett v. Hibbert, 55 N. W. 93, 95, 88 Iowa, 154.

Where a married woman purchases from creditors of her husband their claims against him, she "acquires" such debts as property within an act providing that all the estate acquired by a married woman shall continue her sole and separate property. Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 390, 398.

A sheriff's certificate of sale operating under Code Civ. Proc. § 700, to transfer to the purchaser all the right, title, and interest of a judgment debtor, subject to redemption, is an instrument whereby a title is acquired, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1107, providing that a person who acquires a title by an instrument which is first duly recorded may contest a prior unrecorded deed. Foorman v. Wallace, 17 Pac. 680, 681, 75 Cal. 552.

In Rev. St. tit. 34, c. 3, § 18, providing that all property "acquired" by either husband or wife during marriage, except that "acquired" by gift, devise, or descent, shall be deemed common property acquired, will not be construed not to mean property purchased by the wife with her separate estate. Liebes v. Steffy (Ariz.) 32 Pac. 261, 262.

ACQUIRED RIGHTS.

Acquired rights are those which a man does not naturally enjoy, but are owing to his own procurement, such as sovereignty, or the right of commanding, or the right of property. Borden v. State, 11 Ark. 519, 527, 44 Am. Dec. 217.

ACQUIT—ACQUITTAL.

See "Former Acquittal."

The word "acquittal" is said to be verbum equivolum. It is generally said that a party is "acquitted" by the jury, when in fact the acquittal is the judgment of the court. Burgess v. Boetefeur, 7 Man. & G. 481, 504; People v. Lyman, 53 App. Div. 470, 473, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1062, 1065.

"Acquitted" is defined by Webster as set free, or judicially discharged from an accusation, released from a debt, duty, obligation, charge, or suspicion of guilt. Dolloway

v. Turrill (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 383, 400; Morgan County Com'rs v. Johnson, 31 Ind. 463, 466.

"The word 'acquitted' is a word of technical import, and must be understood in its technical sense, to wit, an acquittal on trial by a jury." Thomas v. De Graffenreid (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 143, 144.

The word "acquittal" is not confined in its meaning to a judgment in favor of defendant after a trial on the merits and facts of the case, but may also have the broader signification of a discharge by judgment rendered for other reasons. City of Junction City v. Keefe, 19 Pac. 735, 737, 40 Kan. 275.

The word "acquitted" means "set free or judicially discharged from an accusation; released from a charge or suspicion of guilt." A discharge of a defendant accused of selling liquor in violation of law, by the magistrate, because of the insufficiency of the evidence, was construed to be an acquittal. People v. Lyman, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1062, 1065, 53 App. Div. 470.

Where an indictment is sufficient in form and substance, and the defendant is arraigned and pleads, and the jury is impaneled and sworn to try the issue, it is presumed that the defendant is demanding a speedy trial and a dismissal of the indictment by the court without the consent of the defendant, and holding him to answer another indictment for the same offense operates as an acquittal. Lee v. State, 26 Ark. 260, 265, 7 Am. Rep. 611.

Where an indictment is dismissed by the prosecuting attorney with the presumed consent of the court, even after a jury is sworn to try the case, the accused is not in a constitutional sense either "acquitted" or put in jeopardy, and hence the first indictment is not a bar to a second. Wilson v. Commonwealth, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 105, 106.

When a nolle prosequi is entered and the defendant discharged, he is acquitted. Morgan County Com'rs v. Johnson, 31 Ind. 463, 466.

To be a bar to a prosecution, an acquittal of the offense charged must be an acquittal in law and in fact by a verdict of a jury on a valid indictment, or by some competent tribunal that has jurisdiction of the offense. A nol. pros. does not amount to an acquittal, but the defendant may be again prosecuted for the same offense. State v. Champagne, 52 Vt. 313, 315, 38 Am. Rep. 754.

The word "acquitted" means an acquittal on a trial by a jury. Proof showing that the grand jury rejected a bill of indictment will not support the allegation that the party had been acquitted. Thomas v. De Graffenreid (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 143, 144.

As discharge.

Discharge distinguished, see "Discharge."

The word "acquitted," as used in a declaration for malicious prosecution which alleges that plaintiff was acquitted by the grand jury finding no bill, was construed as meaning discharged. "In common parlance, 'acquitted' is as clearly expressive of the idea intended to be conveyed as 'discharged.'" Teague v. Wilks (S. C.) 3 McCord, 461, 465.

As relating to civil proceedings.

In Const. art. 7, § 8, providing that in all prosecutions or indictments for libel the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and that if it shall appear that the matter charged as libelous is true the party shall be "acquitted," the word "acquitted" means a release from a debt, duty, or charge, as well as set free or cleared of an accusation, and hence the statute has reference to both civil and criminal prosecutions. Dolloway v. Turill (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 333, 400.

ACQUITTANCE.

The word "acquittance," as used in Gen. St. c. 114, § 1, providing for the punishment of those who alter, forge, or counterfeit acquittances, includes a receipt for money paid as part of the purchase money of a farm. State v. Shelters, 51 Vt. 102, 104, 31 Am. Rep. 679.

Act 11 Geo. IV, 1 Will. IV, c. 66, § 10, prohibits the forgery of "an acquittance or receipt" for money. Held, that a scrip certificate in a railroad company for £2 2s. per pair, entitling the holder to 50 shares in railroad stock, was not an accountable receipt nor an "acquittance or receipt" within the statute. Clark v. Newsam, 1 Exch. 131, 132.

ACROSS.

Laws 1890, c. 565, § 4, permitting a railroad company to construct its road "across, along or upon" any highway, means only a casual or incidental occupation and use of the highway, and does not authorize a company to build its entire railway along the highway. Burt v. Lima & H. F. R. Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 482, 483.

As denoting direction.

Where a deed conveying a lot of land reserved the right to the grantor of passing and repassing with teams in the most convenient place "across" the land conveyed, the term "across" did not necessarily confine the grantor to a right of way transversely over the lot, but the lot being nearly in the form of a parallelogram, and the grant being of one-half thereof divided longitudinally, and it appearing that the rear end of the grantor's land not conveyed was separated from the front where the grantor's buildings were by an impassable barrier, the reservation should be construed to mean the right of passing in the most convenient route over the field to the grantor's buildings, though in so doing it was necessary to pass over the lot transversely and lengthwise. Brown v. Meady, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 391, 395, 25 Am. Dec. 248.

"Across," as used in Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. Tex. 1897, art. 721, authorizing a channel and dock company to construct a channel "across, through or upon" the waters of any bay, warrants a channel in any direction. Davis v. Port Arthur Channel & Dock Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 512, 515, 31 C. C. A. 99.

"Across," as used in Act Cong. July 25, 1886 (14 Stat. 244), granting permission for the construction of a bridge "across" the Missouri river at Kansas City, and requiring that the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, means an opposite direction to length; that is, at right angles to the piers. Hannibal & St. J. Ry. Co. v. Missouri River Packet Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 874, 880, 125 U. S. 260, 31 L. Ed. 731.

As synonymous with over.

The words "over" and "across" may be used interchangeably, and as having the same meaning. Webster thus defines the word "across": From side to side; athwart; crosswise; quite over. He defines the word "over" as follows: Above or higher than, in place or position, with the idea of covering; across, from side to side of, upon the surface of. "Across," as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 24, art. 5, § 1, declaring that a city council shall have power to extend any street over or "across" any railroad track, right of way, or line of any railroad company, designates a crossing at grade, or on the same level as the railroad right of way, while the word "over" is broad enough to confer power of extending the street above and over the track or right of way by means of a viaduct or bridge. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 30 N. E. 1044, 1046, 141 Ill. 586, 17 L. R. A. 530.

To say of a railway that it is built upon, over, or in the street, when, following the course of another street, it runs simply across the street, is not according to common usage. State v. Newport St. Ry. Co., 18 Atl. 161, 162, 16 R. I. 533.

As from side to side.

A deed reserving to the grantee the privilege of a road "across" a certain land did not entitle such grantee to enter at one place, "go partly across" the land, and then come out at another place on the same side of the lot, nor to drag timber from the grantee's wood lot on plaintiff's land for the purpose of turning it around, such use constituting a misuser of the right granted. Comstock v. Van Deusen, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 162, 166.

Where a deed reserves the right to maintain a drain "across" the land conveyed, the word "across" will not be construed so strictly and technically as to nullify the easement because the drain, in fact, ended in a cesspool on the land conveyed. Jones v. Adams, 38 N. E. 437, 438, 162 Mass. 224.

Under an act authorizing a company to improve the navigation of a stream, with power to take toll for timber floated "across" its waters, the word "across" will not be held to mean "floating" or "crossing over" from side to side of the stream, as the word imports a thing not needed, nor within the purport of the act. Appeal of Bennett's Branch Imp. Co., 65 Pa. (15 P. F. Smith) 242, 251.

ACROSS COUNTRY.

Tindal, C. J., said that the words "across a country," as used in an agreement for a steeple chase four miles "across a country," was not an expression of which the court could take a judicial notice, but that the evidence showed that it meant that the riders were to go over all obstructions and not avail themselves of open gates. Evans v. Pratt, 3 Man. & G. 759, 763.

ACT.

See "Die by His Own Hand or Act";
"Ministerial Act"; "Official Act";
"Overt Act"; "Taken in the Act."
All other acts, see "All Other."
Other acts, see "Other."

An act signifies something done voluntarily by a person. An act is the result of the exercise of the will. Black says: "In a more technical sense it means something done voluntarily by the person, and of such a nature that certain legal consequences attach to it." Duncan v. Landis (U. S.) 106 Fed. 839, 848, 45 C. C. A. 666.

An act is that which is done or doing; the exercise of power, or the effect of which power exerted is the cause; a performance; a deed; something done or established. Thus, an indictment alleging that defendants did, in a violent and tumultuous manner, prevent the sheriff from removing a prisoner, charges the commission of an act. Green v. State, 35 S. E. 97, 99, 109 Ga. 536.

Under Gen. St. c. 193, § 21, providing that in all cases in which the death of any person ensues from injury inflicted by the wrongful act of another, and in which an action for damages might have been maintained at the common law had death not ensued, the person inflicting such injury shall be liable to an action, etc., it is held that the word "act" does not include mere passive neglect or omission of duty. Bradbury v. Furlong, 13 R. I. 15, 43 Am. Rep. 1.

A statute providing that no justice of the peace shall "act" in any cause in which he is an attorney means as has been decided in Town of New Hartford v. Town of Canaan, 52 Conn. 166, where the court says: "This language is so exceedingly broad, embracing in terms any act and proceeding, that we do not feel at liberty to accept the ideas of plaintiff's counsel and restrict its application exclusively to an actual trial in court before an interested magistrate." The object of such statute is to secure the utmost fairness and impartiality, and the construction which is in furtherance of that object should be most liberal. Yudkin v. Gates, 60 Conn. 426, 428, 22 Atl. 776.

"Acts," as used in a covenant in a lease that the lessee shall hold the premises without any lawful let, suit, interruption, eviction by the lessor, or by or through the lessor's "acts," construed to mean "something done by the person against whose acts the covenant is made." Spencer v. Marriott, 1 Barn. & C. 457, 459.

A cause of action for personal injuries against a railroad in the hands of receivers constitutes "an act or transaction" of receivers, within the meaning of the act of Congress authorizing suits against a receiver without leave of the court in which the receivership may be pending. Fordyce v. Withers, 20 S. W. 766, 767, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 540.

A deed wherein grantor covenants that he will, at the cost and request of the vendee, perform all "acts, deeds, conveyances and assurances" which may be wanting to the consummation of the vendee's title, embraces only such incumbrances as the vendor has control of. Where the defect in the title is one that cannot be supplied by him, as where there is an outstanding mortgage created by his grantor, vendor cannot be made liable upon such covenant. Armstrong v. Darby, 26 Mo. 517, 520.

The payment of an antecedent debt by a check, when the debtor knew he was unable to pay his debts, was an "act" constituting a preference, within a statute providing that any "act" in contemplation of insolvency should constitute an assignment. Taylor's Adm'r v. Taylor's Assignee, 78 Ky. 470, 472.

Intention implied.

"Act," as used in an insurance policy restricting liability in case of death of insured by his own "act," implies intention, and the words "by his own act or intention," whether "sane or insane," mean the same thing. Chapman v. Republic Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. 481, 482.

Offense distinguished.

The word "act" is not identical in meaning with the term "offense," as used in Const.

U. S. art. 1, § 7, providing that no person for the same offense shall be put twice in jeopardy of punishment, "for the same offense," which imports, in legal sense, an infraction or transgression of a law—the willful doing of an act which is forbidden by a law, or omitting to do what it commands. State v. Oleson, 5 N. W. 959, 969, 26 Minn. 507.

As representation in drama.

Act Aug. 18, 1856 (11 Stat. 138), confers on the author or proprietor of a copyrighted dramatic composition, suited for public representation, the sole right to "act, perform or represent" it on the stage. Held, that the words "act, perform or represent" mean representation in dialogue, and actions by persons who represent the composition as real by performing or going through the various parts or characters severally assigned to them. Daly v. Palmer (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 1182, 1185.

ACT (In Legislation).

"In legislation an act is a statute or law made by a legislative body, as 'an act of Congress is a law by the Congress of the United States, and an act of an assembly is a law made by the legislative assembly.' Bouv. Law Dict. Acts are general or special, public or private. All legislative acts are laws, and if not laws then they are not acts of legislation." People v. Tiphaine, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 241, 244.

The word "act" is equivalent to "statute." United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1167, 1170.

The word "act" is used as synonymous with "article." Deposit Bank v. Daviess County, 39 S. W. 1030, 1037, 102 Ky. 174, 44 L. R. A. 825.

In the Constitution of New York the words "bill," "law," and "act" are used somewhat indefinitely, but it seems that there is little difference between the terms. People v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 177, 187.

Bill or law distinguished.

The language of the constitutional provision that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, differs in some respects in the different states. In some the word "act" is used, while in others the word "bill" or "law" is used. However, each of these provisions as presented to the courts means the final determination of the Legislature upon the particular subject embraced in such "bill," "act," or "law." The word "act" is probably the best word to use, for it includes no action of the Legislature or of any person prior to the final act of the Legislature, and it includes the whole of the act, nothing more and nothing less. The word "law" is probably the worst word to use, for a portion of any act may be law as well as the whole of the act. The word, however, as used in such connection, is intended to be synonymous with "act." The word "bill" means the bill as it is first introduced, and as it may be at any time or in any of its stages until it is finally passed, signed by the necessary officers, and filed away as the highest evidence of what the law is. And when it is thus filed it is called the "enrolled bill." Where the constitutional provision uses the word "bill," it means that if any bill should in any stage be in conflict with the provision it should be amended by the Legislature, and, if the Legislature should fail to correct it, the bill itself, or some portion of it, would be void. Sedgwick County Com'rs v. Bailey, 13 Kan. 600, 608.

A "bill" is the draft or form of an act presented to the Legislature, but not enacted. An "act" is the appropriate term for it after it has been acted on and passed by the Legislature. It is then something more than a draft or form. It has a legal existence as an act of the legislative body, because it becomes a law without further action from any other branch of the government, if the executive take no measures to prevent it. Southwark Bank v. Commonwealth, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 446, 450.

Code.

The Code itself is but one act of the Legislature, no part of which, less than the whole, is properly designated by and as an "act." Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Pack, 9 W. Va. 397, 403.

As section of statute.

In its ordinary acceptation, this word includes the entire statute, but it is not so definite in its meaning that it may not be applied to a complete and independent section of the statute, if found in connection with it; and in the proviso of an act it may be used as a synonym of "section," so as to repeal or affect a section only of the act to which it refers. Rawls v. Kennedy, 23 Ala. 240, 249, 48 Am. Dec. 289.

The word "act" as used in the first section of Act March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 635), provided that nothing in this "act" shall prevent the parties from making such contract as they please extending or limiting the liability of shipowners, refers to the whole act, and not merely to the provisions of such first section. Wright v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 635, 638.

As valid and existing act.

As used in Acts Called Sess. 1863, p. 13, providing that all overseers who are or shall be exempted or detained under "acts" of the Confederate Congress shall be exempt from militia duty in the state, the word "acts" is a noun, substantive, and does not signify any acts or laws yet to be made or passed, but acts now in force; existing acts. In re Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 367, 375.

As applied to the doings of legislative bodies, the term "act" means a statute which is constitutional and valid, and hence, where a statute repeals all acts inconsistent with itself, and it is itself unconstitutional, it is not an act, and hence there is no repeal of prior inconsistent legislation. People v. Tiplaine (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 74, 77.

ACT FORFEITTING CONFIDENCE.

The phrase "act forfeiting the confidence of the community," as used in a contract transferring the practice of one physician to another, in which the vendor agreed not to practice his profession in the community unless the vendee should commit some "act forfeiting the confidence of the community," means incompetency, immorality, or acts of such a nature as to induce reasonable persons to forbear employing the vendee in the practice of his profession. Gilman v. Dwight, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 356, 359, 74 Am. Dec. 634.

ACT OF BANKING.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

The word "act," as used in the expression "acts of bankruptcy," implies some act of the will on the part of the debtor, whether by way of active procurance or voluntary acquiescence. Duncan v. Landis (U. S.) 106 Fed. 839, 848, 45 C. C. A. 666.

A transfer of property by an insolvent debtor to a creditor is not an "act of bankruptcy," as being made with intent to prefer such creditor over his other creditors, unless there was at the time of the transfer some other creditor holding a claim or demand against the insolvent, such as would be provable in bankruptcy. Beers v. Hanlin (U. S.) 99 Fed. 695.

As a general proposition it cannot be disputed that a conveyance by deed by a trader of all his property to a particular creditor in prejudice to the rest is an "act of bankruptcy." The principle of all cases is that, if the conveyance of a particular creditor necessarily prevents the property of the trader from being distributed as the law requires in cases of bankruptcy, that is itself an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statutes relating thereto. Newton v. Chantler, 7 East, 137, 145.

The term "act of bankruptcy" embraces the act of a trader in buying goods and on the same day selling them at a loss of more than 30 per cent. Cook v. Caldecot, 4 Car. & P. 315, 316.

To constitute an "act of bankruptcy," under Bankr. Act 1898, § 3a, cl. 3, providing that it shall be an act of bankruptcy if an insolvent debtor shall suffer a creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings and not vacate or discharge the same at least five days before sale of the property affected, it is necessary that the debtor should suffer or permit, while insolvent, a judgment to go against him, which judgment would of itself be a preference under the act, and that he would then allow execution to be issued and proceedings to sell to be instituted by the necessary advertisement, and fail within five days of the time of the sale to vacate or discharge the judgment, and does not apply to the recovery of a judgment against the debtor for the foreclosure of the lien created by a deed in the nature of a mortgage, securing the payment of a promissory note and a levy on the land conveyed, where the note and security were given before the enactment of the bankruptcy law, and for a valid debt. In re Chapman (U. S.) 99 Fed. 895, 397.

ACT OF CONGRESS.

The words "act of Congress" are as strong and unequivocal as the statutes of Congress, and hence an allegation in an indictment that the act alleged was contrary to an act of Congress is equivalent to an allegation that they are contrary to a statute of Congress. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1167, 1170.

ACT OF GOD.

"The term has received a variety of definitions, differing rather in their mode than in the subject of their signification. It is said to be that which is occasioned exclusively by the violence of nature; by that kind of force of the elements which human ability could not have foreseen or prevented, such as lightning, tornado, sudden squall of wind, and the like. Again, it is said to be, at least, an act of nature which implies entire exclusion of all human agency, whether of the carrier himself or of third persons. It is called a disaster with which the agency of man has nothing to do. It is defined to be a natural necessity, which could not have been occasioned by the interference of man, but proceeds from physical causes alone." New Brunswick Steamboat & Canal Transp. Co. v. Tiers, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 697, 714, 64 Am. Dec. 394; Mershon v. Hobensack, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 372, 377; Fergusson v. Brent, 12 Md. 9, 31, 71 Am. Dec. 582; Sprowl v. Kellar (Ala.) 4 Stew. & P. 382, 386; McClary v. Sioux City & P. R. Co., 3 Neb. 44, 53, 19 Am. Rep. 631; Black v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 46 N. W. 428, 430, 30 Neb. 197; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Manning, 37 N. W. 462, 464, 23 Neb. 552; McHenry v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 4 Har. 448, 449; Pennewill v. Cullen (Del.) 5 Har. 238, 241; Brosseau v. The Hudson, 11 La. Ann. 427, 428; Bason v. Charleston & C. Steamboat Co. (S. C.) Harp. 262, 265; Ryan v. Dec. 406; The Majestic, 17 Sup. Ct. 597, 602, 166 U. S. 375, 41 L. Ed. 1039; Klauber v. American Exp. Co., 21 Wis. 21, 24, 91 Am. Dec. 452; Parmelee v. Lowitz, 74 Ill. 116, 117, 24 Am. Rep. 276; Wald v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ill.) 44 N. E. 888, 889, 35 L. R. A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332; Chevallier v. Straham, 2 Tex. 115, 124, 47 Am. Dec. 639; McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 190, 197; Elliott v. Rossell, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 1, 11, 6 Am. Dec. 306; Clay County v. Simonson, 46 N. W. 592, 596, 1 Dak. 403; Dorman v. Ames, 12 Minn. 451 (Gil. 347, 362).

An act of God signifies any inevitable accident, and is construed to mean in law something in opposition to the act of man, as "storms, tempests, and lightning." "Everything, indeed, as Lord Mansfield says in Forward v. Pittard, 1 Term R. 31, is an act of God that happens by His permission and by His knowledge;" but in legal acceptation the act of God is such an act as could not happen by the intervention of man. Every other kind of impossibility the law requires of every man to guard against in his contract, or to perform his contract or work notwithstanding the casualty. Niblo v. Binsse (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 54, 62.

By "act of God" is meant some inevitable accident which cannot be prevented by human care, skill, or foresight, but results from natural causes, such as lightning, tempests, floods, and inundations. McHenry v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 4 Har. 448. The act of God denotes such causes as are beyond the control of carriers, and produce loss without the interference of human agencies. Klair v. Wilmington Steamboat Co. (Del.) 54 Atl. 694, 695.

"Act of God" means something superhuman, or something in opposition to the act of man. Hale v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., 15 Conn. 539, 544, 39 Am. Dec. 398.

The term "act of God" means something overwhelming, and not merely an incidental circumstance. Oakley v. Portsmouth & Ryde Steam Packet Co., 11 Exch. 618, 623.

"The earliest use of the term act of God that we can find in our law books is by Sir Edward Coke, 1 Co. 97b, in 1581, in Shelley's Case, speaking of the death of a man, and he seems to have been fond of it, for he uses it often afterwards (5 Co. 87a, 22a, 1 Inst. 206a), also meaning death; and 10 Co. 139b, where it is applied to a sudden tempest breaking down sea-walls, and refers to the statute, where the term is 'inevitable dangers or necessity,' without any fault of him who is bound to repair. Moreover, Coke used the phrase, 'the act of God excuses,' as equivalent to 'impotentia excusata legem,' and also as equivalent to an accident which is 'so inevitable that by no providence or industry of him who is bound it can be prevented,' or, as in Shelley's Case, 'which no industry could avoid nor policy prevent.' Again, he uses the phrase, in 1601, as applicable to a sudden storm (1 Bulst. 280, 1 Roll. Rep. 79); and certainly that is one of the many kinds of inevitable accidents that may be so described. After our separation from England, in 1875, Lord Mansfield, in Forward v. Pittard, 1 Term R. 27, introduced a somewhat different view, holding that to be an act of God it must be such a one as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightning, and tempests." Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. (9 Jones & S.) 378, 380, 80 Am. Dec. 627.

An act of God involves some notion of an accident from natural causes impossible to be foreseen and impossible to be guarded against, such as storms, lightning, and tempest; such as a bank or shoal unknown to navigators, or suddenly formed in the ocean. Ewart v. Street (S. C.) 2 Bailey, 157, 162, 23 Am. Dec. 131.

An act of God, to relieve from performance of a contract, must be such as a person of reasonable prudence and foresight could not have guarded against. Where a steamship company contracted to carry a passenger to a certain port, an ice block preventing the port being reached was an act of God excusing the breach. Bullock v. White Star Steamship Co., 70 Pac. 1106, 1108, 30 Wash. 448.

The "act of God" which excuses a common carrier from liability must be the immediate and distinct result of providential events, sudden or overwhelming in their character, which human foresight could not foresee. Tompkins v. The Dutchess of Ulster (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 32, 35.

An act of God which excuses a common carrier must be the immediate, and not the remote, cause of the loss. Steele v. McTyer's Adm'r, 31 Ala. 667, 675, 70 Am. Dec. 516.

The mere failure of a common carrier to forward goods promptly will not render him liable for loss occasioned proximately by the act of God, if guilty of no wrongful detention of them at place of shipment or of negligence or want of care and diligence. Lamont v. Nashville & C. R. Co., 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 58, 60.

Inevitable or unavoidable accident.

Act of God "is natural necessity," as winds and storms which arise from natural causes, and is distinct from inevitable accident. Trent & Mersey Nav. Co. v. Wood, 4 Doug. 287, 290.

"The expressions 'act of God,' and 'unavoidable accident' have sometimes been used in a similar sense, and as equivalent terms, but there is a distinction. That may be an unavoidable or inevitable accident which no foresight or protection of the carrier could prevent; but the phrase 'act of God' denotes natural accidents which could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightning, and tempests." Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 115, 116, 86 Am. Dec. 292; Redpath v. Vaughan, 52 Barb. 489, 499.

The term "inevitable accident," as used to represent one of the contingencies which will excuse a carrier for loss of goods, has been criticised as a relaxation of the stringent rule of the common law, and as embracing cases of accident which must be regarded as inevitable, though not happening from causes that fall under the legal definition of an act of God or of the public enemy. Such would be the irresistible force of robbers, or a fire commencing elsewhere and spreading to the place in which the goods were kept by the carrier. Angell on Carriers, §§ 154-156. And so, where the jury were instructed that the carrier was liable for every injury except such as human care and foresight could not prevent, the instruction was, if anything, too favorable to the carrier, since inevitable accidents, unless such as can be classed under the legal head of acts of God or the public enemy, will not excuse them. Hall v. Cheney, 36 N. H. 26, 30.

"Act of God" not only denotes natural accidents, such as lightning, earthquakes, and tempests, but it embraces all other unavoidable or inevitable accidents; and hence a bill of lading for the carriage of goods by a common carrier, which excepts the carrier from liability for "unavoidable dangers and accidents of the road," does not restrict the general liability of a common carrier, who is always excepted from liability for losses caused by "act of God." Walpole v. Bridges (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 222, 223.

The words "inevitable accident," which are preferred by some to "acts of God," because more reverent, are not adequate to express the ground of a common carrier's excuse; for accidents arising from human force or fraud are sometimes inevitable. But "the act of God" denotes natural accidents, such as lightning, earthquakes, and tempests, and not accidents arising from the fault or negligence of man. McArthur v. Sears (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 190, 197.

"Act of God" is not absolutely synonymous with "inevitable accident," but the latter term properly refers to an immediate result, springing from a general cause, which is properly an "act of God." Blythe v. Denver & R. G. R. Co., 25 Pac. 702, 704, 15 Colo. 333, 11 L. R. A. 615, 22 Am. St. Rep. 403.

As irresistible, superhuman cause.

The phrase, "irresistible and superhuman cause," as used in section 1611, Civ. Code, providing that performance of obligations shall be excused when it is prevented or delayed by such cause, is equivalent to the phrase "act of God," and refers to those natural causes the effects of which cannot be prevented by the exercise of prudence, diligence, or care, and the use of those appliances which the situation of the party renders it reasonable that he should employ. Fay v. Pacific Imp. Co., 28 Pac. 1099, 1100, 28 Pac. 943, 93 Cal. 253, 19 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; Ryan v. Rogers, 31 Pac. 244, 245, 96 Cal. 349.

As without negligence.

The expression "act of God" denotes natural accidents, and not accidents arising from the negligence of man—"something in opposition to the act of man." Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115; Central Line of Boats v. Lowe, 50 Ga. 509, 511.

Precisely what is meant by the expression "act of God," as used in the case of carriers, has undergone discussion, but it is agreed that the notion of exception is those losses and injuries occasioned exclusively by natural causes, such as could not be prevented by human care, skill, and foresight. All the cases agree in requiring the entire exclusion of human agency from the cause of the injury or loss. If the loss happened in any way through the agency of man, it cannot be considered the "act of God"; nor even if the act or negligence of man contributes to bring or leave the goods of the carrier under the operation of natural causes that work their injury is he excused. In short, to excuse the carrier the "act of God" must be the sole and immediate cause of injury. If there be any co-operation of man, or any admixture of human means, the injury is not, in a legal sense, the "act of God." Michaels v. New York Cent. R. Co., 30 N. Y. 564, 571, 86 Am. Dec. 415.

"A common carrier, in order to claim exemption from liability for damage to goods in transportation, though injured by what is deemed an 'act of God,' must be without fault himself. His act or neglect must not contribute to the injury. If he departs from the line of duty, and violates his contract, and while thus in fault, and in consequence of that fault, the goods are injured by the act of God, which would not otherwise have caused damage, he is not protected." Read v. Spaulding, 18 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Bosw.) 395, 408.

The term "act of God," as used with reference to the liability of a common carrier for loss of goods, means a loss from a cause which could not have been prevented by any human prudence or foresight, or loss occurring notwithstanding the fact that the carrier had provided a safe carriage or vessel adequate for the purpose, with a conductor or crew of competent skill and ability. But, if the carrier fails to provide such vessel, conductor, or crew, though the loss be occasioned by the act of God, he will not be permitted to set up such providential calamity to protect himself against what may have arisen from his own folly. Hart v. Allen (Pa.) 2 Watts, 114, 115.

Climatic conditions.

A heavy dew delaying a railway train is not an "act of God," relieving the railway company from liability. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Truskett, 53 S. W. 444, 448, 2 Ind. T. 638.

The inclement weather, such as is frequently experienced in this climate, is not to be regarded as the "act of God," in the sense in which that phrase is to be judicially understood in determining whether a party to a contract should be excused from noncompliance therewith simply because he was prevented from performing his obligation in the premises by rains or freezes which were natural and to be expected. Cannon v. Hunt, 42 S. E. 734, 736, 116 Ga. 452.

Collision.

A collision between two steamboats on a river, by which one of them was sunk without any carelessness on its part, and by reason of carelessness on the part of the other, is not an act of God, within the meaning of the rule that a carrier is excused from liability for an accident resulting from an act of God, but is an act resulting from human agency. Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. 378, 380, 80 Am. Dec. 627.

A collision of vessels which may accrue through natural causes alone, as by the violence of the wind, may be called an "act of God," and excuse the carrier from liability; but when it occurs through the negligence of either party it can by no sound reasoning be brought within the meaning of that expression. If negligence is imputable to either party, the carrier is not excused. Mershon v. Hobensack, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 372, 377.

A steamer having in tow a boat loaded with goods stopped to avoid another vessel, when the waves lifted and threw the tow-boat on the rudder of the steamer, staving in the side of the boat, whereby the goods were injured. In this case the proximate cause of the injury was the stopping of the steamer. Oakley v. Portsmouth & Ryde Steam Packet Co., 11 Exch. 618, 623.

Contagious disease.

The performance of a contract will only be excused as being prevented by the "act of God" when there are intervening circumstances which render performance impossible, and not when they only make it difficult or undesirable; and hence the suspension of a school by reason of an epidemic of a contagious disease does not defeat the right of the teacher to compensation under his contract. Dewey v. Alpena School Dist., 5 N. W. 646, 647, 43 Mich. 480, 38 Am. Rep. 206; Gear v. Gray, 37 N. E. 1059, 1061, 10 Ind. App. 428.

Defective appliances, material, etc.

The loss of a bale of cotton, while being transported on a steamboat by the breaking of a hog chain against which it was placed, the break being on account of a secret flaw in the iron, was not the result of an act of God or unavoidable accident. The chain ought to have been made stronger; it ought to have been tested. The case is one of a simple failure to have a good vessel. Centra' Line of Boats v. Lowe, 50 Ga. 509, 511.

Where the bottom of a dock in a river had a considerable declivity, and vessels grounding there on the outflow of the tide do not lie on an even keel, injury to goods in the hold of a vessel so grounding, caused by the flow of the bilge water to the lower end of the vessel, cannot be attributed to an act of God, so as to excuse the carrier from liability. Such result was one naturally to be foreseen, and against which it was the duty of the carrier to guard. Ewart v. Street (S. C.) 2 Bailey, 157, 162, 23 Am. Dec. 131.

An act of God is commonly illustrated by such natural convulsions as tempests, lightning, earthquakes, the unknown shifting of shoals, and the like, and it is said that the act of God means something in opposition to the act of man. A loss to a vessel occasioned by the shifting of a buoy is not caused by an act of God. Reaves v. Waterman (S. C.) 2 Speers, 197, 206, 42 Am. Dec. 364.

Where a steamboat stranded in entering a harbor in the nighttime, in consequence of the master mistaking a light upon a stranded vessel for a light usually exhibited by the keeper of the beacon light, by means whereof the plaintiff sustained damage, the accident was not the result of an act of God. McArthur v. Sears (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 190, 197.

Damage to goods stored in the hold of a vessel, occasioned by the bursting of casks of chloride of lime, such accident, being attributable to an excess of unslacked lime in the composition of the chloride, cannot be attributed to an act of God, but resulted from human agency or negligence. Brosseau v. The Hudson, 11 La. Ann. 427, 428.

Earthquake.

An earthquake is an "act of God." Slater v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 6 S. E. 936, 937, 29 S. C. 96.

Fire.

Loss by fire does not constitute loss by "act of God." Thus, where a carrier failed to deliver goods by reason of their being destroyed in the great Chicago fire, he was not exempt from liability on the ground that they were destroyed by the act of God. Merchants' Despatch Co. v. Smith, 76 Ill. 542, 544; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Sawyer, 69 Ill. 285, 289, 18 Am. Rep. 613.

Accidental fire not caused by lightning, which destroyed the building in which the county treasurer had his office, and with it all the money, books, records, and documents connected with his office, is not an act of God, since it is not an irresistible, superhuman cause, and will not excuse him from performance of the obligation of his bond, requiring him to well and faithfully and impartially perform the duties and execute the office, it not being specially so stipulated, and he not being bound only to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence. Clay County v. Simonsen, 46 N. W. 592, 596, 1 Dak. 403.

Destruction by an accidental fire, not caused by lightning, is not an act of God so as to excuse the carrier, though the proximate cause of the burning was a sudden gust of wind diverting the course of a distant fire, so as to drive the flames in the direction of and upon them. Miller v. Steam Nav. Co., 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 431.

Where a carrier, while transporting cotton by wagon, placed the wagons containing the cotton within 15 feet of a campfire, and during the night the wind arose and ignited the cotton by sparks blown from such campfire, the loss was the result of the carrier's negligence, and not an act of God. Chevalier v. Straham, 2 Tex. 115, 124, 47 Am. Dec. 639.

An accidental fire is not deemed so far the act of God as to be received as a legal excuse for the nonperformance of a contract, and where a plumber contracted to furnish the materials and do the work of plumbing in a building then in the process of construction, for a gross sum, and before the work was complete the building was destroyed by an accidental fire, he could not recover for the work done. Niblo v. Binsse (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 54, 60.

Flood.

An unusual and extraordinary flood or freshet in a river is such an act of God as excuses a common carrier from his liability at all events for goods he has undertaken to transport. Wallace v. Clayton, 42 Ga. 443, 446; Backus v. Start (U. S.) 13 Fed. 69, 71; Strouss v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 209, 213; Dorman v. Ames, 12 Minn. 451 (Gil. 347, 362); New Haven & Northampton Co. v. Quintard, 31 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sweeny) 89, 97; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Daniel, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 261, 262.

"While every shower of rain that falls upon the earth is an act of God, in contradistinction to the act of man, yet an ordinary freshet is not the act of God in the legal sense, which protects a man against responsibility for the nonperformance of a contract." Doster v. Brown, 25 Ga. 24, 26, 71 Am. Dec. 153.

A common carrier assumes all risks except those caused by the "act of God" and the public enemy. One of the instances mentioned by elementary writers of loss by the act of God is the case of loss by flood and storm. When a common carrier shows that a loss was by an act of God, as by flood, he is excused without proving affirmatively that he was not guilty of negligence. In the case of a loss for which the proximate cause was the act of God, the common carrier was excused, though his own negligence might have contributed to the loss as a remote cause. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 176, 189, 19 L. Ed. 909.

An act of God is an act which no human prudence or power can prevent or avert. While it is true that no human agent can prevent or stay an act of God, the act itself being that of omnipotence, it is frequently the case that the result or natural consequence of an act of God by the exercise of reasonable foresight and prudence may be foreseen and guarded against. Where this can be done by the exercise of reasonable diligence and prudence, a failure to do so would be negligence, and subject the party upon whom this duty devolves to danger, though the original cause was an act of God. The sudden and unprecedented overflow of a river is such an act of God as would relieve a railroad company from liability and danger to freight caused thereby, if after knowledge of the danger the company did not unnecessarily expose it, but made all effort to save it. Smith v. Western Ry. of Alabama, 8 South. 754, 91 Ala. 455, 11 L. R. A. 619, 24 Am. St. Rep. 929.

The term "act of God," in its legal sense, applies only to events in nature so extraordinary that the history of climatic variations and other conditions in the particular locality affords no reasonable warning of them; and, where injuries were caused from timber being floated by a lumber company during a flood, liability therefor could not be avoided on the ground that the flood was an act of God, where from the climatic and geographical conditions the flood might have been expected, though it occurred infrequently. Gulf Red Cedar Co. v. Walker, 31 South. 374, 375, 132 Ala. 553.

In an action against a railroad company for failure to deliver fruit trees shipped over it until they had died, it was contended that owing to the floods in river along which the railroad ran that the railroad company was not liable, floods amounting to an "act of God." It was held, however, that as there was no proof that such floods were not to be anticipated, or that the railroad had been so constructed as to withstand the same, or that the company was unable to transmit the trees in question promptly over another line, they were not exempt from liability. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Manning, 37 N. W. 462, 464, 23 Neb. 552.

Where goods in a railroad depot, near a river, were injured by an extraordinary flood rising higher than any flood had ever risen before, which it was no negligence not to anticipate, and from which, when the rise of the water became apparent, the goods could not be delivered, if the carrier in the due discharge of his duty had the goods in the regular and usual course of transportation, so that their being in the depot at the time was proper, the injury is by the act of God in such sense that the carrier is excused. But it is the duty of the carrier to carry and deliver within a reasonable time; and if when the goods were in the depot, and the flood came, he had violated his duty, and was under the actual pressure of fault and neglect, without which the goods would have been safe, he is not excused. Read v. Spaulding, 18 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Bosw.) 395, 396; Michaels v. New York Cent. R. Co., 30 N. Y. 564, 571, 86 Am. Dec. 415.

The Johnstown flood, caused by the breaking of a dam, which retained a large volume of water at a high elevation, due to extraordinary and unprecedented rains, and thereby letting into a narrow valley a large volume of water, 20 to 30 feet in height, was an act of God. Wald v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co., 44 N. E. 888, 889, 162 Ill. 545, 35 L. R. A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332.

Under the definitions of "act of God," the performance of a contract was not excused by the fact that an unbridged river between defendant's residence and the place of performance was swollen by recent rains and impassable at the time set for the performance, it not being shown that such a condition of the river was unusual at that season of the year, and could not have been anticipated by ordinary prudence. Ryan v. Rogers, 31 Pac. 244, 245, 96 Cal. 349.

Injury to land caused by the overflow of water from a canal cannot be attributed to an act of God, where the owner of the canal permitted sand to accumulate in the canal, but for which accumulation the overflow would not have occurred. Chidester v. Consolidated Ditch Co., 59 Cal. 197, 202.

Where a tenant covenanted to keep the premises in repair, damages by the elements or acts of Providence only excepted, and the premises were damaged by reason of a torrent of water sweeping through them, the water flowing from a reservoir, and the overflow being caused by an injury to the embankment by some person or persons unknown, such damage was not occasioned by the act of God, but by the act of such third person, and the tenant was liable for the repairs. Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115.

Freezing.

It is held that the freezing of a canal so as to stop traffic is an "act of God," excusing the carrier for failure to make immediate delivery. Parsons v. Hardy (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 215, 218, 28 Am. Dec. 521.

The freezing of a river is such an act of God as excuses performance of a contract to tow a vessel thereon. It is an act to which human agency does not contribute and cannot control, and therefore for the consequences of which a party is not responsible. Worth v. Edmonds, 52 Barb. 40, 43.

Where a steamship brought a consignment of oranges to New York, and the weather was so cold as to render it impossible to land the oranges without injuring them, and continuing below zero for several days, and the oranges were landed in spite of the consignee's objections, and their value for the most part destroyed, the act which destroyed the fruit was not the act of God, but of man, in discharging the fruit at an unseasonable time. The Aline (U. S.) 19 Fed. 875, 876; Wessels v. The Aline (U. S.) 25 Fed. 562, 568.

A quantity of wine in casks and cases was delivered at New York to a common carrier, to be transported and delivered at St. Louis. When the wine arrived at East St. Louis the weather was severely cold, and, on account of the ice floating in the river, it could not be carried across. The carrier had it taken from the cars, and stored on a platform, where it was exposed to all the severity and inclemency of the weather for two or three days, during which time it was badly frozen and greatly damaged in value. Under the circumstances, although the cold weather which caused the freezing was the act of God, the carrier was not released from responsibility for the loss, as the freezing of the wine could and should have been guarded against by protecting it, and could not be attributed to the act of God. Wolf v. American Exp. Co., 43 Mo. 421, 425, 97 Am. Dec. 406.

The freezing of perishable articles by reason of an unusual intensity of cold is not such an "act of God" as will excuse the carrier if the accident might have been prevented by the exercise of due diligence and care on the carrier's part. Wing v. New York & E. R. Co. (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 235, 243.

Where fruit trees shipped on a railroad were frozen on the way, the freezing was held to be an act of God, unless caused by unnecessary delay or by careless exposure to cold. Vall v. Pac. R. Co., 63 Mo. 230, 232.

Such an accident as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightning, and tempests, losses that are occasioned by the violence of nature, by that kind of force of the elements which human ability could not have foreseen or prevented, and extraordinary convulsions of nature, and the like, are acts of God. Freezing weather, coming especially in that season of the year when such weather may be expected, cannot be brought within the definition of acts of God. McGraw v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 361, 364, 41 Am. Rep. 696.

Illness.

Under the expression "act of God" are comprehended all misfortunes and actions arising from inevitable necessity which human prudence could not foresee or prevent. Hence it is held that illness, being beyond the power of man to control or prevent, is the act of God. Fish v. Chatman, 2 Ga. 349, 356, 46 Am. Dec. 393; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 859, 861, 140 U. S. 435, 35 L. Ed. 458; Sanders v. Coleman, 34 S. E. 621, 622, 97 Va. 690, 47 L. R. A. 581.

The illness of a party, whereby he is prevented from fulfilling his contract, is to be regarded as an "act of God." Dickey v. Linscott, 20 Me. (2 App. & 7 Shep.) 453, 456, 37 Am. Dec. 66.

While the death of the principal in a bail bond would be an "act of God" in legal contemplation, excusing his appearance, illness, however severe and critical, is not. Ringeman v. State, 34 South. 351, 352, 136 Ala. 131.

Obstructions at sea.

Injury to a vessel caused by striking on a rock or pile not before known to be there may be attributed to an act of God, and the carrier is not liable for injuries resulting therefrom. But if the rock or pile were previously known, it was the duty of the carrier to avoid it, and the injury would be the result of his own negligence. Pennewill v. Cullen (Del.) 5 Har. 238, 241; Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 487, 491, 7 Am. Dec. 235.

The loss of goods resulting from the vessel running upon a known rock in a dense fog was not caused by an act of God, so as to exonerate the carrier. Fergusson v. Brent, 12 Md. 9, 31, 71 Am. Dec. 582.

By the "act of God" is meant something that operates without any aid or interference from man. The sinking of a steamboat caused by coming in contact with the mast of a schooner which had sunk in a squall two days before was not caused by the act of God, though the sinking of the sloop was caused by the act of God. Mynard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co., 71 N. Y. 180, 187, 27 Am. Rep. 28 (citing and approving Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 115, 116, 86 Am. Dec. 292).

A defense that loss of goods on board ship, occasioned by water breaking through broken ports, was the result of an act of God, is not sustained by evidence that a short time before the injury was discovered the ship, during a rough sea, passed through some floating wreckage, there being no evidence tending to prove that the port was broken by the wreckage, nor any attempt to show why the ship did not steer away from it nor reduce its speed, nor any satisfactory proof that the ports were properly closed when the vessel sailed, or properly inspected afterwards. The Majestic, 17 Sup. Ct. 597, 602, 166 U. S. 375, 41 L. Ed. 1039.

Perils of the sea.

"An act of God" which will exempt the carrier by sea from liability for the loss of the cargo may include a peril of the sea; but there may be perils of the sea that are not embraced in the terms "act of God," as against which the carrier can only escape liability by such special contract as the law permits. Clyde Steamship Co. v. Burrows, 18 South. 349, 351, 36 Fla. 121.

Within the rule that a common carrier by sea is not liable to loss resulting from an "act of God," that term means something in opposition to the act of man. The phrase "perils of the sea," which are generally defined to be such accidents as ordinarily result from navigation upon that element, is not entirely coincident with what is, in many cases, understood by the "act of God." The destruction of a vessel by rats, the precaution of keeping a cat on board having been adopted, has been adjudged a peril of the sea; yet this could hardly be deemed a loss by the act of God, and could have no resemblance to lightning and tempests, so often named as instances that which would exonerate a common carrier from loss. It is well settled that a fire, not the effect of lightning, occurring at sea, is a peril of the sea; yet an accident so happening is not accounted an act of God, excusing the common carrier from responsibility. Plaisted v. Boston & K. Steam Nav. Co., 27 Me. (14 Shep.) 132, 135.

"All that can be required of the carrier is that he shall do all that is reasonably and practically possible to insure the safety of the goods. If he uses all the known means to which prudent and experienced carriers ordinarily have recourse, he does all that can be reasonably required of him; and if under such circumstances he is overpowered by storm or other natural agency, he is within the rule that gives immunity from the effects of such vis major as the act of God. I do not think that because some one may have discovered some more efficient method of securing the goods, which has not become generally known, or because it cannot be proved that, if the skill and ingenuity of engineers or other were directed to the subject, something more efficient might not be produced, that the carrier can be made liable. I find no authority for saying that the vis major must be such as no amount of human care or skill could have resisted, or the injury such as no human ability could have prevented." Nugent v. Smith (Eng.) 3 Cent. Law J. 611, 612.

An act of God sufficient to relieve a carrier for the loss of goods will be construed to include a loss occasioned by goods cast into the sea by the command of the master of a vessel in order to protect vessel and crew in storm. Gillett v. Ellis, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 579, 580.

Where a box of books placed in the cabin of a vessel was injured by bilge water, on the vessel grounding at low tide in entering a stream, although the grounding was unavoidable, the carrier was not excused from liability because it was his duty to place the cargo in such position that it would not be injured by the bilge water when the grounding occurred. Bason v. Charleston & C. Steamboat Co. (S. C.) Harp. 262, 265.

Rain.

Extraordinary floods, storms of unusual violence, sudden tempests, severe frosts, great droughts, lightnings, earthquakes, sudden deaths and illnesses, have been held to be acts of God; but an ordinary rain, which caused a landslide in a cut on a railroad from ten to twenty feet deep, which was not of unusual violence, and the probable results thereof would be the softening of the superficial earth, reasonably to be anticipated, cannot be considered an act of God. Gleeson v. Virginia Midland Ry. Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 859, 861, 140 U. S. 435, 35 L. Ed. 458.

An unprecedented storm is an "act of God," against which a railroad company was not bound to prepare in constructing a ditch to carry away surface water from adjoining land, and is not liable for damages resulting from an extraordinary and severe storm which would have produced the injury complained of if a sufficient ditch had been in existence. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. v. Williams, 58 S. W. 570, 571, 3 Ind. T. 352.

An express company exposing goods wrapped in paper to rain, while taking them from the railroad station to its office, whereby the goods were injured, is liable for the damage, such injury being attributable not to the rain as an act of God, but to the negligence of the express company in exposing the goods to the rain. Klauber v. American Exp. Co., 21 Wis. 21, 24, 91 Am. Dec. 452.

It is the duty of the carrier, after transporting goods to the point of destination, to either deliver them to the consignee, or have them put in some safe place for security and protection. And where a railroad company at the place of destination unloaded the goods, and left them exposed, where they were injured by a storm, the injury resulted from the negligence of the carrier, and not from an act of God. McHenry v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 4 Har. 448, 449.

The loss caused to goods unloaded from a vessel by a sudden storm and downpour of rain does not fall within the scope of the phrase "act of God," which was one of the exceptions in the bill of lading; for to constitute the peril contemplated by that exception it would be necessary to show that the damage was due to some inevitable necessity, which was beyond the control of human agency, and that no act of omission or commission contributed thereto. The St. Georg (U. S.) 95 Fed. 172, 177.

Snow.

An unprecedented snowstorm, of such violence as to obstruct the moving of trains, falls within the term "act of God." Pruitt v. Hannibal & St. Joseph R. Co., 62 Mo. 527; Black v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 46 N. W. 428, 430, 30 Neb. 197; Ballentine v. North Missouri R. Co., 40 Mo. 491, 504, 93 Am. Dec. 315.

Storm.

The term "act of God" may be applied to the breaking of an electric wire by a storm. Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. (Del.) 32 Atl. 643, 645, 9 Houst. 306.

That a severe storm produced an unusually low tide, and thereby caused the carrier's barge to strike against a timber projecting from the wharf, so low as in ordinary tides to be no cause of injury, will not excuse the carrier for the loss of goods occasioned by the timber piercing the vessel. In such case the proximate cause of the injury was the defect in the dock, and not the storm. New Brunswick Steamboat & Canal Transp. Co. v. Tiers, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 697, 714, 64 Am. Dec. 394.

Where a flatboat on which cotton was loaded was in tow of a steamboat, which was compelled to lie to on account of a storm, was discovered to have taken in water, and the cotton was unloaded, and after an examination of the boat, and conclusion that the bottom was not injured, the cotton was reloaded on the boat, when it immediately sank, an instruction that if the jury believed that the sinking was occasioned by an injury to the boat received from the violence of the storm, and that due care and skill were exercised in the examination of the boat, the carrier would not be liable, was properly refused. Sprowl v. Kellar (Ala.) 4 Stew. & P. 382, 386.

What may be called an "act of God" has sometimes occasioned differences of sentiment, but the best opinion is that the act of God is something in which the act of man has no part, such as lightning, tempest, wind, etc. In our rivers, which are interspersed with falls and rapids, a sudden squall, not amounting to storm or tempest, might have such effect as to defeat all human skill and diligence, and should be considered as an act of God. Gordon v. Little (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 533, 553, 11 Am. Dec. 632.

Wind.

A loss occasioned by a sudden gust of wind, such as rarely happens, is caused by the act of God. Spencer v. Daggett, 2 Vt. 92, 96.

Where a passenger on a railroad train was injured by the car being blown from the track by a sudden gust of wind, the injury resulted from an act of God; and the fact that the train was three-fourths of an hour behind time, and had it been on time would have been several miles from the point where the accident occurred at the time of the storm, did not make the carrier liable. McClary v. Sioux City & P. R. Co., 3 Neb. 44, 53, 19 Am. Rep. 631.

Injury to a boat caused by a sudden gust of wind, while navigating a well-known and dangerous rapid, cannot be attributed to an act of God, where the gust was not unusual, and the injury would not have occurred but for the want of care and skill in steering the boat. Elliott v. Rossell (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 1, 11, 6 Am. Dec. 306.

Where a vessel transporting teas could not enter a harbor on account of low stage of water, and reshipped the teas on board of keelboats, one of which was driven by a sudden squall of wind and snow sideways, and upset, whereby the teas were wet and damaged, the carrier was not excused from liability, unless such boat was well fitted for the voyage, properly manned, with a captain of experience, and every reasonable exertion made to save her. Hart v. Allen (Pa.) 2 Watts, 114, 115.

An act of God is an event which happens without the intervention of man, and which could not have been prevented by any human prudence; as where a vessel was beating up the Hudson against a light and variable wind, and being near the shore, and while changing her tack, the wind suddenly failed, in consequence of which she ran aground and sunk, the sudden failure of the wind was the act of God. Colt v. McMechen (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 160, 166, 5 Am. Dec. 200.

A carrier is not liable for an injury caused by an "act of God," where the attending circumstances show no concurring negligence of the carrier. Plaintiff delivered to defendant, a carrier, a wagon to be transported to another town. It was placed upon the platform customarily used for loading wagons, etc., on the cars. During the night the wagon was blown off the platform by a whirlwind, and injured, resulting in the delay of the shipment. Held, that defendant was not liable for the delay. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Compton (Tex.) 38 S. W. 220, 221.

ACT OF INSOLVENCY.

An "act of insolvency" by a bank is an act which shows the bank to be insolvent, such as nonpayment of its circulating notes, bills of exchange, or certificates of deposit, failure to make good the impairment of capital, or to keep good its surplus or reserve; in fact, any act which shows that the bank is unable to meet its liabilities as they mature, or to perform those duties which the law imposes for the purpose of sustaining its credit. In re Manufacturers' Nat. Bank (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 665, 669.

An act of insolvency takes place when a business concern or a bank has failed to pay some of its obligations, made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, suspended business, or done any of those things which indicate to creditors that a debtor has become insolvent. Hayden v. Chemical National Bank (U. S.) 84 Fed. 874, 876, 28 C. C. A. 548.

"Act of insolvency, which is an occasional act frequently passed by the legislature, whereby all persons whatsoever who are either in too low a way of dealing to become bankrupts, or, not being in a mercantile state of life, are not included within the laws of bankruptcy, are discharged from all suits and imprisonment, upon delivering up all their estate and effects to their creditors upon oath." In re Klein (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 719, 728 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 484).

The making of a general assignment is not evidence of insolvency only; it is an act of insolvency itself; for a man who has put all his property out of his hands cannot himself pay his debts as they come due in the ordinary course of business. Merrill v. Bowler, 38 Atl. 114, 116, 20 R. I. 226.

ACT OF THE LAW.

When used to define a reason by which a person has been prevented from forming a contract, etc., the expression, "act of the law," means an act performed by judicial authority, which prevents or precludes a compliance with the contract. The defense is like that of the act of God, differing from it only in the facts constituting it. Thus it is settled that where one becomes bail for another he will be exonerated where the performance of his condition to surrender the defendant becomes impossible by the reason of the principal's death before the day of performance, since performance is rendered impossible by act of God; but where the court before which the principal was bound to appear is abolished without qualification the principal in that case will be exonerated from his failure to surrender by "act of the law." Taylor v. Taintor, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 366, 369, 21 L. Ed. 287 (citing People v. Bartlett [N. Y.] 3 Hill, 571; Co. Litt. 206a; Bac. Abr. tit. "Conditions" [2]; Vin. Abr. tit. "Condition" [G. C.] pl. 18, 19, and Id., [I. c.] pl. 16; Hurl. Bonds, 48).

ACT OF OWNERSHIP.

Within an instruction that if the jury believed that plaintiff and those under whom he claimed title for more than thirty years prior to the vesting of the land in controversy, continuously exercised "acts of ownership" over such land, and that defendant during that time had never asserted or claimed any title or interest in the land or exercised any act of ownership over it, they were entitled to presume that a deed regular had been given to plaintiff's ancestor under whom he claimed title, the expression "acts of ownership" means such acts of dominion and proprietorship over the land as were proper to the character and condition thereof, and such open conduct with respect thereto as would be ordinarily exercised by the owner thereof. Gage v. Eddy, 53 N. E. 1008, 1012, 179 Ill. 492.

ACT OF PROVIDENCE.

"An act of Providence, in legal phraseology, is an accident against which ordinary skill and foresight is not expected to provide; it does not include those floods which happen so frequently that men of ordinary prudence are expected to calculate upon them." A person erecting a dam is bound to provide against such ordinary floods. McCoy v. Danley, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 85, 91, 57 Am. Dec. 680.

ACT OF SALE.

By the civil law in Louisiana the common mode of making conveyances of land certificates was by an act of sale, so called, done before a notary, who wrote down in a record kept by him the agreement of the parties as stated by them, which was then signed by the parties and attested by witnesses. The record remained with him, but upon request he gave out authenticated copies to the parties. On request also the notary delivers the record of the act of sale to the parish recorder, to be recorded in his office. Hodge v. Palms (U. S.) 117 Fed. 396, 398, 54 C. C. A. 570.

ACTING.

Acting in fiduciary capacity, see "Fiduciary Capacity or Character."

Acting within the scope of his employment, see "Scope of Employment."

"Attorneys for the estate," when used in speaking of the liability of attorneys for moneys collected while acting as attorneys for the estate of a deceased person, necessarily implies an employment by the administrator, as any employment by the deceased in his life was terminated by his death. Dinsmoor v. Bressler, 45 N. E. 1086, 1090, 164 Ill. 211.

Rev. St. 1874, c. 112, authorizing quo warranto proceedings against persons "acting as a corporation" without being legally incorporated, relates to the attempted doing of acts such as may be legally done only by corporations, such as assuming obligations with a limitation of amount of liability, or attempting to establish perpetual succession. Greene v. People (Ill.) 21 N. E. 605.

Under an article of agreement providing that, until the franchises of two railroad companies should be united, one of them should be the "acting" and controlling company, the word "acting" does not signify that this company was to be the agent merely and for a time of the other company. An agent is not in reference to his principal the controlling person, but the reverse. "Acting" is used in the sense of operating, and renders such company the operating and controlling company. Meyer v. Johnston, 64 Ala. 603, 665.

In 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, limiting the sum to be recovered by an attorney for appearing and "acting on behalf of any other person" in the county court, the words, "acting on behalf of any other person," include everything done by an attorney in regard to a suit in that court, whether before or at or after the hearing. In re Clipperton, 12 Adol. & E. 687, 693.

ACTING EXECUTOR.

Acting executor means a person assuming to act as executor for a deceased person without being the executor legally appointed or the executor in fact. Morse v. Allen's Estate, 58 N. W. 327, 328, 99 Mich. 303.

ACTING OWNER.

A master who operated a schooner, and furnished the supplies to run the vessel, and paid a certain part of the net earnings to the owners, was not the "acting and managing owner," within the meaning of Rev.

St. § 4141, requiring a vessel to be registered at the usual residence of the "acting and managing owner." The Jennie B. Gilkey (U. S.) 19 Fed. 127, 129.

ACTING SUPERVISING ARCHITECT.

"Acting," as used by a person designating himself as "acting" supervising architect, does not designate an appointed incumbent, but merely a locum tenens, who is performing the duties of an office to which he does not himself claim title. Fraser v. United States, 16 Ct. Cl. 507, 514.

ACTING TICKET AGENT.

An agent employed by a union railway company, owning and operating a union depot, to whom different railroad companies entering and using the depot furnish tickets, and who reports the sales thereof daily to the respective companies, accounting to them at regular intervals for the proceeds of such sales, was an "acting ticket agent" of one of such railroads, within Gen. St. 1894, § 5202, providing for the service of process in civil actions upon railroad companies. Hillary v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 64 Minn. 361, 362, 67 N. W. 80, 32 L. R. A. 448.

ACTING TOGETHER.

The term "acting together," in the statutory definition of principals in the commission of a crime as all persons guilty of acting together in the commission of an offense, is not to be understood as restricted to the very act of the perpetration of the crime; for those also are principals who being present, and knowing the unlawful intent of the actual perpetrator, aid him by acts or encourage him by words or gestures, and those who, though not personally present, keep watch to prevent his interruption, or procure means to assist him while engaged in its perpetration, or endeavor at the time to secure his safety or concealment. Welsh v. State, 3 Tex. App. 413.

ACTING TRUSTEE.

A will declared that if a trustee shall refuse to act before the trust shall be fully performed it shall be lawful for the survivor of the trustee so acting to appoint, etc. Held, that by the use of the word "acting" the testator intended to designate those who had taken on themselves to perform some of the trusts mentioned in the will, and did not include one who had refused to act in limine. A person who had so refused could not be considered as acting in any of the trusts. Sharp v. Sharp, 2 Barn. & Ald. 405, 415.

ACTION.

Within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the bribery of a United States officer with intent to influence his decision or

"action" on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding, the certificate which a board of examining surgeons is required to make out is in effect both a decision of the board and an action by the board and the members thereof upon the question or matter submitted to them for their official action and decision. It is true that the board of surgeons cannot decide the question of the granting or increasing of a pension, nor do they finally decide the rating of the applicant, but they are required to thoroughly examine the claimant, and to give a certificate containing a full description of the physical condition of the claimant and of all structural changes. This requires of the board a proper consideration of the symptoms or evidences of disease or disability, and the result thereof is a decision of the board upon the question of the claimant's physical condition. United States v. Van Leuven (U. S.) 62 Fed. 62, 66.

The term "action" in Gen. St. § 3862, declaring that the pendency of an appeal by a taxpayer to the Supreme Court from the refusal of the board of relief to abate an assessment will suspend "action" upon the tax, means the well-known proceedings in law or in equity which may be resorted to for the collection of an overdue tax, such as a levy and sale under a tax warrant, a complaint in the name of the community in whose favor the tax is assessed, as provided by section 3901, or an action by such community to foreclose the tax lien under section 3891. It does not mean that all proceedings for the collection of such taxes are suspended during the pendency of the appeal. Thus, an appeal does not include interest from the date of the assessment, as such interest is not a part of the proceedings to collect the taxes, but a part of the tax to be collected. City of Hartford v. Hills, 45 Atl. 433, 434, 72 Conn. 599.

ACTION—ACTION AT LAW.

One of the oldest English legal definitions of "action" is that given by Lord Coke

"that it is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is one's due; the lawful demand of one's right." Co. Litt. 285, 285a. Blackstone traces his definition back to the civil law, in which Cicero defines an action to be the means by which men litigate with each other. 3 Bl. Comm. 117. Bracton, I think, embodies the whole idea of an action much better in the Latin expression, "Trinus actus, trium personarum," which seems to include not only the act of a plaintiff who makes a lawful demand and the act of a defendant in opposition, but also the action of the court in passing judgment between the parties. This is full and comprehensive, and I think expresses our notion of a legal action in the ordinary understanding of the term. People v. Colborne (N. Y.) 20 How. Prac. 378, 380.

Blackstone defines an action, suit, or proceeding as the instrument whereby the party injured obtains redress for wrongs committed against him, either in respect to his personal contracts, his person, or his property; and Bracton and Fleta characterized an action or suit, in the words of Justinian, as the rightful method of obtaining in court what is due to any one. Badger v. Gilmore, 37 N. H. 457, 458 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 116); Inhabitants of Bridgton v. Bennett, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 420, 425. When there is an intention to limit its signification and apply it only to include common-law and civil suits, it becomes necessary to use some other word for that purpose with it, such as "personal," "real," or "mixed." Inhabitants of Bridgton v. Bennett, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 420, 425.

"An action, in the ordinary use, is simply a legal demand of one's right." Valentine v. City of Boston, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 201, 203; Peeler v. Norris' Lessee, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 331-339; Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, 376, 38 Am. Rep. 518; People v. Sage (N. Y.) 3 How. Prac. 56, 57. And the cause of this lawful demand is some wrong committed by the defendant, and some damage sustained by the plaintiff in consequence thereof. Foot v. Edwards, 9 Fed. Cas. 358, 359; Deseret Irr. Co. v. McIntyre (Utah) 52 Pac. 628, 629.

"Coke declared that an action is 'a legal demand of a man's right,' and the action itself has been long considered to be the prescribed mode of enforcing the right in the proper tribunal." Inhabitants of Webster v. County Com'rs, 63 Me. 27, 29; Wilt v. Stickney (U. S.) 15 Nat. Bankr. R. 23, 24; Badger v. Gilmore, 37 N. H. 457, 458.

A suit or action, according to its legal definition, is the lawful demand of one's right in a court of justice. Appeal of McBride, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 480, 483 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 116); Hook v. McCune (Pa.) 39 Atl. 72, 73; Taylor v. Kelly, 80 Pa. (30 P. F. Smith) 95, 98; In re Agnew's Estate, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 327, 334; Citizens' St. R. Co.

v. Shepherd (Ind.) 62 N. E. 300-304; Evans v. Evans (Ind.) 5 N. E. 24, 27; Hall v. Decker, 48 Me. 255, 256; Sanford v. Sanford, 28 Conn. 6, 22; Lightfoot v. Grove, 52 Tenn. (5 Helsk.) 473, 477.

An "action" is defined to be a legal demand of one's right, for it is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is due. Wilt v. Stickney, 30 Fed. Cas. 256, 257; Eaton v. Elliot, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 436, 438 (citing Co. Litt. 285, and quoting Web. Dict.); Brewington v. Lowe (Ind.) Smith, 79, 80, 48 Am. Dec. 349.

An "action" is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. Porter v. Ritch, 39 Atl. 160, 177, 70 Conn. 235, 39 L. R. A. 353 (citing Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. [6 Wheat.] 264, 407, 5 L. Ed. 257).

According to Lord Coke, every writ whereunto the defendant may be pleaded, be it original or judicial, is in law an "action." Potter v. Titcomb, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 36, 40.

"Though, in general, 'action' signifies merely motion or an act, yet, when applied to legal subjects, it means a proceeding by one party against another to try their mutual rights." Society for Propagating the Gospel v. Whitcomb, 2 N. H. 227, 229.

A suit or action is the means of administering judgment, which is the remedy prescribed by law for the redress of an injury. Ziegler v. Vance, 3 Iowa (3 Clarke) 528, 530.

An action is merely the judicial means of enforcing a right. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4930.

The term "action" is very commonly confounded with the suit (lis) in which the action is enforced, but this is not the technical meaning of the term, according to which an action is simply the right or power to enforce an obligation. An action is nothing less than the right or power of prosecuting in a judicial proceeding what is owed of one, which is but to say an obligation. Frost v. Witter, 64 Pac. 705, 707, 132 Cal. 421, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53; People v. Sage, 8 How. Prac. 56, 57.

An "action" is the legal and formal demand of one's right from another person or party, insisted on in a court of justice. Black, Law Dict. The constituent elements of a legal cause of action consist of a wrongful act by the defendant, or the omission by him of a legal duty which he owes to the plaintiff, and of either the material damage to the plaintiff caused thereby, or of the damage which the law implies therefrom. The right of action springs from the cause of action, but does not accrue until all of the facts which constitute the cause of action have occurred. White v. Rio Grande Western Ry. Co., 71 Pac. 593, 594, 25 Utah, 346.

An action is a legal proceeding by a party complainant against a party defendant to obtain the judgment of the court in relation to some right claimed to be secured, or some remedy claimed to be given by law, to the party complaining. It is given by law for the recovery of that which is one's due, or a legal demand of one's rights. Haley v. Eureka County Bank, 21 Nev. 127, 135, 26 Pac. 64, 67, 12 L. R. A. 815.

Any ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of the wrong, or punishment of a public offense, involving process and pleadings, and ending in a judgment, is an action. Missionary Soc. of M. E. Church v. Ely, 47 N. E. 537, 538, 56 Ohio St. 405.

An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Every other remedy is a special proceeding. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 5156, 5157; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, §§ 12, 13; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, §§ 2595, 2596; Cornish v. Milwaukee & L. W. Ry. Co., 19 N. W. 443, 444, 60 Wis. 476; In re Welch, 84 N. W. 550, 552, 108 Wis. 387; Clark's Code N. C. 1900, §§ 126, 127; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, §§ 2, 3; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 4432; Fullenwider v. Ewing, 1 Pac. 300, 306, 30 Kan. 15; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 22; Smith v. Westerfield, 26 Pac. 206, 207, 88 Cal. 374; In re Joseph's Estate, 50 Pac. 768, 118 Cal. 660; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3333; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3471; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 4202, 4203; In re Attorney General, 47 N. Y. Supp. 883, 884, 22 App. Div. 285; First Nat. Bank v. Yates, 47 N. Y. Supp. 484, 485, 21 Misc. Rep. 373; Losey v. Stanley, 31 N. Y. Supp. 950, 953, 83 Hun. 420; People v. American Loan & Trust Co., 44 N. E. 949, 951, 150 N. Y. 117; People v. County Judge of Rensselaer (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 398, 400; Lawrence v. Thomas, 51 N. W. 11, 84 Iowa, 362.

An action is a proceeding in a court of justice, the object of which is to obtain a judgment of the court affecting either the rights of the person or property of the parties thereto. The party or parties beginning or prosecuting the action are called the "plaintiff" or "plaintiffs," and he or they attempting to resist or ward off the result of the action are called "defendants." Brower v. Nellis, 33 N. E. 672, 673, 6 Ind. App. 323 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 296, Chit. Pl. 428).

A borough resolution prescribing the duties of the town clerk, and providing that he is to be paid the usual professional charges for conducting actions or suits at law or in equity, will be construed not to be confined to actual proceedings in an action or suit, but to include everything that is done with a view to the action or to the preventing of it. Queen v. Prest, 16 Q. B. 32, 44.

In several of the state Codes an action is defined as an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Bouvier defines an action to be a formal demand of one's right from another person or party, made and insisted on in a court of justice. Abbott observes that "action" in its broadest sense includes all the various proceedings ordinarily allowed in courts of justice. More narrowly, and as applied to prosecution, it includes the modes allowed to individuals for enforcement of civil rights or redress of private wrongs, excluding proceedings instituted by the government for the punishment of offenses; or, as opposed to suit, it means an ordinary proceeding according to the course of courts at law, excluding resort to equity or to remedies of equitable cognizance. In re Hunter's Will, 6 Ohio, 500, it is said "action" may be defined as an abstract legal right in one person to prosecute another in a court of justice; and suit is the actual prosecution of such right in a court of justice. Under such definition, the mere fact that the court did not have jurisdiction of the proceeding does not deprive it of its character as an action. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Bemis, 59 N. E. 745, 64 Ohio St. 26.

An "action" is but the legal demand of a right, without regard to the form of proceedings by which that right may be enforced. When there is an intention to limit its significance and apply it only to include common-law and civil suits, it becomes necessary to use some other word for that purpose with it, such as "personal," "real," or "mixed." Inhabitants of Bridgton v. Bennett, 23 Me. 420, 425.

The term "action," when used in the Revision, shall be construed to include all proceedings of any court of the commonwealth. Ky. St. 1903, § 469.

The act of April 22, 1858, providing "that the probate by the register of the proper county of any will devising real estate shall be conclusive as to such realty, unless within five years from the date of such probate those interested to controvert it shall by caveat and action at law, duly pursued, contest the validity of such will as to such realty," is badly worded, and hence difficult of comprehension. The framer of the act knew that it would not do to make the probate absolutely conclusive of the execution of the will, that some time must be given within which to contest that execution, but he evidently was not acquainted with the legal forms necessary to reach that end. This is evident from the manner in which he has used the word "caveat," and also that in which he has connected it with the words "and action at law." He evidently regarded a caveat as a means of process for contesting a will, and an action or issue at law as a continuation thereof. Taking this view of the matter—and it is the only one that can be adopted without the rejection of a word which was evidently deemed material by the framer of the act—and the difficulty is of easy solution. Thus the caveat will then mean the initiatory process, or notice preceding a contest before the register, and the action at law an issue triable in the common pleas, directed by the orphans' court, after an appeal thereto from the decree of the register, and this appeal may be taken, in the ordinary form, at any time within five years. Wilson v. Gaston, 92 Pa. 207, 213, 215 (cited and approved in Appeal of McCort, 98 Pa. 33, 37).

"Action" cannot exist without a plaintiff in being. Alexander v. Davidson (S. C.) 2 McMul. 49, 51.

Action resulting in judgment.

An action "is any judicial proceeding which, conducted to a termination, will result in a judgment." Berry v. Berry (Ind.) 46 N. E. 470, 471 (citing Deer Lodge County v. Kohrs, 2 Mont. 66, 70); Evans v. Evans (Ind.) 5 N. E. 24, 27; Boyle v. Puget Sound Co-operative Colony, 28 Pac. 376, 3 Wash. St. 138; People v. County Judge of Rensselaer (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 398, 400.

An "action" is a judicial proceeding which, if prosecuted effectually, will result in a judgment. Wiley v. Shaver (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 324, 327.

Under a condition in a policy of fire insurance that no "action" against the insurer for recovery of any claim under the policy shall be sustained unless commenced within 12 months after the loss shall have occurred, the action in the condition, which must be commenced within 12 months, is the one which is prosecuted to judgment. The failure of a previous action from any cause cannot alter the case, although such previous action was commenced within the period prescribed. Riddlesbarger v. Hartford Ins. Co., 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 386, 387, 19 L. Ed. 257.

Acknowledgment by notary.

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 547, providing that a judge should not act in an action or proceeding to which he is a party or in which he is interested, etc., the terms "action" or "proceeding" refer to actions or proceedings in courts of justice, and cannot be held to apply to the taking of an acknowledgment by a notary public. First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 23 Pac. 718, 722, 9 Mont. 323.

Appeal and error.

The term "action," as used in a statute allowing costs to a prevailing party in an "action," includes a motion to dismiss an appeal, and authorizes the allowance of costs to an appellee upon whose motion an appeal from a lower court has been dismissed, though no action was ever brought in a lower court to be appealed from. Pomroy v. Cates, 17 Atl. 311, 81 Me. 377.

Code Civ. Proc. § 411, relating to the revival of an "action," applies to proceedings in error, though "a proceeding in error is not properly an action within the meaning of the Code." Black v. Hill, 29 Ohio St. 86, 88.

"A writ of error is in the nature of a suit or action when it is to restore the party who obtains it to the possession of anything which is withheld from him; not when its operation is entirely defensive." Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 409, 5 L. Ed. 257.

A writ of error is not a suit or action as those words are understood and used; hence such section does not require the substitution of a successor in office as plaintiff in a writ of error which was sued out by his predecessor. Overseers of Poor of Town of Clayton v. Beedle (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 11, 15, 16.

A writ of error is an action, and a release of all actions is a good bar to it. An ejectment removed by writ of error to the Supreme Court is still a "writ of ejectment" pending, and there is no reason, if the death would not abate it in the court below, why the writ of error should fail and the representatives of the party decedent be driven to take out a new writ of error. Ulshafer v. Stewart, 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 170, 172.

"An appeal in insolvency" is not an action within Rev. St. c. 82, § 1, or rule 2 of the Supreme Judicial Court. Nor does it vacate the decree appealed from, as is the usual effect of appeal in other cases. This results from the peculiar provisions of section 12 of the insolvency law. That section provides that no appeal in insolvency lies in any case unless specially provided for in the insolvency law. It follows that such appeals, to be effective, must be taken and prosecuted as provided by that act. No latitude or discretion is given to the court by the act. Tuttle v. Fletcher, 44 Atl. 903, 904, 93 Me. 249.

Application to redeem from tax sale.

An application to redeem land sold for taxes was to be made to the court of common pleas of the county in which the lands were situated, notice of the application was to be given in newspapers, and the court was required to examine the facts touching the applicant's right to redeem and the counter testimony of the adverse party. Held, that the proceeding was in the nature of a suit or action, and hence might be certified to the Supreme Court. Rawson v. Boughton, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 328.

Arbitration or submission by agreement.

In a general sense, the word "action" means the legal demand of one's rights in a court of justice, and in this sense it may be said to include any proceeding in such a court for the purpose of obtaining such redress as the law provides. So it is held that where a controversy is submitted to arbitration by agreement under the rule of the district court, passed at the request of the parties, and judgment is rendered on the award of the arbitrators, such proceeding is an action within the meaning of the statute providing that an appeal shall lie to the superior court from all final judgments of the district court rendered in actions when the amount in controversy exceeds a certain sum. Waterbury Blank Book Mfg. Co. v. Hurlburt, 49 Atl. 198, 199, 73 Conn. 715.

2 Rev. St. p. 309, § 37, making it the duty of a court in which a judgment had been rendered in an "action" of ejectment to vacate the same and grant a new trial on the application of the party against whom the judgment was rendered, cannot be construed to include a case in which the controversy had been submitted without action by the agreement of the parties; such a proceeding is not an "action" within the meaning of the statute. Lang v. Ropke, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 701, 702.

Attachment proceedings.

The term "action" is a comprehensive one, and is applicable to almost any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy which the law affords him. Thus it includes an attachment proceeding. Gibson v. Sidney, 69 N. W. 314, 315, 50 Neb. 12; Jordan v. Dewey, 59 N. W. 88, 89, 40 Neb. 639.

The term "action" includes proceedings by foreign attachment. Allen v. Partlow, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 417, 418.

There is no distinction between the term "action" as usually employed by the members of the profession and writers on law, and the word "case" in Rev. Code, c. 106, § 12, providing that it shall not be necessary to set forth in any manner the place in which an act is done, unless from the nature of the case the place may be material. A case as here referred to and the word employed imports means a civil action of some form and nature between two or more parties in a court of law, either decided or still pending, which may be of different kinds; but the first and most prominent distinction between them, when they differ from each other, is the form and legal nature of the action in which the case is instituted, and the best general indication of this distinction in the nature of these different cases in courts of law is the different forms of action in which they are commenced. The pleadings also vary very considerably in these various actions and cases at common law, with the several forms of action appropriately adapted to them, and with the issues of fact as well as law joined and presented in the pleadings; but, whatever may be the form of the action, or the difference of the pleadings in it from those in any other action, each is alike usually termed a "case" or an "action at law," and usually import one and the same thing. Parvis v. Truax, 32 Atl. 1050, 1051, 7 Houst. 575.

As cause of action.

The word "action," as used in the law of 1853 relating to the competency of a witness "when one of the parties to such action has deceased," is used as an equivalent expression to the "cause of action," and in common parlance it is not uncommon to speak of "action" when in strictness we mean the "cause of action." Kimball v. Baxter's Estate, 27 Vt. (1 Williams) 628, 631.

The marked distinction that exists between the word "suit," "cause," or "action," and the words "cause of action," is sharply presented in Koon v. Nichols, 85 Ill. 155. It is there said: "The word 'cause' here means the particular suit in which the order is made; not that the cause of action shall be considered as abandoned, but only that such particular suit shall be considered as abandoned, and no further action shall be had thereon." Thus, Prac. Act, § 23, authorizing the allowance of amendments changing the form of action, and in any matter, either of form or of substance, in any pleading or proceeding, which may enable plaintiff to sustain the action or the claim for which it was intended to be brought, and providing that the adjudication of the court allowing an amendment shall be conclusive evidence of the identity of the action, does not apply to amendments setting up new causes of action. Fish v. Farwell, 43 N. E. 367, 372, 160 Ill. 236.

Certiorari.

A certiorari is no more an action than a writ of error, but is a special proceeding. People v. Oswego County Court of Sessions (N. Y.) 2 Thomp. & C. 431, 433.

Change of venue.

An "action" is the lawful demand of one's right in a court of justice. 3 Bl. Comm. 116. It is defined as the legal and formal demand of one's rights from another person or party, made and insisted on in a court of justice. The mere change of venue of a local action to a newly organized county within which the land is situated does not affect the action. Bookwalter v. Conrad, 39 Pac. 573, 575, 15 Mont. 464.

Condemnation proceedings.

A proceeding to condemn land for a railroad right of way is not a special proceeding, but a civil action. State v. Rowe, 65 S. W. 463, 464, 69 Ark. 642.

In this state an action for a proceeding to assess the amount of just compensation for private property taken for public uses is not an action. Kennebec Water Dist. v. City of Waterville, 52 Atl. 774, 780, 96 Me. 234.

Contempt proceedings.

Appeal Law 1891, § 1, providing that a judgment or order in a civil action, or in a special proceeding, may be removed to the Supreme Court by appeal, and section 24 providing that an official order affecting a substantial right made in the special proceedings may be reviewed on appeal, does not include an order adjudging a defendant guilty of contempt in disobeying an injunction, such proceeding being purely of a criminal nature, and its object being exclusively to vindicate the authority of the court. State v. Davis, 51 N. W. 942, 945, 2 N. D. 461.

Code, § 416, providing that civil actions shall be commenced by the service of summons, does not include an application by the receiver of taxes of the city of New York for the enforcement of a tax on personal property, which was commenced by an order to show cause why defendant should not be committed for contempt, and was not commenced by the service of summons, but such an application constituted a special proceeding within the meaning of Code, § 3334, providing that every proceeding which did not constitute an ordinary prosecution in a court of justice by one party against another for the enforcement or protection of a right, or the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, was a special proceeding. McLean v. Jephson (N. Y.) 13 N. Y. Supp. 834, 835.

Controversy synonymous.

Under Code, c. 130, § 23, providing that all persons to any civil action, suit, or proceeding shall be competent witnesses for or against each other in the same manner as other witnesses, except that the husband shall not be examined for or against his wife or the wife for or against her husband, except in an "action or suit" between the husband and wife, it was held that the words "action" and "suit" are synonymous with "controversy," and cannot be construed as merely designating the particular mode in which the controversy may be presented to the court by action or suit, and, in order to exclude either the husband or wife as a witness, the controversy, in whatever form presented, must be between the husband and wife, and does not include a controversy between a stranger and the husband and wife. Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 632, 645.

Counterclaim and set-off.

The term "action," as used in the negotiable instruments law, includes counterclaim and set-off. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 562, c. 73, § 207; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; N. D. Negotiable Instruments Law, § 191; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1060.

In R. S. Conn. tit. 31, § 3, providing that no "action" shall be brought for the recovery of a claim or debt of more than six years' standing, the word "action" will not be construed in a narrow and technical sense, as applying only to a demand made by a plaintiff, but extends also to a plea of set-off, since such set-off is as much a claim as it would be if the party attempted to enforce it by direct suit. Appeal of Hart, 32 Conn. 520, 539.

Criminal prosecution.

"An 'action' is defined to be 'the legal demand of one's rights, or the form given by law for the recovery of that which is due.' A criminal prosecution, although instituted by an individual, is not in any sense an action between the person instituting it and the prisoner." Harger v. Thomas, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 128, 130, 84 Am. Dec. 422.

Rev. Laws, p. 614, § 1, provides that the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common council may make and limit and impose a tax or reasonable fee and amercements against all and upon all who shall offend against their laws, and the said mayor, recorder, or either of the said aldermen shall and may have and take cognizance before them of all or any "action" brought for a breach of any of the said laws. It was held that the word "action" meant "action" in its broader sense, including information, complaint, conviction, etc., and meant no more than that the magistrate may hear, try, and determine any complaint or information for a breach of the law, convict the offender thereof, and thereupon adjudge the proper fine or amercement, and was not used in the sense of a civil action. Weeks v. Forman, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 237, 243.

Under the definition of "action" in Code Civ. Proc. § 3333, though the Code of Criminal Procedure has no express provision authorizing the reading on a second trial of the evidence of a witness since deceased, Code Civ. Proc. § 830, authorizing the reading of such testimony taken in an "action," renders it admissible, the word "action" including a criminal prosecution. People v. Elliott, 64 N. E. 837, 172 N. Y. 146, 60 L. R. A. 318.

An "action" is the formal demand of one's rights from another person or party, made and insisted on in a court of justice. In a quite common sense "action" includes all the formal proceedings in a court of justice attendant upon the demand of a right made by one person or party of another in such court, including an adjudication upon the right, and its enforcement or denial by the court. Bouvier. A civil action is one of those actions which have for their object the recovery of private or civil rights or of compensation for their infraction, and a criminal action is one of those actions prosecuted in a court of justice in the name of the government against one or more individuals accused of a crime. Hence both civil and criminal actions are included within the term "action," but as used in Laws 1899, p. 53, providing that all actions commenced before a justice of the peace shall be brought in the justice's court in the precinct in which one or more of the defendants reside, the term "action" will be held not to include criminal actions, but applicable alone to civil actions. State v. Schomber, 63 Pac. 221, 222, 23 Wash. 573.

The word "actions" may include both civil and criminal proceedings, so that as used in the statute creating Oklahoma Territory, which preserves to the United States court previously having jurisdiction thereof all actions commenced or crimes committed, the word "actions" would include criminal cases, and hence would indicate that the expression "crimes committed" did not mean criminal actions. Caha v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 513, 514, 152 U. S. 211, 38 L. Ed. 415.

Divorce proceedings.

The term "action," as used in Civ. Code, § 1, providing that there shall be no distinction in pleading and practice between "actions" at law and suits in equity, and there shall be but one form of "action," which shall be denominated a "civil action," includes an action for divorce. Evans v. Evans, 5 N. E. 24, 27, 105 Ind. 204.

Election contest.

Rev. Code, § 75, c. 31, declares that in all actions the party in whose favor judgment shall be given is entitled to costs. Held, that a contested sheriff's election is not an "action" within the meaning of the word as used in the statute. Patterson v. Murray, 53 N. C. 278, 279.

Equity proceedings.

The word "action" has a legal significance, and does not apply to a suit or proceeding in equity. Mynes v. Mynes, 35 S. E. 935, 940, 47 W. Va. 681.

The term "action," as used in Pub. St. c. 189, § 8, and chapter 205, § 9, which provides that no "action" shall be brought against an executor or administrator in his official capacity within one year after the will shall be proved or administration granted, except for certain specific causes, applies only to actions at law, and not to suits in equity. Stone v. Corcoran, 24 Atl. 781, 17 R. I. 759.

"The term 'action' is never properly applied to a suit in equity, nor is a 'suit' a proper designation for an action of account." Mahar v. O'Hara, 9 Ill. (4 Gilm.) 424, 429.

"An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong." This definition embraces suits in equity for relief, as well as actions at law. Tate v. Powe, 64 N. O. 644, 646.

Code, § 2934, authorizes a new action within one year after abatement of a former action seasonably commenced or reversal or a judgment on the ground not precluding a new action for the same cause. It is held that the word "action" as so used applies only to actions at law, and not to equitable proceedings; this being evidenced from the fact that other terms in the section are terms which are peculiar to actions of law, and are wholly inapplicable to suits in equity. Dawes v. New York, P. & N. R. Co., 32 S. E. 778, 96 Va. 733.

In holding that Pub. St. c. 189, § 8, and chapter 205, § 9, fixing periods of limitations as to "actions" against executors and administrators, were applicable to a suit in equity brought by a creditor, the courts say that it is a familiar doctrine that suits in equity are not within the letter of the statutes of limitation, but these in terms relate to legal remedies only; courts of equity, though regarding themselves as bound by the statutes, applying them rather by way of analogy, and with less strictness where equities are involved than do courts of law. Warren v. Providence Tool Co., 35 Atl. 1041, 1042, 19 R. I. 656.

The term "action," as used in statutes prescribing periods within which civil actions may be commenced, includes actions equitable as well as legal. Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476, 481; Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 677, 69 Cal. 255; Humphrey v. Carpenter, 39 Minn. 115, 116, 39 N. W. 67.

Rev. St. § 4962, declaring that no person shall maintain an "action" for the infringement of a copyright, unless he shall give notice of such right by inserting in each copy or every edition published a statement of such copyright of a certain prescribed form, means an "action" either at law or in equity. Thompson v. Hubbard, 9 Sup. Ct. 710, 719, 131 U. S. 123, 33 L. Ed. 76.

A statute authorizing "civil actions" does not use the term "action" as applying exclusively to an "action at law," in contradistinction to a suit in equity, but includes both actions at law and suits in equity, and is used only to distinguish proceedings instituted for the purpose of enforcing a private right or redressing a private wrong from proceedings instituted to punish crimes. Fenstermacher v. State, 25 Pac. 142, 143, 19 Or. 504.

Code Civ. Proc. § 547, providing that a judge shall not act as such in an "action or proceeding" to which he is a party or interested, refers to actions and proceedings in courts of justice, as provided for in the Code. First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 23 Pac. 718, 721, 9 Mont. 323.

Comp. Laws, § 1316, which provides that in any action brought on negotiable paper given on a usurious consideration, if the plaintiff becomes a bona fide purchaser of the paper before it becomes due he will be entitled to recover, unless he had notice of the usury, construed to include suits in equity as well as actions at law. Coatsworth v. Barr, 11 Mich. 199.

The word "actions," as used in the statute regulating jurisdiction of circuit and supreme courts of Michigan, is not used in a limited or technical sense, but it is used in its largest sense, and includes all civil actions, whether cases at law or in equity, being intended to distinguish between civil actions and criminal prosecutions. Scott v. Smart's Ex'rs, 1 Mich. 295, 297.

The term "action," as used in Act April 15, 1869, providing that interest shall not disqualify a party as a witness, but that such statute shall have no application to "actions" by or against executors, administrators, etc., construed to "embrace civil proceedings, whatever their form, as well as 'actions' technically so called." Taylor v. Kelly, 80 Pa. 95, 98; Appeal of McBride, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 480, 483.

The words "action" and "suit," as used in Code, § 69, providing that the distinction between "actions" and "suits" heretofore existing is abolished, mean the formal methods of pursuing and establishing rights, and the actual or substantial difference between legal and equitable causes of action, and the various forms of relief applicable to each, are not disturbed by the statute. Marsh v. Benson (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 415, 419.

The term "action," as used in Code, § 227, providing that in actions for the recovery of money plaintiff shall be entitled to a writ of attachment, includes an action to enforce a contract of sale made for the plaintiff's benefit and to recover the purchase money contracted to be paid thereby, since by Code, § 69, the distinction previously existing between actions at law and suits in equity was abolished, and there now exists but one form of action, denominated a "civil action," and, when the word "action" is used in relation to attachments, it must be deemed to include all civil actions both at law and in equity. Corson v. Ball (N. Y.) 47 Barb. 452, 453.

The word "action," as used in 2 Starr & C. Ann. St. Ill. p. 2642, c. 83, par. 25, which provides that in any of the actions specified in any of the sections of the act, if judgment shall be given for plaintiff and shall be reversed by writ of error or on appeal, or if plaintiff be nonsuited, then, if the time limited for bringing such action shall have expired during the pendency of the suit, plaintiff may commence a new action within a year after such judgment reversed or given against the plaintiff, is not limited to actions at law, but includes suits in equity; and hence, where plaintiff was nonsuited in a chancery suit, and limitations ran against his claim, he was entitled to commence an action at law on the claim within a year after the entry of the nonsuit. Lamson v. Hutchings (U. S.) 118 Fed. 321, 324, 55 C. C. A. 245.

Ex parte proceedings.

"The vital idea of an action," as given by Bouvier, "is a proceeding on the part of one person as actor against another for the infringement of the right of the first in the manner prescribed by law." There can be no action unless there is not only a petitioner or complainant, but a respondent or defendant, and an ex parte proceeding is not an "action" within the meaning of a statute relating to actions. Jones v. Bank of Leadville, 17 Pac. 272, 273, 279, 10 Colo. 464.

Foreclosure of lien or contract.

Code Civ. Proc. § 829, providing that "on the trial of an action" the surety interested shall not be examined on his own behalf against the administrator of a deceased person, includes the trial of a cause brought to foreclose and collect the amount due on a land contract. Parks v. Andrews, 10 N. Y. Supp. 344-346, 56 Hun. 391.

Code Civ. Proc. § 414, subd. 4, provides that the word "action" contained in this chapter is to be construed, when it is necessary so to do, as including a special proceeding or any proceeding thereafter in an action. Thus, a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien will be included. Gee v. Torrey, 28 N. Y. Supp. 239, 241, 77 Hun. 23.

Code, § 2, defines an "action" to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, and section 3 enacts that every other remedy is a special proceeding. Held, that a proceeding under and as prescribed by the mechanic's lien law of 1851 for the city and county of New York (chapter 513, Laws 1851, as amended by chapter 404, Laws 1855) for the enforcement of a lien was not an action, but a special proceeding.—Hallahan v. Herbert, 57 N. Y. 409, 413.

As the term is used in Laws 1864, c. 402, limiting the taxable cost, exclusive of disbursements, in "actions at law" on contract to $25, it includes personal actions on contract the judgments in which are enforced by execution, though to a certain extent they may be proceedings in rem, which circumstance does not necessarily divest them of their character of actions at law, such as actions to enforce mechanics' liens, which, though they possess some of the characteristics of suits in equity, are not sufficiently marked to authorize a disregard of their indicia of actions at law.—Marsh v. Fraser, 27 Wis. 596, 597.

Habeas corpus.

An "action" is the lawful demand of one's right in a court of justice. It is any proceeding for the purpose of obtaining such remedy as the law allows, and under such definition a proceeding upon habeas corpus is in the nature of an action. State v. Newell, 34 Pac. 28, 29, 13 Mont. 302.

An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right. Unless the state is the plaintiff, and the proceeding is against the defendant for the punishment of a criminal offense, it is a civil action, so that a writ of habeas corpus is a civil action. State v. Hueglin, 85 N. W. 1046, 1053, 110 Wis. 369.

Highway proceeding.

Act April 1, 1874, provides that appeals, writs of error, and certiorari, to be effective, must be taken within two years after "any judgment in any real, personal or mixed action." Held, that the words "judgment" and "action" were to be used in their comprehensive rather than in their strictly technical sense, embracing decrees and orders in the nature of judgments, and including proceedings to vacate and relocate a township road. In re Road in Salem Tp., 103 Pa. 250, 254, 40 Leg. Int. 375.

The word "action" as employed in Rev. St. c. 1, § 5, providing that actions pending at the time of the passage or repeal of an act are not affected thereby, does not include a petition pending before the county commissioners for gates at a railroad crossing, founded on chapter 51, § 34. Grand Trunk Ry. of Canada v. Cumberland County Com'rs, 33 Atl. 988, 88 Me. 225.

Rev. St. c. 1, § 3, providing that "actions" pending at the time of the passage or repeal of an act should not be affected thereby, construed not to include a petition for the location of a highway, pending before a board of county commissioners. Inhabitants of Webster v. County Com'rs, 63 Me. 27, 29.

Insolvency proceedings.

Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, requiring partnerships doing business in the state, under a designation not showing the names of the persons, to file a certificate with the clerk before they shall be allowed to maintain an "action," does not include proceedings in insolvency, since they are special proceedings, and are not actions. In re Dennery, 26 Pac. 639, 640, 89 Cal. 101.

Rev. St. c. 21, § 3, providing that "actions" pending at the time of the passage or repeal of an act shall not be affected thereby, does not include proceedings in insolvency. Inhabitants of Belfast v. Fogler, 71 Me. 403, 404.

Mandamus.

In Gen. St. tit. 1, § 189, which provides that whenever any action at law shall be tried by the superior court without a jury the court shall, upon the motion of either party, find the facts upon which its judgment is rendered, the term "action at law" includes a proceeding by mandamus. State v. New Haven & Northampton Co., 41 Conn. 134, 137. See, also, City of Roodhouse v. Briggs (Ill.) 62 N. E. 778; Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 66, 97, 16 L. Ed. 717.

A mandamus proceeding is an "action at law," and it is therefore governed by the same rules of pleading that are applicable to other actions at law. People v. Board of Trade of City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 196, 193 Ill. 577; Dement v. Rokler, 19 N. E. 33, 39, 126 Ill. 174.

A proceeding on mandamus, where there has been a return and the suit has gone to pleadings and a trial thereon has been had, is not a special proceeding, but an "action," under the Code of New York. People v. Lewis (N. Y.) 28 How. Prac. 159, 172.

Motion for judgment.

A motion for judgment under the provisions of a statute is an action, and as such is embraced within the provisions of the statute defining the term "action." Banks v. Brown, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 198, 199.

Petition for new trial.

A suit or action is a legal demand of one's right. But a petition for a new trial, like a motion for the same object, is not an action. It demands nothing, but simply asks permission to review a cause already decided. Magill v. Lyman, 6 Conn. 59, 61.

Petition to vacate judgment.

A petition to vacate a judgment and for a new trial, though in one sense a mere incident to the original action, is yet to be considered as being to a very great extent of the nature of a suit in equity to vacate or set aside a judgment for fraud or otherwise, and rising nearly or quite to the dignity of an action. Fullenwider v. Ewing, 1 Pac. 300, 301, 30 Kan. 15.

Probate proceeding.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2223, providing that an action is an ordinary proceeding for the enforcement and protection of a right and the redress of a wrong, and that every other remedy is a special proceeding, the statutory proceeding in the superior court to determine the heirship of certain claimants is a special proceeding. Smith v. Westerfield, 26 Pac. 206, 207, 88 Cal. 374.

Code, §§ 2265–2603, declaring that actions commenced by or against a personal representative of the decedent may be prosecuted against any succeeding executor or administrator, includes a claim filed under order of court against the estate of another decedent. Reynolds v. Crook, 11 South. 412, 414, 95 Ala. 570.

By Code Civ. Proc. § 21, an action is defined to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Under such statute a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will is not an action, though section 363 provides that the word "action" shall be construed, whenever necessary, as including an action or proceeding of a civil nature. In re Joseph's Estate, 50 Pac. 768, 118 Cal. 660.

Under Code, § 2505, providing that an action is a proceeding for the enforcement or protection of a private right or the prevention or redress of a private wrong, the term "action" does not include proceedings for the appointment of a guardian. Lawrence v. Thomas, 51 N. W. 11, 84 Iowa, 362.

"Action," which, as defined in Rev. St. 1898, § 2595, is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another for the enforcement of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, does not include an application for the appointment of a guardian for one alleged to be insane, but it is "special proceedings," which latter term is expressly provided in section 2596 to include all remedies other than actions. In re Welch, 84 N. W. 550, 552, 108 Wis. 387.

The term "action" in Gen. St. § 1094, providing that, in actions by or against the representatives of a decedent, entries of memoranda of his relative to matters in issue are admissible, does not include an appeal from the probate decree admitting the will to probate. Appeal of Barber, 27 Atl. 973–981, 63 Conn. 393, 22 L. R. A. 90.

The term "action," as used in the title of an act and its subsequent provisions declaring that the statute of limitations shall only begin to run in respect to "such actions" after the happening of a certain contingency, does not apply to special proceedings in surrogates' courts. In re Perry's Estate, 15 N. Y. Supp. 535, 537, 2 Con. Sur. 536.

The vital idea of an "action" is the proceeding on the part of one party as actor against another for the infringement of some right of the first before a court of justice in the manner prescribed by the court or law. The contest of a will is not an action. The thing before the court, and about which it was to judicially inquire, was a paper, in form a testamentary disposition of property. If it was a will, certain legal consequences would follow. If it was not a will, certain other legal consequences would follow. Clough v. Clough, 51 Pac. 513, 515, 10 Colo. App. 433.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 414, subd. 4, providing that the word "action" contained in the chapter relating to the time for enforcing a civil remedy is to be construed as including special proceedings so to do, a special proceeding in a surrogate's court to obtain payment of a judgment from a decedent's estate is an action on the judgment, within the meaning of the statute of limitations. In re Morton's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1104, 1107, 70 Hun, 61.

A demand for an allowance of attorney's fees against an estate in process of administration is considered an action at law. MacDonald v. Tittmann, 70 S. W. 502, 504, 96 Mo. App. 536.

Quo warranto.

An information in the nature of quo warranto is not regarded as an action. It involves a civil right—that of holding office—and the relator may recover his costs against defendant, but it is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. Everet v. Roe, 26 N. J. Law (2 Dutch.) 215, 217.

The term "action," as used in Kan. Code, § 652, embraces all proceedings in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, or the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, and includes proceedings in quo warranto. Ames v. State of Kansas, 4 Sup. Ct. 437, 442, 111 U. S. 449, 28 L. Ed. 482.

Laws Idaho 1st Sess. § 601, authorizing any person to intervene in an action who has an interest in the matter in litigation, by the word "action" means a civil action purely, and does not apply to a proceeding in quo warranto. People v. Green, 1 Idaho, 235, 239.

Recovery of penalty or forfeiture.

A civil action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by one party against another for the enforcement or protection of a private right or the redress or prevention of a private wrong. It may also be brought for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture. Code, § 3. Chandler v. Commonwealth, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 66, 69.

A proceeding to "amerce" a sheriff for neglecting and refusing to execute a special writ of execution issued to him is a proceeding in the nature of an action to redress a wrong. The object of the proceeding is to give the judgment creditor satisfaction or a penalty for the omission of the official duty of a sheriff. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, and hence a proceeding to "amerce" a sheriff falls within the provisions of Code, § 18, subd. 4, providing that an action for a penalty or forfeiture must be brought within one year, though section 18 does not technically and strictly embrace a proceedings to "amerce," because it refers to civil actions exclusively, but its spirit and intent does apply to such a proceeding. Fulmer v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 22 Pac. 561, 562, 42 Kan. 551.

As right of action.

The term "action," as used in Code, § 9220, declaring that "an action" for the death of a father shall survive on the death of the mother of the children, means the right of action. David v. Southwestern R. Co., 41 Ga. 223, 224.

Scire facias.

A scire facias is an action. Milsap v. Wildman, 5 Mo. 425; Chestnut v. Chestnut, 77 Ill. 346, 349.

"Action at law" and "suit at law" are synonymous terms; they are one and the same thing; and hence a scire facias, being an action which may be pleaded to as an action and may be released by the rules of all actions, is comprehended within the term "suit at law" in a city charter, giving a right of appeal from the city court to the superior court at the first term to which any suit at law is returnable. White v. Washington School Dist., 45 Conn. 59, 61.

"Actions are to be distinguished from those proceedings, such as writs of error, scire facias, and the like, where, under the form of proceedings, the court and not the plaintiff appears to be the actor. A scire facias is not an action." Heath v. Bates, 70 Ga. 633, 636; Challenor v. Niles, 78 Ill. 78, 79; Sutton v. Cole (Mo.) 55 S. W. 1052, 1053.

The word "action," as defined by the New York Code, is sufficiently comprehensive to include the proceeding by scilicet. fa. to have execution, etc. It is a proceeding in a court of justice by which plaintiff prosecutes defendant for the enforcement of a right; the remedy therefor given by scilicet. fa. to obtain execution of the judgment is superseded by the provisions for an action therefor under the Code. Cameron v. Young (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 372, 373.

Special and statutory proceedings.

An "action," defined by the Code to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, does not include an application by petition to the Supreme Court under the statute to compel a specific performance by infant heirs of a contract for the sale of land made by the ancestor, as the statutory definition of an "action" can hardly be held to embrace a proceeding which is purely statutory and new, and which is conducted in no respect according to the ordinary forms of the common law, as is the case of the proceeding in question, which is peculiar and unknown to our courts, except by special statutory provision. Hyatt v. Seeley, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 52, 55.

By Rev. St. c. 114, it is provided that "all controversies which might be the subject of a personal action at law or of a suit in equity" may be submitted to the decision of arbitrators. Held, that such section did not authorize the submission to arbitrators of a claim under the mill act (Rev. St. c. 116) for damage occasioned to land by flowing it by a milldam, collectible under a particular statutory mode of redress, and hence not a controversy which might be the subject of a personal action at law or of a suit in equity. Henderson v. Adams, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 610, 612.

A proceeding by a trustee to mortgage trust property is a special proceeding, and not an action. Losey v. Stanley, 31 N. Y. Supp. 950, 953, 83 Hun. 420.

Pasch. Dig. art. 4604, which provides that limitation will be suspended on all debts grounded upon contract in writing by the commencement of an "action or suit" within four years next after the same could have been instituted, is not met by the posting of notices of a trust sale by a trustee before the debt secured by the trust is barred, but not in time to make the sale before the bar of limitation would be complete. Blackwell v. Barnett, 52 Tex. 326-335.

Section 3333 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the word "action," as used in the new revision of the statutes, signifies an ordinary prosecution in a court of justice by a party against another party for the enforcement of a right, the redress of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Section 3334 provides that every other prosecution by a party for either of the purposes specified in the last section is a special proceeding. Under this definition the court held that an application by the Attorney General for the examination of witnesses prior to the beginning of an action, as authorized by Laws 1897, c. 383, is not a special proceeding, and therefore an order of the Appellate Division, affirming an order in relation to such examination, is not appealable to the Court of Appeals. In re Attorney General, 50 N. E. 57, 155 N. Y. 441.

The word "action" as used in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392, 395, providing for a place of trial of civil actions, and in the amendment of 1901 to section 394, providing as to the venue of actions against a city, refer to actions as defined in section 22 of the Code, ordinary proceedings between parties, and not to special proceedings, defined by section 23 to include all other remedies. City of Santa Rosa v. Fountain Water Co., 71 Pac. 1123, 1124, 138 Cal. 579.

The word "action," as used in relation to the time of commencing actions, is to be construed, whenever it is necessary so to do, as including a special proceeding of a civil nature. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 303; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2901; Gwinn v. Melvin (Idaho) 72 Pac. 961, 962.

Suit synonymous.

The words "suit" and "action," as applied to legal proceedings, are synonymous terms. Dullard v. Phelan, 50 N. W. 204, 205, 83 Iowa, 471; Lamson v. Hutchings (U. S.) 118 Fed. 321, 323, 55 C. C. A. 245; Page v. Brewster, 58 N. H. 126; Magill v. Parsons, 4 Conn. 317, 322; Wilt v. Stickney, 15 Nat. Bankr. R. 23, 24; Kennebec Water Dist. v. City of Waterville, 52 Atl. 774, 780, 96 Me. 234; White v. Washington School Dist., 45 Conn. 59, 61; Overseers of Poor of Town of Clayton v. Beedle (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 11, 15, 16; Webb v. Allen, 40 S. W. 342, 343, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 605; Cobbeys Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1851.

The words "suit" and "action" are generally synonymous, though the term "suit" is the appropriate one to designate a proceeding in a court of equity, and "action" to designate one in a court of law. Miller v. Rapp, 34 N. E. 125, 126, 7 Ind. App. 89.

"Action" and "suit" are often synonymous, though an action may be considered a form of a suit, and the latter is often applied to proceedings in equity, and "actions" to those at law, up to judgment. Hall v. Bartlett (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 297, 300 (citing Weston v. City of Charleston, 27 U. S. [2 Pet.] 449, 464, 7 L. Ed. 481); Miller v. Rapp, 34 N. E. 125, 126, 7 Ind. App. 89.

The word "suit" is a generic term, which denotes any legal proceeding of a civil kind by one person against another. The term "suit," however, is used in opposition to "action," suit being the proper word for a litigation in equity, and "action" for a litigation in the court of law. Branyan v. Kay, 11 S. E. 970, 971, 33 S. C. 293; Appleton v. Turnbull, 24 Atl. 592, 593, 84 Me. 72.

The term "suit" is more comprehensive in its signification than the word "action," extending to any proceeding in a court of justice seeking a remedy which the law affords, and to any legal application to a court of justice. City of Marion v. Ganby, 26 N. W. 40, 41, 68 Iowa, 142.

While the common use of the terms "action" and "suit" is to limit the former to proceedings at law and the latter to equitable proceedings, the words are not used with such exactness in statutes as to warrant the conclusion that they are only to be taken in this limited sense. The word "suit" is the more general term, and is broad enough to cover either form of proceeding; but the terms are often used in application to both classes of cases, and we so find them in our statutes. Niantic Mills Co. v. Riverside & O. Mills, 31 Atl. 432, 19 R. I. 34; Didier v. Davison, 10 Paige, 515, 517; McPike v. McPike, 10 Ill. App. (10 Bradw.) 332, 333.

"The legal signification of the word 'suit' comprehends the prosecution of any claim, demand, or request, and is much broader than the term 'action,' and may embrace it, but does not define it." Cornish v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co., 19 N. W. 443, 444, 60 Wis. 476 (quoting Burrill, Law Dict. tit. "Suits").

"Suit" is defined to be the prosecution or presentation of some claim, demand, or request. In law language, it is a prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. Story, Const. § 1791. The word "suit" as used in its modern sense is synonymous with "action." 1 Barb. 15. An "action" is defined to be a legal demand of one's right, or it is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is due. 1 Barb. 15. Until judgment the suit is called an action. Bouv. Wilt v. Stickney (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 256, 257.

The word "action," in Code Iowa 1873, providing that the actions in a court of record shall be commenced by serving defendant with a notice signed by plaintiff and his attorney, etc., is identical with the word "suit" in the act of Congress authorizing the removal of suits from state to federal courts. In re Receivership of Iowa & Minnesota Const. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 799, 800.

The words "suit," "action," or "proceedings at law," in Gen. St. c. 36, § 24, providing that no person shall be disqualified as a witness in common civil suits or proceedings at law or in equity by reason of his interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, and providing that in all actions except actions on book account, where one of the original parties to a contract or cause or action at issue on trial is dead or insane, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor, and in Acts 1864, No. 31, § 1, providing that the proviso in the former act shall not in any manner affect any suit brought or pending on the 1st day of August, 1863, were used in reference to the same subject-matter and substantially as synonymous terms. Calderwood v. Calderwood's Estate, 38 Vt. 171-174.

The word "suit" is a more comprehensive word than "action," and may include a special proceeding. Cent. Dict. The substitution of the word "action" in Code Civ. Proc., prohibiting attorneys from buying a demand with the intent to bring an action thereon, the word "suit" having been used in a former statute, shows the intent to narrow the statute, and therefore the statute does not preclude an attorney from buying a demand against an estate with the intent to institute a special proceeding for its collection. Tilden v. Aitkin, 55 N. Y. Supp. 735-737, 37 App. Div. 28.

"'Suit' is a more general and comprehensive word than 'action.' It means, in its ordinary and popular acceptation, 'any action or process for the recovery of a right or claim; legal application to a court for justice; prosecution of right before any tribunal.' Webster Dict. It is undoubtedly derived originally from the secta or suit of witnesses, which every plaintiff was required to produce or offer to produce when he preferred his claim in court. 'Inde producti sectam'—thereupon he brings suit—a form of words still continued. 2 Bl. Comm. 295. In this wide sense a writ is pending and undetermined in court until the plaintiff has fully recovered and realized his just demand. While seeking to compel its satisfaction by a sale of the property of the defendant, he is still pursuing his suit; prosecuting his claim." Ulshafer v. Stewart, 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 170, 174.

The word "suit" in section 6097, Rev. St. providing that a creditor whose claim is rejected shall commence a suit thereon within six months or be barred, is used as synonymous with the word "action" in Rev. St. § 4971, providing that there shall be but one form of action, known as a "civil action." A suit brought in the court of common pleas under the provisions of Rev. St. § 6352, against an assignee for the benefit of creditors, to require him to allow the claim of the plaintiff in the settlement of his trust, is a civil action. Kennedy v. Thompson, 3 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 446.

The word "action" in Code Civ. Proc. § 73, prohibiting an attorney from buying a demand with an intent to bring an action thereon, is narrower than the word "suit," which is used in a former statute prohibiting attorneys from buying demands with intent to bring suit thereon; and therefore the statute first mentioned does not prohibit an attorney from buying a demand against an estate with intent to institute special proceedings thereon. Tilden v. Aitkin, 55 N. Y. Supp. 735, 737, 37 App. Div. 28.

Summary proceeding.

A summary proceeding is not an "action" within Laws N. Y. 1896, c. 748, authorizing justices of the district court to set aside a verdict rendered in an action. Decker v. Sexton, 43 N. Y. Supp. 167, 171, 19 Misc. Rep. 59.

Supplementary proceedings.

The word "action," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 382, subd. 7, providing that an "action" on a judgment rendered in the court not of record must be commenced within six years, does not include supplementary proceedings to enforce the collection of a justice's judgment which had been filed and docketed in the office of the county clerk. Green v. Hauser, 9 N. Y. Supp. 660, 18 Civ. Proc. 354; Bolt v. Hauser, 10 N. Y. Supp. 397, 399, 19 Civ. Proc. R. 7.

Rev. St. 1881, § 412, providing that the court in term or the judge in vacation shall change the venue of any "civil action" on application of either party, includes proceedings supplementary to execution. Burkett v. Holman, 3 N. E. 406, 408, 104 Ind. 6; Same v. Bowen, 21 N. E. 38, 39, 118 Ind. 379.

It is said in 1 Bac. Abr. 46, note "b," that a suit, till judgment, is properly called an "action," but not after; and hence a release of all actions is regularly no bar to an execution. Prac. Act, art. 18, § 2, provides that after the lapse of five years from the entry of judgment an execution may be issued only by leave of the court and notice to the adverse party. Article 32 declares that the act shall not apply to actions brought before it takes effect. Held, that the statute applies to judgments rendered before the passage of the act as well as subsequently, since the word "action" should not be extended beyond its ordinary signification. Bolton v. Landsdown, 21 Mo. 399, 400.

"Action" is the name properly given to a suit until after judgment, and therefore a release of all actions is no bar to an execution. Tichenor v. Collins, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 123, 124.

ACTION CONCERNING REAL ESTATE.

See "Concern."

ACTION CONCERNING THE TRADE OF MERCHANDISE BETWEEN MERCHANTS.

The clause in the statute of limitations which excepts "actions which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant" extends only to open and current accounts stated. It must be a direct concern of trade; liquidated demands or bills and notes which are only traced up to the trade of merchandise are too remote to come within its description. Ranchander v. Hammond (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 200, 202.

The clause in the statute of limitations which excepts "actions which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant" has, according to the courts of New York, "given rise to much discussion in the English courts as well as in those of this country, and it has not always been attended by the same results. * * * The most prominent case in which the ruling of this clause * * * was involved is Coster v. Murray (N. Y.) 5 Johns. Ch. 522, and, on appeal, in Murray v. Coster (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 576, 11 Am. Dec. 333. It appears to have established this result: that the clause only applies to open and current accounts, as well between merchants as others, where there are mutual dealings and mutual debits and credits, and had no application to such a case as the one then before the court, where the items of the account were all on one side, arising from the joint purchase of goods, one of the purchasers taking the whole goods and agreeing to account to the other for one-third of the proceeds. No part of such account had arisen within six years, and under these circumstances the demand was considered to be barred." Atwater v. Fowler (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 417, 425.

ACTION EX CONTRACTU.

The term "actions ex contractu," as used in Appellate Court Act, § 8, has reference to the nature of the cause of action, and not to the form of the proceeding to enforce it. By it is meant all causes of action arising ex contractu, as distinguished from those arising ex delicto, without regard as to whether the proceeding is at law or in equity. Umlauf v. Umlauf, 103 Ill. 651, 654.

The expression "actions ex contractu," as used in Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 525, c. 37, § 8, giving appellate courts jurisdiction in certain actions ex contractu, has reference to the nature of the cause of action, rather than to the form of the proceeding for its enforcement, and it is immaterial whether such proceeding is in law or equity. Clin-ton Mut. County Fire Ins. Co. v. Zeigler, 66 N. E. 222, 223, 201 Ill. 371.

An action on the violation of an express contract made by the parties themselves is called an "action ex contractu," and, where it is sought to combine in the same action charges against a carrier for violation of a special contract and also for violation of his common-law duties, the action is called "ex delicto quasi ex contractu." Nelson

v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (Mont.) 72 Pac. 642, 645.

ACTION EX DELICTO.

Actions ex delicto are such as arise from torts or wrong, and in which the party may be arrested on process and imprisoned on the judgment, and in which there is no right of contribution between the several defendants for a joint wrong, and which at common law abated on the death of the party, and in which joint tortfeasors are severally liable, and in which the damages to be recovered are general damages, or those which necessarily or by implication of law result from the act or default complained of, and are unliquidated. Van Oss v. Syon, 56 N. W. 190, 191, 85 Wis. 661.

An action to recover unliquidated damages for a personal injury caused by negligence, although the negligence complained of amounts to a breach of contract on the part of the defendant, belongs to the class of cases "actions ex delicto." Tort is the ground of the action, and the law of torts must govern the case. Doremus v. Root (U. S.) 94 Fed. 760, 761.

The form of action based on violations of the implied contract of a carrier declared by law is called an action "ex delicto" or in tort. It is frequently difficult to determine from an examination of the complaint whether the action is on contract or in tort; that is, whether it is intended to charge the carrier with a violation of the express contract made by the parties, or a violation of the implied contract made by the law. The implied contract created and declared by law relative to the duties and liabilities of a carrier is so complete within itself that there is little necessity for any additional contract, unless the carrier desires to limit his liability; and so usual is it for shippers to rely upon this contract created by law in actions against carriers that it has been held that "tort is the natural and habitual foundation of an action for the breach of an ordinary contract of carriage." Nelson v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (Mont.) 72 Pac. 642, 645 (citing Whittenton Mfg. Co. v. Memphis & O. R. Packet Co. [U. S.] 21 Fed. 806, and cases there cited).

A suit under the national banking act to recover twice the amount of interest paid is a suit for a penalty and is ex delicto. Union Glass Co. v. First Nat. Bank of New Castle, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 565, 572.

ACTION FOR DECEIT OR FRAUD.

The common-law "action for deceit" is an action in tort. There can be no recovery unless it can be shown that the injury was done and loss occasioned by the false statement relied upon. In actions of this sort it was long ago laid down that fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, could not give rise to such an action. It therefore must clearly appear upon the face of the petition that the false statement complained of actually caused loss to the claimant. Brady v. Evans (U. S.) 78 Fed. 558, 560, 24 C. C. A. 236.

Code, § 291, subsec. 4, authorizing the arrest of a defendant in a civil action brought to recover damages for fraud and deceit, will be construed to include an action for seduction. Hood v. Suddeth, 16 S. E. 397, 400, 111 N. C. 215.

Code Civ. Proc. § 28, providing that "an action for relief on the ground of fraud" must be begun within three years from the time the cause of action accrued, does not include an action to remove a cloud on plaintiff's title caused by a fraudulent conveyance. The statute has reference to suits by parties who are asking to be relieved from contracts which they were fraudulently induced to make, as where a deed has been fraudulently obtained, and suits of that character, where fraud is the substantive cause of the action; but where the alleged fraud is only an incident of the action, and the fraudulent deed conveyed nothing, and the plaintiff was in a position to recover possession of the land notwithstanding the fraudulent conveyance, and without first procuring its cancellation in equity, the statute has no application. Wagner v. Law, 28 Pac. 1109, 1115, 3 Wash. St. 500, 15 L. R. A. 784, 28 Am. St. Rep. 56.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff recovered a judgment against defendant, which is still unpaid and unsatisfied; that defendant willfully and falsely represented that he could not pay any of his debts, but that if plaintiff would accept a small portion of such judgment in full settlement, and give defendant a release, then defendant would procure a person to take an assignment of the judgment; that, relying on such statement, plaintiff accepted the offer and gave defendant a release, and made an assignment to one M.; that the money was paid not by M., but by defendant; and that the defendant was able to pay the judgment in full—states all the constituents in an action for deceit, viz., representation, falsity, scienter, distribution, or injury. Wessels v. Carr, 38 N. Y. Supp. 600, 16 Misc. Rep. 440.

The gist of the action for deceit is that the defendant made false representations knowing them to be untrue. Watson v. Jones, 25 South. 678, 681, 41 Fla. 241.

In order to sustain an action for deceit, there must be proof of fraud; nothing short of this will suffice. Bank of Atchison County v. Byers, 41 S. W. 325, 331, 139 Mo. 627 (citing Verry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 374).

ACTION FOR INJURY TO PERSON OR CHARACTER.

The words "action for injury to the person," as generally used, include not only such injuries as result from trespass, but also such as result from a breach of the contract obligation. It will not, however, cover an action against a physician for negligence or want of skill in the treatment of a patient. Wood v. Downing's Adm'r, 62 S. W. 487, 489, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 62-64, 110 Ky. 658.

Rev. St. c. 127, § 2, subd. 1, providing that the defendant shall be liable to arrest where the "action is for an injury to person or character," does not include an action by the personal representatives for the wrongful death of the decedent, and such an action is not for an injury to the person of the deceased. Gibbs v. Larrabee, 23 Wis. 495, 496.

Code, § 291, authorizing the arrest of a defendant in a civil action for injury to character and person, was construed to include an action for seduction. Hood v. Suddeth, 16 S. E. 397, 399, 111 N. C. 215.

ACTION FOR MESNE PROFITS.

See "Mesne Profits (Action for)."

ACTION FOR NUISANCE.

The "action for a nuisance" provided for in Code Civ. Proc. tit. 1, c. 14, art. 7, is a strictly common-law action. At the common law the remedy for an injury sustained by a private nuisance was an action on the case for damages, or by assize of nuisance, or by a writ of quod permittat prosternere. In the former action the party injured only recovered satisfaction for the injury, but could not thereby remove the nuisance. In the two latter, if the plaintiff prevailed, he not only recovered damages for the injury sustained, but judgment that the nuisance be abated or removed. Waggoner v. Jermaine (N. Y.) 3 Den. 306, 310, 45 Am. Dec. 474. By Code Civ. Proc. § 453, the proceedings by writ of nuisance were changed into an action, and it has been declared that the action thus provided for is a substitute for the writ of nuisance. Miller v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co., 80 N. Y. Supp. 319, 320, 78 App. Div. 390 (citing Ellsworth v. Putnam [N. Y.] 16 Barb. 565).

Code Civ. Proc. § 963, declares that in certain actions, including an action for a nuisance, the issues of fact must be tried by a jury. Held, that the phrase "for a nuisance" imported an action for damages, and hence an action to enjoin a nuisance was not within the purview of the section. Olmsted v. Rich, 6 N. Y. Supp. 826, 53 Hun. 638 (following Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 105 N. Y. 319, 11 N. E. 518).

ACTION FOR PENALTY OR FORFEITURE.

Code, § 18, subd. 4, providing that an "action for a penalty or forfeiture" must be brought within one year, must be construed to embrace within its terms a proceeding to amerce a sheriff for neglecting and refusing to execute a special writ of execution issued to him, though, technically and strictly, the language of the section does not embrace the proceeding to amerce, because it refers to civil actions exclusively. An action is defined by Code, § 4, as an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. The proceeding to amerce is in the nature of an action to redress a wrong, its object being to give the judgment creditor satisfaction or a penalty for the omission of the official duty of the sheriff. Fuller v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 22 Pac. 561, 562, 42 Kan. 551.

ACTION FOR RECOVERY OF MONEY.

See "For the Recovery of."

The words "recovery of the money," as used in Code, § 227, allowing the property of a debtor to be attached in an action for the recovery of the money against the debtor who is not a resident of the state, do not include an action for damages for wrongs, and hence an attachment cannot be issued in an action for the conversion of personal property. Shaffer v. Mason (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 501, 502, 18 Abb. Prac. 455, 29 How. Prac. 55.

The words "recovery of money," as used in the statutes authorizing an attachment in a case for the recovery of money, include an action for wrong, as well as an action on a contract. An action of assault and battery is as much an action for the recovery of money as an action for the breach of a contract, and the amount claimed, and the grounds thereof, can as well be stated in the former case, and with as much certainty, as can the claim for unliquidated damages in the latter. Floyd v. Blake (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. 349, 351.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3245, which provides that costs cannot be awarded to plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation, in which the complaint demands judgment for a sum of money, unless the claim upon which it is founded shall be presented before the commencement thereof, includes actions ex delicto as well as actions ex contractu. Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 761.

Actions arising on contract for the recovery of money only are actions for the recovery of a definite sum of money as such, and without calling on the court to ascertain or adjudge anything but the existence and terms of the contract; and an action that requires the determination of amounts unliquidated, in their nature requiring other proof and depending on other considerations than such as appear in the contract itself, is not such an action. Tuttle v. Smith (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. 329, 334.

As used in Comp. Laws, § 4894, authorizing an attachment in actions arising on contract for the recovery of a sum of money only, the phrase "for the recovery of money only" must be construed to mean the recovery of a definite sum of money as such, and without calling on the court to ascertain or adjudge anything but the existence and terms of the contract by which it is due. No action can properly be said to be within such provision unless the supposed contract relates to property of some kind—to some pecuniary interest to be affected by its breach—and the violation of which enables the party aggrieved to state to the court in its complaint such facts as will show damages of a pecuniary nature, and such damages as may be ascertained by some legal rule of indemnification. Coats v. Arthur, 58 N. W. 675, 681, 5 S. D. 274.

An action for the foreclosure of a mortgage is not an action for recovery of money only, within Gen. St. c. 17, § 227, providing that no action shall be commenced against an executor, except "actions for the recovery of money only," until the expiration of a certain time. Jones v. Null, 1 N. W. 867, 868, 9 Neb. 57.

The expression "recovery of money," as used in Code, § 277, authorizing an attachment in an action for the recovery of money, refers to cases where a sum of money is specified in the summons, as the sum for which plaintiff will take judgment if defendant fail to answer the complaint, and does not embrace actions for wrongs. Gordon v. Gaffey, 11 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 1, 2.

Code Civ. Proc. § 248, allowing an attachment to issue in any action for the "recovery of money or property" and for damages for conversion, or in an action for the "recovery of damages" done to personal property, does not authorize an attachment in a suit for slander. Addison v. Sujette (S. C.) 27 S. E. 631, 636.

A proceeding for an accounting between partners, though it is merely collateral, and for the purpose of enabling the court to render a money judgment in favor of the party entitled thereto, is not an action for the recovery of money only. Powell v. Bennett, 29 N. E. 926, 4 Ind. App. 112.

Where defendant induces plaintiff by false and fraudulent representations to purchase from him land by way of exchange, and defendant pays part cash and the said land in exchange for plaintiff's land, an action by plaintiff after a tender of reconveyance of the land fraudulently conveyed to him and for the agreed price thereof in money is an action in tort, and not an action arising on a contract for the recovery of money only. Crossman v. Lindsley (N. Y.) 42 How. Prac. 107, 108.

ACTION FOR RECOVERY OF REAL ESTATE.

"Action for the recovery of real estate," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 75, § 11, providing that any person against whom a judgment is recovered in an action for the recovery of real property may have a new trial on notice, etc., is to be construed as meaning actions "in the nature of actions of ejectment—that is, in which a recovery of possession is sought—and does not include all actions in which the title may come in question and be determined." Knight v. Valentine, 29 N. W. 3, 4, 35 Minn. 367. It includes proceeding under the statute, of forcible entry and detainer for recovery of possession. Ferguson v. Kumler, 25 Minn. 183, 185.

An action brought in Arkansas by a daughter, whose father left all his property to his sons, "having full confidence in their disposition to deal justly and liberally," and leaving it "to them to make proper and suitable provisions for their sisters," against the collusive purchaser from her brothers, is not an action for the recovery of real property within the meaning of the statute of limitations of Arkansas. Percy v. Cockrill (U. S.) 53 Fed. 872, 876, 4 C. C. A. 73 (citing Mansf. Dig. § 4471).

Under a statute authorizing a married woman to maintain an action for the recovery and protection of her real estate without joining her husband, it is held that an action for partition is an action for the recovery and protection of land within the meaning of the statute. Castner v. Sliker, 10 Atl. 493, 43 N. J. Eq. 8.

ACTION FOR SEDUCTION.

The action at common law known as an "action for seduction" would only in fact be an action of trespass or trespass on the case (authorities were not agreed upon that point) for the loss of services. The person entitled to the services of the party seduced could maintain the action, but none other could. Bartley v. Richtmyer, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 33, 53 Am. Dec. 338. The law gave no remedy to the parent for the mere seduction of his daughter, however wrongfully it might have been accomplished. Incontinence on the part of the young woman could not be made the foundation of an action against the person who had tempted her and deprived her of her chastity, but if she were living with her parent at the time of the seduction, and the seduction were followed by pregnancy and illness, whereby the parent was deprived of the filial services theretofore rendered to him, an action was maintainable against the seducer. Add. Torts, § 1277. The foundation of the action was not placed upon the seduction itself, but upon the loss of services. Breon v. Henkle, 13 Pac. 289, 290, 14 Or. 494.

ACTION FOR SLANDEROUS WORDS.

An action for written slander is an action for "slandorous words" within the General Judiciary Act of March 2, 1797, § 97, providing that in "all actions of case for slanderous words, if the damages found or assessed by the jury do not surmount the sum of $7.00, the court shall allow no greater costs than damages." Parsons v. Young, 2 Vt. 434.

ACTION FOR WASTE.

An action for waste is a proceeding ex delicto, and lies for whatsoever does a lasting damage to "the freehold or inheritance," either intrinsically injurious thereto in contemplation of law, or shown so to be by proofs for the jury, a special and sufficient license in writing to commit the waste done being requisite to avoid such action of waste and its consequences. Purton v. Watson, 2 N. Y. Supp. 661 (citing McGregor v. Brown, 10 N. Y. [6 Seld.] 114, 119; Code Civ. Proc. § 1651).

ACTION IN EQUITY.

An application to a district court by an executor or administrator for license to sell real property is not an "action in equity," within Code Civ. Proc. § 675, providing that appeals may be brought to the Supreme Court by either party in all actions in equity. Such a proceeding is not, strictly speaking, an action, but a special proceeding. ACTION ON CONTRACT.

The phrase "action arising on contract," as employed in Comp. Laws, § 4903, specifying the kinds of actions on which attachments may issue, is the equivalent of "actions ex contractu," since actions at law are fundamentally and logically divided into two classes—actions ex contractu and actions ex delicto. First Nat. Bank of Nashua v. Van Vooris, 62 N. W. 378, 379, 6 S. D. 548.

Act March 3, 1875, declares that no federal, circuit, or district court shall have cognizance of any suit founded on a contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes, etc. Held, that the term "founded on contract" should not be limited and restrained to cover only suits brought on the contract to recover the amount called for by the contract, or to have a specific performance of its terms, so as to include suits for damages for breach of contract, but should be held to embrace the latter form of action as well as the former. Republic Iron Mining Co. v. Jones (U. S.) 37 Fed. 721, 722, 2 L. R. A. 746.

The term "action of contract" in St. 1890, c. 457, allowing one who has loaned money in dealing in margins to recover the same in an action of contract, includes an action for money had and received. Crandell v. White, 41 N. E. 204, 205, 164 Mass. 54.

An action brought to recover damages for a breach of the condition of a bond given by the plaintiff in a suit in another state upon the issuance of a writ of ne exeat, to secure the defendant therein for his costs and damages, is an action upon contract. The technical common-law form of actions ex contractu are abolished by the Code, and actions which would formerly be distinguished as debt, covenant, or assumpsit all fall under the general designation of "actions upon contract." Midland Co. v. Broat, 50 Minn. 562, 567, 52 N. W. 972, 973, 17 L. R. A. 312.

Bonds.

Rev. St. 1839, § 250, giving to a defendant in an "action arising on contract" the right to counterclaim any other cause of action also "arising on contract," includes an action on an appeal bond, though the judgment appealed from was rendered for a tort, since the prior proceedings were merged in the judgment, which became the contract in suit, and was subject to a counterclaim, irrespective of the character of the original claim. Green v. Conrad, 21 S. W. 839-843, 114 Mo. 651.

Code, § 3456, providing that causes of "action founded on contract" are revived by an admission in writing signed by the party to be charged, should be construed to include an action or proceeding to enforce a guardian's duty to safely care for the trust funds coming into his hands, and to account therefor to the ward or to the court for the ward's benefit, for it is founded on a contract of the most solemn nature. Blakeney v. Wyland, 89 N. W. 10, 17, 115 Iowa, 607.

On motion for a new trial on an action on a sheriff's bond for breach of official duty in making an execution sale, where the fifth statutory cause for a new trial (Rev. St. 1881, § 559) is not assigned, namely, "error in the assessment of the amount of recovery where the action is on contract," the fourth statutory cause, "excessive damages," does not call in question the assessment of the amount of recovery, as "the action is on contract." Moore v. State, 114 Ind. 414, 423, 16 N. E. 836.

Breach of marriage promise

Code, § 227, providing that an attachment may issue in an "action arising on contract for the recovery of money only," cannot be construed to embrace an action founded on an alleged breach of promise of marriage, though such action is founded on an alleged contract to marry between the parties, and is for the recovery of money only. An action cannot properly be said to be an action arising on contract for the recovery of money only, unless it relates to property of some kind, to some pecuniary interest to be affected by its breach, and the violation of which requires the party aggrieved to state to the court in his complaint such facts as will show damages of a pecuniary character, and such damages as may be ascertained by some legal rule of indemnification. Barnes v. Buck, 1 Lans. (N. Y.) 268, 269.

Deposit.

An action to recover back a deposit of money made under an executory contract, on the ground of alleged fraud in inducing plaintiff to make the deposit, and without any allegation of demand and refusal, is not an "action on contract" within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 227, authorizing the issuance of an attachment in "actions arising on contract," but is an action for fraud, and therefore an attachment cannot be issued. Knapp v. Meigs (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 406.

Judgment.

Code, § 129, directs the insertion of a notice, in a summons in an "action on contract," that judgment will be taken for a specified sum on failure of the defendant to answer. Held, that the term "action on contract," as there used, meant an action relating to an agreement between the parties, either express or implied, and had no application to, and did not include, actions to recover statutory penalties, actions founded on judgments, etc. White v. Wood, 2 N. Y. Supp. 673, 674, 49 Hun. 381 (citing McCoun v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 50 N. Y. 176).

Code Iowa, § 2539, providing that causes of action founded on contract may be revived by an admission or new promise in writing, construed not to include an action on a judgment. McAleer v. Clay County (U. S.) 38 Fed. 707, 708.

The phrase "action arising on contract" includes an action on a money judgment, whether the same was recovered for a tort or on a contract. First Nat. Bank v. Van Vooris, 62 N. W. 378, 379, 6 S. D. 548.

Lease.

Under Comp. Laws, § 6194, authorizing actions of assumpsit in "all cases arising upon contract under seal, or upon judgments, when an action of covenant or of debt may be maintained," "in the same manner in all respects as upon contracts without seal," applies to an action for use and occupation on a lease under seal. An action directly on the terms of the case, and one simply for use and occupation, differ only in that in one the declaration is special, and in the other general; the purpose in each action is the same, and both are actions arising upon contract. Dalton v. Laudahn, 80 Mich. 349, 350.

Open account.

"Contract," as used in the Georgia Constitution of 1868 in reference to "cases founded on contract," in which a court may enter verdict without a jury, does not include an action on an open account, wherein, under Code, § 3405, on personal service and no defense made, the plaintiff may take a verdict without proving every item. Jones v. Adams, 46 Ga. 605.

Statutory liability.

Code Civ. Proc. § 537, authorizing an attachment in an "action on contract" for the payment of money, includes a liability of the stockholder of a corporation under Const. art. 12, § 3, making such a stockholder liable for his portion of the corporate debts. Kennedy v. California Sav. Bank, 31 Pac. 846, 847, 97 Cal. 93, 33 Am. St. Rep. 163.

An action by the fire department of a city against an insurance agent to recover the percentage of insurance premiums received by him to which plaintiff is entitled under Rev. St. § 1924, is an "action on contract," as used in Rev. St. § 2918, subd. 7, authorizing the recovery of full costs in certain actions on a contract, when the damages recovered exceed $50. Fire Dept. of City of Oshkosh v. Tuttle, 7 N. W. 549, 50 Wis. 552.

Waiver of tort.

Rev. St. 1879, § 3522, subd. 2, providing that the defendant in any action arising on contract may plead any other cause of "action arising on contract" existing at the commencement of the action as a counterclaim and set-off, is liberally construed to include all independent express contracts, whether liquidated or unliquidated, and also to include that class of cases in which tort has been suffered. The law permits the sufferer to waive the tort and sue on an implied contract. If he indicates in his plea that he is proceeding on the implied assumpsit, his action will be sustained as an action arising on contract, and hence a cross-demand for damages suffered by reason of false and fraudulent representations of a vendor before and at the time of a sale, and not a demand for damages for a breach of a contract, is not an "action arising on contract." Barnes v. McMullins, 78 Mo. 260, 274; Green v. Conrad, 21 S. W. 839, 843, 114 Mo. 651.

ACTION ON JUDGMENT.

An "action on a judgment" is not necessarily a proceeding to enforce the judgment, but may be for the purposes of renewing it and continuing it in force; but supplementary proceedings are not an action on a judgment within Code Civ. Proc. § 382, subd. 7, providing that an action on a judgment rendered in a court not of record must be commenced within six years. Green v. Hauser, 9 N. Y. Supp. 660, 662, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 354.

ACTION PUTTING CHARACTER IN ISSUE.

ACTION TO DETERMINE CLAIM TO REAL ESTATE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3252, allowing certain additional costs in actions "to determine a claim to real property," refers only to proceedings to assert a claim to title to land, and does not include an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Wright v. Reusens, 15 N. Y. Supp. 504, 590, 60 Hun, 585.

ACTION TO INVALIDATE TAX DEED.

The expression "action to invalidate or cancel any tax deed," used in Comp. Laws, § 1643, providing that in an action to recover the possession or title of any property, real or personal, sold for taxes, or to invalidate or cancel any tax deed, etc., must be confined to suits where the legality of the entire tax is in good faith controverted. A suit to quiet plaintiff's title to real estate, and to annul defendant's adverse title based upon a tax deed, is an action to invalidate or cancel a tax deed. O'Neil v. Tyler, 53 N. W. 434, 438, 3 N. D. 47.

ACTIONABLE FRAUD.

"Actionable fraud" consists in a false representation made with an intention to deceive, and may be committed by stating what is known to be false or by professing knowledge of the truth of a statement which is false, but in either case the essential ingredient is a falsehood uttered with intent to deceive. Marsh v. Falker, 40 N. Y. 562, 575, note.

As a general rule, "actionable fraud" or misrepresentations consist in a false statement concerning a fact material to the contract, and which is influential in producing it. The mere expression of opinion, estimate, or judgment of the value of property, even if false, does not ordinarily constitute actionable fraud, but a willful misrepresentation by a vendor that the rent from property charged was greater than it was, when relied upon by the vendee, is actionable fraud; also a willful representation by the owner that the property was high and dry and located in a particular place, which representation was relied upon by the purchaser as true, but which was false, and which operated to his personal injury, is an actionable fraud. Hecht v. Metzler, 48 Pac. 37, 40, 14 Utah, 408, 60 Am. St. Rep. 906.

Actionable fraud consists in misrepresentation or concealment as to the existence or nonexistence of some fact or circumstance. Such an action cannot therefore be based upon the expression of hopes, expectations, and beliefs. Farrington v. Bullard, 40 Barb.

(N. Y.) 512, 516; Sawyer v. Prickett, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 146, 22 L. Ed. 105, 103; Gallagher v. Bunnell, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 346, 347; Lexow v. Julian, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 477. A statement by the owner of property, to induce another to make a loan on the security thereof, that he then had a customer ready and willing to pay a certain amount in cash for property, is actionable. Seaman v. Becar, 38 N. Y. Supp. 69, 70, 15 Misc. Rep. 616.

"Actionable fraud" consists either in a misrepresentation or concealment as to the existence of some fact or circumstance. Farrington v. Bullard, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 512, 516. A mere promise of something in the future cannot be regarded as a fraudulent representation of an existing fact. Kley v. Healy, 29 N. Y. Supp. 3, 6, 9 Misc. Rep. 93, 97.

"Actionable fraud" is a deception practiced in order to induce another to part with property or to surrender some legal right, and which accomplishes the end designed. Cooley, Torts (1st Ed.) 474. The false statement must be material, must be connected with the particular transaction complained of, must be made to influence the opposite party's conduct, and must be relied upon by some party. Further, damages must be shown, and such damages must follow proximately the deception. Ansbacher v. Pfeiffer, 13 N. Y. Supp. 418, 419, 59 Hun, 624.

"A statement of value made by a vendor during negotiations between parties, the value known to be excessive, does not frequently constitute fraud. The mere expression of opinion as to value, although the amount stated is known to be excessive, is not fraud, unless the person making it knew at the time that in consequence of the relations—the trust and confidence existing between himself and the person to whom it was made—the vendor would rely on it and be controlled by it." Story, Eq. Jur. § 197. "The purchaser is not entitled to relief against the vendor for false affirmation of value, it being deemed his own folly to credit a new assertion of that nature; and, besides, the value consists in judgment and estimation, in which men necessarily differ." But the remedy will lie against the vendor for falsely affirming that a greater rent is paid for the estate than is actually reserved, inasmuch as that is a fact within his own knowledge. Dobell v. Stevens, 3 Barn. & C. 623; Lysney v. Selby, 2 Ld. Raym. 1118. An inadequacy of value is, in general, of itself no evidence of fraud, although, taken together with other circumstances, it may constitute the same element of proof in establishing fraud. Wise v. Fuller, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 257, 262.

ACTIONABLE INJURY.

An injury that is not the natural consequence of an act or omission, and that would not have resulted but for the interposition of a new and independent cause, is not actionable; nor is an injury that could not have been foreseen or reasonably anticipated as the probable result from an act of negligence. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry (U. S.) 84 Fed. 944, 950, 28 C. C. A. 644, 43 L. R. A. 349.

ACTIONABLE MISREPRESENTATION.

It may be said generally that "actionable misrepresentations" consist in a false statement respecting the fact material to the contract, and which is influential in producing it. Wise v. Fuller, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 257, 262.

ACTIONABLE NEGLIGENCE.

"Actionable negligence" consists in the breach of some duty owing to the defendant by the plaintiff, by reason of which the plaintiff was injured. Salem-Bedford Stone Co. v. O'Brien, 40 N. E. 430, 431, 12 Ind. App. 217 (citing Morrow v. Sweeney, 38 N. E. 187, 10 Ind. App. 626; Carskaddon v. Mills, 31 N. E. 559, 5 Ind. App. 22; Thiele v. McManus, 28 N. E. 327, 3 Ind. App. 132); South Bend Iron Works v. Larger, 39 N. E. 209, 210, 11 Ind. App. 367; Hettchen v. Chipman, 41 Atl. 65, 87 Md. 729; Singleton v. Felton (U. S.) 101 Fed. 526, 528, 42 C. C. A. 57; O'Reilly v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 572, 573, 82 App. Div. 492 (citing McGrath v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 59 N. Y. 468, 17 Am. Rep. 359).

"Actionable negligence" consists in the breach or nonperformance of some duty of the party charged with the negligent act or omission, owed to the one suffering loss or damage thereby. Brett, M. R., in Heaven v. Pender, 17 Rep. 511, defines "actionable negligence" to consist in the failure to exercise ordinary care or skill towards a person to whom the defendant owes the duty of observing ordinary care, by which failure the plaintiff, without contributory negligence on his part, has suffered injury to his person or property. This definition is accepted and approved by the court for the purposes of this case. Roddy v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 15 S. W. 1112, 1113, 104 Mo. 234, 12 L. R. A. 746, 24 Am. St. Rep. 333.

A correct definition of "actionable negligence" must include the notion that a legal duty has been violated, whether that duty arose from the common law or from a valid statute or a municipal ordinance being immaterial. Fields v. North Jersey St. Ry. Co., 53 Atl. 404, 406, 68 N. J. Law, 343, 59 L. R. A. 455, 96 Am. St. Rep. 552.

Actionable negligence arises from a neglect to perform a legal duty. Boardman v. Creighton, 49 Atl. 663, 665, 95 Me. 154; Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co., 44 Atl. 809, 810, 69 N. H. 257, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163; Akers v. Chicago, St. P. & O. Ry. Co., 60 N. W. 669, 670, 58 Minn.

540. Some relation of duty, public or private, special or general, must exist, either by contract or as an implication of public policy, before one man becomes liable to another for the consequences of a careless act or omission on the part of the first man which causes injury to the second man. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 35 Atl. 90, 94, 83 Md. 434. With purely moral obligations the law does not deal. Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co., 44 Atl. 809, 810, 69 N. H. 257, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163. Even if a defendant owes a duty to some one else, but does not owe it to the person injured, no action will lie. Under these principles the failure of a railroad company to comply with a statute requiring such companies to block frogs in their yards and terminal stations did not render it liable to a trespasser in its yards for injuries received by him owing to such failure. Akers v. Chicago, St. P. & O. Ry. Co., 60 N. W. 669, 670, 58 Minn. 540.

To constitute actionable negligence, there must be not only causal connection between the negligence complained of and the injury suffered, but the connection must be by natural unbroken sequence, without intervening efficient causes, so that but for the negligence in the defendant the injury would not have occurred. It must not only be the cause, but it must be the proximate—that is, the direct and immediate—efficient cause of the injury. Decatur Car Wheel & Mfg. Co. v. Mehauffey, 29 South. 646, 651, 128 Ala. 242 (citing Western Ry. of Alabama v. Mutch, 97 Ala. 196, 11 South. 895, 21 L. R. A. 316, 38 Am. St. Rep. 179); Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 35 Atl. 90, 94, 83 Md. 434.

"Actionable negligence" is a failure in legal duty which occasions an injury to a party free from contributory negligence, or who has not failed in the discharge of his duty in the given circumstances. The failure of a railroad company to furnish a reasonably safe passage to and from its mail train while stopping at its regular stations for the purpose of mailing letters is actionable negligence. Hale v. Grand Trunk R. R., 15 Atl. 300, 303, 60 Vt. 605, 1 L. R. A. 187.

Actionable negligence involves a breach of duty owed by a responsible person either to the public generally or to some particular person. It makes it necessary that we shall consider the duty owed to the defendant by the plaintiff. "Duty" and "negligence," thus considered, are correlative terms. Bethlehem Iron Works Co. v. Weiss (U. S.) 100 Fed. 45, 49, 40 C. C. A. 270.

Actionable negligence may spring from the careless performance of a legal duty, or from a total neglect or disregard of such duty, but it can never be consistently predicated of a purely accidental occurrence. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Cutts, 49 Atl. 673, 674, 95 Me. 162.

The element which distinguishes actionable negligence from criminal wrong or willful tort is inadvertence on the part of the person causing the injury. He may advert to the act of omission of which he is guilty, but he cannot advert to it as a failure of duty; that is, he cannot be conscious that it is a want of ordinary care without subjecting himself to the charge of having inflicted willful injury. Proctor v. Southern Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 351, 358, 61 S. C. 170.

The standard of duty imposed by law in the different contractual relations of life varies in degree from ordinary care, as in the relation of master and servant, to extreme vigilance, as in the case of common carriers of passengers for hire. In no case, excepting possibly that of the carrier of merchandise for hire, is the duty absolute, such as involved in the obligation of an insurer or guarantor; but in all cases failure of duty is regarded as actionable negligence. Obanhein v. Arbuckle, 81 N. Y. Supp. 133, 135, 80 App. Div. 465.

ACTIONABLE NUISANCE.

An "actionable nuisance" is anything wrongfully done or permitted which injures or annoys another in the enjoyment of his legal right. Cooper v. Overton, 52 S. W. 183, 184, 102 Tenn. 211, 45 L. R. A. 591, 73 Am. St. Rep. 864; Chicago North Shore St. Ry. Co. v. Payne, 61 N. E. 467, 468, 192 Ill. 239.

"Anything which is injurious to health, or indecent, or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property is a nuisance and subject of an action. Such action may be brought by any person whose property is injuriously affected, or whose personal enjoyment is lessened by the nuisance and by the judgment the nuisance may be enjoined or abated as well as damages recovered." Code Civ. Proc. § 731. Grandona v. Lovdal, 21 Pac. 366, 368, 78 Cal. 611, 12 Am. St. Rep. 121.

By Code Civ. Proc. § 731, an "actionable nuisance" is defined as follows: Anything which is injurious to health, or indecent, or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, is a nuisance and the subject of an action. Grandona v. Lovdal, 21 Pac. 366, 368, 78 Cal. 611, 12 Am. St. Rep. 121.

A power house erected next door to a boarding house, and injuring it by reason of the noise and vibrations caused by its machinery, would not be a private nuisance if it was run in a skillful and proper manner and the maintenance was authorized by its charter. Chicago North Shore St. Ry. Co. v. Payne, 61 N. E. 467, 468, 192 Ill. 239.

ACTIONABLE PER SE.

"Words actionable per se" are such words as charge some punishable offense, some disgraceful disease, or spoken of a person in relation to some profession, occupation, or official station in which he is employed. Barnes v. Trundy, 31 Me. 321, 323.

The expression "actionable per se" at common law refers to words importing a felony, but many public offenses were felonies at common law which were made mere misdemeanors by the more enlightened American statutory law. The general rule is that any words which charge a person with an indictable offense which is punishable by an infamous or corporal punishment, or which involves moral turpitude, are actionable in themselves. Lemons v. Wells, 78 Ky. 117, 118.

The expression "actionable per se," as used in the law of slander, means words from which damages are presumed, without any special damage being done, and must be such as, if true, would subject a private person to legal punishment, or, if spoken of a person holding an office or profession, such as are calculated to injure him in his office, profession, or trade; and, if the words are not actionable under this rule, falsehood and malice cannot make them so. Thus, to say of a young lady that she is not handsome, might be false and malicious, but it would not be actionable. Mayrant v. Richardson (S. O.) 1 Nott & McC. 347, 349, 9 Am. Dec. 707.

When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which from its nature necessarily must or presumably will, as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication, prima facie, constitutes a cause of action, and prima facie constitutes a wrong, without any allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from the fact of publication; and this is all that is meant by the term "actionable per se." Newell, Defam. p. 181. "When defamatory words spoken of a person in relation to his business, profession, or occupation are such that they directly tend to injure him in respect to it, or to impair confidence in his character or ability, when from the nature of the business great confidence must necessarily be reposed, they are 'actionable per se,' although not applied by the speaker to the profession or occupation of the plaintiff; but when they convey only a general imputation upon his character, injurious to any one of whom they might be spoken, they are not actionable unless such application be made." Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 398, 405, 6 Am. Rep. 105; Continental Nat. Bank v. Bowdler, 23 S. W. 131, 134, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 723.

Words charging the wife with deserting her husband during his illness are actionable per se in connection with words forbidding all persons to give her harbor or trust on his account, such words not being privileged. Smith v. Smith, 41 N. W. 499, 500, 73 Mich. 445, 3 L. R. A. 52, 16 Am. St. Rep. 594.

When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which necessarily must or presumably will, as its natural consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication prima facie constitutes a cause of action, and prima facie constitutes a wrong, without any allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from the fact of publication; and this is all that is meant by the term "actionable per se." Pratt v. Pioneer Press Co., 35 Minn. 251, 254, 28 N. W. 708, 709, 710.

ACTIONABLE WORDS.

"Actionable words" in libel are those which (1) import a charge of some punishable crime, or (2) import some offensive disease which would tend to deprive a person of society, or (3) which tend to injure a party in his trade and occupation or business, or (4) which have produced some special damage. Cady v. Brooklyn Union Pub. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 198, 199, 23 Misc. Rep. 409 (citing Moore v. Francis, 23 N. E. 1127, 121 N. Y. 199, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810; Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wils. 177).

ACTIVE.

That is in action; that demands action; actually subsisting; the opposite of passive. An active debt is one which draws interest. An active trust is a confidence connected with a duty. An active use is a present legal estate. Black, Law Dict.

ACTIVE DUTY.

Every member of the State Guard, while in attendance at the regular drill provided for by law, or at any parade, review, battalion, regimental, or other drill, or any escort duty, or paying military honors, or either, within or without the state, or any military excursion authorized by the Governor, or by his commanding officer, shall be considered on "active duty" at such time, except as to pay and rations. Ky. St. 1903, § 2700.

ACTIVE TRUST.

An "active trust" is where special and particular duties are pointed out to be performed by a trustee. Flaherty v. O'Connor (R. I.) 54 Atl. 376, 377 (citing 1 Perry on Trusts [5th Ed.] § 18).

An "active trust" is one in which active duties, requiring the exercise of sound personal discretion, are enjoined on the trustee. Appeal of Barnett, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 392, 399, 86 Am. Dec. 502 (quoted and approved In re Eshelman's Estate, 43 Atl. 201, 202, 191 Pa. 68).

Where a special duty is to be performed by the trustee in respect to the estate, such as to collect the rents and profits, to sell the estate, etc., the trust is called "active." All other trusts are denominated "passive" trusts, because there is no duty imposed on the trustee. He simply acts as the reservoir of the legal estate, because, from terms and character of the conveyance and limitation, the statute cannot transfer the legal estate to the cestui que use or trust. Perkins v. Brinkley, 45 S. E. 541, 542, 133 N. C. 154.

If the trustee is to exercise any direction in the management of the estate or in the investment of the proceeds, or if the purpose of the trust is to protect the estate for a given time, or until the death of some one, or until division, or until a request for a conveyance is made, the trust is active. Although the direction may be for the trustee to permit and suffer another person to receive the rents, yet if any duty is to be imposed upon the trustee, expressly or by implication, the legal title is in him. First Nat. Bank v. Nashville Trust Co. (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 392, 401.

An analysis of the cases which have settled the distinction between active and dry trusts will show that in the former class the duty to be performed by the trustee must not only involve some positive action on his part, but an action attended with some discretion. The automatic function of merely receiving for the cestui que trust, and immediately paying over to him the trust fund or its income, will not make a trust active. The cestui que trust could perform the act as well, and he has no protection in the superior judgment of the trustee, because the trustee is not empowered to exercise his judgment. The cases properly describe him as a mere conduit. But when the trustee is invested with a discretion, however slight, he takes the place of the donor, and the trust committed to him is "active." A trust for the protection of the beneficiary, who may be a spendthrift, or a married woman, or a party in remainder, stands, of course, on a different footing, and is equally valid, whether the duties of the trustee are active or passive. In re Hemphill's Estate, 36 Atl. 409, 410, 180 Pa. 95.

A bequest in trust for testator's daughter for her natural life, the interest and income alone for her share to be paid to her, whether covert or discover, is an active trust. In re Forney's Estate, 28 Atl. 1086, 1087, 161 Pa. 209.

Where a will created the following trust: "I give and bequeath to my five children [naming them] in trust for their children, all my real estate, share and share alike, after the decease of my wife, * * * and the payment of the said bonds and mortgages against my real estate shall have been satisfied. Should any of my children before mentioned die without children, then their share of the said estate shall go to the surviving heirs, and the said children shall not have any power to sell or mortgage any of the said estate"—the trust created was active, because active duties attended it, and because it subserved contingent interests. In re Malseed's Estate (Pa.) 18 Phila. 405, 406.

ACTIVE VIGILANCE.

"Active vigilance," in reference to an executor's duty in collecting a debt due the estate, is a relative term, and depends on facts appearing in each case; and an executor, who claims that certain property not in his possession belongs to the estate, though he does not know how he can prove or who it actually belongs to, and who is advised by counsel in good faith that he cannot make such proof, and who actually believes it, will not be deemed not to have used "active vigilance" in failing to bring such action. O'Connor v. Gifford, 22 N. E. 1036, 1037, 117 N. Y. 275.

ACTOR.

Chinese actor as laborer, see "Chinese Laborer."

ACTUAL

"Actual" mean "real," as opposed to "nominal." Astor v. Merritt, 4 Sup. Ct. 413, 419, 111 U. S. 202, 28 L. Ed. 401.

The word "actual" has a definite and well-understood meaning. It is something real, in opposition to constructive or speculative; something existing in fact. A life insurance policy, requiring proof of "actual" death before payment, requires actual proof of the death of insured, and the mere presumption of death arising from seven years absence is insufficient. Kelly v. Supreme Council Catholic Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 61 N. Y. Supp. 394, 395, 46 App. Div. 79.

"Actual" means existent, but does not preclude the idea of change, so that a statute giving supervisors power to regulate water rates, and providing that until so regulated the "actual" rates established and collected by the water company shall be deemed the legal established rates thereof, does not prevent the water company from increasing the rates. Osborne v. San Diego Land & Town Co., 20 Sup. Ct. 860, 866, 178 U. S. 22, 44 L. Ed. 961.

As contrasted with option.

"Actual," as used in a letter between a broker and his customer, "I now see that you have my actual wheat account mixed with my option account," was used to distinguish two classes of transactions; the actual account referring to the actual purchase and sale of wheat, and the option account being merely fictitious transactions, which did not relate to the intended actual purchase and sale of that commodity, but merely a gambling contract on the rise and fall of the market. Dows v. Glaspel, 60 N. W. 60, 64, 4 N. D. 251.

ACTUAL ACCEPTANCE.

"Actual acceptance," as applied to a non-existing bill of exchange, must point to the particular bill to be accepted, and describe it in unmistakable terms, and a general letter of credit cannot be construed to be an acceptance of any particular bill. Valle v. Cerre's Adm'r, 36 Mo. 575, 590, 88 Am. Dec. 161.

ACTUAL AGENCY.

An agency is actual when the agent is really employed by the principal. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2299; Rev. Codes N. D. 1890, § 4307; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1660; First Nat. Bank v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co., 91 N. W. 436, 438, 11 N. D. 280.

ACTUAL AUTHORITY.

"Actual authority" is such as a principal intentionally confers upon the agent, or intentionally or by want of ordinary care allows the agent to believe himself to possess. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2316; Rev. Codes N. D. 1890, § 4321; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1674.

ACTUAL BIAS.

"Actual bias" of a juror is defined by Rev. St. Utah, p. 993, § 4833, subd. 2, as the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror which leads to a just inference in reference to the case that he will not act with entire impartiality. State v. Haworth, 68 Pac. 155, 158, 24 Utah, 398.

By Pen. Code Cal. § 1073, actual bias is defined to be the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case or to either of the parties which will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of either party. People v. Wells, 34 Pac. 718, 719, 100 Cal. 227.

"Actual bias consists in the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror which satisfies the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, that such juror cannot try the issues impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the party challenging." State v. Chapman, 47 N. W. 411, 414, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432 (citing Comp. Laws, § 7358, subd. 2); People v. McQuade, 18 N. E. 156, 160, 110 N. Y. 284, 304, 1 L. R. A. 273 (citing Code Cr. Proc. § 376, subd. 2). Actual bias is defined in the same language by Code Cr. Proc. § 22, art. 9, under which it was held that the formation and expression of an opinion are not alone the test of the juror's competency, but the nature of the opinion may be inquired into, and, if found to be only a transitory inclination of the mind, based upon rumor, newspaper statement, general notoriety, etc., the truth of which the juror does not inquire into nor judge, it is not a disqualifying opinion. Huntley v. Territory, 54 Pac. 314, 315, 7 Okl. 60.

ACTUAL BIRTH.

The term, "in existence by actual birth," as used in Pen. Code, art. 545, providing that the person upon whom the homicide is alleged to have been committed must be in existence by actual birth, means a complete expulsion of the child from the body of the mother alive. Wallace v. State, 10 Tex. App. 255, 270.

ACTUAL BREAKING.

See "Breaking (In Criminal Law)."

ACTUAL CASH PAYMENT.

Gen. St. c. 55, §§ 2-4, requires a special partner to contribute to the common stock of the firm a specified sum in actual cash payment as capital. Held, that the phrase "actual cash payment," in such connection, was emphatic, and was intended to exclude an instrument by which commercial securities of any description short of cash may be regarded by the aid of mercantile usage as spontaneously equivalent to cash, and to remove from all parties the temptation to evade its requirements in this respect. Hagerty v. Foster, 103 Mass. 17, 19. Such statute is not complied with by giving promissory notes of the special partner, payable on time to the general partner, and which, when negotiated, constitute a debt for which both members of the firm are liable. Such notes are in no legitimate sense a contribution of money to the common stock. It creates no fund or capital to which persons dealing with the firm might look for the payment of their debts, but substitutes in its place a debt for which each copartner is severally liable only. Nor is a note of a third person, not indorsed by the payee, of which the special partner and the copartnership were equitable owners, to be regarded as equivalent to money. A note is an agreement to pay money, and cannot be treated as cash. Pierce v. Bryant, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 91, 92. A like statute is held to merely require the capital contributed to be completely subjected to the control and distribution of the firm in the form of money, and hence the certified check of a solvent bank is an "actual cash payment." Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 9 N. Y. Supp. 239, 56 Hun, 641. Such a statute requires the entire payment to be made in money, and such payments cannot be made partly in cash and partly in goods, securities, or assets of another firm. Lineweaver v. Slagle, 2 Atl. 693, 696, 64 Md. 465, 54 Am. Rep. 775.

Actual cash payment includes a contribution to the capital of a limited partnership by checks which were actually cashed, and the amount of which actually went into the firm business, since payment by check is recognized by commercial law, and has come into use so frequently as to almost supersede payments of any considerable amount in any other manner, and when one man draws a check on his banker in favor of another, and it is accepted by the payee, and the debt is receipted, and all parties agree that the check was cashed, it cannot be said that such transaction was not an actual payment, and an actual payment is not required to be made in coin, and a payment by check which was actually cashed constituted an actual cash payment, within the meaning of the statute. Hogg v. Orgill, 34 Pa. (10 Casey) 344, 351.

The expression "actual cash payment" excludes a construction by which commercial securities of any description may be regarded, by the aid of mercantile uses, as substantially equivalent to cash. Lineweaver v. Slagle, 2 Atl. 693, 696, 64 Md. 465, 54 Am. Rep. 775.

Contribution of capital by a special partner for a limited partnership by means of a certified check on a solvent bank is an actual cash payment. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 9 N. Y. Supp. 239, 56 Hun, 641.

ACTUAL CASH VALUE.

The phrase "actual cash value" is practically synonymous with "fair cash value." The actual cash value of the property is the price which it will bring in a fair market, after fair and reasonable efforts have been made to find a purchaser who will give the highest price. The actual cash value, then, is the fair or reasonable cash price for which the property can be sold in the market. Birmingham Fire Ins. Co. v. Pulver, 18 N. E. 804, 807, 126 Ill. 329, 9 Am. St. Rep. 598; Conness v. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co., 62 N. E. 221, 225, 193 Ill. 464; Manchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Simmons, 35 S. W. 722, 723, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 607; Wolfe v. Howard Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 583, 584; Mack v. Lancashire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 4 Fed. 59, 60; Conness v. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co., 62 N. E. 221, 225, 193 Ill. 464 (citing Birmingham Fire Ins. Co. v. Pulver, 18 N. E. 804, 126 Ill. 329, 9 Am. St. Rep. 598).

The actual cash value of real or personal property is the price it would sell for, for cash, in the ordinary course of business, free from incumbrance, otherwise than at forced sale. Morgan's L. & T. R. S. Co. v. Board of Reviewers, 3 South. 507, 511, 41 La. Ann. 1156.

ACTUAL AND CONTINUED CHANGE OF POSSESSION.In statutes of frauds.

Civ. Code, § 3440, declaring that no sale of personal property shall be good as against the creditors of the seller, unless it is followed by an "actual and continued change of possession," requires a delivery of the property into the hands of the buyer, who must have physical possession of the same. That possession must be open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership. It must be such as to give evidence to the world of the claims of the new owner. He must, in other words, be in the usual relation to the property which owners of goods occupy to their property. This possession must be continuous; not taken to be surrendered back again; not formal, but substantial. But it need not necessarily continue indefinitely, when it is bona fide and openly taken, and is kept for such a length of time as to give general advertisement to the status of the property and the claim to it by the vendee. Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503, 506, 76 Am. Dec. 500 (quoted and approved in Bell v. McClellan, 67 Cal. 283, 7 Pac. 699; O'Gara v. Lowry, 5 Pac. 583, 588, 5 Mont. 427; Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316, 85 Am. Dec. 178; Hesthal v. Myles, 53 Cal. 623, Walters v. Ratliff, 61 Pac. 1070, 1073 10 Okl. 262).

Gen. St. 1878, c. 41, § 15, declares that every sale of goods in the possession of the vendor or under his control, unless the same is accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an "actual and continued change of possession," is presumed fraudulent as against the vendor's creditors. Held, that the actual and continued change of possession declared by the statute must be an absolute change of the possession, and that a mere formal or constructive taking possession of the vendee, and immediately leaving the property in the actual control and possession of the vendor, was not sufficient to prevent the presumption of fraud created by the statute from obtaining. Murch v. Swensen, 42 N. W. 290, 291, 40 Minn. 421. There must be such a change as the circumstances of the sale and nature of the property admit, such as the vendor is capable of making. Chickering & Sons v. White, 44 N. W. 988, 989, 42 Minn. 457.

Rev. St. p. 436, § 169, provides that every sale made by a vendor of goods in his possession or under his control, unless the same be accompanied by the immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, shall be conclusive evidence of fraud. Held, that the word "actual" was designed to exclude the idea of a mere formal change of possession, and means possession which is open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership by the vendee; in other words, he must be in that relation to the property which owners of goods occupy to their property. Dodge v. Jones, 14 Pac. 707, 710, 7 Mont. 121.

"Actual and continued change of possession," as used in reference to the sale of personal property by a judgment debtor, means "an open and public change of possession, which is to continue and to be manifested continually by outward and visible signs, such as to render it evident that the possession of the judgment debtor has ceased." Topping v. Lynch, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 484, 488.

The "actual change of possession" required to rebut the presumption of fraud in a sale of goods means such a change that the vendor ceases to possess the goods in any capacity whatever. The continuance of the vendor in possession as the vendee's agent is not "actual change of possession," so as to rebut the presumption of fraud. Grant v. Lewis, 14 Wis. 487, 490, 80 Am. Dec. 785.

"Actual change of possession," within the statute requiring every sale of personalty to be followed by an actual change of possession, is plainly used in opposition to "virtual" or "constructive." An actual change, as distinguished from that which by the mere intentment of law follows a transfer of the title, is an open, visible, public change, manifested by such outward signs as render it evident: that the possession of the owner, as such, has wholly ceased, and where, after a sale, the goods remained in the same house, in the same possession, were applied to the same usages, and, so far as the public had any means of judging, remained in the possession of the same person as owner, there was no such change. Randall v. Parker, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 69, 73.

In the provision of the statutes that every transfer of personal property, if made by the person having at the time possession or control, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, of the thing transferred, is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, the word "actual" is designed to exclude the idea of a mere formal change of possession. Morris v. McLaughlin, 64 Pac. 219, 221, 25 Mont. 151.

In chattel mortgage laws.

"Actual and continued change of possession," under a statute relating to chattel mortgages, means an open, public change of possession, which is to continue and be manifested continually by outward and visible signs, such as render it evident that the possession of the judgment debtor has changed. Constructive possession cannot be taken under a chattel mortgage. The possession must be taken in fact, and that possession cannot be taken by words and inspection. Steele v. Benham, 84 N. Y. 634, 638.

Actual change of possession imports at least something more than a mere legal or fictitious change to be worked by the operation of a chattel mortgage alone. Camp v. Camp (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 628, 629.

The "actual and continued change of possession" of mortgaged personalty, required by statute in order to prevent the presumption of fraud arising as to the transaction, cannot be construed to mean a constructive change of possession; and hence the act of an agent of the mortgagee in going to the mortgagor's place of business and taking possession of the mortgaged property with the mortgagor's assent, at the same time putting it in charge of one who was then and for a long time afterwards was in the mortgagor's employ, the property remaining in his place of business in its usual place and being used by the mortgagor in his business the same as before, did not amount to an "actual and continued change of possession." Brunswick v. McClay, 7 Neb. 137, 139.

Under Acts 1879, p. 134, § 1, requiring an "actual and continued change of possession" of mortgaged personal property to entitle plaintiff to relief as against a subsequent attaching creditor of the mortgagors, it is said that what will constitute a delivery and an actual and continued change of possession must necessarily depend on the character and situation of the property in question, and it was held that where, in an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage on cattle against the mortgagor and an attaching creditor, plaintiff sequestered the cattle, which the sheriff delivered to him under a "range levy," and plaintiff left the cattle with one of the mortgagors as keeper, and with other cattle to which plaintiff held title, there was an actual and continued change of possession within the statute. Randolph v. Brown, 53 S. W. 825, 828, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 617.

Comp. Laws 1885, c. 68, art. 2, § 11, providing that a chattel mortgage shall continue in force for only one year, unless a renewal affidavit is filed, or there is "an actual and continued change of possession," means that the actual possession must pass from the mortgagor, and does not return to him; and hence, where a chattel mortgage was executed on a stock of goods, and the store was placed in charge of an agent of the mortgagee, and the mortgagor was employed as a clerk, and subsequently the agent was discharged and the entire control of the store was placed in the hands of the mortgagor, there was not an "actual and continued change of possession," as required by the statute. Swiggett v. Dodson, 17 Pac. 594, 596, 38 Kan. 702.

An "actual and continued change of possession," within the meaning of the Oklahoma statute, relative to sales, must be open, notorious, and unequivocal, and such as to apprise the community or those who are accustomed to deal with the party that the goods have changed hands, and that the title has passed from the vendor to the vendee. Swartzburg v. Dickerson, 73 Pac. 282, 12 Okl. 568.

ACTUAL CONDITION.

"Actual condition," as used in the charter of a banking corporation, requiring the publication in newspapers of quarterly statements showing the "actual condition" of the bank, means something more than the condition shown by the books of the bank. It means that the statement shall show what actually exists in the way of assets, and that those assets bear, approximately at least, the value at which they are stated in the statement. Those statements are made and published for the benefit of the public, so that the dealers with the bank and the depositors, as well as bill holders, may know what is the actual condition of the institution with which they are dealing. Campbell v. Watson, 50 Atl. 120, 131, 62 N. J. Eq. 396.

ACTUAL CONTEST.

As used in an action for attorney's fees for counsel in settling an estate, in a hypothetical question to an expert as to the value of the services, stating that there was an "actual contest" in the probate court, the natural import of the words "actual contest," considered in connection with the context and subject-matter, meant that the proceedings to prove the will were not entirely ex parte, and a showing that there was a filing of papers in the case, and that attorneys for certain heirs, who denied the validity of the will, were present at the probate court and examined the witnesses, sustained the statement that there was an "actual contest." Turnbull v. Richardson, 37 N. W. 499, 503, 69 Mich. 400.

ACTUAL COST.

Of alteration of grade crossings.

St. 1890, c. 428, providing for the abolition of grade crossings, and declaring that the allowances shall be for the total "actual cost" of the alterations, should be construed to include nothing in the nature of investment, intended to give a more proper return on the road, or to include improvements such as the cost of a new station, but that the allowance should be merely for the expense of altering the old station, and lowering it to meet the tracks, and providing new approaches, etc. City of Newton v. Boston & A. R. Co., 51 N. E. 183, 185, 172 Mass. 5.

Of imported article.

"Actual cost," as used in the revenue act of 1818, means the actual price paid in a bona fide purchase, and not the market value; but the market value may be, and often is, justly resorted to as a means of ascertaining the "actual cost" in doubtful and suspicious cases; for it may be fairly presumed in ordinary cases that the market value, and no more and no less, is given for the commodity. The terms, however, are not identical in their meaning, nor is the one necessarily the true interpretation of the other. Alfonso v. United States (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 395.

"Actual cost," in the revenue laws, means "the price given and every charge which attended the purchase, and the exportation, paid or supposed to be paid at the place whence the article is exported." Goodwin v. United States, 10 Fed. Cas. 625, 627. "The true and real price paid for the goods upon a genuine bona fide purchase." United States v. Sixteen Packages (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1111, 1113.

Of plates.

An act providing that whenever the numbers of copies of the published Reports of the state should reach a certain amount, then the Secretary of State should sell the plates of such volumes at the "actual cost" of the same to the state, means the cost per plate of stereotype matter, and does not include an additional sum for the composition. State v. Price, 42 Pac. 120, 121, 12 Wash. 653.

Of running trains.

"Actual cost," as used in a lease of plaintiff's railroad to defendants, providing that, whenever an increase of business on the line shall warrant it, additional regular trains shall be established and run by defendants, who shall be allowed "actual costs" of running the same, means money actually paid out for extra trains, and hence does not include the items of expense which would have been incurred whether extra trains had been run or not; no new engines or cars and no extra hands being required for the trains, and no additional compensation paid to the men employed thereon. Lexington & W. C. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 226, 230.

ACTUAL DAMAGES.

Actual damages are such compensation for an injury as would follow from the nature and character of the act. Actual damages are those which the injured party is entitled to recover for the wrongs received and injuries done, when none were intended. Ross v. Leggett, 28 N. W. 695, 697, 699, 61 Mich. 445, 1 Am. St. Rep. 608.

Actual damages are compensatory only. Lord, Owen & Co. v. Wood, 94 N. W. 842, 845, 120 Iowa, 303.

Actual damages are such losses as are actually sustained and are susceptible of as-certainment. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Lawson, 72 Pac. 233, 234, 66 Kan. 660.

The purpose of the law in awarding actual damages is to repair the wrong that has been done, to compensate for the injury inflicted, and not to impose a penalty. Actual damages are not dependent on nor graded by the intent with which the wrongful act is done. Field v. Munster, 32 S. W. 417, 418, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 341.

By "actual damages" is meant in law such damages as the testimony will justify the jury in awarding to recompense the plaintiff for loss of time or money, for incurred expenses, for bodily injuries, for mental pain and suffering, for the permanency of the injuries, and the like. Oliver v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co., 43 S. E. 307, 320, 65 S. C. 1.

Damages in a tort action are not divided into actual, compensatory, and exemplary. The term "compensatory damages" covers all loss recoverable as matter of right. It includes all damages for which the law gives compensation, and that gives rise to the term "compensatory damages." "Compensatory damages" and "actual damages" are synonymous terms. Pecuniary loss is an actual damage. So is bodily pain and suffering. Gatzow v. Buening, 81 N. W. 1003, 1009, 106 Wis. 1, 49 L. R. A. 475, 80 Am. St. Rep. 1.

Actual damages are either general or special. The former are such as naturally result from the act complained of. Injury to the feelings, caused by the willful neglect or default of another, constitutes actual damages, for which a recovery could be had. So Relle v. Western Union Tel. Co., 55 Tex. 308, 311, 40 Am. Rep. 805 (citing Hays v. Houston G. N. R. Co., 46 Tex. 272, 279).

The words "actual damages" shall be construed to include all damages that the plaintiff may show he has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession, or occupation, and no other damages whatever. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 5418.

Failure to deliver telegram.

The term "actual damages" has a significance and meaning of its own, and will not include mental anguish caused by mere negligence in failing to deliver a telegram. Gahan v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 433, 434.

Infringement of patent.

The "actual damages" authorized by statute to be recovered for the infringement of a patent are such as the plaintiff can actually prove and has in fact sustained, as distinguished from mere imaginary or exemplary damages, which in personal torts are sometimes given. Whittemore v. Cutter (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1123, 1125.

Libel.

"Actual damages," in an action for libel, "are such as the plaintiff suffered, if any, on account of the libel or injury to the feelings and character, or anguish of mind by the shame, mortification, and degradation caused by the publication." Grace v. McArthur, 45 N. W. 518, 521, 76 Wis. 641.

The term "actual damages," as used in an action for libel, is broad enough to include damages for loss of reputation, shame, falsehood, etc. Hearne v. De Young, 64 Pac. 576, 577, 132 Cal. 357.

Gen. Laws 1887, c. 191, § 2, entitled "An act to regulate actions for libel," in defining "actual damages," limits them to damages in respect to property, business, trade, profession, or occupation. Allen v. Pioneer Press Co., 41 N. W. 936, 939, 40 Minn. 117, 125, 3 L. R. A. 532, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707.

Wrongful attachment.

As used in an act authorizing a recovery of actual damages sustained by the wrongful issue of an attachment, the term "actual damages" does not mean such damages as can be definitely determined as the actual loss which the debtor would incur by reason of the attachment, and which loss could be determined or computed, but an undetermined loss or damage, which is no less actual by reason of its indeterminate character, such as damage to reputation, damage to pride and to feeling, and damage of that character. But it was not the intention of the Legislature to assess an arbitrary punishment against an attaching creditor. Levy v. Fleischner, 40 Pac. 384, 385, 12 Wash. 15.

Actual damages, which a defendant is entitled to recover in an action for wrongfully suing out an attachment, only include such damages and current expenses of the business during the detention of the property attached, and reasonable attorney's fees, to be fixed by the court on proper evidence. Actual damages do not include the prospective profits from the use of the property, being inevitable, uncertain, and speculative in their nature, and depend upon so many remote chances of trade and of subsequent causes as to be undeserving of precise estimation. Seattle Crockery Co. v. Haley, 33 Pac. 650, 653, 6 Wash. 302, 36 Am. St. Rep. 156.

ACTUAL DEDICATION.

"Actual dedication," as applied to the dedication of land to a municipality, means an intention to voluntarily surrender to the public and yield up to it every private right in and every private right growing out of the land, leaving no right in the dedicant, except such as he enjoys in common with the public. Longworth v. City of Cincinnati, 29 N. E. 274, 277, 48 Ohio St. 637.

ACTUAL DELIVERY.

Actual delivery, as applied to sales of personal property, commonly imports two distinct acts, ceding of actual possession by the seller, and actual taking of such possession by the buyer or as agent. It consists in giving real possession of the thing sold to the vendee or his servants, or to his special agents, who are identified with him in law and represent him. Bolin v. Huffnagle (Pa.) 1 Rawle, 9, 19.

ACTUAL DERELICTION.

"Actual dereliction" may either be expressly declared, or may be left to be inferred from declaratory acts verbis vel factis, vel non factis. Rhodes v. Whitehead, 27 Tex. 304, 313, 84 Am. Dec. 631.

ACTUAL DETERMINATION.

An actual determination in an action is the judgment rendered thereon, and not an order for judgment, and this applies as well to the judgment entered upon the order of the General Term as it does to a judgment in the first instance. Whitfield v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co., 10 N. Y. Supp. 106, 107, 16 Daly. 288.

"Actual determination," as used in Code, § 11, providing that appeals shall lie only from actual determinations of the various courts named, made at General Term, does not include a judgment entered in conformity with a remittitur from the Court of Appeals to the General Term, since the remittitur controlled the court below and left nothing to be determined by such court, and it could not direct any different judgment. Wilkins v. Earle, 46 N. Y. 358.

"Actual determination," as used in Code, § 352, authorizing an appeal to the General Term of the Common Pleas of the City of New York from an actual determination by the General Term of the Marine Court, construed to require a determination on the merits before the latter court, and not to include a default judgment. McMahon v. Rauhr, 47 N. Y. 67, 72.

An order made on appeal to the General Term of the Marine Court, reversing the judgment and granting a new trial, does not constitute an actual determination of the action, such as will authorize an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, under Code, § 352. Frank v. Benner (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 422, 423.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3191, provides that appeals may be taken from any court to the Court of Common Pleas from an "actual determination" made at the General Term of any court, where there has been a final judgment entered upon an appeal taken to such General Term. Held, that an order of the General Term, affirming the judgment upon appeal, is not an "actual determination," within the meaning of such section, and that an appeal will lie only from the judgment entered pursuant to such an order. Whitfield v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co., 10 N. Y. Supp. 106, 107, 16 Daly, 288; Fuller v. Tuska, 17 N. Y. Supp. 356.

ACTUAL EVICTION.

Eviction is actual when the tenant is deprived of the occupancy of some part of the demised premises. Talbott v. English, 59 N. E. 857, 860, 156 Ind. 299.

An actual eviction is an actual expulsion of the tenant out of all or some part of the demised premises; a physical ouster or dispossession from the very thing granted or some substantial part thereof. The mere making of another lease during the term of such premises does not constitute an actual eviction. Knotts v. McGregor, 35 S. E. 899, 901, 47 W. Va. 568.

An "actual eviction" consists in the deprivation by the landlord of the tenant of the whole or some portion of the demised premises, and, where there has been an actual eviction from a part of the demised premises, the tenant may retain possession of that which he has; the entire rent being suspended until full possession has been restored. The act of the landlord in depriving a tenant of a portion of the demised premises, being a willful one, and done in defiance of the tenant and his rights under the lease, is in the nature of a trespass. Seigel v. Neary, 77 N. Y. Supp. 854, 856, 38 Misc. Rep. 297.

ACTUAL EXPENSES.

"Actual expenses" as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2557, providing that the surrogate cannot allow costs, other than actual expenses, out of an estate or fund of less than $1,000 in land or value, includes an allowance to an administrator for the time occupied in the judicial settlement of his account. In re Van Kleeck, 20 N. Y. Supp. 85, 2 Con. Sur. 14.

ACTUAL FORCE.

Actual force, within a statute providing for imprisonment on a judgment obtained in an action founded on actual force, must be force such as to put one standing in defense of possession in fear of personal injury. In re Dimmick, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 842, 843.

Within the statute prohibiting the discharge of a judgment debtor in insolvency, where the judgment was obtained for "actual force," the force must be such as to put one standing in defense of possession in fear of personal injury; and the force to invalidate a marriage must amount to duress per minas. In re Widmier (Pa.) 10 Phila. 81. The term "actual force," as so used, means force or violence willfully or wantonly directed against the plaintiff or his property, such as would amount to an actual breach of the peace, and where a driver recklessly and riotously drives a team upon a public road under circumstances in which he must have known that the probable circumstances would be injurious to others. In re Graeff, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 369, 370.

ACTUAL FRAUD.

Actual fraud implies "deceit, artifice, trick, design; some direct active operation of the mind." People v. Kelly (N. Y.) 35 Barb. 444, 457.

Actual fraud is any artifice by which another is deceived. Jackson v. Jackson, 47 Ga. 99, 104. "A deception practiced in order to induce another to part with property, or to surrender some legal right, and which accomplishes the end designated." Haas v. Sternbach, 41 N. E. 51, 53, 156 Ill. 44 (quoting Cooley, Torts, 474); Lodge v. Rose Valley Mills, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 811, 812.

Actual fraud consists in any kind of artifice by which another is deceived. It implies moral guilt. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4025.

"Actual fraud is any cunning, deception, or artifice used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another." Hatch v. Barrett, 8 Pac. 129, 137, 34 Kan. 223.

A promise made without any intention of performing it is "actual fraud." The essence of the fraud being the existence, at the time of the promise, of an intention not to perform it, without such intention there is no actual fraud; for a mere failure to fulfill a promise is not fraud. Brison v. Brison, 17 Pac. 689, 690, 75 Cal. 525, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189.

"Actual fraud," within the meaning of the chapter relating to contracts, consists in any of the following acts committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract: (1) The suggestion as a fact of that which is not true by one who does not believe it to be true; (2) the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true; (3) the suppression of that which is true, by one having knowledge or belief of the fact; (4) a promise made without any intention to perform it; or (5) any other act fitted to deceive. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2117; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3848; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1201; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 743.

Actual fraud, or fraud in the ordinary sense and meaning of the term, is a matter of fact, to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury. This proof shall consist of proof of acts or conduct which the court calls badges of fraud, and it is for the court and judge to decide what is such a badge. Kirkley v. Lacey, 30 Atl. 994, 995, 7 Houst. 213.

The fraud in those cases where a debt accrues after a settlement by a debtor on a wife consists in the fact that the debtor is knowingly permitted by the beneficiary to have the possession, control, and apparent ownership of the property, so that persons dealing with him are misled by appearances, and suppose him to be the owner, and give him credit on the faith of such ownership. If that be so, it matters not what may be the motive of the parties. Their conscious acts have worked a fraud, and that is the actual fraud necessary in such cases, as distinguished from the constructive fraud which is presumed in favor of a creditor whose debt accrued before the settlement was made. McCanless v. Smith, 25 Atl. 211, 224, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 505.

Constructive fraud distinguished.

Fraud in law is of two kinds, actual and constructive. The former arises from deception practiced by means of the misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact; the latter, from a rule of public policy or the confidential or fiduciary relation which one of the parties affected by the fraud sustained toward the other. It is a constituent of actual fraud that the party alleged to have been defrauded was deceived. No positive dishonesty of purpose is required to show constructive fraud. Forker v. Brown, 30 N. Y. Supp. 827, 10 Misc. Rep. 161.

Fraud may be actual or constructive. Actual fraud consists in any kind of artifice by which another is deceived. Constructive fraud consists in any act of omission or commission, contrary to legal or equitable duty, trust, or confidence justly reposed, which is contrary to good conscience and operates to the injury of another. The former implies moral guilt; the latter may be consistent with innocence. Massachusetts Ben. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261. One who knowingly and willfully makes false representations as to material facts, with intention to induce the other to enter into a contract with him, and who does so induce the other to enter into the contract to his injury, is guilty of actual fraud, without regard to his intent as to injury to the other party. It is a fraud in law if the party makes representations which he knows to be false and injury ensues, although the motive from which the representations proceeded may not have been bad. Northwestern Life Ins. Co. v. Montgomery, 43 S. E. 79, 80, 116 Ga. 799 (citing Foster v. Charles, 6 Bing. 396).

ACTUAL KNOWLEDGE.

There is evidently a difference between "notice" and "actual knowledge" of the proceedings in bankruptcy, as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 17, 30 Stat. 550 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428], providing that a discharge shall release the bankrupt, except as to such debts not scheduled, unless the creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The notice is evidently a written notice delivered to the creditor, but the section evidently contemplates that the creditor may have actual knowledge of the proceedings from other sources than either of those provided by the statute. If it be clearly shown that the creditor had actual knowledge of the application for discharge, it makes no difference how this knowledge may have been acquired. Jones v. Walter (Ky.) 74 S. W. 249, 250.

ACTUAL MALICE.

"Actual malice," in the law of libel, means an evil intent or motive arising from spite or ill will. McDonald v. Brown, 51 Atl. 213, 23 R. I. 546.

"Actual malice," in the law of libel, means personal hatred or ill will toward the plaintiff, or wanton disregard of the civil obligation of the defendant toward the plaintiff. Hearne v. De Young, 64 Pac. 576, 578, 132 Cal. 357.

By the term "actual malice," as used in the law of libel, is meant personal spite or ill will, or culpable recklessness or negligence. Such malice may be shown by extrinsic evidence, or it may be gathered from the publication itself. Cherry v. Des Moines Leader, 86 N. W. 323, 114 Iowa, 298.

"Actual malice" in the publication of a libel exists when the publication is made through motives of ill will and with intent to injure or defame. Taylor v. Hearst, 40 Pac. 392, 393, 107 Cal. 262.

"Actual malice," as used in connection with an action for libel in furnishing a report as to the financial standing of the plaintiffs, means that the report in question was prepared and published, not in good faith, but with an intent to injure plaintiffs, or with a willful and wanton neglect of the rights and interests of plaintiffs. Minter v. Bradstreet Co., 73 S. W. 668, 683, 174 Mo. 444.

ACTUAL MARKET VALUE.

Act March 3, 1863, providing that the invoice of goods imported, which are procured otherwise than by purchase, must state their "actual market value," means their value in the principal markets of the country where they were manufactured, no matter what it cost the manufacturer to produce them, or it is the price at which the manufacturer holds them for sale, or at which he freely offers them in the market, or such price as he is willing to receive for them if they are sold in the ordinary course of trade. There is no substantial difference between the expressions "market value," "their market value," and "actual market value." Twelve Hundred and Nine Quarter Casks etc., of Wine (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 398, 404.

"Actual market value," as used in the customs duty act, is the price which the owner or purchaser of the goods is willing to receive for them, if they are sold in the ordinary course of trade; the price which a purchaser must pay to get them. This is common sense and reason. It is the popular meaning of the term, and it is also the legal meaning. Three Thousand One Hundred and Nine Cases of Champagne (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 1168, 1172; Six Cases of Silk Ribbons (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 247.

The term "actual market value," as used in Act March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 737), requiring that the invoice of imported goods, which are procured otherwise than by purchase, must state their "actual market value" at the time and place when and where they are procured or manufactured, means the price at which the owner or manufacturer of goods holds them for sale in the ordinary course of trade. Some of the statutes use the expression "market value," some "fair market value," and some "actual market value"; but there is no substantial difference. The only other possible meaning of the word "actual" is value in the actual market, as contradistinguished from a hypothetical, notional, or ideal value, which may be affixed to an article in a particular case for a particular reason. Whatever men, in the ordinary dealings of society between man and man, would consider to be the fair "actual market value" of property, that is its "actual market value," within the meaning of the revenue laws. In Cluquot's Champagne, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 114, 18 L. Ed. 116, the court defines the "actual market value" as the price at which the owner or manufacturer of goods holds them for sale; the price at which he freely offers them in the market; such price as he is willing to receive for them if they are sold in the ordinary course of trade. Twelve Hundred and Nine Quarter Casks, etc., of Wine (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 398, 405.

Under Act June 10, 1890, c. 407, § 19, 26 Stat. 139 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1924], the words "actual market value," whenever used in the act or in any law relating to the appraisement of imported merchandise, are to be construed to mean the actual market value or wholesale price of the merchandise as bought and sold in the usual wholesale quantities, including the value of the cases and coverings of any kind and all other expenses incident to placing the merchandise in condition to pack for shipment. West v. United States (U. S.) 119 Fed. 495.

ACTUAL MARRIAGE.

Proof of actual marriage is always used and understood in opposition to proof by cohabitation, reputation, and other circumstances from which marriage may be inferred, which is sufficiently shown by a copy of the register or by testimony of witnesses who are present at the ceremony. This constitutes proof of marriage in fact, and is merely a direct evidence, as contradistinguished from cohabitation, which is an indirect evidence of marriage. State v. Winkley, 14 N. H. 480, 494.

ACTUAL MILITARY SERVICE.

There is a sound distinction between the calling forth of the militia and their being in "actual service" and employment of the United States, contemplated both in the Constitution and the acts of Congress. The Constitution enables Congress to provide for the government of such part of the militia as may be employed in the service of the United States, and makes the President commander in chief of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States. If the former clause included the authority to call forth the militia, as being, in virtue of the call of the President, in actual service, there would certainly be no necessity for the distinct clause authorizing it to provide for the calling forth of the militia, and the President would be commander in chief, not merely of the militia in actual service, but of the militia ordered into service. The term "actual service" means something more than a mere calling forth of the militia. It includes some act of organization, mustering, or marching done or recognized in obedience to the call in the public service. The terms "called forth" and "employed in the service" cannot, in any appropriate sense, be said to be synonymous. From the very nature of things the call must precede the service. Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 164, 5 L. Ed. 19.

The fifth amendment to the federal Constitution requiring an indictment or prosecution before any one can be held to answer for high crimes, except cases arising in the land or naval force or in militia "when in actual service in time of war," does not refer to the regular army or navy, but refers only to the militia. In re Bogart (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 796, 798.

As authorizing nuncupative wills.

Act April 8, 1833, permitting any "soldier in actual military service" to dispose of his movables, wages, and personal assets by nuncupative will, means one who is engaged in the active duties of the field, whether it be on the march, in the temporary camp, battle, siege, or bivouac, but can never apply to the soldier who is in regular quarters or at his customary home on leave of absence.

In common parlance, a soldier is understood to be in "actual military service" from the time of his enlistment until his discharge, whether he be in camp, garrison, hospital, at home on furlough, on the march, or engaged in battle or siege. In re Smith's Will (Pa.) 6 Phila. 104.

Gen. St. p. 377, § 9, relating to the formalities of wills, and providing that nothing therein shall be construed to prevent any soldier in "actual military service" from disposing of his wages or other personal estate as he might otherwise have done, means one in the enemy's country engaged in actual warfare, where he is liable at any hour to engage in battle; and while serving in that department, whether in camp or campaign services, he was in "actual military service" as fully as if he had been engaged in actual combat with the enemy. When a soldier is in the enemy's country performing military service, whether in camp, campaign, or in battle, such service is "actual military service." Van Deuzer v. Gordon's Estate, 39 Vt. 111, 117.

The expression "actual military service," as used in the statute of frauds, "received a full consideration in the case of Drummond v. Parish (Eng.) 3 Curt. 522, in which it was held that these words referred to and were intended to designate a service on an expedition, and that the privilege [in respect to nuncupative wills of British soldiers] was limited and confined to those soldiers only who were on that particular service. We are entirely satisfied with this interpretation of the statute, but what shall be considered as an expedition is in some measure a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. The deceased was a soldier belonging to a company and regiment which formed a part of the Army of the Potomac in the recent War of the Rebellion." He had been with his company and regiment during the Peninsular campaign, and during the month of August had been transferred with the entire army to the vicinity of Washington. While the regiment was on the march to engage the enemy, the deceased, who was sick and very weak, was ordered by the captain to fall out, and go on when he was rested. He was sent by the medical director to the hospital in the District of Columbia, which was in fact nothing but a field hospital, where he was told that he had not long to live, and on the same day made the declarations and requests to the witness proposed to be established as a testamentary disposition. "If we regard the nature and object of this privilege, and the situation of the deceased at the time he made the declaration, * * * we can come to no other conclusion than that, in the sense of the statute, the deceased was at that time a soldier in actual military service." Gould v. Safford's Estate, 39 Vt. 498, 507.

Where an officer of a regiment embarked from India for England, he was at the time a soldier in "actual military service," within the meaning of St. 1 Vict. c. 26, providing that a soldier in actual military service may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done prior to the act. In re Johnson, 2 Curt. 341.

St. 1 Vict. c. 26, § 11, enacting that any soldier, being "in actual military service," may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of the act, applies to such soldiers only as are on an expedition. From the authorities, it would seem that a military will was only good when made on the field of battle or marching against the enemy. Drummond v. Parish, 3 Curt. 522.

Rev. St. c. 74, § 18, authorizing a soldier in actual service to dispose of his property by either a written or a nuncupative will, is not to be limited to those excursions from camps or quarters in the enemy's country which are designed to bring on an immediate engagement, but to include time spent in winter quarters while on an expedition into the enemy's country. Leathers v. Greenacre, 53 Me. 561, 573.

An officer in the army of the United States in May, 1864, after it had commenced to move on Richmond, wrote and sent a letter to his sister, saying, if he was killed or did not return, he wanted her to have his property. He was killed in August, 1864. Held, that such officer was a "soldier in actual service in peril of immediate death," within the meaning of the statute relating to nuncupative wills, and his will was entitled to probate as such. Botsford v. Krake (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 112, 120.

ACTUAL NOTICE.

Actual notice consists in express information of a fact. Gress v. Evans, 46 N. W. 1132, 1134, 1 Dak. 387; La Crosse Boot & Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Mons Anderson Co., 70 N. W. 877, 878, 9 S. D. 560; Kansas Moline Plow Co. v. Sherman, 41 Pac. 623, 626, 3 Okl. 204, 32 L. R. A. 33; Jackson v. Waldstein (Tex.) 27 S. W. 26, 27; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5116; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2450; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2789.

Notice is actual when it is directly and personally given to the person to be notified. Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 145, 146; Johnson v. Dooly, 72 Ga. 279, 299; Levins v. W. O. Peoples Grocery Co. (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 733, 740; College Park Electric Belt Line v. Ide, 40 S. W. 64, 66, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 273; Morey v. Milliken, 30 Atl. 102, 105, 86 Me. 464.

Actual notice exists when the party to be affected by it might by the use of reasonable diligence have informed himself of the existence of certain facts. Any fact or circumstance that is sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry, and is of such a character that he might ascertain the fact by the exercise of reasonable diligence, will be regarded as notice. College Park Electric Belt Line v. Ide, 40 S. W. 64, 66, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 273; Root v. Baldwin (Tex.) 52 S. W. 586, 587; Hooser v. Hunt, 26 N. W. 442, 445, 65 Wis. 71; Kansas Moline Plow Co. v. Sherman, 41 Pac. 623, 626, 3 Okl. 204, 32 L. R. A. 33; Schavely v. Bishop, 55 Pac. 667, 668, 8 Kan. App. 301; Johnson v. Dooly, 72 Ga. 297, 299.

"Actual notice" is notice brought directly home to the parties. McCray v. Clark, 82 Pa. 457, 461.

"Actual notice" of a fact is nothing more or less than knowledge of the existence of such a fact. Fuller & Johnson v. McMahon (Iowa) 94 N. W. 205. The term is so used in Rev. St. 1858, c. 86, § 32, which provides that when a deed purports to be an absolute conveyance, but is intended to be made defeasible by force of a deed of defeasance or other instrument for that purpose, the general conveyance shall not thereby defeat or vacate, as against any person other than the maker of the defeasance, or his heirs or devisees, or persons having "actual notice" thereof, unless the instrument of defeasance shall have been recorded. Brinkman v. Jones, 44 Wis. 498, 519.

Actual notice is a conclusion of fact, capable of being established by all grades of legitimate evidence. Levins v. W. O. Peoples Grocery Co. (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 733, 740.

Actual notice does not mean that which in metaphysical strictness is actual in its nature, because it is seldom that ultimate facts can be communicated in a manner so direct and unequivocal as to exclude doubts as to their existence or authenticity. Actual notice means, among other things, knowledge of facts or circumstances so pertinent in character as to enable reasonably cautious and prudent persons to investigate and ascertain as to the ultimate facts. Pope v. Nichols, 59 Pac. 257, 259, 61 Kan. 230.

"Actual notice" is that which gives actual knowledge, or facts which would lead to such knowledge. White v. Fisher, 77 Ind. 65, 71, 40 Am. Rep. 287.

Constructive notice distinguished.

Actual notice, which will imply fraud in a purchase of property, implies a wrongful purpose or intent in the mind of the person whose contract is in question. Reisan v. Mott, 42 Minn. 49, 43 N. W. 691, 18 Am. St. Rep. 489. A person cannot be held guilty of actual intended fraud because he had imputed or constructive notice thereof. Benton v. Minneapolis Tailoring & Mfg. Co., 76 N. W. 265, 267, 73 Minn. 498.

1 Wds. & P.—11

Actual notice embraces all degrees and grades of evidence, from the most direct and positive proof to the slightest circumstance from which a jury would be warranted in inferring notice. It is a mere question of fact, and is open to every species of legitimate evidence which may tend to strengthen or impair the conclusion. Constructive notice, on the other hand, is a legal inference from established facts, and, like other legal presumptions, does not admit of dispute. "Constructive notice," says Story, J., "is in its nature no more than the evidence of notice, the presumption of which is so violent that the court will not even allow it to be controverted." Constructive notice is a legal inference from established facts, and when the facts are not controverted, or the alleged defect or infirmity appears on the face of the instrument and is matter of ocular inspection, the question is one for the court. Whether, under a conceded state of facts, the law will impute notice to the purchaser, is not a question for the jury. Thomas v. City of Flint, 81 N. W. 936, 944, 945, 123 Mich. 10, 47 L. R. A. 499, 81 Am. St. Rep. 230.

Notice is of two kinds, actual and constructive. Actual notice may be either express or implied. If the one, it is established by direct evidence; if the other, by proof of circumstances from which it is inferable as a fact. Constructive notice is, on the other hand, always a presumption of law. Express notice embraces, not only knowledge, but also that which is communicative by direct information, either written or oral, from those who are cognizant of the fact communicated. Implied notice, which is equally actual notice, arises where the party to be charged is shown to have had knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would lead him by the exercise of due diligence to a knowledge of the particular facts, or, as defined by the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Rhodes v. Outcalt, 48 Mo. 367, 370, "a notice is to be regarded in law as actual when the party sought to be affected by it knows of the particular fact, or is conscious of having the means of knowing it, although he may not employ the means in his possession for the purpose of gaining further information." City of Baltimore v. Whittington, 27 Atl. 984, 985, 78 Md. 231.

1 Ter. Laws, 46, declares "that an unrecorded deed shall be void against a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration." In the Revision of 1825, the provision was that it should not be binding, except "between the parties and such as have actual notice." Held, that the term "actual notice" was there used, as contradistinguished from implied notice, and, though "actual notice" required by the act was not "certain knowledge," it was such information as men generally act upon in the transactions of life. In other words, it was knowledge of the state of facts sufficient to put a person on inquiry, which, if prosecuted to a logical termination, would have imparted actual knowledge of the condition of the title. Vaughn v. Tracy, 22 Mo. 415, 420.

The term "actual notice," within the meaning of the recording statutes, making unrecorded instruments valid only as against those who have actual notice of their existence, is used in contradistinction to the constructive notice imparted by the record in a conveyance. It does not mean direct evidence that the subsequent purchaser actually knew of the existence of the deed. Any proper evidence tending to show it—facts and circumstances coming to his knowledge that would put a man of ordinary circumspection upon inquiry—will suffice. The mere statement by a third person that, if a person owning land gave another deed to the land it would put her in a fix, is not sufficient to constitute notice, where such a person testifies that they did know of the existence of another deed at the time of making such a remark. Morrison v. Juden, 46 S. W. 994, 998, 145 Mo. 282.

Previous notice synonymous.

"Actual notice" as used in Rev. St. § 2243, providing that, when a deed purports to be an absolute conveyance in terms, but is made or intended to be made defeasible by force of a deed of defeasance or other instrument for that purpose, the original conveyance shall not be thereby defeated or affected, as against any person other than the maker of the defeasance, or his heirs or devisees, or persons having "actual notice" thereof, unless the instrument of defeasance shall have been recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the county where the lands lie, is equivalent to "previous notice," as used in section 2324, providing that the statute shall not be construed in any manner to affect or impair the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration, unless it shall appear that such purchaser had "previous notice" of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, or of the fraud rendering void the title of such grantor. Hooser v. Hunt, 26 N. W. 442, 445, 65 Wis. 71.

Conveyance or claim of title.

"Actual notice" is not synonymous with "actual knowledge" or "personal notice," so as to require a person having actual notice of a registration of a prior conveyance of land to actually know of such conveyance or have been personally notified thereof, but may mean the existence of a state of facts from which the law will conclusively presume that such notice exists. Cowan v. Withrow, 16 S. E. 397, 111 N. C. 306.

The actual notice which a purchaser is presumed to have of a prior entry does not mean direct evidence that he actually knew of the prior entry, but that the possession and the facts and circumstances coming to his knowledge were such as to put a man of ordinary circumspection upon inquiry, and reasonable inquiry would have disclosed the prior entry and superior equity. Johnson v. Fluetsch, 75 S. W. 1005, 1011, 176 Mo. 452.

Notice is actual when the purchaser either knows of the existence of the adverse claim or title or is conscious of having the means of knowledge, although he may not use them. It does not mean that there must necessarily be direct and positive evidence that the subsequent purchaser actually knew of the existence of the deed. Any proper evidence tending to show it—facts and circumstances coming to his knowledge that would put a man of ordinary circumspection upon inquiry—should go to the jury as evidence of such notice. Thus, one who has lost his title to the land by a judgment in ejectment cannot claim value of the improvements as having been put on without notice, though he honestly believed he had title, where, before making the improvements, the person whose title was subsequently upheld told him of his claim. Brown v. Baldwin, 25 S. W. 858, 860, 121 Mo. 106.

Actual notice arises where a purchaser knows of the existence of the adverse claim or title, or is conscious of having the means of knowing, although he may not use them; and, if the purchaser has such information as would put an ordinarily prudent person on inquiry, he is affected with notice. Actual notice implies the existence of evidence tending to prove knowledge, and there is no implication to be raised, from the words "actual notice," that every person who loans money on real estate security should visit the premises, since it is the policy of the law to make persons record their deeds, and where they fail to do so it is carrying out the intention of the statute to require the person who has disregarded it to introduce some evidence tending to show that the purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, who has observed the requirements of the statute, had knowledge of the facts which are claimed to be essential. To require this is not to require proof of actual knowledge, but to afford some basis for the otherwise unfounded conclusion of actual notice; in other words, to give its proper force to the significant word "actual." Masterson v. West End N. G. R. Co., 5 Mo. App. 64, 71.

Rev. St. c. 59, § 28, provides that any unrecorded conveyance of real estate shall be valid and effectual against any person except the grantor "and persons having actual notice thereof." Held, that the words "actual notice" were used as equivalent to constructive notice, which is to be presumed from the registry of the deed; but the party claiming under the unrecorded deed is not required to prove that the party claiming under a subsequent deed or attachment had "certain knowledge" of the deed from the debtor to the party claiming under it—such knowledge, for example, as the party claiming by the attachment or a subsequent conveyance would have if he had seen the first deed executed and delivered to the grantee. Something less than positive personal knowledge of the fact of the conveyance would be sufficient to constitute "actual notice," within the true intent and meaning of the statute. Curtis v. Mundy, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 405, 407.

The registration of a deed in the county where the land is situated, properly authenticated, is notice to every one of its contents as shown by such record; but a recorded deed from an heir, though notice sufficient to put purchasers on inquiry as to the existence of other heirs, is not notice that the grantee therein claimed by unrecorded conveyances from such other heirs. Root v. Baldwin (Tex.) 52 S. W. 586, 587.

Dangerous character of dogs.

In considering the knowledge which the owner of an animal must have as to its dangerous character before he can be held liable for its acts, the court said: "Notice may be of two kinds. It may be an actual notice—that is, knowledge brought home to the party himself—that his dog has bitten a certain person at a certain time under certain circumstances, which he had no right to do; or a man may keep a vicious bull, and may have notice brought home to him of some immediate injury that he has done. That is actual notice. In case of any accident happening or injury being done, either by one animal or the other, in that case, the master would be liable. But that is not the only case in which the master may be liable. There may be a case in which there is no actual notice, but where there are certain facts and circumstances which, being brought to his knowledge, imply notice; that is, by reason of the duty that is imposed upon him, he reasonably ought to know. If a man has a dangerous dog, though he may never have bitten any person, if he is of a vicious and ferocious character, and that knowledge is brought home to his wife, under those circumstances, in case of injury inflicted by that dog, he unquestionably would be liable, though no actual notice had been given. In other words, that is what the law terms 'constructive notice,' which means nothing more nor less than that there are facts and circumstances, which are brought to his knowledge, tending to show that the animal is a dangerous and ferocious animal, and therefore he would be liable for any consequences which may result from the viciousness of the animal." Barclay v. Hartman, 43 Atl. 174, 175, 2 Marv. 351.

Defective condition of sidewalk or highway.

Actual notice of the defective condition of a sidewalk on the part of the mayor and board of aldermen of a city means knowledge of such defects, gained by observation thereof or by information directly given by some person having knowledge of such defect. Poole v. City of Jackson, 23 S. W. 57, 59, 93 Tenn. (9 Pickle) 62.

In an action for injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, an instruction that by "actual notice" is meant that if there was a defect in the sidewalk, and some member of the board of mayor and aldermen, or some agent or employé of defendant whose duty it was to keep or see the streets were kept in repair, saw it, or that some one notified or informed them, or some of them, of its existence, was not erroneous. Poole v. City of Jackson, 23 S. W. 57, 59, 93 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 62.

The words "actual notice," in a statute relating to actions for the recovery of damages sustained by defects in highways, which requires proof of "actual notice" of municipal officers concerning such defects, signifies something more than an opportunity to acquire notice by the exercise of due care and diligence; but the facts and circumstances may justify the conclusion that such officers must have had actual notice, unless grossly inattentive, though proof of gross inattention is not proof of actual notice. Hurley v. Inhabitants of Bowdoinham, 34 Atl. 72, 74, 88 Me. 293.

Legal proceedings.

Actual notice, within the meaning of a statute requiring actual notice of legal proceedings, does not include notice in a newspaper, which is never seen by the person required to be served with notice. Spinney v. Spinney, 32 Atl. 1019, 1021, 87 Me. 484.

Tax sale.

"Actual notice," as used in Pub. St. c. 12, § 49, providing that real estate which has been sold for taxes may be redeemed when the person offering to redeem is a mortgagee of record, provided such offer is made within two years after "actual notice" of the sale, means something more than knowledge of such facts as might be sufficient to put one on inquiry. The words, "subject to any unpaid taxes," used in a release to the mortgagee of the equity of redemption after a tax sale, though sufficient to put the mortgagee on inquiry, are not equivalent to "actual notice" of the sale for taxes. Keith v. Wheeler, 34 N. E. 174, 159 Mass. 161.

Trust.

Actual notice, within the rule that the party purchasing real estate which is subject to a trust is not a bona fide purchaser without notice, if he has actual notice of such trust, does not necessarily mean actual notice of the fact itself, but notice of facts which would or ought to put him on inquiry in reference to it. Bradley v. Merrill, 34 Atl. 160-162, 88 Me. 319.

ACTUAL OCCUPANCY.

Actual occupancy is defined as an open, visible occupancy, as distinguished from the constructive possession which follows legal title. The word "actual" is usually used in a statute in opposition to virtual or constructive, and calls for an open, visible occupation. Cutting v. Patterson, 85 N. W. 172, 173, 82 Minn. 375.

An occupant is one who has the actual use or possession of a thing. Webster defines "occupant" to be the one who has possession. In common parlance, occupancy is synonymous with possession. To create an actual occupancy, within the meaning of the statute respecting the sale of land for taxes, it is not necessary that the part actually occupied of a lot of land sold for taxes should be occupied professedly as a part of such lot. If such part is occupied as a part of another lot, it is equally an occupancy, and is as effectual as if it were occupied as a part of the lot sold. Smith v. Sanger (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 360, 366.

The words "actual occupancy," as used to denote one of the elements of adverse possession of land, are indefinite in their meaning; for, though they are usually applied to a case of residence on the land, or to an occupation by fences or buildings, they are not necessarily restricted to such marks of occupation, but may be applied to other acts of ownership which are known to the true owner. Hence actual occupancy is not necessarily synonymous with domicile or residence, but means actual use. Leeper v. Baker, 68 Mo. 400, 405 (approved in Golterman v. Schliermeyer, 19 S. W. 484, 111 Mo. 404).

The erection on uncultivated land of a hut, and its occasional use for hunting and fishing purposes, by one who makes no claim of ownership of the land, and who resides elsewhere, does not constitute "actual occupancy" of the land, within the meaning of the statute requiring notice of tax sale to be served on the person in "actual occupancy" of the land sold for taxes. People v. Campbell, 38 N. E. 300, 143 N. Y. 335 (affirming 22 N. Y. Supp. 458, 459, 67 Hun, 590).

"Actual occupancy," as distinguished from mere possession, is the prominent idea associated with the word "homestead." It is not to be understood, though, as requiring constant personal presence, so as to make a man's residence his prison, or that a temporary absence, enforced by some casualty or for the purposes of business or pleasure, would constitute a removal, ceasing to occupy, or abandonment. Clark v. Dewey, 73 N. W. 639, 71 Minn. 108; Kramer v. Lamb, 87 N. W. 1024, 1025, 84 Minn. 468.

ACTUAL OCCUPANT.

2 Rev. St. p. 304, § 4, providing that an action of ejectment shall be brought against the "actual occupant" of the premises in controversy, means an occupant who has actual use or possession of the property on his own behalf, and does not apply to a servant holding possession merely for his master, nor to a soldier of the United States claiming to be in charge of the premises under superior officers. People v. Ambrecht (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. 97, 101.

Gen. St. c. 23, § 48, providing that, in case of the condemnation of land for railroad purposes, a certain notice shall be served upon the "actual occupant" of such land, requires service on one who is an actual resident thereon. Hunt v. Smith, 9 Kan. 137, 145.

ACTUAL OCCUPATION.

A pauper rented a house, paying rent and residing in the house with his family. He was in the habit of taking persons to sleep in some of the rooms, letting sometimes a bed, sometimes half a bed, generally by the night, but occasionally for a week, in which case, however, the bed only was let, and the pauper reserved the right of putting another bed into the room. The lodgers had no right to the rooms by day. The pauper had constant access to and control over the whole house, and kept the keys to all the rooms. Held to be an "actual occupation" of the dwelling house within St. 1 Wm. IV, c. 18, § 1. Rex v. Inhabitants of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, 4 Adol. & E. 495.

Code 1873, § 3087, provides that, if the defendant is in actual occupation and possession of any part of the land levied on, the officer shall, at least 20 days previous to the sale, serve the defendant with written notice of the levy. Held, that the use of the word "actual" implies that the possession by defendant shall be real, and not speculative or constructive. Thus, the possession of an assignee is in legal sense the possession of the principal, but the possession and occupation of the owner through an agent is a theoretical one, and not actual. In truth, the owner does not occupy the land. It is occupied by another under his authority. By use of the expression "actual occupation and possession" the statute implied that the land was in the occupation of the defendant himself, and if this construction be not adopted no force is given to the adjective "actual," which it cannot be presumed the Legislature used tautologically. Bennett v. Burton, 44 Iowa, 550, 551.

"Actual occupation," as used in Act March 2, 1889, forfeiting certain unearned land grants, but providing it should not apply to bona fide homestead claims asserted by actual occupation, means residence. Edwards v. Begole (U. S.) 121 Fed. 1, 7, 57 C. C. A. 245.

ACTUAL PLACE OF ABODE

Rev. St. c. 38, § 10, declares that "ratable personal property shall be taxed in the town where the owner shall have had his actual place of abode for the larger portion of the" preceding 12 months. Held, that "actual place of abode" should be construed as the town where he has his home and where his family reside, irrespective of all absences therefrom for temporary or business purposes. Arnold v. Davis, 8 R. I. 341, 342.

ACTUAL PLACE OF RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

The phrase "actual places of religious worship" in Const. art. 9, § 1, empowering the Legislature to exempt from taxation actual places of religious worship, does not include a parsonage, though erected upon ground appurtenant to a church, but not actually a part thereof. Church of Our Saviour v. Montgomery County (Pa.) 10 Wkly. Notes Cas. 170, 171.

Act May 14, 1874, passed in pursuance of Const. art. 9, § 1, exempts from taxation all churches, meeting houses, and other places of stated worship. It was held that a church which ceases to be used as a place of worship ceases to be exempt from taxation. Moore v. Taylor, 23 Atl. 768, 147 Pa. 481.

ACTUAL POSSESSION.

Actual possession is the subjugation of the premises to the use and dominion of the claimant. Lillianskyoldt v. Goss, 2 Utah, 292, 297; Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567, 573; Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24, 44; Davis v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 57 Cal. 543, 545; Webber v. Clarke, 15 Pac. 431, 434, 74 Cal. 11; Courtney v. Turner, 12 Nev. 345, 352; State v. Central Pac. R. Co., 30 Pac. 686, 688, 21 Nev. 247; Gildehaus v. Whiting, 39 Kan. 706, 18 Pac. 916, 920; Pendo v. Beakey, 89 N. W. 655, 657, 15 S. D. 344; Robinson v. Gantt, 95 N. W. 506, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 51.

Actual possession of land is the purpose to enjoy, united with or manifested by such visible acts, improvements, or inclosures as will give the absolute and exclusive enjoyment of it. Stalninger v. Andrews, 4 Nev. 59, 68; Courtney v. Turner, 12 Nev. 345, 352; Davis v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 57 Cal. 543, 545; Pendo v. Beakey, 89 N. W. 655, 657, 15 S. D. 344.

Actual possession is a possession of the character required by the character and situation of the lands. Allaire v. Ketcham, 35 Atl. 900, 901, 55 N. J. Eq. 168.

Possession of land is actual when there is an occupancy according to its adaptation and use. Morrison v. Kelly, 22 Ill. (12 Peck) 609, 624, 74 Am. Dec. 169.

Actual possession is usually evidenced by actual occupation, by substantial inclosure, by cultivation, or by proper use, according to the particular locality and quality of the property. Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567, 573; Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24, 44; Gildehaus v. Whiting, 18 Pac. 916, 920, 39 Kan. 706; Webber v. Clarke, 15 Pac. 431, 434, 74 Cal. 11; State v. Central Pac. R. Co., 30 Pac. 686, 688, 21 Nev. 247; Hanson v. Stinehoff, 72 Pac. 913, 914, 139 Cal. 169 (citing Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567, 573).

"Actual possession" of land consists in exercising acts of dominion over it, and in making the ordinary use of it to which it is adapted, and in taking the profits of which it is susceptible. Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 15 Pac. 431. The law sets out no particular rules, where the statute of limitations does not prescribe them, which are necessary to constitute acts of dominion. Actual possession is a question of law and fact, and its determination must largely depend upon the situation of the parties, the size and extent of the land, and the purpose for which it is adapted. Johnston v. City of Albuquerque (N. M.) 72 Pac. 9, 11.

Actual possession is simply having the property in the immediate control or power of the party. When applied to land, it means the actual entry and occupation thereof. Omaha & F. Land & Trust Co. v. Parker, 51 N. W. 139, 140, 33 Neb. 775, 29 Am. St. Rep. 506.

"Actual possession" of part of a tract of land under a bona fide claim and color of title to the whole is possession of the whole, or so much as is not in the adverse possession of others. Olinger v. Shepherd (Va.) 12 Grat. 462, 473.

The term "person in actual possession or occupancy of land," within the meaning of Revenue Law, § 216, providing that, before a purchaser at a tax sale shall be entitled to a deed, he shall serve notice on every person in actual possession or occupancy of such land, does not include a person who is allowed, without payment of rent, to stack hay on a part of the land which is rented to a third person. Drake v. Ogden, 21 N. E. 511, 512, 128 Ill. 603.

An answer in an action for trespass, alleging that the "possession" of defendants had been "actual, peaceable, quiet, open, notorious, and adverse," sufficiently alleged that the possession was exclusive and visible. Keaton v. Sublett, 58 S. W. 528, 529, 109 Ky. 106.

Constructive possession distinguished.

Actual possession means existing in fact, truly and absolutely, as opposed to potential, possible, virtual, or theoretical possession. Doty v. O'Neil, 30 Pac. 526, 527, 95 Cal. 244.

Actual possession, in the Spanish and Mexican law, is that which is accompanied with the real and effectual enjoyment of an estate, with the reception of its fruits, and is contradistinguished from imaginary or fictitious possession. Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal. 254, 263.

"Actual possession," as a legal phrase, is put in opposition to the other phrase, "possession in law," or "constructive possession." Actual possession is the same as "pedis possessio" or "pedis positio," and these mean a foothold on the land and actual entry and possession in fact, a standing upon it, an occupation of it, as a real, demonstrative act done. It is the contrary of a possession in law, which follows in the wake of title, and is called "constructive possession." Churchill v. Onderdounk, 59 N. Y. 134, 136; Marsh v. Ne-ha-sa-ne Park Ass'n, 42 N. Y. Supp. 996, 1000, 18 Misc. Rep. 314; Cutting v. Patterson, 85 N. W. 172, 173, 82 Minn. 375; Rosenfeld v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 303, 304, 13 C. C. A. 450.

"Actual possession," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 312, § 1, to compel the determination of claims to real property, and which requires the plaintiff to have been in "actual possession" of the property for three years, means a possession in fact, as contradistinguished from that constructive one which the legal title draws after it. The correctness of that construction is apparent. The word "actual," in the statute, is especially significant. It is plainly used in opposition to "virtual" or "constructive," and means an open, visible occupancy. Cleveland v. Crawford, 7 Hun, 616, 619.

Constructive possession is a fiction of law; actual possession, a tangible fact. The "actual possession" means the corporeal detention of the property, when used in relation to adverse possession. Carey v. Cagney, 33 South. 89, 91, 109 La. 77.

Acts of ownership.

To constitute "actual possession" of land, it is only necessary to put it to such use, or exercise such dominion or acts of ownership over it, as in its present state it is reasonably adapted to. Brand v. United States Car Co., 30 South. 60, 128 Ala. 579.

Actual possession of land consists of visible and notorious acts of ownership exercised over the premises, and, while it is not necessary that there should be any fence or inclosure of the land, there must be continuous dominion, manifested by continuous acts of ownership. New Mexico, R. G. & P. R.

Co. v. Crouch, 13 Pac. 201, 203, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 141.

One who actually entered on land, erected a sawmill, carried on the business of manufacturing timber into lumber and firewood, and exercised acts of ownership generally, some of his employes residing thereon, was in "actual possession." Fleming v. Maddox, 30 Iowa, 239, 241.

"Actual possession," when the premises are susceptible of it, must, as a general rule, be by inclosure of the land by a fence or like improvements, so as to make the occupation visible, notorious, continuous, and adverse, and thus constitute notice of the claim and possession of the occupant to the public; but there are exceptions, where the land is not suitable for cultivation, and the occupant exercises dominion over it, which is possession, when accompanied with the necessary requisites, and asserted in an equally positive manner for other purposes. Green v. Cumberland Coal & Coke Co. (Tenn.) 72 S. W. 459, 460.

Cultivation, inclosure, or improvement.

Possession is always actual when it is an open and visible occupation. The possession may be evidenced by an inclosure. In such case it is ordinarily limited to the inclosure. It may be evidenced by other improvements, or by actual and visible use. In the case of a mill site, the presence of boundary posts is as significant of occupation as an inclosure would be of agricultural land; and where, in addition to the boundary posts, there was a house, stable, and spring constructed to increase the flow of water, and a graded wagon road leading from the mill site to the land of the claim, it was not erroneous to instruct that, to constitute actual possession, it was not necessary that it be inclosed by a fence or that it should be reduced to cultivation. Valcalda v. Silver Peak Mines (U. S.) 86 Fed. 90, 94, 29 C. C. A. 591.

A party in possession of land, with improvements and inclosure, holds to the extent of his inclosure by what is termed "actual possession"; and if at the same time he holds under deed or title, he holds to the extent of his deed or title, outside of his actual possession, by what is termed "constructive possession." Ramirez v. Smith (Tex.) 56 S. W. 254, 259 (citing Cunningham v. Frandtzen, 26 Tex. 34, 35; Evitts v. Roth, 61 Tex. 81, 84).

One may gain actual possession of land by fencing it, or by cultivating and improving it, or by building upon it, and then he will have possession of as much as he has fenced or cultivated, and improved or built upon, with some land around and necessary for the buildings. Actual possession—"possessione pedis"—can mean no more. Pendo v. Beakey, 89 N. W. 655, 657, 15 S. D. 344 (citing Thompson v. Burhans, 79 N. Y. 93).

One who resided on lands adjoining mortgaged premises, with only an alley between, the mortgaged premises being inclosed and used as a garden by the mortgagor, was in actual possession and entitled to notice of foreclosure, under Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6032. Cutting v. Patterson, 85 N. W. 172, 173, 82 Minn. 375.

"Where a man enters upon and improves, fences, and occupies part of another man's tract of land, and has the boundaries of his claim surveyed and marked, including woodland not inclosed, and for 21 years openly and exclusively uses the woodland as his own, in connection with his improvement, and as farmers ordinarily use their woodland, this is not a constructive, but an actual, possession of the woodland, and excludes the constructive possession which the law usually attributes to the title and to the owner's actual possession of the rest of his tract." Wolf v. Ament's Ex'r (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 150 151.

An inclosure by an ordinary fence of premises, without residence thereon or improvement or cultivation, or other acts of ownership, is of itself insufficient to constitute "actual possession." Davis v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 57 Cal. 543, 545.

The exercise of control over uninclosed timber land, by working on the land at times and prohibiting others from interfering therewith, constitutes actual possession. Allaire v. Ketcham, 35 Atl. 900, 901, 55 N. J. Eq. 168.

Occupancy or residence.

Actual possession consists in the actual occupancy of the party. Newcome v. Crews, 32 S. W. 947, 98 Ky. 339; Lillianskyoldt v. Goss, 2 Utah, 292, 297.

Actual possession of real estate means such possession as is evidenced by fencing, cultivating, or other unmistakable acts of exclusive custody and control, and it is not necessary that there should be actual residence on the land. Van Buskirk v. Dunlap, 2 West. Law Month. 125, 129; Webber v. Clarke, 15 Pac. 431, 434, 74 Cal. 11.

By "actual possession," as used in a statement that forcible entry is high-handed invasion of the actual possession of another, is meant that he shall be in actual use and enjoyment of the land for such purpose as it is capable of, and not that the prosecutor shall be actually present at the time. State v. Newbury, 29 S. E. 367, 368, 122 N. C. 1077.

"Actual possession," as used in the forcible entry and detainer statute requiring the plaintiff to have been in actual possession when the defendant took wrongful possession of the property, construed not to mean the actual occupancy of the premises at the time; and hence the owner of a store, who locks it up till he can find a tenant, is in actual possession thereof, within the meaning of the statute. Minturn v. Burr, 16 Cal. 107, 109.

Keeping off trespassers.

Posting notices against trespassers along a part of two of the boundary lines of a tract of 60,000 acres of uninclosed and unoccupied forest land, and employing watchers to keep trespassers off of the same, do not constitute actual possession thereof within statutes making void grants of lands which are in actual possession of a person claiming title adverse to the grantor. Marsh v. Neha-sa-ne Park Ass'n, 42 N. Y. Supp. 996, 1000, 18 Misc. Rep. 314.

Personal property.

"Actual possession," as used in Code, § 1923, providing that no mortgage of personal property, which is not filed for record, shall be valid as against existing creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, where the mortgagor retains "actual possession" thereof, means a true, genuine, positive, and certain possession, and not a virtual or theoretical possession. The mortgagor has no "actual possession" when he retains the property under his immediate personal supervision and control, though he employs others to aid in that control; but when the property is intrusted to the custody and control of another, without the immediate supervision of the mortgagor, then "actual possession" is in that other, and not in the mortgagor. King v. Wallace, 42 N. W. 776, 777, 78 Iowa, 221.

Within the statute putting on the free list professional books, implements, instruments, and tools of trade, etc., in the actual possession of the person at the time of arriving in the United States, the words "actual possession" mean an open, visible, and present occupancy and possession of the articles imported. The actual possession and the arrival of the owner must be coincident; and thus articles which are brought with the owner in the same vessel are to be deemed in his actual possession at the time of the arriving, though they are in the immediate custody of the carrier. If, however, the articles arrive by a different vessel and at a different time from the owner, they cannot be said to be in his actual possession. Rosenfeld v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 303, 304, 13 C. C. A. 450.

"Actual possession," as used in St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 26, providing that the assignee of a rent charge shall not be registered as an elector, unless he has been in the actual possession of it for six months before the last day of July, is to be construed literally, and means a possession in fact; and hence a receipt for several years by the grantee did not satisfy the statute, on the ground that he might be considered as a trustee for the assignee. Hayden v. Overseers of Twerton, 4 Man. & G. 1, 7.

ACTUAL PURPOSES OF NAVIGATION.

The words "actual and necessary purposes of canal navigation," in a statute exempting the property of a canal company from taxation which is kept and held by the company for the actual and necessary purposes for canal navigation, includes crossings, piers, and basins owned by the company, which are not rented, but which are actually used for conducting the boats engaged in the canal navigation and for the reception of their cargo. Morris Canal & Banking Co. v. Betts, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 555, 556.

ACTUAL RECORD.

The actual record of a mortgage, within the statute, is the spreading of a mortgage on the record, and not the filing of it with the clerk. Benson v. Callaway, 80 Ga. 230, 4 S. E. 851.

ACTUAL RESIDENCE—ACTUAL RESIDENT.

Acts 1835, §§ 8, 11, requiring "actual residence" on a tract of land in order that a person may obtain title thereto by limitation, does not require actual residence on each of two tracts of land claimed; and, though the party claiming title derived that title to different tracts from different sources, yet, if the tracts join each other and are all in one inclosure, and there is no one but the alleged owner residing thereon, such residence is "actual residence" on all the tracts, within the meaning of the act. Wharton v. Bunting, 73 Ill. 16, 20.

"Actual residence" as used in Civ. Code §§ 54, 640, relating to divorce, does not mean the usual place of residence, or the place where a person is in fact residing for the time being, but has substantially the same meaning as the term "domicile," having in contemplation a residence of a permanent and fixed character. Carpenter v. Carpenter, 2 Pac. 122, 126, 30 Kan. 712, 46 Am. Rep. 108.

Legal residence distinguished.

A distinction is recognized between legal and actual residence. A person may be a legal resident of one place and an actual resident of another, and when he goes from the place of his legal residence, intending to return, to reside temporarily at the other place. Hinds v. Hinds, 1 Iowa (1 Clarke) 36, 39; Love v. Cherry, 24 Iowa, 205; Bradley v. Fraser, 54 Iowa, 289, 6 N. W. 293. Legal residence, as distinguished from mere temporary actual residence, is the residence contemplated by the Code, relating to the bringing of actions aided by attachment. Ludlow v. Szold, 57 N. W. 676, 678, 90 Iowa, 175.

As contradistinguished from a person's "legal residence," he may have an "actual residence" in another state or country. He may abide in one country, without surrendering his legal residence in another, if he so intends. His "legal residence" may be merely ideal, but his "actual residence" must be substantial. He may not actually abide at his "legal residence" at all, but his "actual residence" must be his abiding place. Though one may have a "legal residence" in one state, yet, if his "actual residence" is in another state, the latter fact is sufficient to authorize an attachment against his property in the first state upon the ground of nonresidency; and in an action for divorce the mere fact of a plaintiff's "legal residence" within the state, his actual residence being out of the state, would not be sufficient to defeat a motion to compel him to execute a nonresident's bond for costs. Furthermore, a mere "legal residence" in the state with an "actual residence" out of the state, does not satisfy Civ. Code, § 423, requiring that a plaintiff, for a divorce, must have "a residence in the state" for one year before the commencement of the action. Tipton v. Tipton, 8 S. W. 440, 441, 87 Ky. 243.

"Actual resident," as used in the Iowa Code, which provides that a person may be sued before a justice of the peace in any county of which he is an "actual resident," includes one who has moved into a county and hired a house there, with the intention of remaining until he had completed a certain job of work, though he did not mean to reside there permanently. A person may be an "actual resident" of one county, and have a legal residence in another. Fitzgerald v. Arel, 18 N. W. 713, 714, 63 Iowa, 104, 50 Am. Rep. 733. A partnership, within the meaning of such statute, has an "actual residence" in the county in which it conducts its business, though neither member of the partnership is an "actual resident" of that county. Fitzgerald v. Gimmell, 20 N. W. 179, 180, 64 Iowa, 261.

ACTUAL SEISIN.

"Actual seisin," means possession of the freehold, by the pedis positio of one's self or one's tenant or agent, or by construction of law, as in the case of a commonwealth's grant, a conveyance under the statute of uses, or doubtless, of grant or devise, where there is no actual adverse possession. Seisin in law is a right to the possession of the freehold, where there is no adverse occupancy thereof, such as exists in the heir after descent of land upon him before actual entry by himself or his tenant. Carpenter v. Garrett, 75 Va. 129, 135.

Actual seisin, or actual possession, as distinguished from constructive possession or possession in law, has been defined to be one based upon an actual entry on the land, and one which requires or gives an occupation as a demonstrative thing. Carr v. An- derson, 39 N. Y. Supp. 740, 749, 6 App. Div. 6, 10 (citing Churchill v. Onderonk, 59 N. Y. 134).

ACTUAL SERVICE.

See "Actual Military Service."

Actual service of a writ is shown, within the meaning of a statute providing that service of a partner is service on the firm and on the partner actually served, where the partner is a nonresident and there has been a publication of the writ, as provided by law. Martin v. Burns, 16 S. W. 1072, 1073, 80 Tex. 676.

"Actual service" is defined in the mechanic's lien law as service by serving a copy on nonresident defendant personally or by leaving it at his residence 10 days before its return. Smith v. Collopy, 55 Atl. 805, 807, 69 N. J. Law, 365.

ACTUAL SETTLER.

"An actual settler upon land belonging to the state is one who establishes himself upon the land, or fixes his residence upon it to effect possession for his exclusive occupancy and use, with a view to acquire title to it by purchase from the state." Gavitt v. Mohr, 10 Pac 337, 338, 68 Cal. 506.

An "actual service of summons" as used in an act providing for the enforcement of claims or liens upon buildings, consists of a personal service on the defendant, or, if he cannot be found in the state, by affixing a copy thereof on such building, or by leaving it at his residence. Revision N. J. p. 668. Heldritter v. Elizabeth Oil Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 135, 136, 112 U. S. 294, 28 L. Ed. 729.

"Actual settlers," within the land laws of California, providing that lands belonging to the state which are suitable for cultivation can only be granted to actual settlers thereon, means actual residents. Mosely v. Torrence, 12 Pac. 430, 431, 71 Cal. 318.

Const. art. 7, § 6, providing that actual settlers residing on school lands shall be protected in the prior right of purchasing the same, means a settler residing on the land, and not a settler not residing thereon, though he had fenced the entire tract and cultivated a portion thereof. Baker v. Millman, 13 S. W. 618, 619, 77 Tex. 46.

"Actual settlers," as used in Gen. St. p. 109, § 2, requiring that an actual settler on vacant or unappropriated land shall be given notice that another person intends to appropriate such land, does not include one who only makes a small clearing on unappropriated land and cuts a few logs thereon. McQuady v. Mattingly (Ky.) 12 S. W. 758.

The term "actual settler," as used in the law authorizing the sale of school lands, requires actual residence on such land, and the person who has done nothing more than to make improvements on the land is not such a settler. He must both have settled upon and improved the land. Probably a person might, by going upon it and making improvements with a bona fide intention of becoming a settler thereon, obtain rights which would date from the first moment of his occupancy. To settle on the land means to fix the owner's place of residence thereon, and a settler of land is one who resides thereon. This is in accordance with all of the definitions of the words "settle," "settler," and "settlement," when applied to a settlement upon land. Bratton v. Cross, 22 Kan. 673, 678.

"Actual settler," as used in Act Aug. 12, 1870 (2 Pasch. Dig. art. 7048), requiring a person attempting to acquire rights in public land by pre-emption to be an "actual settler," means a person in the actual occupancy of land, with the intention of making the same his permanent residence, and using the land as his home, as opposed to a mere temporary occupation, which will not constitute a party an actual settler or occupant in good faith within the meaning of the statute. Turner v. Ferguson, 58 Tex. 6, 10.

ACTUAL TIME.

An order by the Governor commuting a penitentiary sentence to imprisonment for nine years of "actual time" in the penitentiary, and providing that, when he shall have served nine years' "actual time" in said penitentiary he shall be entitled to his discharge, construed as requiring a service of nine calendar years, and not to give the prisoner the benefit of having such time commuted by good behavior. In re Hall, 51 N. W. 750, 751, 34 Neb. 206.

21 Stat. 346, and 22 Stat. 118, providing that officers in the army shall be entitled to additional pay for length of service, and that the actual time of service in army or navy, or both, shall be allowed all officers in computing their pay, construed as including the time in which an army officer served at West Point as a cadet. United States v. Watson, 9 Sup. Ct. 430, 431, 130 U. S. 80, 32 L. Ed. 852; United States v. Morton, 5 Sup. Ct. 1, 4, 112 U. S. 1, 28 L. Ed. 613.

ACTUAL TOTAL LOSS.

An actual total loss is caused by (1) a total destruction of the thing insured; (2) the loss of the thing by sinking or by being broken up; (3) any damage to the thing which renders it valueless to the owner for the purpose for which he held it; or (4) any other event which entirely deprives the owner of the possession at the port of destination of the thing insured. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4568; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1914.

As applied to a building, actual total loss means, not that its materials were utterly destroyed, but that the building, though part of it remained standing, has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and instead has become a broken mass, or cannot longer be properly designated as a "building." Absolute extinction is not meant. Where the roof and interior woodwork of a building are destroyed by fire, leaving the walls standing, though somewhat damaged, it is a question for the jury as to whether there was a total destruction of the building or not. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 32 N. Y. Supp. 1059, 1061, 85 Hun, 250, 254.

There is actual total loss when the subject-matter of the insurance is wholly destroyed or lost to the insured, or where there remains nothing of value to be abandoned to the insurer. Soelberg v. Western Assur. Co. of Toronto (U. S.) 119 Fed. 23, 29, 55 C. C. A. 601.

An "actual total loss," as the term is used in marine insurance, is a loss where the vessel ceases to exist in specie, but becomes a mere congeries of planks, incapable of being repaired, or where, by the peril insured against, it is placed beyond the control of the insured, and beyond his power of recovery. Globe Ins. Co. v. Sherlock, 25 Ohio St. 50, 64.

"Actual total loss," as used in a marine insurance policy, occurs when the subject insured wholly perishes, or its recovery is irretrievably hopeless, as where a ship is broken in pieces and dismembered, so that her planks and apparel are scattered on the sea, though the whole or greater part of the fragments reach the shore as wreckage; for in such case the ship, as one, is destroyed. Burt v. Brewers' & Malsters' Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 383, 385.

"Actual total loss," as used in a policy of marine insurance, does not necessarily imply the actual physical destruction of the thing insured, but may occur in cases where the ship remains in specie, but is irretrievably lost to the owner. Carr v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 17 N. E. 369, 370, 109 N. Y. 504; Monroe v. British Foreign Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 777, 780, 3 C. C. A. 280.

The general rule as to what constitutes the total loss of a ship, within a policy of insurance, is defined in Murray v. Hatch, 6 Mass. 465, as follows: "If the ship is afloat, or it is practicable to put her afloat, and if she is capable of being repaired at any expense, it is not a total loss, within the meaning and intent of the policy." There is much doubt, at least, of the correctness of the proposition that an insurance on a vessel against "actual total loss only" covers the case of total loss of value, though the ship remains in the form of a ship, capable of being repaired at some cost, and is not placed, by sale or otherwise, beyond the power of the insured to procure her arrival. But, where a wrecked vessel, insured against "actual total loss only," is allowed by the insurers to be sold to satisfy a claim of salvors employed by the insurers, who had the right so to do, the insured, not being a party to the contract, was entitled to recover as for a total loss. Carr v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 17 N. E. 369, 370, 109 N. Y. 504.

ACTUAL USE

Church.

"Actual use," as used in Act May 14, 1874, exempting churches and regular places of worship from taxation, and providing that all property other than that in "actual use" and occupied for such purposes should be taxed, means exclusively used; and a mere concurrent or alternate occupation by the church does not come within the requirements of the exemption. City of Philadelphia v. Barber, 28 Atl. 644, 645, 160 Pa. 123; Parsonage Taxes, 25 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 570, 572.

Under Const. § 170, exempting from taxation "places actually used for religious worship, with the grounds attached thereto and used and appurtenant to the house of worship," and "all parsonages or residences owned by any religious society, and occupied as a home, and for no other purpose, by the minister of any religion," a church parsonage, which is not occupied by the minister, but is rented to another, is not exempt, though erected on the church lot, and though the rent is paid to the minister. Broadway Christian Church v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 66 S. W. 32, 33, 112 Ky. 448.

Horse.

A statute exempting from attachment a horse required for farming or teaming purposes, or actual use, includes a horse kept by a commercial traveler, required for use in his business for selling goods by sample, although the horse is only four years old and has never been used. Towne v. Marshall, 13 Atl. 648, 64 N. H. 460.

Under a statute exempting a horse in "actual use," the question whether, at the time the horse was attached, it was reasonably necessary for the actual working use of the debtor, was a question of fact for the jury. Somers v. Emerson, 58 N. H. 48, 49.

Iron.

Iron, which at one time formed a part of boiler plates used in the manufacture of boilers, and of rods or beams used in building bridges, but which, in order to fit the plates, rods, or beams, was cut off as useless and thrown into the scrap heap, was iron which had been in "actual use," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2504, relating to tariffs, and declaring that nothing should be deemed scrap iron, except waste or refuse iron that had been in "actual use" and only fit to be remanufactured. Schlesinger v. Beard, 7 Sup. Ct. 546, 548, 120 U. S. 264, 30 L. Ed. 656.

Wearing apparel.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2503, exempting from duty wearing apparel in "actual use" of citizens returning to the United States from foreign countries, does not mean a use limited to wearing apparel on the person at the time, but includes any article of wearing apparel bought for use, and appropriated and set apart to be used, by becoming a part of what is ordinarily known as a person's wardrobe, and includes all articles of wearing apparel, in a condition to be worn without further manufacture, owned by a person, and brought with him as a passenger, and intended for the use and wear of himself and his family, who accompanied him as passengers, and not for sale or purchase, or imported for other persons or to be given away, suitable for the season of the year which was immediately approaching at the time of the arrival, not exceeding in quantity, quality, or value what the plaintiff was in the habit of ordinarily providing for himself and his family at that time and keeping on hand for their reasonable wants, in view of their means and habits of life. Astor v. Merritt, 4 Sup. Ct. 413, 419, 111 U. S. 202, 28 L. Ed. 401.

ACTUAL VALUE.

The expressions "actual value," "market value," and "market price," when applied to any article, mean the same thing. They mean the price or value of the article, established or shown by sales, public or private, in the way of ordinary business. Sanford v. Peck, 27 Atl. 1057, 1058, 62 Conn. 510; Murray v. Stanton, 99 Mass. 345, 348; Citquot v. U. S., 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 114, 143, 18 L. Ed. 116.

The "actual value" of lands at the time they were taken by a railway company, which is to be ascertained in case there was no market, so that the market value could not be determined, is the reasonable worth of the land in the hands of a prudent seller at liberty to sell, at a reasonable time for selling, in the usual and reasonable terms and conditions of selling, taking in view the location of the land, and the purposes for which it was held; such value as the same would be determined by a prudent seller or purchaser. St. Louis, K. & A. Ry. Co. v. Chapman, 16 Pac. 695, 697, 38 Kan. 307, 5 Am. St. Rep. 744.

The "actual value" of shares of corporate stock is ascertainable from the intrinsic worth of its assets immediately available or unavailable, on its profits or losses covering a fixed period, and the business calculations for the future; and other elements of value besides these, in the mind of the business man, may be taken into account in arriving at a correct conclusion as to the "actual value" of the whole capital stock. Commonwealth v. Edgerton Coal Co., 30 Atl. 125, 129, 164 Pa. 284.

As salable or cash value.

"Actual value," as used in directions to assessing officers, means the same as salable value and cash value. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 162, 25 L. Ed. 903.

In determining the "actual value" of property under Tax Law, § 12, the sum for which the property under ordinary circumstances would sell is the criterion, and it is not arbitrary or fanciful to base the finding of value on the rental of property paid by the lessee, because the rent of the property is evidence of the amount for which it will sell. People v. Feitner, 77 N. Y. Supp. 218, 220, 38 Misc. Rep. 204.

Under Pol. Code, § 3627, providing that all taxable property must be assessed at its full cash value, a complaint in a suit against an assessor for damages for excessive valuation of lands, which averred that their "actual value for agricultural purposes" never exceeded a certain sum, less than the assessment, did not show an excessive valuation, since the full cash value might not be the same as their "actual value for agricultural purposes." Ballerino v. Mason, 23 Pac. 530, 83 Cal. 447.

ACTUAL VIOLENCE.

An assault with actual violence is an assault with physical force, "put in action, exerted upon the person assailed." "The term 'violence' is synonymous with physical force, and the two are used interchangeably in relation to assaults. Actual is something real, in opposition to constructive or speculative; something existing in the act." Any language which expressly or by necessary implication imports and charges exertion of physical force on the person assaulted charges assault with "actual violence," and hence charging an aggravated battery is sufficient, which by necessary implication includes exertion of physical force upon the person. State v. Wells, 31 Conn. 210, 212.

ACTUALLY.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, it was held not to be prejudicial error to require the jury, in order to acquit on the ground of self-defense, to find that accused "actually believed" that he was in danger of losing his life or suffering great bodily harm; the word "actually" not being capable of doing more than emphasizing or calling the jury's attention to the fact that defendant was required to believe that he was in immediate danger. Whiteneck v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 55 S. W. 916, 917.

"Actually," as used in an affidavit that the amount of money or other property, specified in a certain certificate to have been contributed by each of the special partners to the common stock, had been "actually" contributed and applied, etc., means in fact, really, in truth, paid in, contributed, and applied. Crouch v. First Nat. Bank, 40 N. E. 974, 979, 156 Ill. 342.

ACTUALLY COLLECTED.

Rev. St. 1874, c. 53, art. 10, § 10, providing that the compensation of county officers shall in no instance exceed the fees "actually collected," does not mean only such fees as an officer shall collect otherwise than in pursuance of an appropriation out of the county treasury, but includes all fees received by him, without regard to the mode of collection, though they are paid by the county, since the mode of effecting a collection, when it shall have been successful, can by no possibility affect the fact that money has been actually collected. Marion County v. Lear, 108 Ill. 343, 347.

ACTUALLY DANGEROUS.

"Tolerably safe" and "actually dangerous" are not necessarily conflicting terms. The former often implies the latter. To say that the track of a railroad had been placed in a tolerably safe condition might mean that it was actually dangerous. Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 6 N. W. 303, 307, 49 Wis. 609.

ACTUALLY DWELLS.

Rev. St. § 1500, subd. 7, declaring that, whenever any territory shall be organized into any town, every person who "actually dwells" therein shall thereafter have a legal settlement in such town, applies to one who actually remains, tarries, or abides for some length of time, and includes one who is boarded or supported at a particular house. Town of Hay River v. Town of Sherman, 18 N. W. 740, 742, 744, 60 Wis. 54.

ACTUALLY EMPLOYED.

Laws 1855, p. 300, authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies, and providing that the corporation organized should continue subject to the same rate of tax, and the amount of its capital and loans thereafter on which such tax should be paid should be such proportion of its capital and loans as is "actually employed" in the state of Michigan, applies to all the capital stock paid in, and the loans made to the corporation for the purposes authorized by the charter, whether actually expended in building the roads, or on hand for that purpose in the form of money, bills of exchange, or bonds drawing interest. These could hardly be regarded as unemployed, in the sense ordinarily applied to that term by capitalists. Capital specially appropriated, set apart, and devoted to a particular purpose is said to be employed or in use. In this sense the term "actually employed" was used in the statute. People v. Michigan Southern & N. I. R. Co., 4 Mich. 398, 406. The phrase as so used has no reference to the "actual use" of the property, but is merely designed to distinguish the investment in one state from the investment in the other. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. Auditor General, 9 Mich. 448.

ACTUALLY ENGAGED.

Acts 1863, p. 13, exempting from militia duty in the state persons engaged in certain occupations, so long as they are "actually engaged" therein, cannot be construed to mean that all those persons who are exempted shall continually employ their own personal skill and labor in and about the pursuits or occupations on account of which they are exempted. When we say of a man that he is actually engaged in forming or planning, we mean that he is really or truly engaged, engaged in fact. The words "actually engaged," in common parlance, are the opposite or antithesis of "seemingly," or "pretendedly," or "feignedly engaged." In re Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 367, 375.

ACTUALLY OCCUPY.

St. 1798, c. 20, § 2, makes it an offense for a person to "actually occupy" a place for the purpose of gaming. Held, that defendant did not "actually occupy" a shed, which he had rented for the purpose of gaming, contiguous to a passageway between the shed and his store. Commonwealth v. Dean, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 387.

ACTUALLY ON DUTY.

The expression "whilst actually on duty," as used in Metropolitan Police Act, § 34 (Laws N. Y. 1860, p. 446, c. 259), providing that no person holding office under the act shall be liable to military or jury duty, or to arrest on civil process, or to service of subpoenas from civil courts while "actually on duty," is not to be construed to exempt a patrolman from arrest on civil process, or service of subpoenas from civil courts, unless such patrolman is actually on duty; and patrolmen are not to be deemed actually on duty during their fixed and known remission from duty. The superintendent or captains, being constantly charged with the constant operations of the police force, are deemed always on duty, so that they are exempt at all times during the continuance of their terms of office. Hart v. Kennedy (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 432, 433.

ACTUALLY OPEN FOR BUSINESS.

"Actually open for business," as used in a fire policy on a store, requiring its books to be kept in a fireproof safe, except during such time as the store is "actually open for business," includes all the time "when it is lighted up, and the merchant or his clerk is there, ready and desirous of selling goods, or to do anything else which constitutes a part of the work or labor of conducting a mercantile business. A store is as much open for business while the merchant is waiting for customers during his customary business hours as it is when the customers are present." The fact that the door is locked, so that customers have to knock for admission, does not change the conclusion, where such customers are admitted when they knock. Jones v. Southern Ins. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 19, 21.

ACTUALLY OWING.

Where notes given for wages have been transferred to third parties, the wages are not "actually owing" to the employé, within Laws 1886, c. 283, providing that the wages or salaries "actually owing" to the employé of an assignor at the time of an assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be preferred before any other debt, though he afterwards purchased back such notes. In re Hooper's Estate, 11 N. Y. Supp. 241, 242, 57 Hun, 490.

ACTUALLY RECEIVE.

The statute of frauds (St. 29 Car. II, c. 3, § 17), requiring that a buyer of goods must "actually receive" them to make the purchase binding, must be construed to mean acceptance by the party himself, and hence an acceptance by a wharf owner of tea, to be forwarded to the buyer according to the usual course of dealing between the parties, was not an acceptance by the buyer. Hanson v. Armitage, 5 Barn. & Ald. 557, 558.

The good will of a business is property, and may have a value independent of any particular locality or any specific tangible property; and stock of a corporation issued for such good will is issued for property "actually received," within the meaning of the New York stock corporation law (Laws 1892, c. 688). Washburn v. National Wall Paper Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 17, 19, 26 C. C. A. 312.

ACTUALLY REMOVING

A statute, providing that an attachment may be levied on the property of a defendant who is "actually removing" out of the county, includes a person, not a resident of the state, who was moving through a county of this state, since he is in and removing out of the county, and the law gives to every nonresident a locus in the county where he is found. Johnson v. Lowry, 47 Ga. 560, 561, 15 Am. Rep. 655.

ACTUALLY SETTLED.

"Actually settled," as used in Rev. St. tit. 79, c. 9, art. 3939, requiring a person who desires to acquire a homestead to present his application, containing a statement that he has "actually settled" on the land which he claims, is used in the sense of a real, and not a constructive or fraudulent, settlement, being used by the Legislature "for the purpose of securing real bona fide settlers upon the land"; and hence one whose purpose was not to settle upon the land at the time, but to reserve it for future settlement, did not "actually settle" on the land. Busk v. Lowrie, 23 S. W. 983, 984, 86 Tex. 128.

ACTUALLY SOLD.

Lands are actually sold at a tax sale, so as to entitle the treasurer to his fees, when the sale is completed, and when he has collected from the purchaser the amount of his bid; and a sale to a purchaser who fails to complete, rendering a resale necessary, is not an actual sale. Miles v. Miller, 5 Neb. 269, 272.

ACTUS.

In England an "actus" was a kind of public way over which the public passed on foot and on horseback. Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539, 540.

ACUTE BRONCHITIS.

Where the evidence shows that sometimes "acute bronchitis" is used to designate an ordinary cold in the chest, and by other physicians such use would be a misnomer, it is a question for the jury as to whether the person who had suffered with a slight attack of bronchitis or cold had acute bronchitis, so as to make a statement, in an application for life insurance, that he had never had such disease, a misrepresentation. Billings v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 516, 517, 70 Vt. 477.

ACUTE GASTRITIS.

"Acute gastritis" may mean bellyache caused by slight indigestion resulting from overeating, which would be of short duration and in no sense dangerous, so that the failure to state such slight ill in an application for insurance does not constitute a misrepresentation. Billings v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 516, 518, 70 Vt. 477.

AD DAMNUM.

Ad damnum means the amount of damages demanded. Cole v. Hayes, 7 Atl. 391, 392, 78 Me. 539.

The "ad damnum clause" in a complaint is the claim for damages. Vincent v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 55 Atl. 177, 179, 75 Conn. 650. It may limit the scope and effect of the plaintiff's claim with respect to his title to the special damages laid in the declaration. Karnuff v. Kelch (N. J.) 55 Atl. 163, 165.

AD FILUM AQUÆ.

See "Filum Aquæ."

AD HOC.

See "Attorney ad Hoc."

See, also, "Curator ad Hoc."

The word "special," as used in relation to the appointment of special curator, has very much the same meaning as the words "ad hoc," which is the original, while the word special is the translation, and in decisions they are used indifferently. Sallier v. Rosteet, 32 South. 383, 384, 108 La. 378 (citing Hansell v. Hansell, 45 La. Ann. 548, 10 South. 941).

AD VALOREM.

The term "ad valorem," as used in Const. art. 19, § 27, requiring special assessments on real estate to be ad valorem and uniform, construed to mean a quotient part of the existing value of the property, and not an adjustment of burdens to each individual man in view of his particular gains or damages. City of Little Rock v. Board of Improvements, 42 Ark. 152, 162.

AD VALOREM TAX.

The "ad valorem" system of taxation relates to the assessment and taxation of all property. Levi v. City of Louisville, 30 S. W. 973, 974, 97 Ky. 394, 28 L. R. A. 480.

Within Pamph. Acts 1841, p. 51, declaring that an "ad valorem tax" of one-fourth of 1 per cent. shall be assessed and collected on all bank stock subscribed for in any incorporated bank in this state, an ad valorem tax means a tax or duty on the value of the article or thing subject to taxation, and the language used by the Legislature should receive the same construction as if it had declared that there shall be assessed and collected within this state a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent. on the value of all bank stock subscribed for any incorporated bank, etc. Bailey v. Fuqua, 24 Miss. (2 Cushman) 497, 501.

An ad valorem tax is a tax of so much per cent. on the invoice or appraised money value of the goods subject to the tax. Ad valorem duties are always estimated on a certain per cent. of the value of the property. A large proportion of the duty on imports are of this description, and so sometimes are many of the taxes which make up the internal revenue. By far the larger proportion of state taxation is also on property by valuation, and effect can only be given to it by means of assessors who value the property and apportion the taxes by their estimate. Pub. Acts 1881, No. 168, provides for the assessment of telegraph and telephone lines at their cash value, and a tax levied thereon at a rate equal to the average of general municipal and local taxes throughout the state during the year previous, in lieu of all other taxes, was held to be an ad valorem tax. Pingree v. Auditor General, 78 N. W. 1025, 1026, 120 Mich. 95, 44 L. R. A. 679.

ADAPTED.

In a claim for a patent describing, what the inventor claims as new, "the pipe box provided with a projection 'adapted' to co-operate with a spring to rock the said pipe box, substantially and for the purpose described," "adapted" is not even approximately synonymous with "combined," so that such claim is for the pipe box with a projection, which projection may be adapted to co-operate with a spring for the purpose of rocking the box, etc. Brown Mfg. Co. v. Deere (U. S.) 61 Fed. 972, 977, 10 C. C. A. 208.

"Adapted for coining," as used in Rev. St. c. 127, § 18, providing that any person who shall knowingly have in his possession "any instrument adapted and designed for coining counterfeit money" shall be subject to a punishment, includes an instrument adapted to stamp the impression of only one side of a United States half dollar. Commonwealth v. Kent, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 221, 223.

ADD.

"Added," as used in Pol. Code, § 3764, providing that the delinquent tax list must contain the amount of taxes and cost due, with the taxes due on personal property "added" to the taxes on real estate, where the real estate is liable therefor, or the several taxes are due from the same person, does not contemplate a mathematical computation, and is used in the sense of "subjoined" or "appended." California Loan & Trust Co. v. Weis, 50 Pac. 697, 700, 118 Cal. 489.

Within the statute authorizing the amendment of a complaint by striking or "adding" new parties, "adding" does not mean substituting a different party altogether, so as to authorize the dismissal of one plaintiff and the substitution of a new one. Leaird v. Moore, 27 Ala. 326, 328.

A mortgage of a stock of goods which is to cover additions "added thereto" will be construed not to include goods purchased, "but never received at the place of business or taken possession of for the purposes of the business." Curtis v. Wilcox, 13 N. W. 803, 804, 49 Mich. 425.

ADDED DAMAGES.

Beyond actual damages, the law gives what is called "added damages." Those grown out of the wantonness or atrocity, so to speak, of the act. They are given where the act was so wanton, or so despotic, or of so oppressive a character, or where it entails such shame, such publicity upon a party, as to have the effect of exciting his feelings more than an act committed under less wanton, less oppressive circumstances. They may be called "exemplary," "punitive," "vindictive," or "compensatory" damages. Ross v. Leggett, 28 N. W. 695, 697, 61 Mich. 415, 1 Am. St. Rep. 608.

ADDICTED.

"Addicted" means devoted by customary practice; to apply one's self habitually; and a finding of a committee for the investigation of the conduct of the regent of the State University, stating that he was "addicted" to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, is substantially equivalent to a declaration that he is guilty of habitual intoxication or drunkenness, since drunkenness is the result of addiction to the excessive use of intoxicants; and as Gen. St. Kan. 1819, p. 2519, makes drunkenness a misdemeanor, such finding is sufficient to authorize the removal of the regent. Rogers v. Morrill, 42 Pac. 355, 357, 55 Kan. 737.

The words "addicted to the use" in an application for a life policy, in reference to the applicant being addicted to the use of chloral, means habitual, constant use of it. Rand v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 37 S. W. 7, 8, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 291.

"Addicted to the use of alcoholic stimulants," in a question in an application for a life policy whether the applicant has ever been addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants, is an inquiry as to his habit in that regard, and not as to whether he used such stimulants at all, but whether he used any of them habitually. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Davey, 8 Sup. Ct. 331, 332, 123 U. S. 739, 31 L. Ed. 315.

ADDITION.

See "In Addition to."

Building.

As building, see "Building (In Criminal Law)"; "Building (In Lien Laws)."

The words "additions attached," in a fire policy on furniture contained in a certain brick building and "additions attached," were construed to include furniture in the frame building on the next lot, extending over and against the rear of the brick building two inches, and used in connection with the brick building. The court, in so ruling, says: "It is a fact not to be overlooked that the only building to which the term 'additions attached' can relate is this frame building. The language is therefore surplusage unless it embraces that building, and we must give effect to every part of the policy, if we can do so without obvious violence to the intentions of the parties to it. The structure impinged against the rear of the brick building. It extended onto lot 967 sufficiently to do this, hence it was not wholly on the lot adjoining. The fact that it was upon both the lots is not of sufficient moment to relieve the insurer from liability. Nor was it detached. It was connected as closely to the brick building as the nature of the structure would permit. It is a familiar rule in the interpretation of insurance policies that, where any uncertainty exists in the language, it will be resolved in favor of the insured. The two buildings were occupied by plaintiff, and we are not required to distort the phraseology of the policy in reaching the conclusion that it covered the furniture in the wooden structure." Maisel v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 69 N. Y. Supp. 181, 183, 59 App. Div. 461.

The phrase "additions adjoining and communicating," in an insurance policy on a brick dwelling house, and additions adjoining and communicating, embraces a frame addition adjoining and communicating with the brick building. Carpenter v. Allemannia Fire Ins. Co., 26 Atl. 781, 156 Pa. 37.

A building contract, requiring additional payments for changes, additions, and alterations, will be construed to mean such changes as are incidental to the complete execution of the work as described in the plans and specifications, and therefore of only minor or trifling importance; if otherwise, some different mode of determining what prices should be paid for them would also have been prescribed by the writer. We think any material departure from the plans and specifications with reference to which the contract was made, which resulted in a new and substantially different undertaking, cannot be regarded as within the meaning of this language. Cook County v. Harms, 106 Ill. 151, 159.

"Alterations, deviations, or additions," within the meaning of a building contract expressly providing for "alterations, deviations, or additions, and the payment for them," includes extra work on the building, and therefore an order payable out of the amount due on the builder's contract includes the sum due for such extra work. Dunn v. Stokern, 3 Atl. 349, 350, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 401.

Mechanic's Lien Law (Nix. Dig. p. 487, § 5), declaring that any addition erected to a former building shall be considered a "building for the purposes of the act," will be construed to embrace something which in common parlance would not be designated as a building, or the phraseology would not have been used that such addition should be considered as a building for the purposes of the act. Whitenack v. Noe, 11 N. J. Eq. (3 Stockt.) 321, 325.

The expression "erections and additions," as used in a lease obligating the lessees to deliver up the premises and all the future "erections and additions to or upon the same to the lessor at the end of the term," was limited in purpose and effect to new buildings erected or old buildings added to, putting such erections and additions upon the same footing in respect of the obligation to keep in repair the buildings upon the premises at the execution of the lease, and could not be so extended as to deprive the tenants of the right to remove trade fixtures, much less personal property put on the premises by them during the term, such as machinery in a mill. Holbrook v. Chamberlin, 116 Mass. 155, 162, 17 Am. Rep. 146.

Same—Distinct building.

"Addition" means something added to, so that a building entirely distinct from another and larger than it is will not be covered by an insurance policy insuring the building and addition. Rickerson v. German-American Ins. Co., 32 N. Y. Supp. 1026, 1027, 85 Hun, 266.

The term "additions" in a fire policy on a two-story brick building and additions thereto was construed to mean a building partly occupied by assured's servants, one of the rooms of which was used as a laundry, though such building was not annexed to the brick building, there being no other building in assured's yard which could possibly be claimed as an addition to the brick building. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Martin (Miss.) 16 So. 417.

Within the meaning of an insurance policy giving insured authority to make "additions," a new warehouse located 40 feet away from the main building, and connected with it by a bridge and underground passage used for pipes, is not an addition. Peoria Sugar Refining Co. v. People's Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 24 Fed. 773, 15 Ins. Law J. 52.

Under a policy insuring a "steam power elevator building and additions, with porches and platforms attached," a warehouse standing within 2½ feet of the elevator building, and about the same size as the elevator, and fastened to the elevator by strips of board nailed upon each building, and used exclusively for storing grain, which was first received into the elevator and then spouted into the warehouse through two spouts which extended from one building to the other, and was taken from the warehouse by a conveyor running under the warehouse and elevator, no grain being received into or discharged from the warehouse except through the elevator, and there being no means of entrance into the warehouse except through a window which was reached by a ladder or by cleats nailed onto the side of the building, such warehouse was in effect merely a bin of the elevator building, and covered by the policy. Cargill v. Millers' & Manufacturers' Mut. Ins. Co., 22 N. W. 6, 33 Minn. 90.

The phrase "additions thereto adjoining and communicating" in a fire policy on frame mill building and all additions thereto attached, "which building is occupied by insured as a pail shop," was construed to cover a dryhouse 12 feet from the main building, and between which there was a movable bridge, there being no other building besides these, except a boilerhouse 2 feet from the dryhouse, all of which buildings were connected by steam pipes, and each a necessary part of the plant. "In view of the dependent use of all the buildings in the manufacture of pails, the word 'additions' was not an inappropriate designation of the two smaller ones; and for the same reason the qualifying words 'adjoining and communicating,' though perhaps unnecessary, were evidently intended to designate such additional buildings as were necessary appurtenances to the main building in the manufacture of pails." Marsh v. Concord Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 898, 899, 71 N. H. 253.

A lease provided that no alteration or "addition" in and to the buildings on the leased premises themselves, or to the premises themselves, should be made without the consent of the lessors. A wooden structure was built on the surface of the soil, and not attached by screws or nails or any other way to the buildings, and which could be taken out whole or in pieces without disturbing the soil or injuring the buildings. It did not exceed 12 feet in height, and its position on the premises did not increase the fire risk or rate of insurance, and it was used as a shop and workroom. Held, that such building constituted an "addition" to the premises within the term of the lease. Whitwell v. Harris, 106 Mass. 532, 537.

Same—Increase in height.

Nix. Dig. p. 487, providing that a mechanic's lien may be had on buildings erected, and that an "addition erected to a former building" shall be a building within the meaning of the act, means that the addition must be a lateral one, and must occupy grounds without the limits of the building to which it constituted an addition, so that the lien shall be on the building formed by the addition and the land on which it stands, and the addition, therefore, must be erected alongside of and not under or on top of the former building, and does not include putting a new story on top of an old building. Urdike v. Skilman, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 131, 132.

A deed in which the grantee agreed that if he should make any "addition of building" it should not extend beyond a certain line does not restrict the right of the grantee to raise his building higher, though by so doing he interrupted the access of light and air to the windows of the grantor's house. Atkins v. Bordman, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 457, 477. 37 Am. Dec. 100.

In Act March 15, 1866, amending the charter of the city of Trenton, providing for making a fair valuation of the real estate in the city, by which the assessors shall be governed, provided that if, after such valuation, any building or "addition" shall be erected on any lot, it shall be the duty of the assessor to assess the same, "addition" means a lateral "addition," one which occupied land without the limits of the original building. Adding to its height or depth or changing any interior structure is merely an alteration, and not an addition, and hence internal improvements in the internal arrangement of a house, changing the roof from a gable to a French roof and erecting a bay window on a side thereof, are not "additions." Perrine v. Parker, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 352, 354.

City or town.

Act 1866, providing that, whenever any person or persons shall lay out an "addition" to any city or town in the state before the plat thereof shall be recorded, the lands shall be valued, etc., cannot be construed to mean an addition from territory lying without the corporate limits of the city, and that the statute does not apply in cases where the lands within the city limits are laid out and platted into lots, streets, etc. These words do not import an addition to the territorial limit or boundary of the corporation, for the territory of a city as a municipality cannot be extended by laying out and platting into lots the lands adjacent to its boundary. The "addition" here meant is such as results from the mere act of the proprietor in laying out and platting his lands into lots, streets, etc. The plat of an addition, either to a city or a town, intended by the statute, is an addition to the territory previously laid out into lots, streets, etc., and not an addition to the territory embraced within the limits of the city or town as prescribed in its charter. Mitchell

v. Franklin County Treasurer 25 Ohio St. 143, 154.

Machinery or mill.

"Additions," as used in a lease providing that the lessee should be allowed to retain, out of the first quarter's rent, money expended for repairs and "additions," and that such "additions" should remain at the expiration of the lease as the property of the lessor, refers to repairs and additions necessary to put the leased machinery in condition for operation, but did not include new and independent machinery put in the building by the lessees for the purposes of their trade. Cook v. Folsom, 2 Lanc. Law Rev. 185, 186, 2 Del. Co. R. 314, 315.

Where articles of copartnership provided that one of the partners should bear the expense of any "addition" made to a certain mill, but that the repairs should be paid for out of the profits, the word "addition" applied to a foundation placed in the mill for a new engine, it appearing that the old foundation would not have been suitable. Dunnell v. Henderson, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 174, 178.

"Additions thereto," as used in a contract of sale of a steam saw and grist mill, which provided that the purchase money should be paid in installments, and that on default of any payment the purchaser should forfeit all former payments and surrender possession of the mill, with all "additions thereto," does not include detached articles of personal property purchased to aid in the operation of the mill, such as oxen, carts, blacksmiths' tools, etc., but includes only such personal property as was in fact added to the mill. Hill v. Townsend, 69 Ala. 286, 292.

ADDITIONAL.

"Additional," as used in Act April 20, 1899 (P. L. 66), declaring it unlawful thereafter to establish or maintain any "additional" hospital in the built-up portions of cities, does not mean in addition to the total number then maintained in the whole city, but refers to new buildings not already established. Commonwealth v. Charity Hospital of Pittsburg, 47 Atl. 980, 982, 198 Pa. 270; Id., 48 Atl. 906, 907, 199 Pa. 119.

ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE.

The "additional allowance" which Code Civ. Proc. § 3372, provides may be granted to the prevailing parties in condemnation proceedings, is made by way of an indemnity to the party succeeding in the litigation. The court must fix the amount to be allowed, subject to the limitation in the statute, that the maximum amount shall not exceed 5 per cent., etc. The same will depend upon the proper deductions from the proof submitted as to the indemnity needed for actual expenses in the action, necessarily or reasonably incurred, beyond the taxable costs allowed by statute to the prevailing party. St. Lawrence & A. R. Co. v. De Camp, 23 N. Y. Supp. 544, 546.

ADDITIONAL CONSIDERATION.

An "additional consideration," sufficient to support an agreement to relinquish the residue of a debt after part payment, may consist of anything which would be a burden or inconvenience to one party or a possible benefit to the other. Chicora Fertilizer Co. v. Dunan, 46 Atl. 347, 350, 91 Md. 144, 50 L. R. A. 401.

In Laws 1897, p. 134, § 1940, providing that the question of a tax for "additional" school facilities may be submitted to the electors, "additional" means in addition to or beyond those already possessed. It would include apparatus and appliances for teaching, and teachers as well. State v. Cave, 52 Pac. 200, 203, 20 Mont. 468.

ADDITIONAL INSURANCE.

"Additional insurance," as used in an indorsement on an insurance policy that $700 "additional insurance" would be permitted, means other insurance, and insurance prior to the issuance of the policy must be included, as well as insurance subsequent thereto. Behrens v. Germania Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 719, 58 Iowa, 23.

ADDITIONAL SECURITY.

Code 1857, p. 461, art. 145, provides that a court may order "additional" security if it has reason to believe that a guardian's bond is insufficient. Held, that the term "additional" embraces the idea of joining or uniting one thing to another so as thereby to form one aggregate whole, and an "additional security" imports a security which, united with or joined to the former, is deemed to make it, as an aggregate, sufficient as a security from the beginning, and hence there is no discharge of the former surety on the giving of "additional security," but his liability continues and is supplemented by the latter; and likewise the "additional security" must be held to stand as an indemnity for a discharge of the duties of the guardianship as a whole, embracing the time before as well as after the date when he signed such security, and therefore liable for antecedent breaches of the bond. State v. Hull, 53 Miss. 626, 645, 646.

ADDITIONAL SERVITUDE.

The building of an electric street railway upon the grade of a street which does no special injury to the fee is not the imposition of a new or additional servitude upon a highway for which the owner of the fee is entitled to compensation. Birmingham Traction

Co. v. Birmingham Ry. & Electric Co., 24 South. 502, 505, 119 Ala. 137, 43 L. R. A. 233.

ADDITIONAL TIME.

An order granting appellant 60 days' "additional time" for settling his bill of exceptions must be construed to mean 60 days in addition to the time allowed by the practice. Marks v. Boone, 4 South. 532, 533, 24 Fla. 177.

ADDITIONAL WORK.

The distinction between "extra work" and "additional work" under a contract is that the former is work arising out of and entirely independent of the contract—something not required in its performance; the latter being something necessarily required in the performance of the contract, and without which it could not be carried out. Shields v. City of New York, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1020, 1021, 84 App. Div. 502.

ADDRESS.

See "Accurately Addressed."

The word "address" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "a direction for guidance as to a person's abode; hence the place at which a person resides, or the name or place of destination, with any other details necessary for the direction of a letter or package." The word is synonymous with "residence." San Diego Sav. Bank v. Goodsell, 70 Pac. 299, 302, 137 Cal. 420.

ADDUCE.

To "adduce" "means to bring forward, present, offer, or introduce," and hence, as used in the certificate to the trial court, attached to the testimony, which states that it contains all the evidence "adduced" at the trial of a cause, is not equivalent as a statement that such evidence was introduced, but shows that it includes evidence offered as well as that received. Tuttle v. Story County, 9 N. W. 292, 293, 56 Iowa, 316.

The word "adduced," as used in a bill of exceptions stating that certain affidavits contained all the evidence "adduced" for and against a motion, is broader in its signification than the word "offered," and is equivalent to the expression, "This was all the evidence given in the cause." Beatty v. O'Connor, 5 N. E. 880, 882, 106 Ind. 81.

A bill of exceptions reciting that it contains all the evidence "adduced," means that it contains all the evidence presented; citing Webster, who gives the synonyms of adduce as "offer," "present," "allege," "advance," "state," and "mention." Brown v. Griffin, 40 Ill. App. 558, 559.

ADEEMED.

The term "adeemed," as a general rule, may be applied to a legacy, if the estate in or title to the things specifically bequeathed is essentially changed. Tolman v. Tolman, 27 Atl. 184, 185, 85 Me. 317.

ADEMPTION.

Ademption is the extinction or satisfaction of a legacy by some act of the testator which is equivalent to a revocation of the bequest, or which indicates an intention to revoke. Kenaday v. Sinnott, 21 Sup. Ct. 233, 237, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. Ed. 339; Burnham v. Comfort, 15 N. E. 710, 711, 108 N. Y. 535, 2 Am. St. Rep. 462. The rule is applied where the testator is the parent of the legatee or stands in loco parentis, and the question of its application depends on the declared or presumed intention of the grantor. The rule of ademption is predicable of legacies of personal estate, but is not applicable to devises of realty. Burnham v. Comfort, 15 N. E. 710, 711, 108 N. Y. 535, 2 Am. St. Rep. 462.

Ademption is the extinction or satisfaction of a legacy by some act of the testator which is equivalent to a revocation of the bequest or indicates the intention to revoke, and the rule is applied where the testator is a parent of the legatee or stands in loco parentis. In re Turflier's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 135, 139, 1 Misc. Rep. 58, 64.

Ademption is a revocation or cancellation of a legacy by some act of the testator, although it is not necessarily an express revocation, the intent being frequently gathered by implication. Strother's Adm'r v. Mitchell's Ex'r, 80 Va. 149, 154.

"Ademption" is used to describe the act by which a testator pays to his legatee in his lifetime a general legacy which by his will he had proposed to give him at his death. Langdon v. Astor's Ex'rs, 16 N. Y. 9, 34.

"Where a parent or other person in loco parentis bequeaths a legacy to a child or grandchild, and afterward, in his lifetime, gives a portion or makes a provision for the same child or grandchild, without expressing it to be in lieu of the legacy, if the portion so received or the provision made be equal to or exceed the amount of the legacy; if it be certain, and not merely contingent; if no other distinct object be pointed out, and if it be ejusdem generis—then it will be deemed an ademption of the legacy." Clendenen v. Clymer, 17 Ind. 155, 158; Langdon v. Astor's Ex'rs, 16 N. Y. 9, 34; Trimmer v. Bayne, 7 Ves. 507, 513; Clark v. Jetton, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 229, 234. "It is founded on the presumption that a bequest by the father is intended as a portion to the child, and so of the after gift, and the presumption will be that a double portion was not intended when nothing else appears, and therefore it will be taken that the gift was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy, when it is of equal value." Clark v. Jetton, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 229, 234.

A total "ademption" by acts of a testator occurs in two cases only: (1) When he gives in his lifetime to a legatee what he had left him in his will, or (2) when before his death he so deals with the subject of the bequest as to render it impossible to effect the transfer or payment which the will directs. Connecticut Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Chase, 55 Atl. 171, 174, 75 Conn. 683.

Slight or immaterial changes in the form of the property bequeathed will not work an ademption. The general rule is that, when the chattel specifically bequeathed by a testator is sold or conveyed by him during his life, the legacy is adeemed. Harvard Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, 151 Mass. 76, 23 N. E. 1006, 7 L. R. A. 390. But the rule does not apply to general legacies. In re Frahm's Estate, 94 N. W. 444, 446, 120 Iowa, 85.

Advancement.

An advancement will not be considered an "ademption" where the devise is of real estate. Bouvier, Law Dict. The doctrine of ademption applies only to legacies. Burnham v. Comfort (N. Y.) 37 Hun, 216, 219.

Satisfaction distinguished.

Ademption is only predicable of a specific legacy, and takes place when the thing that is the subject of the legacy is taken away, so that when the testator dies, though the will purports to bestow the legacy, the thing given is not to be found to answer the bequest; and ademption does not depend on the intention of the testator. A satisfaction, on the other hand, is predicable of a general as well as a specific legacy, and it takes place when the testator in his lifetime becomes his own executor and gives to his legatee what he had intended to give by will, and unlike redemption, satisfaction is primarily a question of intention. Beck v. McGillis (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 35, 56, 57.

Although the words "ademption" and "satisfaction," and the corresponding words "adeem" and "satisfy," are frequently used by judges and text-writers as convertible terms having the same signification, yet, as Mr. Justice Harris (Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 56) has truly observed, each, in its technical application to the provisions of a will, has a distinct and appropriate meaning; ademption in its strict sense being predicable only of specific, and satisfaction of general, legacies. Langdon v. Astor's Ex'rs, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Duer) 477, 541.

Of general legacy.

When a general legacy is given of a sum of money out of the testator's general assets, without regard to any particular fund, intention is the very essence of ademption. If a testator, after having made his will containing a general bequest to a child or stranger, makes an advance, or does other acts which can be shown by express proof to have been intended by the testator as a satisfaction or discharge of or a substitute for the legacy given, it shall be deemed in law to be an ademption of the legacy. Richards v. Humphreys, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 133. Thus, where a testator in his lifetime paid a sum of money to a general legatee, and takes from him a receipt for the money in full discharge of the legacy and all rights in the testator's estate, by will or otherwise, the advancement is an ademption of the legacy. Cowles v. Cowles, 13 Atl. 414, 415, 56 Conn. 240.

Of specific legacy.

Specific legacies are said to be adeemed when in the lifetime of the testator the particular thing bequeathed is lost, destroyed, or disposed of, or it is changed in substance or form so that it does not remain, at the time the will goes into effect, in specie to pass to the legatee. Starbuck v. Starbuck, 93 N. C. 183, 185; Ford v. Ford, 23 N. H. (3 Fost.) 212, 215.

When applied to specific legacies of stock, or money, or securities for money, the term "ademption" must be considered as synonymous with the word "extinction." For it should be observed that, if stock, securities, or money so bequeathed be sold or disposed of, there is a complete extinction of the subjects, and nothing remains to which the words of the will can apply; for, if the proceeds from such sale or disposition would be substituted and permitted to pass, the effect would be to convert a specific into a general legacy. Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 1, 8.

The term "ademption" literally means "removal" or "extinction." It applies originally to specific legacies. Where a testator gives or bequeaths a specific article, such as a bale of wool or a piece of cloth, and such article does not exist at the time of his death, there is an "ademption" of the testamentary bequest. The thing bequeathed may be lost or destroyed during the lifetime of the testator, or he may have sold the same or otherwise disposed of it, or changed the form so as to destroy its identity. Hence it has been said that a legatee will have no title to a specific legacy unless the thing bequeathed remains in specie as described in the will at the testator's death. So, also, if the testator specifically bequeaths a debt which is due to him, and before his death he receives payment of the debt from the debtor, the bequest or legacy is adeemed, and this is true whether the payment is enforced by the testator or is made voluntarily by the debtor. Citing 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 632; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1131. A bequest to a son of a certain sum, payable out of the shares of a daughter's children, and providing that on such payment the son shall surrender an agreement of the daughter to pay him the amount of such legacy, is a bequest for a particular purpose, and hence is adeemed by payment by the testator, during his life, of the daughter's debt to the son. Tanton v. Keller, 47 N. E. 376, 378, 167 Ill. 129.

A specific legacy of a chattel or a particular debt or parcel of stock is held to be adeemed when the testator has collected the debt or disposed of the chattel or stock in his lifetime, whatever may have been the motive or intent of the testator in so doing. Cowles v. Cowles, 13 Atl. 414, 415, 56 Conn. 240.

"It is a well-established rule of law that when the thing which is the subject of the legacy is taken away, so that when the testator dies, though the will purports to bestow the legacy, the thing meant is not to be found to answer the bequest, ademption takes place. It has been extinguished, if a specific debt, by having been paid to the testator himself; if an article of property, by its sale or conversion. This, to quote the court in the case of Beck v. McGillis (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 35, 57, is ademption; whether or not it has taken place is a conclusion of law, and does not depend upon the intention of the testator. When the question is settled, and it is determined that the testator intended to give a specific thing and not a general legacy, then the intention of the testator has nothing further to do with the question of ademption. This is entirely a rule of law, and the rule is that the legacy is extinguished if the thing given is gone. It is true, of course, that ademption relates only to a specific legacy, but no reason suggests itself why a different rule should apply to a specific devise of real estate. So, in Philson v. Moore (N. Y.) 23 Hun, 152, 155, it is said that the law is well settled that, if a testatrix devise real estate and sell the same before the will takes effect, the proceeds of the will becomes personal, and no court can substitute the money received by testatrix for the land devised." Thus a taking of land by eminent domain before the death of testator, and after the execution of the devise of such land and the receipt of money therefor by the testator, constitutes an ademption, and the devisee is not entitled to the money received by testator for such land. Ametrando v. Downs, 70 N. Y. Supp. 833, 835, 62 App. Div. 405.

Of specific and general legacies distinguished.

The satisfaction of a general legacy depends on the intention of the testator as inferred from his acts, but the ademption of a specific legacy is effected by the extinction of the thing or fund bequeathed, and the intention that the legacy should fail is presumed. Kenaday v. Sinnott, 21 Sup. Ct. 233, 237, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. Ed. 339.

Ademption of a specific and a general legacy depends on different principles. A specific legacy of a chattel or a particular debt or parcel of stock is held to be adeemed when the testator has collected the debt or disposed of the chattel or stock in his lifetime, whatever may have been the motive or intention of the testator in doing so; but when the general legacy is given of a sum of money out of the testator's general assets, without regard to any particular fund, the intention becomes the very essence of ademption. If he pays a legacy in express terms during his lifetime, it will operate by way of ademption, although the terms "payment," "satisfaction," "release," or "discharge" were not used, since the legacy created no obligation on the testator during his lifetime, or any interest in the legatee which could become the subject of payment, release, or satisfaction. If, therefore, a testator, after having made his will containing general bequests, makes an advance or does other acts which can be shown to have been intended by the testator as a satisfaction or discharge of or a substitute for the legacy given, it shall be deemed in law to be an ademption of the legacy; and hence, if a father has given his child a legacy, and on the event of the marriage of the child or other similar occasion the father makes an advance to such child, though in a smaller amount than the legacy, it will be deemed a substitute for the provision contemplated by the will, and an ademption of the whole legacy. This is founded on the consideration that the duty of a father to make a provision for his child is one of imperfect obligation and voluntary, and that his power of disposing of his property is entire and uncontrolled, and that he is the best and sole judge both of his ability to provide for his child and of the amount which it is proper for him to appropriate. An ademption of general legacies takes effect, not from the act of the legatee in releasing the legacy or receiving satisfaction of it, but solely from the will and the act of the testator in making a payment or satisfaction or a substitute or a different act of bounty; and, if the portion subsequently given in the lifetime of the testator is less than the legacy, it operates as an ademption of the whole legacy, not because a smaller sum can constitute a payment of a larger, but because it manifests the will and intent of the testator to reduce the amount of the provision provided in his will. Cowles v. Cowles, 13 Atl. 414, 415, 56 Conn. 240.

With respect to general legacies not given as portions, the rule respecting ademption depends upon different considerations than with respect to specific legacies. The intention of the testator is immaterial in the ademption of a specific legacy, because, the subject being extinct at the death of the testator, there is nothing upon which the will can operate; but it is otherwise in regard to general legacies, which are payable out of the general personal estate; there the question whether any advancement by the testator in his lifetime to the first legatee shall be considered an ademption, or in substitution of the bounty given by the will, must depend entirely on the fact that such was the testator's intention. "A specific legacy cannot be adeemed in the lifetime of the testator, nor can a specific devise of land be adeemed by an advancement." Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 1, 8.

ADEQUATE.

"Adequate," when used as an adjective qualifying provocation, is a synonym with "legal," "lawful," and "reasonable." State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

The words "adequate" and "suitable" are not equivalent. That which is adequate must be suitable, but that which is suitable may not be adequate. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. Eastman, 20 Minn. 277, 295 (Gil. 249, 255).

ADEQUATE CARE.

Adequate care is such care as a man of ordinary prudence would himself take under similar circumstances to avoid accident. That care is proportionate to the risk to be incurred. Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co., 18 Atl. 818, 819, 8 Houst. 529.

ADEQUATE CAUSE.

"Adequate cause" in the definition of manslaughter as voluntary homicide committed under the immediate influence of sudden passion arising from an "adequate cause," but neither justified nor excused by law, is that which would commonly produce a degree of anger, rage, resentment, or terror in a person of ordinary temper sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection. Pen. Code 1895, art. 700. Gardner v. State, 48 S. W. 170, 171, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 19; Farrar v. State, 15 S. W. 719, 720, 29 Tex. App. 250; Rutherford v. State, 15 Tex. App. 236, 247; West v. State, 2 Tex. App. 460, 476; Bonner v. State, 15 S. W. 821, 822, 29 Tex. App. 223; Williams v. State, 7 Tex. App. 396, 397; Sargent v. State, 33 S. W. 364, 366, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 325; Spearman v. State, 4 S. W. 586, 587, 23 Tex. App. 224; Boyd v. State, 12 S. W. 737, 738, 28 Tex. App. 137; Stell v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 75, 76. Any condition or circumstance which is capable of creating and does create sudden passion, as anger, rage, resentment, or terror, rendering the mind incapable of cool reflection, whether accompanied by bodily pain or not. Stell v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 75, 76; Williams v. State, 15 Tex. App. 617, 623; Sargent v. State, 33 S. W. 364-366, 35 Tex.

Cr. R. 325; Hawthorne v. State, 12 S. W. 603, 604, 28 Tex. App. 212; Orman v. State, 6 S. W. 544, 545, 24 Tex. App. 495; Blanco v. State (Tex.) 57 S. W. 828, 829; Wadlington v. State, 19 Tex. App. 266, 274; Cockran v. State, 13 S. W. 651, 652, 28 Tex. App. 422. Insulting words or gestures, or an assault and battery so slight as to show no intention to inflict pain or injury, or an injury to property unaccompanied by violence, are not "adequate causes," as the term is there used. Boyett v. State, 2 Tex. App. 93, 100. But an assault and battery causing pain and bloodshed is a sufficient cause. Cochran v. State, 13 S. W. 651, 652, 28 Tex. App. 422.

"Adequate cause or sudden passion," as the phrase is used to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, means that the provocation must arise at the time of the commission of the offense, and that the passion is not the result of former provocation; that the act must be directly caused by the passion arising out of the provocation, it not being sufficient that the mind is merely agitated by passion arising from some other provocation or a provocation given by some other person than the party killed, and the passion intended must be either of the emotions of the mind known as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror, rendering it incapable of cool reflection. Boyett v. State, 2 Tex. App. 93, 100; West v. State, 2 Tex. App. 460, 476.

The following are deemed adequate causes: (1) Adultery of the person killed with the wife of the person guilty of the homicide, provided the killing occurred as soon as the facts of an illicit connection is discovered; (2) Insulting words or conduct of the person killed towards the wife of the party guilty of the homicide, provided the killing takes place immediately upon the happening of the insulting conduct; (3) any condition or circumstance which is capable of creating, and which does create, in the mind of the person guilty of the homicide, such a degree of anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror as to render it incapable of cool reflection. (Definition given in approved instruction.) Brown v. State (Tex.) 75 S. W. 33.

ADEQUATE COMPENSATION.

"Adequate compensation," as used in the Constitution of Texas, providing that no person shall be deprived of property without adequate compensation being made, means that private property shall not be taken without payment of its just value being made in money. The owner of land taken for public use is entitled to the intrinsic value of the land so taken, without reference to the profit or advantage that he may derive from the construction of the improvement for which it is taken. Buffalo Bayou, B. & C. R. Co. v. Ferlis, 26 Tex. 588, 601, 603.

ADEQUATE PROVOCATION.

"Adequate provocation" is synonymous with legal, lawful, and reasonable provocation, and is an assault or personal violence. State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

ADEQUATE REMEDY.

Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, § 16, declaring that suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States in any action where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law, is merely affirmative of the general doctrine of courts of equity, and was not intended to narrow the jurisdiction of such courts, and depends on what was a proper subject of equitable relief in the courts of equity of England, the great reservoir from which we have extracted our principles of jurisprudence; and, as there are many cases in which courts of law and equity exercise concurrent jurisdiction, the judiciary act was never intended to disturb that jurisdiction, and in such cases it must be supposed that the remedy at law is not adequate and complete for all purposes for which the plaintiff may claim relief. Bean v. Smith (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1143, 1150.

"An adequate remedy" at law, the existence of which will preclude proceedings in equity, means either the same remedy as chancery would give, or one clearly adequate against the same parties. Beardsley v. Bennett (Conn.) 1 Day, 107, 109.

"Adequate remedy at law," means a remedy vested in the complainant to which he may at all times resort at his own action, fully and freely, without let or hindrance. Wheeler v. Bedford, 7 Atl. 22, 24, 54 Conn. 244.

The term "adequate remedy at law" means a remedy which is plain and complete, and as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity. Keplinger v. Woolsey (Neb.) 93 N. W. 1008, 1009.

Adequate remedy is a remedy which is equally beneficial, speedy, and sufficient; not merely a remedy which at some time in the future will bring about a revival of judgment of the lower court complained of in certiorari proceedings, but a remedy which will bring relief to petitioner from the injurious effects of that judgment and the acts of the inferior court or tribunal. State v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 286, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787.

The rule that equity will not grant extraordinary relief, as specific performance, mandamus, and the like, where there is an "adequate remedy at law," means a specific, adequate legal remedy competent to afford relief on the very subject-matter made the foundation of the prayer for equitable relief. An applicant for mandamus to require a public officer to perform a duty imposed on him by law has not an "adequate remedy at law," unless such legal remedy will require the officer to perform in effect the specific act which the law requires him to do. Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488, 508.

An "adequate and specific remedy" which will be a bar to mandamus is a legal remedy that will afford the relief to which the party is entitled, and the existence of possible equitable remedies does not affect the jurisdiction of courts of law, and the courts have held that by a legal remedy such as will bar relief by mandamus is meant a remedy at law, as distinguished from a remedy in equity, and that the mere existence of an equitable remedy is not of itself a conclusive objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction, although it may and should influence the court in the exercise of its discretion in the particular case. The principle involved is that whenever a legal right exists the party is entitled to a legal remedy, and when there is no other legal remedy mandamus will lie. State v. Sneed, 58 S. W. 1070, 1075, 105 Tenn. 711.

An "adequate legal remedy" is one which secures absolutely and of right to the injured party relief from the wrong done; so that an act authorizing a railroad company, if it thinks that rates for freight as fixed by a board of transportation are unjust and unreasonable, to bring an action in the Supreme Court, and authorizing the Supreme Court, in the event it finds such rates unjust or unreasonable, to direct that board of transportation in its discretion to allow the railroad company to raise its rates, does not afford an adequate legal remedy, the decision of the court not being compulsory on the board. Ames v. Union Pac. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 165, 172.

Within the rule for a writ of prohibition, it will not issue where the applicant has a plain, speedy, and "adequate remedy" at law. The adequacy of a remedy is not to be tested by the convenience or inconvenience of the parties to a particular case. Thus, for instance, the mere fact that, in order to appeal from a judgment, the appeal bond required is beyond the power of an appellant to secure, does not prevent an appeal from being an adequate remedy in such case. Willman v. Dist. Court, 35 Pac. 692, 4 Idaho, 11.

The term "adequate remedy," as used in Const. La. art. 11, providing that every person, for injury done him in his rights, lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have an "adequate remedy" by due process of law, "means complete satisfaction of the judgment without restriction. This remedy is distinct from due process, as it is to be by due process. The process will vary with the nature of the remedy and the character of the debtor." "The plaintiff is not only entitled to due process, but, in addition thereto, he is guaranteed a remedy entirely adequate." United States v. City of New Orleans (U. S.) 17 Fed. 483, 491.

An "adequate remedy" which will prevent the issue of a writ of certiorari is a remedy which is equally beneficial, speedy, and sufficient; not merely a remedy which at some time in the future will bring a revival of the judgment of the lower court complained of in the certiorari proceedings, but a remedy which will promptly relieve the petitioner from the injurious effects of that judgment and the acts of the inferior court or tribunal. State v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 286, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787.

The expression "adequate, complete, prompt or efficient remedy," as used in Laws 1899, c. 5, conferring upon the circuit court jurisdiction pertaining to the settlement of estates of deceased persons in cases where the county court cannot afford a remedy as adequate, complete, prompt, or efficient as the circuit court, was manifestly intended to put prior judicial rules on the subject into statute law, and furnish a definite legislative guide in the administration of justice. In doing so the broadest possible view, so to speak, of the effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court was taken. The judgment of the circuit court on the question of the propriety of its taking jurisdiction of any such controversy would not be disturbed unless manifestly wrong. Mere economy of time alone is not sufficient to warrant the circuit court to take jurisdiction of controversies which are within the jurisdiction of the county court, but such element, with circumstances rendering speedy settlement of the controversies of more than ordinary importance, is sufficient. Becker v. Chester, 91 N. W. 87, 92, 115 Wis. 90.

ADEQUATE SECURITY.

Code, §§ 2637, 2638, providing that letters testamentary shall not be granted, unless on the filing of a sufficient bond, to any person named as executor whose circumstances are such that they do not afford adequate security for the due administration of the estate, was construed "only to authorize the refusing of letters whenever, under all the circumstances of the case, the surrogate should be of the opinion that such a course was proper for the protection of the rights and interests of the beneficiaries under the will. The statute was by no means designed to restrict a person named as executor from acting as such, even without a bond, simply because the testator was a richer man than himself. Thrift, integrity, good repute, business capacity, and stability of character, for instance, are circumstances which may be properly considered in determining the question of adequate security." Martin v. Duke (N. Y.) 5 Redf. Sur. 597, 600.

Adequate security, and circumstances mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 2638, to be considered by the surrogate in issuing letters testamentary, do not relate primarily or exclusively to the pecuniary responsibility of the executor, but to his moral qualification. The question presented to the court is: Is it safe to put this estate in the hands of the person named as executor. Can he be trusted to administer it faithfully and honestly, as directed by the will? In re Wischmann, 80 N. Y. Supp. 789, 791, 80 App. Div. 520.

ADEQUATELY.

An instruction, in a personal injury case, stating that defendant owed the duty of keeping certain machinery in an "adequately safe" condition for use, means, simply, kept sufficiently safe for the particular purpose. Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Mason, 109 Pa. 296, 299, 58 Am. Rep. 722.

ADHERE.

"Adhere," as used in Const. art. 3, § 3, making it treason to levy war against the United States or to adhere to its enemies, construed to "include every act which, with regard to a domestic rebellion, would constitute a levying of war." United States v. Great-house (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 18, 21.

Adhering to the King's enemies must of necessity be against the King, and therefore if an Englishman assist the French, being at war with them, and fight against the King of Spain, who is an ally of the King of England, this is treason, as adhering to the King's enemies against the King. Cruising is a sufficient overt act of adhering, as if Englishmen would list themselves and march. This is sufficient without going to battle. In re Vaughan, 2 Salk. 634, 635.

ADIT.

Gen. Laws, p. 630, in reference to mines, and providing that an "adit" of at least 10 feet in and along the lode from the point where the lode may be in any manner discovered shall hold such lode the same as if a discovery shaft had been sunk, means a horizontal excavation in and along the lode, and refers to mining lodes so situated that they can be reached by means of horizontal excavations. Electro Magnetic M. & D. Co. v. Van Auken, 11 Pac. 80-82, 9 Colo. 204.

The term "adit" in Gen. Laws, p. 630, means the entrance and passage to the opening by which the mine is entered or by which water and ores are carried away, and, whether it extends to a depth of 10 feet or not, is equivalent to a discovery shaft. Gray v. Truby, 6 Colo. 278, 280.

ADJACENT.

The word "adjacent" is defined by Webster and other lexicographers to mean "to lie near"; "close, or contiguous." It is sometimes said to be synonymous with "adjoining," "near," "contiguous." In some decisions court have held it to mean "in the neighborhood or vicinity of"; in others "adjoining or contiguous to." People v. Keechler, 62 N. E. 525, 527, 194 Ill. 235.

The word "adjacent," even in its strictest sense, means no more than lying near, close or contiguous, but not actually touching. There are degrees of nearness, and, when you want to express the idea that a thing is immediately adjacent, you have to say so. Hanifen v. Armitage (U. S.) 117 Fed. 845, 851.

"Adjacent," as used in an insurance policy permitting the keeping of gasoline in certain quantities on premises "adjacent" to the property insured, means near, close, in proximity, and applies to the gasoline and its relation to the building insured. Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Stoddard, 73 N. W. 291, 292, 52 Neb. 745.

The words "south of and adjacent to the right of way" of the M. railroad, in a petition for the location of a public highway, to designate the starting point thereof, are too indefinite to answer such purpose, and the petition is therefore insufficient. The words "adjacent to" are relative, and have different meanings under different circumstances. McDonald v. Wilson, 59 Ind. 54, 55.

The terms "abutting or adjacent property" and "property butting on," as used in the chapter relating to cities under special charters, shall be held to include the easement and right of way of any railroad company located along any street, or on lands abutting on or adjacent thereto, in all cases where no property of any person, firm, or corporation, except a municipal corporation, intervenes between such easement or right of way and the traveled portion of such street or highway. Code Iowa 1897, § 968.

The charter of the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company authorized it to construct a cable road from Court street through Montague street to Wall Street Ferry, and to erect necessary power and car houses in streets adjacent to Montague street west of the hill, in locations to be approved by the commissioner of city works. The conformation of the ground was such that the grant was valueless unless the company should be permitted to erect its power house in one of the streets parallel to and in the vicinity of Montague street. Held, there being no streets touching Montague street west of the crest of the hill, that the word "adjacent," so used, must be construed to mean the neighboring parallel streets.

Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 18 N. Y. Supp. 876, 877.

"Adjacent," as used in a statute providing for a petition for a ditch by "adjacent" owners, properly includes lands over which the ditch passes, as well as those lying near to the ditch. Kent v. Perkins, 38 Ohio St. 639, 641.

As abutting or contiguous.

"Adjacent" does not at all times mean "adjoining" or "abutting," but it is many times so used, and the purposes of its use are to be known from the context. Synonyms of the word are "abutting," "adjoining," "attached," "beside," "bordering," "close," "contingent," "neighboring," "next," and "nigh." When used in Code 1893, tit. 10, c. 2, requiring a petition for the construction of a drain to be signed by a majority of persons owning land adjoining it, such improvement will not be held to mean owners of land not abutting on the improvement. Wormley v. Wright County Sup'rs, 78 N. W. 824, 825, 108 Iowa, 232.

In a statute providing that the amount and cost of work done "adjacent" to certain lots shall be assessed against them, the word "adjacent" has reference to the work done on a street within a certain length, which is to be levied as a tax upon the abutting property. Clapton v. Taylor, 49 Mo. App. 117, 125.

"Adjacent," as used in Act 1832, declaring that the owners of all the lots "adjacent to and fronting a part of the street open under the provisions of this law should be assessed for the respective portion of benefit derived from the improvement," etc., is synonymous with the word "contiguous." Municipality No. 2 v. White, 9 La. Ann. 446, 448.

"Adjacent," as used in an ordinance locating the line of a railroad immediately adjacent to and parallel with an alley between certain streets, means lying near, or close to but not actually touching, and, when qualified by the adverb "immediately," it means the same as "contiguous" or "touching" the whole of one side. It is a contradiction in terms to say that a right of way on both sides of a given line, and located over and above it, and which includes the line and touches it upon both sides, is "adjacent" to such line, and hence the ordinance did not entitle the railway to condemn 25 feet on one side of the alley and 6 feet on the other side. Tudor v. Chicago & S. S. R. T. R. Co. (Ill.) 27 N. E. 915, 917.

As adjoining.

"Adjacent," in penal statutes, has sometimes been construed very properly as meaning "near by though not adjoining," but, in the statute requiring that a change of venue should be made to an "adjacent" county, the word evidently means "adjoining." Miller v. Cabell, 81 Ky. 178, 184.

"Adjacent," as used in a statute authorizing the boards of trustees of townships in which the school district or school districts affected lie to organize a new school district out of territory belonging to two or more districts "adjacent to each other," means so united or bound together as to form a compact district. It does not require that the districts affected adjoin each other. People v. Keechler, 62 N. E. 525, 528, 194 Ill. 235.

"Adjacent," as used in a statute providing for the annexation to a borough of adjacent land, if it means that each and all of the several lots or other particular tracts of land proposed to be annexed must adjoin the borough, would limit the intent of the Legislature unreasonably, and the annexation of lots contiguous to each other, but not all contiguous to the borough, would have to be accomplished by a series of proceedings which would lead to confusion and delay. The word must be used in its primary and obvious meaning as "adjoining" or "contiguous," as it cannot be conceived that the Legislature would annex to a borough a section of land or village wholly severed by the intervening land of a township, so as to establish two entirely separate villages in one municipality. In re Sadler, 142 Pa. 511, 517, 21 Atl. 978.

Adjoining distinguished.

Adjoining, synonymous, see "Adjoining."

The word "adjacent" is not inconsistent with the idea of something intervening. The word "adjoining" implies a closer relation, its primary meaning, to "lie next to," "to be in contact with," excluding the idea of any intervening space. Yard v. Ocean Beach Ass'n, 24 Atl. 729, 731, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 306; Peeverly v. People, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 59, 69.

As used in charter providing for improvement of city streets and permitting an assessment against abutting and "adjacent" property, "adjacent" signifies lying near, close to, or contiguous, but not actually touching, and the distinction between "adjacent" and "adjoining" is that the former implies that the two bodies are not widely separated, though they may not actually touch, while "adjoining" indicates that they are so joined or united that no third body intervenes. Hennessy v. Douglas County, 74 N. W. 983, 985, 99 Wis. 129 (citing Massing v. Ames, 37 Wis. 651, 652).

As bordering on river.

Act April 10, 1850, § 13a, prohibiting a grant of lands under water in a certain river to "any person other than the proprietor of the adjacent land," restricts "the grant to the owners of the land bordering upon or adjoining the water covering the subject of the proposed patent." The interpretations given to the word "adjacent" by Walker are "lying close," "bordering upon something," and hence the owner of land coming to a point on the river "has no extent adjacent to the water, according to the principle applicable to such cases." The owners "cannot be entitled to a patent for anything but a perpendicular line into the river." People v. Schermerhorn (N. Y.) 19 Barb. 540, 556.

"Adjacent owners," as used in a statute authorizing a purchase of land under water by adjacent owners, construed to mean "persons whose lands were bounded by the river." City of New York v. Hart (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 380, 388.

As in neighborhood of.

"Adjacent," as used in a grant, does not mean adjoining, but signifies convenient, near to, or in the neighborhood. Henderson v. Long (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1084.

"Adjacent" does not mean adjoining, but in the neighborhood of, or convenient, or near to the place specified, and a grant of land adjacent to the military boundary line of North Carolina will sustain a survey from 10 to 15 miles distant. Henderson's Lessee v. Long, 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 128, 129, 11 Fed. Cas. 1084.

"Adjacent," as used in Laws 1886, c. 642, authorizing a street railway company to construct a cable road from C. street through M. street to W. street, and to erect necessary power houses in streets "adjacent" to M. street, west of the hill, must be construed to mean "neighboring" streets, or those near to M. street, west of the hill, where there are no streets touching the road to M. street at any point west of the hill. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 18 N. Y. Supp. 876, 877.

Laws 1885, c. 145, declares that any district sections, or parts of sections, which have been platted into lots and blocks, also the lands "adjacent" thereto, said territory containing a resident population of not less than 175, may become incorporated as a village. Held, that by the term "lands adjacent thereto," was meant only those lands lying so near and in such close proximity to the platted portion of the city as to be suburban in their character, and to have some unity of interest with the platted portion in the maintenance of a village government. It was never designed that remote territory having no natural connection with the village, and no adaptability to village purposes, should be included. State v. Village of Minnetonka, 59 N. W. 972, 974, 57 Minn. 526, 25 L. R. A. 755.

Laws 1886, c. 63, § 1, authorizing the consolidation of two cities lying "adjacent" to each other, construed not to require that the cities should actually join each other at the time of the consolidation. "It is enough if they were 'adjacent,' and that term has been defined by Webster as 'lying near to, but not actually touching.'" State v. Kansas City, 31 Pac. 1100, 1103, 50 Kan. 508.

"Adjacent" means lying close or near to, and where a turnpike act provides that if any person shall turn off or pass the gates on ground "adjacent thereto," etc., if he turns off at a place little more than one half a mile from the gate it is turning off on ground adjacent to the gate, within the meaning of the act. Carrier v. Schoharie Turnpike Road (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 56, 57.

Laws 1871, vol. 1, p. 328, rendering a railroad company liable only to "adjacent occupants or proprietors" for losses to stock resulting from failure to fence its right of way, does not include the owner of property situate a quarter of a mile from the railroad. Continental Imp. Co. v. Phelps, 11 N. W. 167, 168, 47 Mich. 299.

As the next antecedent.

"Adjacent," in the ordinary construction, and where nothing in the context suggests a different one, applies to the next antecedent. Regina v. Brown, 17 Q. B. 833, 839.

To railroad in grants of timber.

"Adjacent," as used in Act March 3, 1875, c. 152, § 1, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], authorizing railroad companies to take materials for the construction of its road from lands adjacent to its right of way, construed not to include any land save such as by "its proximity to the line of the road" is directly and materially benefited by its construction. United States v. Chaplin (U. S.) 31 Fed. 890, 896.

"Adjacent," as used in 13 Stat. 365, granting to a certain railroad the right to take timber, etc., from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, construed not to be limited to land contiguous to or adjoining the line of its railroad. United States v. Lynde (U. S.) 47 Fed. 297, 300; United States v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 29 Alb. Law J. 24. The word sometimes has a meaning given it which is synonymous with the word "adjoining," but it is often applied in a more extended sense, as in the vicinity or the neighborhood of. Congress having selected from several synonymous words the one having, as applied to the subject in the section in which it is used, the broadest meaning and most extended signification, must be held to have intended the broadest rather than the most restricted signification to be given to it in the interpretation of said section, and therefore to hold that this section restricted the defendant to lands adjoining or contiguous to the line of the road would be contrary to all rules of interpretation, while, if we apply the usual rules, we must hold at its rights or extended by this section, be on lands adjoining or contiguous to this line of road to lands anywhere in the vicinity or neighborhood of its said line, though large tracts of land intervene. United States v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 29 Alb. Law J. 24.

"Adjacent," as used in act of Congress granting the right to the railroad company to take from public lands "adjacent" thereto stones, earth, and water required for the construction of the railway, will not be held to include lands beyond the tier of townships lying on either side of the townships through which the railroad runs. United States v. Bachelder, 48 P. 310, 311, 9 N. M. 15 (reversed in Bachelder v. United States [U. S.] 33 Fed. 986, 987, 28 C. C. A. 246, holding that "adjacent" does not confine the privilege to particular townships or sections lying along the right of way, but that the proper test as to whether the timber is taken from public lands adjacent to the line is whether the timber is within reasonable hauling distance by wagons).

The phrase, "adjacent lands," in Act June 8, 1872, c. 354 (17 Stat. 339), which granted to the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company the right to take timber, etc., from public lands adjacent to its right of way, means lands on which the timber, etc., was within reasonable hauling distance by wagon. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 156, 160, 59 C. C. A. 579.

"Adjacent," as used in Act March 3, 1875, c. 152, § 1, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], means "contiguous" or "adjoining," and does not refer to the government subdivisions lying next to the right of way, and confers the right to take timber only from such lands as may be reached by ordinary transportation by wagons, and not otherwise. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 886-888.

Lands lying within three miles of the track of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company are "adjacent" lands within the meaning of Act Cong. June 8, 1872, 17 Stat. 339, and March 3, 1877, 19 Stat. 405, allowing the railroad to use timber on adjacent lands. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (N. M.) 66 Pac. 550, 551.

Act March 3, 1875, c. 152, § 1, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], granting to railroad companies the right to take from the public lands "adjacent" to the line of the road timber necessary for its construction, does not authorize the taking of timber 50 miles distant from the road. Stone v. United States (U. S.) 64 Fed. 667, 673, 12 C. C. A.

451; Id., 17 Sup. Ct. 778, 783, 167 U. S. 178, 42 L. Ed. 127.

The grant in the Act March 3, 1875, c. 152, § 1, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], of a right to take timber adjacent to the right of way of a railroad company, implies no limitation as to the place of use, so that the company may transport timber thus taken for use on any part of its road, however remote. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co., 14 Sup. Ct. 11, 14, 150 U. S. 1, 37 L. Ed. 975.

ADJACENT PREMISES.

"Adjacent premises," as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 43, § 2, providing that whoever, not having a license to keep a dramshop, shall sell any intoxicating liquor in any quantity to be drank upon the premises, or in or upon any "adjacent premises," shall be punished, etc., must be construed to include a street or alley adjoining the place where sold. Bandalow v. People, 90 Ill. 218, 220.

ADJOINING.

Additions adjoining and communicating, see "Addition."

"Adjoining," as used in a written agreement in which defendant agreed to sell plaintiff one-half acre of land "adjoining" K.'s lot on the east, and running due east, does not necessarily imply that the western line of defendant's lot would extend along the whole length of K.'s lot, but would be equally well satisfied if the western line of land intended to be conveyed extended only a part way on K.'s lot, and the description was fatally defective, as it did not fix the base line. Sherer v. Trowbridge, 135 Mass. 500, 502.

In considering the question as to whether two pieces of property situated about one mile from each other can be considered as in the vicinity or neighborhood of each other, or as constituting adjoining premises, within the meaning of the rule that the keeping of gunpowder upon private premises may be a nuisance when, in case of explosion, it would be liable to injure persons or property of those residing in the vicinity, neighborhood, or upon adjoining premises, the court says that where property is injured directly and without any intervening cause by the force of an explosion it is legally within the neighborhood or vicinity of the scene of the explosion, and that "adjoining premises" may in contemplation of law, be defined in the same way. St. Mary's Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Bradford Glycerine Co. (Ohio) 7 O. C. D. 582, 585.

Const. art. 19, § 27, provides that nothing in the Constitution shall be construed to prohibit the General Assembly from authorizing assessments on land for local improvements in towns and cities, "to be based upon the consent of a majority in value of the property holders owning property adjoining the locality to be affected." Held, that "property adjoining the locality to be affected" is any property adjoining or near the improvements which is physically affected, or the value of which is commercially affected directly by the improvement to a degree in excess of the effect on the property in the town or city generally. Little Rock v. Katzenstein, 12 S. W. 198, 199, 52 Ark. 107.

As adjacent.

Adjacent distinguished, see "Adjacent."

In Laws 1893, c. 73, art. 7, § 2, providing that territory outside of limits of any city or town "adjoining" thereto may be attached to such city or town for school purposes on application by a majority of the electors of such adjacent territory, "adjoining," being used in connection with the word "adjacent," will be held to be used with the same meaning, and as so used will be territory contiguous to, though not necessarily actually touching, the limits of such city. School Dist. No. 74 v. Long, 37 P. 601, 603, 2 Okl. 460 (citing Territory v. Clark [Okl.] 35 Pac. 882).

"Adjoining" means close to or near to; contiguous. The term may be of the same meaning as "adjacent," conveying the idea merely of nearness, and not of immediate proximity. In Matthews v. Kimball, 66 S. W. 651, 653, 70 Ark. 451, the Supreme Court of Arkansas construed the provisions of Const. art. 19, § 27, authorizing special assessments for local improvements in cities and towns under such regulations as may be prescribed by law, to be based upon the consent of the majority in value of the property holders owning property "adjoining" the locality to be affected, and holds that the use of the term "adjoining" does not limit the power of the municipality to make a special assessment for park purposes to the property which actually touches park grounds. Matthews v. Kimball, 66 S. W. 651, 653, 70 Ark. 451.

As along.

"Adjoining," as used in Wag. St. p. 310, § 43, requiring every railroad to maintain good and substantial fences on the sides of the road where the same passes through, along, or "adjoining" inclosed or cultivated fields or uninclosed prairie lands, making them liable for damages caused by failure to maintain such fences, is synonymous with the word "along," which is manifest from the immediate context, and from the use of the word "along," in the same connection, in a subsequent part of the same section, without the word "adjoining"; both words as used imply contiguity, or contact. Walton v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 67 Mo. 56, 58.

As appertaining or belonging.

A deed conveyed certain land, and the "lands adjoining," which were composed of an island in a stream, and separated from the first lands by the main channel. It was held that the expression "lands adjoining" was equivalent to the expression "and all lands thereto appertaining." The words "adjoining" and "appertaining" are not synonymous as descriptive words in a deed. "Adjoin" usually imports contiguity; "appertaining," use, occupancy. One thing may appertain to another without adjoining or touching it. Proof that a piece of land adjoined would not be proof that one appertained to the other. Neither in literal meaning nor as used in deeds are they equivalent. Under the rules of construction applicable to deeds in an action of trespass, the term "lands adjoining" was not to make the grant extend beyond the medium flum of the main channel of the river. The term cannot be construed literally, as there is no limit to "adjoining" land. Miller v. Mann, 55 Vt. 475, 478.

Gen. St. c. 178, § 46, prescribing a punishment for a person in a house of correction who should escape from said house or the inclosed yard and work shops "adjoining," includes the inclosed yard belonging to the house of correction, which was situated across the street and cultivated by the convicts as a garden, and it is not required that the yard shall be immediately connected with the house itself, for if it is a place entirely devoted to the purposes of the house, and sufficiently secure and suitably protected from all persons without, it is "adjoining," within the meaning of the statute. Commonwealth v. Curley, 101 Mass. 24, 25.

As contiguous or touching.

"Adjoining," as used in a will devising all testator's messuage or dwelling house and premises, with a piece of land thereto "adjoining," means contiguous. Josh v. Josh, 5 O. B. (N. S.) 454, 465.

In Act March 6, 1877, authorizing railroad corporations to condemn lands "adjoining" their right of way, "adjoining" means touching or in contact with, and cannot be construed to mean near, and the lands condemned as adjoining the right of way must be contiguous to the right of way. Akers v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 110, 112.

"Adjoining," as used in a conveyance describing property as "adjoining" the ocean, construed as meaning that the property conveyed is in actual contact with the ocean. Yard v. Ocean Beach Ass'n, 24 Atl. 729, 731, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 306.

Within the description of a deed providing that a line shall run due west a given distance "adjoining to Egg Harbor Inlet," "adjoining" means touching. McCullough v Absecom Breach Land & Improvement Co., 21 Atl. 481, 488, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 170, 187.

Two localities that are at every point separated from each other by the interposition of a third would not, commonly or aptly, be described as "adjoining." Village of South Orange v. Whittingham, 35 Atl. 407, 408, 58 N. J. Law (29 Vroom) 655.

"Adjoining," as used in a fire insurance policy on a frame mill building and all additions thereto "adjoining" and communicating, appropriately describes an addition built onto the main building. Marsh v. New Hampshire Fire Ins. Co., 49 Atl. 88, 70 N. H. 590.

"The literal meaning of the word 'adjoining,' when used in a contract or statute, does not exclude all other evidence of intention and of the subject-matter involved. If it is apparent it was used in its literal and restricted sense, or if there is no evidence indicating its use in a different sense, the court would not be justified in giving it some other or more comprehensive meaning. In a criminal statute, the meaning of 'adjoining' may properly be determined by the legislative purpose requiring a strict construction, such as was applied in State v. Downs, 59 N. H. 320. See, also, Rex v. Hodges, Moody & M. 341. But when it is apparent from the context that its literal meaning would defeat the intended purpose it must be assumed that the word was used in a different sense. Moore v. Phoenix Fire Ins. Co., 6 Atl. 27, 64 N. H. 140, 10 Am. St. Rep. 384; Shaw v. McGregory, 105 Mass. 96, 100." Thus buildings within a few feet of and next to a mill building, and used in common with it, are "additions adjoining," within the terms of an insurance policy. Marsh v. Concord Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 898, 899, 71 N. H. 253.

"Adjoining," as used in a statute punishing any person for setting fire to a building "adjoining" a dwelling house, is a synonym for adjacent to or contiguous; and where an outbuilding to which the defendant set fire did not touch the dwelling house, but was separated from it at the base by four inches, and at the top by about three feet, it was not adjacent or contiguous to the dwelling house, within the meaning of the statute. State v. Downs, 59 N. H. 320, 321.

So, in Peverelly v. People, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 59, 70, a warehouse not in contact with an inhabited dwelling but four or five feet distant, was held not to be adjoining such dwelling.

Curtilage or messuage synonymous.

St. 1804, c. 143, making it a felony to break or enter any shop or office not "adjoining to or occupied with a dwelling house," in the nighttime, and steal therein, includes all shops and outhouses not so "adjoining to and occupied" as to be taken as a part of any mansion or dwelling house. Devoe v. Commonwealth, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 316, 327.

A deed conveyed a hotel "and land adjoining it, being two or three acres, more or less." Held, that the words "lands adjoining" are not synonymous with "messuage or curtilage," and, even if they were synonymous, would not convey an island located in a river back of the land on which the hotel stood. Miller v. Mann, 55 Vt. 475, 479.

In a statute making it burglary to break into and enter any building "adjoining to or occupied with a dwelling house" means "something more than adjoining or contiguous"; the phrase refers to the common-law definition of burglary, and means "a breaking into out houses within the same inclosure adjoining to the dwelling and occupied as part thereof." People v. McGra, 1 Mich. N. P. 27, 29.

As fronting.

"Adjoining," as used in City Charter, Sp. Laws 1875, c. 6, § 3, subd. 8, authorizing the assessment of lots "adjoining" sidewalks built by the city, construed to mean contiguous thereto or fronting thereon; and hence the charter is not in conflict with the constitution providing for assessment of lands fronting on sidewalks. Scott County v. Hinds, 52 N. W. 523, 524, 50 Minn. 204.

Laws 1868, c. 844, § 3, authorizing the widening of a street in Brooklyn, and directing the expenses of the improvement to be assessed on "adjoining property," does not authorize an assessment on the property which fronted on another street, and which was separated from the avenue in question by the land of others, but the assessment must be limited by property which adjoins the avenue, since the word "adjoin" in its etymological sense means touching or contiguous, as distinguished from lying near or adjacent, and the same meaning must be given it when used in statutes. In re Ward, 52 N. Y. 395, 397.

As near or next to.

"Adjoining" may mean, as used in charters or statutes, near to or next to. Truax v. Pool, 46 Iowa, 256, 258.

In common parlance "adjoining" is sometimes used for near; and whether it was so used in a deed is a question for the jury, where one description in the deed mentions the property as adjoining a certain lot, and another gives a different description. Massey v. Belisle, 24 N. C. 170, 182.

Separation by right of way or street.

Buildings are adjoining so as to be subject to a mechanic's lien, even though they are divided by a private way. Lehmer v. Horton (Neb.) 93 N. W. 964, 966 (citing Fitzpatrick v. Allen, 80 Pa. [30 P. F. Smith] 292).

The charter of a dock company, authorizing it to purchase and hold any lands "adjoining" or near certain tracts of land which the corporation was authorized by its charter to improve, does not authorize the dock company to purchase and hold land which was separated from the land mentioned in the charter by a strip belonging to a railway company, and which was essential to the use of such company for railway purposes. American Dock & Improvement Co. v. Trustees for Support of Public Schools, 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 409, 435.

"Adjoining property," as used in St. 1887, c. 348, providing that a fence of certain dimensions, erected or maintained to annoy the owners of "adjoining property," shall be deemed a private nuisance, etc., means properties where such fence would be a boundary fence between the two tracts of ground, and does not embrace properties between which is a street which separates the tracts. Spaulding v. Smith, 39 N. E. 189, 162 Mass. 543.

ADJOINING COUNTY.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 80, § 23, authorizing an application for a writ of habeas corpus in certain cases to be made to some officer having authority, residing "in any adjoining county," authorizes an application for the writ in the nearest or most accessible county, though it may not be actually adjoining. Were the rule otherwise, under the conditions named in the statute, the applicant, in case there was no one capable of acting in the counties actually adjoining, would either fail to get the writ, or be at liberty to go from his own county to the remotest county, passing over all the intervening courts and judges. In re Doll, 50 N. W. 607, 608, 47 Minn. 518.

ADJOINING STATES.

"Adjoin" means "to lie or be next in contact; to be contiguous"; so that Code Civ. Proc. § 948, providing that a transcript of a judgment of a justice of the peace in an "adjoining" state may be received in evidence in New York, authorizes only those of contiguous states, and will not be applicable to Ohio. Bent v. Glaenger, 40 N. Y. Supp. 657, 658, 17 Misc. Rep. 569, 570.

The definition of the word "adjoining" is to lie or be next to or in contact. Webst. Dict.; Crabbe, Eng. Synonyms; Fernald, Eng. Synonyms. The state of Washington is not "adjoining" to Alaska, within the meaning of that word as used in Rev. St. §§ 601, 637 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 484, 519], providing for the transfer by a district court of a cause in which the judge is interested to the next circuit court for the district; and if there be no circuit court therein, to the next circuit court in the state; and if there be no circuit court in the state, to the next circuit court in an "adjoining" state. Lewis v. Johnson (U. S.) 90 Fed. 673, 674.

ADJOINING TOWNS.

"Adjoining," as used in a statute giving jurisdiction to a justice of the peace to try an action either in the county where the plaintiff resided or before some justice of another town in the same county next "adjoining," should be construed to mean that where the corners of four towns met at one point the diagonal towns adjoined each other at the corner. Holmes v. Carley, 31 N. Y. 289 (cited in Eldert v. Long Island Electric R. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 186, 188, 28 App. Div. 451).

The words "adjoining towns," as used in the section, relating to the organization of town insurance companies by persons residing in adjoining towns, shall be held to mean not only the towns immediately adjoining the town in which the business office of the corporation is located, but the towns which adjoin these also contiguously, or at their corners. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 3231.

ADJOURN—ADJOURNMENT.

The word "adjourn" means precisely the same thing as to postpone, or put off, or delay. Bispham v. Tucker, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 253, 254 (citing Ormsby County v. State, 6 Nev. 283, 287).

In its primary signification "adjourn" means to put off and defer to another day specified; but it has also acquired the meaning of suspending business for a time, defer, delay, and, when used in reference to a sale under a judgment and foreclosure or any judicial proceeding, it properly includes the fixing of the time to which the postponement was made, and the failure to specify at the time of the adjournment the day to which the postponement of the sale was made would invalidate the sale on the day postponed, unless the postponement was necessitated by the wrongful interference of the defendant. La Farge v. Van Wagenen (N. Y.) 14 How. Prac. 54, 58.

An "adjournment" is not more than a continuance of the session from one day to another, as the word signifies. Commissioners before whom a petition to divide a borough into wards is tried need not give notice of an adjourned meeting when the adjournment is public and a matter of convenience, of which all the parties must take notice. In re Division of Lansford Borough, 21 Atl. 503, 504, 141 Pa. 134.

A town meeting adopted a resolution to adjourn to another house in the town, to which the officers and electors proceeded, and continued the business of the meeting. On contesting the validity of such proceedings it was insisted that there can be no adjournment of a town meeting, or of the meeting of any other assembly or body, from one hour to another in the same day. In answering this objection the court said: "It cannot be very material whether the formal suspension of or putting off the business of the town meeting for a sufficient length of time to enable the presiding officers to go to the place selected was an 'adjournment' or a 'recess,' or whether it was called in the motion made and carried either the one or the other." An "adjournment" is defined as the putting off until another time or place. People v. Martin, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 22, 28.

Of court.

The definition is given in Bouvier as "to put off, to dismiss till an appointed day, or without any such appointment." If an adjournment is had without fixing any time for the subsequent convening of the court, the law determines the time to be at the beginning of the next term. No person can be held to have notice of the convening of a term of court unless such notice is given by law or by order of the court. To control the time at which his court shall convene the judge must at each adjournment specify a time certain as the date when his court will again meet, or lose the power to hold any further sessions until the time as fixed by law. Irwin v. Irwin, 37 Pac. 548, 551, 2 Okl. 180.

"Webster says that the word 'adjourn,' both in England and this country, is applied to all cases in which public bodies separate for a brief period with a view to meet again. As applied to a justice's court, it signifies, we think, not only that the justice ceases to exercise his functions in the particular case for the time being, but that he and the parties, witnesses, jurors, and officers in attendance separate from the place of trial, so that there remains no court at such place." French v. Ferguson, 45 N. W. 817, 818, 77 Wis. 121.

The word "adjourn," as used in statute providing that justices of the peace before whom a suit is instituted may, to prevent fraud or surprise or on reasonable cause, adjourn the trial to any time not exceeding 15 days on return of the summons, is used in the same sense as the word "postpone," and means that the justice may "delay" or "put off" the trial for any time not exceeding 15 days. Bispham v. Tucker, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 253, 254.

An adjournment is an act, not a declaration. In the proper order of procedure the announcement of the crier of the court precedes, and does not follow, adjournment. It is but a proclamation to those in attendance of the time to which the court intends to adjourn, and gives notice of the formal act of adjournment. But adjournment is the act of separation and departure, and until this had fairly taken place the act is incomplete. Just as the crier had finished announcing the adjournment, and the judges had risen to their feet, but were still on the bench, the counsel being present, the jury returned with their verdict, which was received by the court. Held, that the receipt of the verdict, whether objected to or not, was good, and the order to adjourn might be recalled. Person v. Neigh, 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 199, 200.

There is an obvious distinction between the "adjournment" of the court on the first day or any subsequent day of the term and the adjournment of the term, in advance of the appointed time, to another day. In the first place the term has already commenced, and the effect of the adjournment is a prolongation of the term; in the latter case, the term being postponed by adjournment before it commenced, the return day thereof is also adjourned, and it dates its beginning from the time to which it is adjourned. So a transcript of a record required to be filed in the appellate court on or before the first day of the term, where the term was adjourned before such day to a subsequent day, was properly filed on the adjourned day. Wilson v. Lott, 5 Fla. 302, 304.

The term "within thirty days from the adjournment of the court," as used in Civ. Code, § 5539, providing that the bill of exceptions shall be tendered to the presiding judge within that time, manifestly means from the final adjournment of the term during which the case was tried. Loud v. Pritchett, 30 S. E. 870, 871, 104 Ga. 648.

Same—Recess.

In Code Cr. Proc. § 415, providing that the jury must at each adjournment of the court be admonished, "adjournment" means an adjournment from day to day or for a longer time, and not a recess taken during a single day's session. An "adjournment," says Blackstone, is no more than a continuance of the session from one day to another, as the word itself signifies; and hence taking a recess for dinner was not an adjournment requiring an admonition to the jury. Peoper v. Draper, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 138, 141.

The term "adjournment," as used in Rev. St. § 3574, subd. 5, requiring a justice of the peace to enter every adjournment in his docket, cannot be construed to include a recess occurring during a trial of a cause. French v. Ferguson, 45 N. W. 817, 818, 77 Wis. 121.

Of legislature.

Const. art. 3, § 22, declares that if a bill or joint resolution shall not be returned by the governor in 3 days after presentation to him (Sundays excepted) it shall have the same force and effect as if he had signed it unless the General Assembly by their ad-jourment prevents its return. Held, that the word "adjournment," as used in such article, meant an adjournment by the concurrent action of both houses of the General Assembly. Corwin v. Comptroller General, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 390, 394.

"Adjournment," as used in Const. art. 5, § 16, declaring that every order or resolution in which the concurrence of both houses of the General Assembly may be necessary, save on questions of "adjournment," shall be presented to the Governor and approved by him before it shall take effect, means any "continuance of the session from one day to another"; and hence a concurrent resolution extending the session 10 days beyond the time that it would ordinarily extend by law required the approval of the governor to render such extension valid. Trammell v. Bradley, 37 Ark. 374, 379.

The term "adjournment," in the constitutional provision that if a governor fail to return a bill within five days of its receipt it shall become a law, unless the general session by adjournment shall prevent its return, means final adjournment at the close of the session, not adjournment for the day or for several days during the session. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Ass'n v. Michel, 27 South. 565, 567, 52 La. Ann. 936, 49 L. R. A. 218.

ADJOURNED BY CONSENT.

See "Consent."

ADJOURNED TERM.

An "adjourned term" is but a continuation—a part—of the regular term. Giving the district court power to hold an adjourned term gives it power, not to adjourn from day to day, but to adjourn over a length of time—over intervening obstacles to the holding of court. In re Dossett, 37 Pac. 1066, 1073, 2 Okl. 369; Kingsley v. Bagby, 41 Pac. 991, 2 Kan. App. 23.

An "adjourned term" is not an original term. The definition of the word "adjourn" precludes it. There must be either a regular or special term in session, and the business of that term delayed, postponed, or put off until some more convenient time. This more convenient time would be an "adjourned term," and a continuation of the regular term. Kingsley v. Bagby, 41 Pac. 991, 2 Kan. App. 23.

The act providing that courts of the District of Columbia shall be invested with the same power of holding "adjourned sessions" that are exercised by the courts of Maryland does not purport to vary the character of the session, or make an adjourned session a distinct session; and hence an adjourned term was a continuance of the term at which the adjournment was taken, and did not constitute a distinct term. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Withers, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 106, 108, 5 L. Ed. 217.

The expression "adjourned terms," as used in Acts 1833, § 1, providing that the "judges of the Supreme Court may hold 'adjourned terms' of said court for the trial of such cases as the counsel on both sides thereof may agree to set at such adjourned term," manifestly imports but a continuation of the previous term, and although it is continued for the trial of the cause in a particular division it by no means follows that the power of the court over the business which has been done and the entry made is taken away. It is the same term prolonged, and although prolonged for purposes specified in the order, and although the court as a matter of justice would not take up any cause not set for trial at such "adjourned term," yet as its session or term has not finally closed it has power over its record to make it conform to the truth, and see that injustice is not done by allowing an erroneous judgment to stand, but should mero motu vacate it, and set down the cause for a rehearing at the regular succeeding term. If the term is not closed, and the court is still in session, it is not concluded by its previous order, but has power to rescind it. It is not like the case of a special, distinct term, held after the regular term has been brought to a final close. In such case the court would be concluded by the final adjournment. In order to conclude the court and exclude its power from the record of the term, the term must have closed their session by an adjournment sine die, or by lapse of time, so as to be closed by the coming on of the regular term. Van Dyke v. State, 22 Ala. 57, 59.

ADJUDGE.

See "Duly Adjudged"; "Thing Adjudged."

The word "adjudged" means "adjudicated," and "adjudicated" means judicially determined; so that as used in section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that a judgment shall not be vacated on motion or petition until it is adjudged that there is a valid defense, the word "adjudged" means judicially determined; and therefore a court should not set a judgment aside until, after a hearing of the appellant's evidence, the court finds and decides that such applicant has made out a prima facie valid defense or cause of action. Western Assur. Co. v. Klein, 67 N. W. 873, 874, 48 Neb. 904.

As convicted.

The word "adjudged," as used in Rev. St. art. 2, p. 68, § 1, declaring that every person who shall willfully swear falsely shall, on conviction, be "adjudged" guilty of perjury, and shall not thereafter be received as a witness in any cause, is synonymous with "convicted"; and hence a verdict finding one guilty of perjury does not disqualify him as a witness until sentence has been pronounced thereon. Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 111, 25 Am. Rep. 148.

Judgment of court implied.

The words "adjudge," "determine," and "award," as used by arbitrators in their award, do not necessarily carry with them the idea of a judgment according to law, so as to enable one of the parties to have the award set aside for errors of law. Patton v. Garrett, 21 S. E. 679, 682, 116 N. C. 847.

While sometimes used together with "considered," "ordered," "determined," "decreed," etc., as one of the operative words of a final judgment, the word "adjudged" is also applicable to interlocutory orders and adjudications of the court. It is not synonymous with "decided," "determined," etc. An allegation that the court "adjudged" that defendants should pay, etc., is not equivalent to an allegation of the rendition of judgment. Edwards v. Hellings, 33 Pac. 799, 99 Cal. 214.

Act March 11, 1862, § 8, providing that in case a tax title is "adjudged" invalid the purchaser shall have the lien of the state for taxes chargeable against such property, etc., construed to only mean a judgment entered by a court of competent jurisdiction. Webb v. Bidwell, 15 Minn. 479, 484 (Gil. 394, 399).

The words "convicted and adjudged," as used in Act May 5, 1892, c. 60, § 4, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1320], providing for the imprisonment and deportation of any Chinaman convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to remain in the United States, is to be construed as meaning that he is found by the commissioner to be unlawfully within the United States, and does not require conviction in the courts. United States v. Hing Quong Chow (U. S.) 53 Fed. 233, 234.

ADJUDICATE—ADJUDICATION.

See "Former Adjudication"; "Time of Adjudication."

Act March 14, 1844, § 4, providing that on taking the bill as confessed on the coming in of the answers the court shall proceed to ascertain and "adjudicate" the rights and interests of the parties, meant to determine in the exercise of judicial power; that is, a solemn or deliberate determination by the judicial power. It constituted a direction to the court to adjudicate the rights and interests of the parties involved on the issues made by the pleadings and on the evidence to be taken and submitted according to the usual methods of procedure in chancery, and constituted nothing less than a direction to decide and decree what were the respective rights of the parties as they might appear from the law and the testimony. There was nothing in the act requiring a court of chancery to ascertain what the verdict of a jury might be on the facts, but it merely requires the court to ascertain and decide the rights and interests of the parties on the evidence before it. Street v. Benner, 20 Fla. 700, 713.

Act July 8, 1886, referring certain claims to the court of claims for adjudication according to law on the proofs, and requiring that court to report the same to Congress, construed to require complete, final, and conclusive judgment by the court of claims. United States v. Irwin, 8 Sup. Ct. 1033, 1035, 127 U. S. 125, 32 L. Ed. 99.

"'Adjudication' means a solemn or deliberate determination of an issue by the judicial power, after a hearing in respect to the matters claimed to have been adjudicated." Where the court, in a mandamus proceeding to reinstate a public servant after wrongful discharge, declines to try the question of damages, there is not an adjudication of such question which will preclude a subsequent suit to recover the damages. Sans v. City of New York. 64 N. Y. Supp. 681, 31 Misc. Rep. 559.

"Adjudication," as used in relation to the division of property owned in indivision between a father and his minor children, means an assignment by judgment; the adjudging of the ownership of all things by a court; and to constitute such an adjudication something more is required than a recommendation of a family meeting that the adjudication be made, than the appraisal of the property by experts, and an order of the court homologating and approving the proceedings of the family meeting. Succession of Burguières, 28 South. 883, 885, 104 La. 46.

ADJUDICATION OF BANKRUPTCY.

The expression "adjudication of bankruptcy," as used in Rev. St. § 5069, providing that when the bankrupt is bound, as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor, on any bill, bond, note, or other specialty, but his liability does not become absolute until after the "adjudication of bankruptcy," the creditor may prove the same after such liability becomes fixed, means the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and the proceedings are commenced at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. In re Morse (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 846, 847.

An adjudication of bankruptcy is not a judgment establishing a lien, but is generally of an opposite character, and usually operates to prevent the acquisition of liens; and hence is not a "judgment," as the word is used in Rev. St. 828 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 635], authorizing the clerks of the federal courts to make a charge of 15 cents for every search for any particular judgment or other lien required by statute to be made. In re Clerk's Charges (U. S.) 5 Fed. 440, 442.

An "adjudication of bankruptcy" is a certificate or order made by an authorized officer to the effect that the petitioner became a bankrupt by the filing of his petition. In re Patterson (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1315, 1318.

"Adjudication," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall mean the date of the entry of a decree that the defendant, in a bankruptcy proceeding, is a bankrupt, or, if such decree is appealed from, then the date when such decree is finally confirmed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418.

ADJUDICATION OF INSOLVENCY.

A "petition in insolvency" and an "adjudication of insolvency" are two entirely and essentially different things. There can be no adjudication of insolvency without a petition, either voluntary or involuntary; but there may be a petition without an adjudication. While it is true that the relation relates back, for certain purposes, to the date of the petition, yet the two things are distinct events, that may happen after a considerable interval of time. Wages earned within three months anterior to a petition for insolvency do not come within Code, art. 47, § 15, giving preference to wages contracted not more than three months anterior to an adjudication of insolvency. Roberts v. Edie, 36 Atl. 820, 822, 85 Md. 181.

ADJUST.

"Adjust" is to settle or bring to a satisfactory state, so that parties will agree in the result, as to adjust accounts. Flaherty v. Continental Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 934, 935, 20 App. Div. 275, 277. Nevertheless the constitutional provision making it the duty of the state auditor "to adjust claims" did not authorize him to issue a warrant for the full sum as called for in an act of the Legislature appropriating a certain amount for the relief of a county to reimburse it for expenses incurred in a murder trial. State v. Moore, 59 N. W. 755, 758, 40 Neb. 854, 25 L. R. A. 774.

To "adjust" an unliquidated claim is to determine what is due; to settle; to ascertain; and when losses under policies of insurance are adjusted they are ascertained or determined. Miller v. Consolidated Patrons' & Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 84 N. W. 1049, 1050, 113 Iowa, 211 (citing Ruthven v. American Fire Ins. Co., 102 Iowa, 550, 71 N. W. 574).

To "adjust" an unliquidated claim is to determine what is due, and such definition is applicable to losses arising under policies of insurance; hence a person authorized to "adjust" a claim under an insurance policy has power to determine what is due, and settle or bring to a satisfactory state, so that the parties are agreed in the result, and may waive formal proofs. Ruthven v. American Fire Ins. Co., 71 N. W. 574, 578, 102 Iowa, 550.

"Adjust," as used in Act March 10, 1871, § 7, providing that the state board of equalization shall thereupon proceed "to adjust" and equalize the aggregate valuation of the property of each one of the railroad companies liable to taxation, means to fit, to make accurate, or to determine the exact relation which the property bears to a money standard, and requires the court to determine, on comparison of the extent and amount of the business of one railroad company with another, whether any have assumed a higher or smaller standard of valuation than the others. Washington County v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co., 58 Mo. 372, 376.

The distinction between adjusting the amount of damages done by a fire and the sum for which the insurance company is liable is very apparent. In the first place, there would be a recognition of the extent of the damage done by the fire; in the latter, a recognized liability, properly adjusted by the parties; but the mere fixing of the amount of loss by the fire is not of itself an admission on the part of the insurer that any liability existed against it upon such policy, and does not raise an implied promise to pay. Wil'oughby v. St. Paul German Ins. Co., 68 Minn. 373, 375, 71 N. W. 272.

As agreement to pay.

"Within certain limitations in ordinary use, the words 'adjust and settle' have different meanings. They are not infrequently used in the sense of pay; they are synonymous, and in some of their uses are equivalent, to fixing, to arrange; in others, to determine, to establish, to regulate. So that under an agreement that, if a committee did not settle and adjust a claim, defendant would "adjust" it, a finding by arbitrators that defendant agreed to pay will not be disturbed. Lynch v. Nugent, 46 N. W. 61, 63, 80 Iowa, 422.

Unliquidated demands implied.

Const. art. 4, § 19, requires that the comptroller shall "adjust and settle" all public accounts and demands, except grants and orders of the General Assembly. Held, that since, with regard to liquidated demands, the word "adjust" would be synonymous with "settle," and would therefore be unnecessary, and render the sentence tautological, such word must be construed to refer to unliquidated claims, and as so used require the comptroller to adjust between the parties unliquidated demands against the state, in which he is required to use his discretion and judgment; and the word "settle" applying to demands liquidated, and requiring the payment of such claim. State v. Staub, 23 Atl. 924, 927, 928, 61 Conn. 553.

ADJUSTABLE DOCK.

A contract to construct an "adjustable dock" does not require a dock which is automatically adjustable, but one which is adjustable by cutting away and filling in its gates so that they will conform to the contour of the hull of the vessel; especially where the term is treated as a technical one, and the experts agree upon that definition of it. International Bow & Stern Dock Co. v. United States (U. S.) 60 Fed. 523, 527.

ADJUSTER.

An "adjuster" is one who determines the amount of a claim as a claim against an insurance company. First Nat. Bank v. Manchester Fire Assur. Co., 66 N. W. 136, 138, 64 Minn. 96.

An adjuster is a person who makes any adjustment or settlement, so that an insurance adjuster would be empowered and authorized to adjust and settle a loss, and his authority would be sufficient to enable him to take any and every step which he deemed necessary or proper to facilitate an adjustment; hence a declaration that the company will not pay the claim is binding on the company. Flaherty v. Continental Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 934, 936, 20 App. Div. 275.

The "adjuster" of a fire insurance company, as to the settlement of losses, is the representative of the company, and his acts are the acts of the company. Roberts v. Insurance Company, 72 S. W. 144, 145, 94 Mo. App. 142.

ADJUSTMENT.

See "Final Adjustment."

In insurance.

Ordinarily an "adjustment of loss" in fire insurance is equivalent to a promise to pay the loss so determined; for ordinarily an adjustment implies a liability for the loss and consequent promise to pay. But an adjustment does not necessarily imply liability, and accordingly it may be made under a reservation of the question of liability. An adjustment made subject to the terms and conditions of the policy, which relieves the insurer from liability in case certain conditions or stipulations are not fulfilled by the insured, means simply that the company will pay the loss as fixed under the terms and conditions of the policy, if under them the insured is entitled to payment. Whipple v. North British & Mercantile Fire Ins. Co., 11 R. I. 139, 140 (cited in Fournier v. German-American Ins. Co., 49 Atl. 98, 99, 23 R. I. 36).

In the law of insurance, "adjustment" means to settle or bring to a satisfactory state, so that the parties are agreed in the result. The preliminary proofs are to be acted on by negotiation, by statements on the one side, demands for correction or addition on the other, by compliance with such request, until the parties agree. If they do not agree, there is not an adjustment. City of New York v. Hamilton Fire Ins. Co., 39 N. Y. 45, 47, 10 Am. Dec. 400.

The term "adjustment" in a marine policy, providing that the loss shall be paid sixty days after proof and adjustment thereof, implies that the loss has been adjusted between the parties, and does not contemplate a statement made by the person employed by the assured alone, though he may be called by himself and by them an adjuster. Taber v. China Mut. Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 239, 251.

Where in an insurance policy the sum to be paid as indemnity in case of losses is not fixed in the contract, but is left open to be proved by the claimant or to be determined by the parties, this determination is called an "adjustment" of the loss. Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Miller (Tex.) 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 332.

In machines.

In a claim for a patent an "adjustment" of the retractile force of an automatic circuit breaker, "adjustment" was construed to mean the "mechanical means of making the adjustment." Page v. Holmes Burglar Alarm Telegraph Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 304, 319.

ADJUTAGE.

An "adjutage" is a tube, conical in form, intended to be applied to an aperture through which water passes, whereby the flow of the water is greatly increased. Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Whart. 477, 492.

ADMINISTER.

Drug, liquor, or poison.

The primary definition of the word "administer" is to give. The word is not a word having a strict legal and technical import. It is a word in general use, with a commonly accepted meaning, and where a person is charged with administering noxious medicine it is the same as charging him with giving such medicine. State v. Jones (Del.) 53 Atl. 858, 861.

"Administering is defined to be giving, dispensing; hence, where defendants furnished and gave liquor to a woman, even though at one time she asked for it, they were guilty of administering liquor within a statute making it rape to have carnal knowledge of woman by administering any liquid which shall prevent resistance." People v. Quin (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 128, 134.

Within the provision that whoever prescribes or administers to any pregnant woman, or to any woman who he supposes to be pregnant, any drug, medicine, or substance whatever, with intent to procure a miscarriage of such woman, shall, if the woman miscarries and dies in consequence thereof, be fined, etc., the word "administer" does not signify merely the manner of administering the drug, medicine, or substance, but it has a wider meaning. Among the definitions of the word are the following: To furnish, to give, to administer medicine; to direct or cause to be taken; to supply, furnish, or provide with; and, as used in said section, the word "administer" was clearly intended to cover the whole ground named, making it an offense to give, furnish, supply, provide with, or cause to be given, furnished, supplied, or provided or taken any such drug, medicine, or substance, etc. McCaughy v. State, 59 N. E. 169, 170, 156 Ind. 41.

A statement charging a woman with "administering" to her daughter "pills to drive off a child," in their natural meaning charges her with attempting to procure an abortion on her daughter. This is the natural import of the words spoken, and they convey to the minds of ordinary persons the charge of a crime. Filber v. Dautermann, 28 Wis. 518, 520.

Cr. Act, § 1, making the felonious administering of poison criminal, construed to include the act of compelling a person to take poison by acts of violence. "Neither deception nor breach of confidence is a necessary ingredient in the act. It matters not whether the poison be put into the hand or into the stomach of the party whose life is to be destroyed by it. If the poison reaches the stomach or body of the deceased and does its work of death there, it is immaterial whether force or fraud was the means by which the guilty agent effected his object. We think counsel are wrong in assuming that the word 'administer' always and necessarily implies service. If it does, it often implies service to a very unwilling master. Such is the case when the law is administered to a criminal. The word 'minister' is said to be derived from the same root as the Latin word 'manus'—the hand. Etymologically, therefore, the word 'administer' would seem applicable to anything that could be done by the hand to or for another." Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146, 162.

In 2 Rev. St. 666, § 37, making it a felony to administer, or cause and procure to be administered, any poison to any human being with intent to kill, "administer" will be construed to embrace every mode of giving it or causing it to be taken, as putting poison in bread which was so placed that it would be taken by the intended victim. La Beau v. People, 34 N. Y. 223-233.

In 2 Rev. St. 666, § 37, providing that every person who shall be convicted of having administered any poison to any human being with intent to kill such being, and which shall have been actually taken by such being, whereof death shall not ensue, shall be punishable by imprisonment for not less than 10 years, "administer" means to direct and cause medicine to be taken; and placing poison in coffee which was intended for immediate use, and which was immediately used, was an administering within the meaning of the statute.—Le Beau v. People (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 66, 69.

Acts 1855, p. 23, § 4, providing that if any person who shall "administer poison" to another, with intent to deprive him or her of life, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, construed not satisfied by an attempt to "administer poison" by putting it in food, but to require that the poison be taken into the stomach. Sumpter v. State, 11 Fla. 247, 256.

Administering of drugs contrary to a statute prohibiting such act is shown by evidence that defendant procured the drug and mailed it to another, who took the drug in pursuance of defendant's advice, though the drug was mailed in a different state than the place in which it was taken. State v. Morrow, 18 S. E. 853, 859, 40 S. C. 221.

"Administering," as used in Act Feb. 10, 1887, providing that the act shall not be considered to prevent regularly licensed and practicing physicians from "administering" certain prohibited liquors whenever they deem it necessary, means to give as a dose, to direct or cause to be taken as medicine; and the giving by the physician of an order for a quart of whisky on a drug store in which he himself was a partner, without more, is not the administering of medicine, but an illegal sale of spirituous liquors. Brinson v. State, 8 South. 527, 528, 89 Ala. 105.

Estate.

See "Fully Administered"; "Not Administered."

An administrator's bond, conditioned that he should well and faithfully "administer," meant to fulfill the functions and perform the duties of an administrator. Lanier v. Irvine, 21 Minn. 447, 448.

The word "administer," as used in a bond given by an executor conditioned that he would faithfully "administer" the estate, means the collection of moneys due the estate and the raising of money to pay claims due from it. Sparhawk v. Buell's Adm'r, 9 Vt. 41, 56.

In an executor's bond conditioned that he will faithfully administer the estate of the testator, the word "administer" implies no more than a faithful discharge of the duties of the executor in relation to those having claims against the estate, and implies no obligation to pay those entitled to distribution.

Moore v. Waller's Heirs, 8 Ky. (1 A. K. Marsh.) 488, 491; Barbour v. Robertson's Heirs, 11 Ky. (1 Litt.) 93, 95.

An executor's bond, requiring him to well and truly "administer" an estate, construed to include the duty to pay over to a legatee for life personal property, and the interest and dividends received thereon by the executor. Sanford v. Gilman, 44 Conn. 461, 464.

A will providing that the executors named in the will, or those "administering" on testator's estate, should hold a fund in trust for certain purposes, means the administrator with the will annexed, appointed after the death of the executors named. In re Baker (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 626, 631.

Within Gen. St. 1899, § 5583, providing that, when a person shall be imprisoned under a sentence of imprisonment for life, his estate, property, and effects shall be "administered" as if he were naturally dead, by the use of the word "administered" it was the intention of the lawmakers to restrict the administration to the control and disposition of personal property for the benefit of creditors, to the end that all debts of the convict may be speedily paid, administration having relation to personal property, and only where the personalty is sufficient in value to pay the debts of the decedent does the administrator exercise any control over the real estate; and hence in such imprisonment the descent of the real property of the prisoner is not cast upon his heirs. Smith v. Becker, 64 Pac. 70, 62 Kan. 541.

The assets of an estate are not regarded as administered until they have been collected and applied as required by law or the will of the testator. American Surety Co. v. Platt (Kan.) 72 Pac. 775, 776 (citing Slagle v. Entreklin, 10 N. E. 675, 676, 44 Ohio St. 637).

Where money belonging to an estate was mixed by the administrator with his own funds and converted by him, it was thereby, technically speaking, administered, and could not be recovered by an administrator de bonis non, who was entitled only to such goods as remained unadministered in specie, which would include money received by the former administrator in his character as such and kept by itself. Reed v. Hume, 70 Pac. 998, 1000, 25 Utah, 248.

ADMINISTRATION.

See "Ancillary Administration"; "Due Administration"; "Due Administration of Justice"; "Letters of Administration"; "Special Administration."

"The administration of government means the practical management and direction of the executive department, or of the public machinery or functions, or of the operations of the various organs of the sov-eign. The term 'administration' is also conventionally applied to the whole class of public functionaries, or those in charge of the management of the executive department." People v. Salsbury (Mich.) 96 N. W. 936, 941.

"Administration" is the act of administering or conducting the office, and in connection with the courts is the execution of the powers and duties of the courts named—the administering of the laws by those courts in their application to particular persons or cases. Wenzler v. People, 58 N. Y. 516, 536.

An "administration" is defined to be a change, alteration, or conversion of the goods of a testator or intestate. Gregory v. Harrison, 4 Fla. 56, 57.

"Administration," as used with reference to the estate of a deceased person, "is a very comprehensive term, and means the settlement of an estate, whether by an administrator or an executor." Crow v. Hubard, 62 Md. 560, 565.

The term "administration," as used in Revision 1860, § 2357, providing that administration shall not be originally granted after the lapse of five years from the death of decedent, or from the time his death was known in case he died out of the state, means "the management of the estate of a decedent, and expresses the jurisdiction assumed by the proper probate court over it. This jurisdiction is assumed by the appointment of the administrator; when that is done, administration is said to have been granted. It does not refer simply to the act of appointment of the administrator, although that act is included in the thought expressed." Crossan v. McCrary, 37 Iowa, 684, 685.

When used with reference to the duties of an administrator in chief, the term "administration" includes more than the collection of assets and the payment of debts and legacies and distribution to the next of kin, and involves anything which may be done rightfully in the preservation of the assets of the estate, and which may be done legally by the administrator in his dealings with creditors, distributees, or legatees, or which may be done by them in securing their rights. Martin v. Ellerbe's Adm'r, 70 Ala. 326, 339.

Administration of assets implies such a complete disposition of them as not only to collect them from the debtor of the estate, if they are in that condition, but finally to place them in the hands of the creditor, legatee, or distributee to whom, after undergoing a process of administration, they finally belonged. Walton v. Walton (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Dec. 512, 518.

Const. art. 4, in providing that probate courts shall have jurisdiction in all "matters testamentary and of administration," meant matters appertaining to proceedings in an orphan's court in supervising and directing executors and administrators in the discharge of their duties, and did not confer on the probate court jurisdiction of an action to partition the land of a deceased person among his heirs without sale. Herndon v. Moore, 18 S. C. 330, 351.

Curatorship distinguished.

A "curatorship" differs from an "administration" in that the latter continues in full force until a final settlement occurs, and meanwhile the executor or administrator represents the heirs and creditors of the decedent, but, when the minor comes of age, the event terminates the curatorship as to all things except the settlement between the minor and the incumbent curator. State ex rel. Scott v. Greer, 74 S. W. 881, 883, 101 Mo. App. 669.

ADMINISTRATIVE.

The function of the election board of a town in receiving votes and announcing the result is "administrative." People v. Austin, 46 N. Y. Supp. 526, 527, 20 App. Div. 1.

An "administrative officer" is frequently classed as a ministerial officer, and vice versa. And. Law Dict. defines "administrative" to mean to dispose, direct the application of, as to administer the law. Bouvier speaks of "administrative" as synonymous with "executive"; a ministerial duty; one in which nothing is left to discretion. People v. Salsbury (Mich.) 96 N. W. 936, 940.

ADMINISTRATOR.

See "Ancillary Administrator"; "De Facto Administrator"; "Foreign Executors and Administrators"; "General Administrator"; "Special Administrator."

An administrator "is a person lawfully appointed to manage and settle the estate of a deceased person who has left no executor." Smith v. Gentry, 16 Ga. 31, 32.

Administrators receiving their appointment from the court are officers of the courts whose appointment they bear. Rothschild v. Hasbrouck (U. S.) 65 Fed. 283, 285.

An executor or administrator is to a certain extent an officer of the law, clothed with a trust to be performed under prescribed regulations. Shewell v. Keen (Pa.) 2 Whart. 332, 339, 30 Am. Dec. 266; Pace v. Smith, 57 Tex. 555, 558.

"Administrators, executors, and guardians" are quasi public trustees, with duties prescribed by law, which every one is obliged to know, and notice of whose character is notice of the limitation of their power. In re Hinds' Estate, 38 Atl. 599, 601, 183 Pa. 260.

An administrator is a person to whom letters of administration—that is, an authority to administer the estate of a deceased person—has been granted by the proper court. "An administrator takes only such powers as are conferred by law, and those who deal with him have notice of his duties and powers and of all limitations thereon. He is merely an agent or trustee acting immediately under the direction of the law regulating his conduct and defining his authority. Collamore v. Wilder, 19 Kan. 67, 78; Lafferty v. People's Sav. Bank, 43 N. W. 34, 36, 76 Mich. 35.

An administrator of an insolvent estate must be regarded as being emphatically the representative of the creditors, and it is his duty to take possession of all the estate, to the exclusion of the heirs, and apply it to the payment of the debts. Starr v. Estey, 45 Atl. 590, 69 N. H. 619.

An administrator, under a statute authorizing him in certain contingencies to take possession of real estate, is virtually but the agent of the owners to care for the estate, collect rent, and do other acts for their benefit under the direction of the court. The devolution of the title is in no way interrupted or affected thereby, nor by his right to sell or mortgage for the payment of debts, and each may transfer a definite portion subject thereto. Herriott v. Potter, 89 N. W. 91, 92, 115 Iowa, 618.

The word "administrator" is descriptive only of the person who has taken upon himself the responsibilities of administering the estate of a deceased person. As to the property of the deceased, the administrator stands in his place, to dispose of it as the law directs. When the heirs or creditors desire to reach it, it can be done only through himself, and, whenever it is found that a devastavit has been committed, his own property can alone be reached through the same channel. So that he is the common medium through which his effects and those of the deceased are accessible to the parties who are legally interested therein. Therefore the subtle distinctions in which the administrator and the person who bears that title are treated as two separate legal entities are the mere inventions of astute and ingenious lawyers, that embarrass rather than facilitate the attainment of the ends of justice. Allen v. Leach, 44 Atl. 800, 802, 7 Del. Ch. 232.

Administrators are of two kinds, general and special. Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198.

Where plaintiff sued on a note payable to bearer, and commenced his petition, "A. B., administrator to C. D., deceased," etc., held, that the words "administrator," etc., should have been treated as a mere descriptio personæ, in no way militating against plaintiff's right to a judgment in his own name. Rider v. Duval, 28 Tex. 622, 624.

The words "executors, administrators, and assigns," as used in a fire policy issued to the insured, his "executors, his administrators, or assigns," operate to vest the right of action upon the policy, on the death of insured, in his personal representatives. Wyman v. Wyman, 26 N. Y. 253, 255.

The word "administrator" may include every person to whom the administration of an estate or the execution of a will may be granted. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 620, c. 188, § 1.

Administrator with will annexed distinguished.

An administrator differs from an administrator with the will annexed, not in respect to his right to collect debts due the estate, but only in respect to the disposition of assets. Each represents the estate in all controversies with its debtors. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Freeman (U. S.) 109 Fed. 847, 851, 48 C. C. A. 692, 54 L. R. A. 680.

As assigns.

See "Assigns."

Executor included.

Although in name there is a difference between "administrator" and "executor," yet in fact and in law they are really the same, for each has control over the personal estate and the distribution thereof. In re Murphy, 39 N. E. 601, 692, 144 N. Y. 557.

The term "administrator," as used in a right of entry to foreclose a mortgage, in which an executor describes himself as "administrator," construed to include executor, and to be a sufficient description. Sheldon v. Smith, 97 Mass. 34, 35.

A notice to an executor notifying him of his appointment is sufficient though the notice recites that he has been appointed as "administrator." Finney v. Barnes, 97 Mass. 401, 402.

The term "administrator," when used in statutes, includes executor, where the subject-matter justifies such use. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 21; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 2, art. 1, § 4.

Foreign administrator included.

The term "administrator," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 53, § 16, providing that all actions which are pending against a deceased person at the time of his death may, if the cause of action survives, be prosecuted to final judgment, and the executor or administrator may be admitted to defend the same, included foreign as well as domestic administrators, or any species of administrators recognized by statute as having authority to act as such. Brown v. Brown, 28 N. W. 238, 35 Minn. 191.

As legal representative.

See "Legal Representative."

As next of kin.

Executors and administrators are not by their nature calculated to describe next of kin, but, on the contrary, executors are persons selected by the testator, and administrators are those named by the ecclesiastical court, and, generally speaking, the expressions "executor" and "administrator" cannot be intended to mean next of kin. Bulmer v. Jay, 3 Myl. & K. 196, 199.

As owner.

See "Owner."

As personal representative.

See "Personal Representative."

Receiver.

The terms "administrators" and "receivers" are not convertible terms. Though their duties and incidental powers in some respects may be similar, yet they are officers having different functions to perform, and appointed for different purposes. The Willamette Valley (U. S.) 62 Fed. 293, 303.

As representative.

See "Representative."

Residuary legatee included.

Gen. St. c. 95, § 5, providing that "no executor or administrator" shall be sued by any creditor of deceased within two years from the time of giving bond for the discharge of their trust, includes one who, being also a residuary legatee, has given a bond to pay debts and legacies, as well as the ordinary bond. Jenkins v. Wood, 134 Mass. 115, 117.

Special administrator included.

The term "administrators," as used in Code, § 1825, relative to the compensations of executors and administrators, embraces special administrators. Wright's Adm'rs v. Wilkerson, 41 Ala. 267, 272.

As trustee.

See "Trustee."

ADMINISTRATOR CUM TESTAMENTO ANNEXO.

As executor, see "Executor."

An administrator differs from an administrator with the will annexed, not in respect to his right to collect debts due the es-ate, but only in respect to the disposition of assets. Each represents the estate in all controversies with its debtors. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Freeman (U. S.) 109 Fed. 847, 851, 48 C. C. A. 692, 54 L. R. A. 680.

ADMINISTRATOR DE BONIS NON.

An administrator de bonis non is an administrator appointed where there is a vacancy in the administration by the resignation, removal, or death of the administrator in chief before a final accounting and discharge. Sims v. Waters, 65 Ala. 442, 443.

An administrator de bonis non is an administrator appointed to administer a portion of the estate remaining unadministered after the death of a former administrator. Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198. "One who administers upon the unadministered effects of the deceased." Barkman v. Duncan, 10 Ark. (5 Eng.) 465, 466; Beall v. New Mexico, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 535, 541, 21 L. Ed. 292. He has all the powers of a common administrator. Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198.

An administrator d. b. n. is one appointed to administer the goods of an estate which has been partially administered by a former executor or administrator. This is but a continuance of the original administration by another hand, under a separate responsibility, but by the same authority, the effect of which is to subrogate the substituted administrator to the common-law and statutory rights of creditors, next of kin, and legatees for the benefit of all interested in the fund. Tucker v. Horner (Pa.) 10 Phila. 122, 125.

An administrator de bonis non administratis, in general, is the successor of the executor; nevertheless he derives his title directly from the testator, and not from the executor, and on his appointment there vests in him title only to the unadministered property of the testator in trust for those to whom it belongs; and therefore, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, he has no recourse against his official predecessor for devastavit or maladministration, such remedy being reserved to creditors, legatees, and distributees; and the executor is responsible to the successor only for the goods, effects, and credits which remained unadministered. Waterman v. Dockray, 3 Atl. 49, 50, 78 Me. 139; Beall v. New Mexico, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 535, 541, 21 L. Ed. 292.

An "administrator de bonis non" takes the estate where his predecessor left it, and, in respect to the time of limitation to sell real estate, as well as in many other respects, his administration is a mere continuation of that commenced by the latter, otherwise the rights of heirs, devisees, purchasers, and creditors would be uncertain and indefinite. In re Kingsland, 14 N. Y. Supp. 495, 497, 60 Hun, 116 (citing Slocum v. English, 62 N. Y. 494).

An "administrator de bonis non" takes possession of the goods and chattels of the testator or intestate which remain in specie and unadministered. He is appointed to finish what is left unfinished, and for no other purpose. Gregory v. Harrison, 4 Fla. 56, 57.

ADMINISTRATOR DE BONIS NON CUM TESTAMENTO ANNEXO.

An administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo is "an administrator appointed to wind up the affairs of an estate which has already been partially administered by a previous executor or administrator who is either dead or incapable of further action." Conklin v. Egerton's Adm'r (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 430, 432; Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198.

ADMINISTRATOR PENDENTE LITE.

An administrator pendente lite is an administrator whose powers are terminated by the termination of the suit for the purposes of which he is appointed. Cole v. Wooden, 18 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 15, 20.

An "administrator pendente lite" is an administrator during litigation. Whart. Law Dict. "Lis" means a suit, action, controversy, or dispute, and "dispute" is a conflict or contest, while "controversy" is a disputed question, a suit at law. A "lis pendens" is a pending suit, so that, as long as the lis continues pendens, so long does the administrator appointed during litigation remain a provisional administrator. The pendens of the lis is not disturbed nor in any manner affected by the fact of an appeal from the circuit court to an appellate. The litigation or contest still goes on, and the power of the temporary administrator still remains, unaffected by the varying fortunes or vicissitudes of the pending controversy. State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 283, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787.

"An administrator pendente lite is an officer of the court whose duty is limited to filing an inventory, taking care of the assets, and collecting and paying debts. His authority does not extend to payment of legacies or making distribution of the estate." In re Ellmaker's Estate (Pa.) 4 Watts, 34, 36 (quoting Commonwealth v. Mateer [Pa.] 16 Serg. & R. 416; Adams v. Shaw, 1 Schoales & L. Rep. 254). These views find support in the opinion in Ex parte Worthington, 54 Md. 361. So that such an administrator has power to discharge the debts of the decedent, though without power to make distribution of the residue. Baldwin v. Mitchell (Md.) 38 Atl. 775, 776.

ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND.

"Looking only to the penalty of the bond, it certainly is an instrument for the payment of money; but when we come to the condition, which is usually regarded as the substantial part, there is no provision for paying any sum to any one. The bond may be a security for the payment of money, as where goods of the estate have come to the hands of the administrator, and money has been obtained therefrom, and the county court has distributed the funds. But that is in the due administration of the estate for which the bond is a security, and not because of any express provision of the instrument. A suit on an administrator's bond is not a suit on a written instrument or writing, for the direct payment of money, and a writ of attachment in aid of such suit cannot be allowed under Code Colo. § 95, subd. 14, regulating attachments." People of Colorado v. Boylan (U. S.) 25 Fed. 594, 595.

ADMIRALTY.

As court of record, see "Court of Record."

Common law distinguished, see "Common Law."

"The admiralty courts were originally established in England and other maritime countries of Europe for the protection of commerce and the administration of the venerable law of the sea, which reaches back to sources long anterior even to those of the civil law itself; which Lord Mansfield says is not the law of any particular country, but the general law of nations, and which is founded on the broadest principles of equity and justice, deriving, however, much of its completeness and symmetry, as well as its modes of proceeding, from the civil law, and embracing altogether a system of regulations embodied and matured by the combined efforts of the most enlightened commercial nations of the world." New England Marine Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 1, 23, 20 L. Ed. 90.

A court of admiralty has no equity jurisdiction, though it is not governed by professional or technical rules or modes of procedure, and acts with the spirit of purest equity and good conscience; but it cannot change the legal relation of the parties to property, as a court of chancery can, and even in the execution of its judgments, if it encounters an impediment which requires the action of a court of equity, it must pause until some other court with suitable powers has acted. The Albert Schultz (U. S.) 12 Fed. 156.

The "admiralty" is a court of very high antiquity. It has been distinctly traced as early as the reign of Edward I. If it be not of immemorial antiquity, as Lord Coke supposes, it is almost certain that its origin may be safely assigned to some anterior age. There is a strong probability of its existence in the reign of Richard I, since the laws of Oleron, which were compiled and promulgated by him on his return from the Holy Land, have always been deemed the laws of admiralty, and could not have been fully enforced in any other court. What was originally the nature and extent of the jurisdiction of the admiralty cannot now with absolute certainty be known. It is involved in the same obscurity which rests in the original jurisdiction of courts of common law. It seems, however, that at a very early period the admiralty had cognizance of all questions of prize, of torts, and offenses, as well in ports within the ebb and flow of the tide as upon the high seas; of maritime contracts and navigation; and also of the peculiar custody of the rights, prerogatives, and authorities of the crown in the British seas. The forms of its proceedings were borrowed from the civil law, and the rules by which it was governed were, as is everywhere avowed, the ancient laws, customs, and usages of the sea. In fact, there can scarcely be the slightest doubt that the admiralty of England and all other maritime courts were formed upon one and the same common model, and that their jurisdiction included the same subjects as the consular courts of the Mediterranean. The most venerable monument of admiralty jurisdiction is the Black Book of the Admiralty, which has always been deemed of the highest authority, and, besides containing the laws of Oleron at large, it contains an ample view of the crimes and offenses cognizable in the admiralty, and, among other things, it prohibits suing merchants and mariners and others at common law for anything appertaining to the marine law of ancient right, and expressly affirms the jurisdiction of the admiralty over all contracts made abroad and within the flood mark. It cannot be denied that before and in the reign of Edward III the admiralty exercised jurisdiction, first, over matters of prize and its incidents, second, over torts, injuries, and offenses in ports within the ebb and flow of the tide and on the high seas, third, over contracts and other matters regulated and provided for by the laws of Oleron and other special ordinances, and, fourth, over maritime causes in general. De Lovio v. Boit (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 420, 2 Gall. 398.

Admiralty is constructed of inferior jurisdiction, being bounded and circumscribed by certain lines and stated rules, and is subject to the control of the temporal courts. Respublica v. Le Caze (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 55, 56 (citing 1 Bac. 558).

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

The nature and extent of the admiralty jurisdiction conferred on the United States courts by the Constitution is to be determined by the laws of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court, and by usage prevailing in the state courts when the Constitution was framed, and is not coextensive or limited by the admiralty jurisdiction of England at the time of the formation of the Constitution, or governed by the civil law or the practice or usage of Continental Europe. Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 68, 70, 24 L. Ed. 373; Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock (U. S.) 10 Fed. 142, 143.

Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1845, providing that the district courts of the United States shall have and possess jurisdiction in matters of contract and tort arising in or on or concerning steamboats employed in navigation or commerce on the high seas or tide waters within the "admiralty jurisdiction" of the United States, does not constitute a regulation of commerce, and it would be inconsistent with the plain and ordinary meaning of the words "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" to construe them as meaning a regulation of commerce, since the jurisdiction to administer the existing laws on matters of contract and tort arising on steamboats navigating the high seas is not a regulation within the meaning of the Constitution, and the act of Congress merely creates a tribunal to carry such laws into execution, but does not prescribe the laws, and to support the constitutionality of the law as a regulation of commerce would impute to the Legislature an exercise of the power which it has not claimed under the clause of the Constitution conferring on Congress the power to regulate commerce, nor can the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States be made to depend on the regulation of commerce, as they are entirely distinct things and have no necessary connection with each other, and are conferred in the Constitution by separate and distinct grants. The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 445, 452, 13 L. Ed. 1058.

Subject-matter.

In all the great maritime nations of Europe, the term "admiralty jurisdiction" is uniformly applied to the courts exercising jurisdiction over maritime contracts and concerns. De Lovio v. Boit (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 441, 2 Gall. 398.

The "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" given by Const. art. 3, § 2, to the courts of the United States, "manifestly embraces those subjects, whether of contract or tort, which were then under the general maritime law, or appropriate subjects of the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty." Scott v. The Young America (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 851, 852, Newb. Adm. 101.

"The principal subjects of admiralty jurisdiction are maritime contracts and maritime torts, including captures jure belli, and seizures on water for municipal and revenue forfeitures." The Belfast v. Boon, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 624, 637, 19 L. Ed. 266.

In Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 68, 72, 24 L. Ed. 373, Mr. Justice Clifford quotes from 2 Story, Const. § 1666, approvingly as follows: "Admiralty jurisdiction embraces all contracts, claims, and services which are purely maritime, and which respect rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation;" and then just as Clifford said, maritime jurisdiction of the admiralty courts in cases of contract depends chiefly upon the nature of the service or engagement, and is limited to such subjects as are purely maritime, and have respect to commerce and navigation. A maritime lien is not essential to give the courts of the United States admiralty jurisdiction, and a charter party in which there is complete contract for maritime services to be rendered is a maritime contract within the jurisdiction of the United States courts. Maury v. Culliford (U. S.) 10 Fed. 388, 391.

The English rule conceding jurisdiction to admiralty, with few exceptions, only to contracts made upon the sea and to be executed thereon (making the locality a test), is entirely inadmissible, the true criterion being the nature and subject-matter of the contract, as whether it was a maritime contract having reference to maritime service or maritime transactions, and hence admiralty jurisdiction extends to a contract of maritime insurance. New England Marine Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 1, 24, 20 L. Ed. 90.

The true criterion of "admiralty jurisdiction" with respect to contracts is the nature and subject-matter of the contract, as to whether it was a maritime contract having relation to maritime service or maritime jurisdiction. A contract made near the close of the season of late navigation for the shipment of a cargo of grain from Chicago to Buffalo, the grain to be stored in the vessel at Buffalo, is not maritime in character, so as to give admiralty jurisdiction of a suit for damage to the grain. The Richard Winslow (U. S.) 71 Fed. 426, 428, 18 C. C. A. 344.

"Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," according to the generally accepted and received use of the term, extends to all things done upon and relating to the sea, to transactions relating to commerce and navigation, to damages and injuries upon the sea, and all maritime contracts, torts, and injuries; but as applied to this country, with its immense lakes and numerous navigable rivers, the doctrine in modern times has extended it wherever ships, freight, and navigation successfully aid commerce, whether internal or external. Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States. Hence Rev. St. c. 91, § 8, which provides that whoever furnishes labor or materials for a vessel after it is launched or for its repair has a lien on it therefor, to be enforced by attachment, etc., in so far as it authorizes proceedings in rem in the state courts for the enforcement of a lien on domestic or foreign seagoing vessels, is invalid. Warren v. Kelley, 15 Atl. 49, 50, 80 Me. 512.

Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction extends to all things done upon and relating to the sea, to transactions relating to commerce and navigation, and to damages and injuries upon the sea, and all maritime contracts, torts, and injuries. Charter parties, affreightments, marine hypothecations, contracts for marine service in the building, repairing, supplying, and navigating ships, are, among other things, embraced with the term "maritime contracts." Bird v. The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 18, 22.

The jurisdiction of admiralty in matters of prize is not confined to captures at sea. Prize jurisdiction does not depend on locality, but on the subject-matter. Admiralty not only takes cognizance of all captures at sea, in havens, and rivers, but also of all captures made on land, where the same have been effected by a naval force or in co-operation with a naval force. Brown v. United States, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 110, 139, 3 L. Ed. 504 (citing Key & Hubbard v. Pearse, cited in Le Caux v. Eden [Eng.] Doug. 606; Lindo v. Rodney [Eng.] Doug. 613, note; The Stella del Norte [Eng.] 5 C. Rob. Adm. 349; The Rebeckah [Eng.] 1 C. Rob. Adm. 227).

If the business or employment of a vessel appertain to travel, trade, or commerce on the water, it is subject to admiralty jurisdiction, whatever be its size, form, capacity, or means of propulsion. The General Cass (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 169, 171, Brown, Adm. 334.

The admiralty court has jurisdiction and power to try all maritime cases; of everything done on the water below the low-water mark the admiralty court has sole and absolute jurisdiction. It is said to be no court of record in 3 Bl. Comm., and in many other books; but it does not follow, nor is it anywhere laid down, that, because the court of admiralty is said not to be a court of record, it is therefore an inferior court. Lacaze v. State (Pa.) 1 Add. 58, 80, 81.

Territory.

Courts of admiralty are of great antiquity, and have been distinctly traced as early as the reign of Edward I, and there is a strong probability of their existence in the reign of Richard I. It seems that at a very early period the admiralty had cognizance of all questions of prize, of torts, and offenses, as well in ports within the ebb and flow of the tide as upon the high seas, of maritime contracts and navigation, and also the peculiar custody of the rights, prerogatives, and authorities of the crown in the British seas. The forms of its proceedings were borrowed from the civil law. Lord Hale explicitly asserts that in ancient times the common law exercised jurisdiction concurrent with the admiralty over crimes committed even on the narrow seas or coasts, though it were high sea, and that this jurisdiction did not cease until about the 38 Edward III. De Lovio v. Boit (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 2 Gall. 398.

The admiralty jurisdiction given to the United States courts by the Constitution extends over all public navigable waters, without regard to their being influenced by the tide. The Eagle v. Fraser, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 15, 20, 19 L. Ed. 365.

In the Constitution, declaring that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, conferring on district courts "exclusive original cognizance of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," the term "admiralty jurisdiction" is not used in the limited sense in which it is used in English law, which confined the jurisdiction of admiralty to the high seas, and entirely excluded it from transactions arising on waters within the body of a country, such as rivers, inlets, and arms of the sea as far out as the naked eye could discern an object from shore to shore, as well as all transactions arising on the land, though relating to marine matters; but it "extends not only to the main sea, but to all navigable waters of the United States or bordering on the same, landlocked or open, salt or fresh, tide or no tide." The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 443, 454, 13 L. Ed. 1058 (citing New England Marine Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 78 U. S. [11 Wall.] 1, 24, 20 L. Ed. 90).

The repair of a vessel used to navigate tide water, although used partly on inland navigation, is a maritime contract, and the mechanics and materialmen may proceed in the federal courts. McLelland v. The Robert Morris (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 293, 294, 1 Wall. Jr. 33.

The test of the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty in respect to torts was whether the place of alleged injury was on the water. A bathhouse moored to shore, but wholly floating in the water, and so arranged that the tide flowed through it, access to the house being had by means of planks from the shore, was injured by being run into by a steamer. Held, that the accident was on the water, and hence within the jurisdiction of admiralty. The M. R. Brazos (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 951, 10 Ben. 435.

ADMIRALTY LIEN.

"Admiralty lien" is a privilege, a "jus in re," perfect where there has never been possession, or where it has been lost or relinquished. To this familiar and well-established doctrine the lien for freight is an exception, but that for salvage is not. The Missouri (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 484, 490, 1 Spr. 280.

ADMIRALTY PROCEEDING.

As civil suit, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

Proceedings to confiscate real estate under the act of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels," etc., are not proceedings in admiralty, although the act declares that they shall be in rem and conform as near as may be to proceedings in admiralty and revenue cases. Ex parte Graham, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 541, 19 L. Ed. 981.

ADMISSION.

The term "admission," as used in an act transferring to the orphans' court the powers and duties formerly exercised by the ordinary relative to the "admission" of guardians, does not include the power of revocation, and hence does not authorize the orphans' court to revoke letters of guardianship. Tenbrook v. McCollm, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 333, 335.

The word "admission," relating to the admission of an attorney, means something more than merely permitting the appearance of persons who may present themselves in proper cases, without the right to practice. It is to be understood with reference to the long-established custom of admitting and licensing attorneys, not for a single occasion, but generally. In re Graduates (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Pr. 301, 336.

ADMISSION (In Evidence).

See "Solemn Admission."

An "admission" is the statement of a fact against the interest of the party making it; but it is not essential, to constitute it an admission, that the fact should have come under the personal observation of the declarant. Wasey v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 85 N. W. 459, 461, 126 Mich. 119 (citing Sparr v. Wellman, 11 Mo. 230).

An "admission" is a voluntary acknowledgment by a party of the existence of truth of certain facts. Statements contained in deeds are competent evidence against the parties executing them. Roosevelt v. Smith, 40 N. Y. Supp. 381, 383, 17 Misc. Rep. 323.

"An admission is a statement suggesting any inference as to any fact in issue, or relevant or deemed to be relevant to any such fact, made by or on behalf of any party to any proceedings. Chase, Steph. Dig. Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 57." Statements made by a witness to a party, derogatory to the latter, were held not admissions on the part of defendant. People v. Bushnell, 71 N. Y. Supp. 253, 254, 35 Misc. Rep. 452.

The word "admission," as used in an instruction, in the action on the contract of a father to convey or devise land to his son, that the jury might consider the "admission" made by the father during his lifetime as to any agreement with the son regarding the land described, was used synonymously with "declaration," and was not, therefore, error. Jamison v. Jamison, 84 N. W. 705, 706, 113 Iowa, 720.

With regard to admissions by one partner to bind his copartner, there is no distinction between the admission of an account and the admission of the fact; the same consequence follows from either admission. The admission of the fact determines the amount of liability which attaches to the other partner with as much certainty as if the partner had admitted the amount of the proceeds of property in the hands of the firm. Baker v. Stackpoole (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 420, 434, 18 Am. Dec. 508.

Admission, in a criminal trial, is a fact which may be proved as relevant to any fact in issue. It is not testimony; it is a fact to be proved by testimony, and cannot of itself support a conviction. State v. Willis, 41 Atl. 820, 824, 71 Conn. 293.

As agreement or promise.

"Admissions" are concessions or acknowledgments made by a party of the existence or truth of certain facts. It does not include a promise or an agreement to pay money, that being a fact to be proved like any other issuable fact. An "admission" may be made of this fact or concerning it, but the admission is not a fact. Thomas v. Paul, 58 N. W. 1031, 1032, 87 Wis. 607.

An admission of indebtedness contained in a statement that the account rendered is correct is not a contract, so as to give a right to a writ of attachment. Ordenstein v. Bones (Ariz.) 12 Pac. 614, 615.

A payment is treated as such an "admission" of the indebtedness as will remove the bar of the statute of limitations. Burr v. Williams, 20 Ark. 171, 188.

Admissions by acts.

The word "admission," as used in Gen. St. c. 73, § 8, as amended by Gen. Laws 1877, c. 40, providing that it shall not be competent for any party to an action to give evidence therein of any conversation or "admission" of a deceased or insane party, construed only to refer to "admissions" by words, and not to such acts as have the force and effect of "admissions." Chadwick v. Cornish, 1 N. W. 55, 57, 26 Minn. 28.

Admissions in writing.

The usual meaning attached to the word "admission" is broad enough to include written as well as oral admissions. Every written contract or statement in writing is in one sense of the word an admission made by each party who may sign it. Jackson v. Ely, 49 N. E. 792, 794, 57 Ohio St. 450.

Confession distinguished.

The term "admission" is usually applied to civil transactions and to those matters of fact in criminal cases which do not involve criminal intent, while the term "confession" is generally restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457, 461; Colburn v. Town of Groton, 28 Atl. 95, 96, 66 N. H. 151, 22 L. R. A. 763; State v. Porter, 49 Pac. 964, 966, 32 Or. 135.

A "confession" in criminal law is the voluntary declaration made by a person who has committed a crime or misdemeanor of the agency or participation which he had in the same. The term "admission" is usually applied to civil transactions, and to those matters of fact in criminal cases which do not involve criminal intent. The word "confession" relates to the acknowledgment of guilt, and "admission" relates to the acknowledgment of facts. Thus, where the evidence merely shows an admission of facts from which a conclusion of guilt might in a certain instance be drawn, the use of the word "confession" in a charge was erroneous. State v. Heidenreich, 45 Pac. 755, 29 Or. 381. Thus, where there is an admission of a fact or a bundle of facts from which guilt is directly deducible, or which within and of themselves import guilt, it may be denominated a "confession." But not so with an admission of a particular act or acts on circumstances which may or may not involve guilt, and which is dependent for such result upon other facts or circumstances to be established. But the statement of a person showing that he intentionally killed deceased is a confession, though his statements embraced the narration of acts designed to present an excuse for the killing. State v. Porter, 49 Pac. 964, 966, 32 Or. 135.

The term "admission" is usually applied to civil action, and "confession" to acknowledgment of guilt in criminal prosecution. Where statements are made by a defendant to an officer, they may be received as an admission against interest, even though they might be regarded as a confession in a criminal court. Notara v. De Kamalaris, 49 N. Y. Supp. 216, 219, 22 Misc. Rep. 337.

In an instruction in a criminal case that if the jury should find that defendant intentionally misstated material facts they might consider misstatements as "admissions" of guilt, the term "admissions" was not used as meaning "confessions," but as signifying admission by conduct from which guilt might be inferred, so that the instruction was not erroneous. Commonwealth v. Devaney, 64 N. E. 402, 404, 182 Mass. 33.

Conversation distinguished.

See "Conversation."

Offer to buy peace distinguished.

A distinction is taken between admission of particular facts and an offer of a sum of money to buy peace, for it must be permitted to men to buy their peace, without prejudice to them if the offer should not succeed. An offer to pay money is evidence when the party making it understands it to be and makes it as an admission of his liability. It is not evidence when he makes it for the purpose of averting litigation, not intending to admit his liability. Colburn v. Town of Groton, 28 Atl. 95, 96, 66 N. H. 151, 22 L. R. A. 763.

ADMISSION (In Pleading).

An admission in pleading dispenses with proof, and is equivalent to proof. In an action against a town for the expense of supporting an insane pauper at the state hospital, an admission in the answer that defendant had paid for one year's support of the pauper in such hospital is evidence of an admission of liability. Connecticut Hospital for the Insane v. Town of Brookfield, 36 Atl. 1017, 1018, 69 Conn. 1.

An "admission" in pleading is evidence against the party making it on the trial of the particular issue to which the admission relates, but an admission in one count of a declaration is not evidence against the plaintiff under any other count. Starkweather v. Kittle (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 20, 22.

An admission, in the language of the rule of the district court that plaintiff has a good cause of action as set forth in his petition, except so far as it might be defeated by the facts in the answer constituting a good defense, must be construed to mean that defendant admits every fact alleged in the petition which it is necessary for plaintiff to establish in the first instance to enable him to recover, but does not admit allegations in the petition which merely deny matter, alleged in the answer, the burden of proof of which is upon the defendant. Joy v. Liverpool, London & Globe Ins. Co. (Tex.) 74 S. W. 822, 823 (citing Smith v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 74 Tex. 541, 12 S. W. 221).

ADMISSION TO BAIL.

Admission to bail is the order of a competent court or magistrate that the defendant be discharged from actual custody upon the taking of bail. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4460; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1492.

Laws 1878, p. 142, defining "admission to bail" as an order of a competent court or magistrate that the defendant be discharged from actual custody on bail, does not mean the discharge itself, but the order of the court for the persons discharged, and hence an allegation in an action on an appeal bond that the accused was admitted to bail did not constitute an averment that the person was discharged from custody. People v. Solomon, 15 Pac. 4, 5 Utah, 277.

In an action on a bail bond, where the complaint alleged that the accused was "admitted to bail," such phrase meant the order of a court or magistrate for the prisoner's discharge, and not the discharge itself. People v. Solomon, 15 Pac. 4, 5 Utah, 277.

"Admitted to bail," as used in a petition, in an action to recover the penalty of a criminal bond, which alleges that the defendant is "admitted to bail," construed to mean that he was discharged on his own recognizance. Shelby County v. Simmonds, 33 Iowa, 345, 347.

ADMIT.

"The word 'admit' is defined thus: To permit; to suffer; to tolerate." Gregory v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1195, 1198, 17 Blatchf. 325.

A fact is not admitted or undisputed simply because a witness has so testified and the statement has not been directly contradicted, especially when it plainly appears that the court did not credit the statement. City of New Haven v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 44 Atl. 31, 33, 72 Conn. 225.

As grant.

"Admitted," as used in equity rule 88, declaring that a rehearing shall not be "granted" after the lapse of the term at which the final decree is entered, and providing that in nonappealable cases a petition for rehearing may be "admitted" before the end of the next term after final decree, should be construed as synonymous with the word "granted," and hence the effect of the rule is to deprive the court of the power to grant a rehearing in any case after the lapse of the term next succeeding the entry of a final decree. Glenn v. Dimmock (U. S.) 43 Fed. 550, 551.

As tolerate.

In an instruction that if the facts relating to the sale of the property in question "admit" of two constructions, one rendering it fraudulent and the other honest and valid, the latter must be accepted, "admit" is the synonym of "tolerate." A paraphrase of the sentence would be that, unless the testimony tending to prove the fraud is so clear as to admit of no other conclusion, then the jury must find the conveyance valid. Pollak v. Searcy, 4 South. 137, 139, 84 Ala. 259.

"Admit," as used in instruction to the effect that, if the facts relative to an alleged sale of property admit of two constructions, the one rendering it fraudulent and the other honest and valid, the latter must be accepted and acted upon, is synonymous with "tolerate." Skipper v. Reeves, 8 South. 804, 805, 93 Ala. 332.

ADMITTED TO BAIL.

See "Admission to Bail."

ADMIXTURE.

The use of the words "admixture or addition," in Act May 5, 1899 (P. L. 241), making it unlawful to manufacture or sell oleomargarine which shall be but an imitation of yellow butter, etc., indicates that the intention of the Legislature is to prohibit the imitation of yellow butter by any "admixture or addition" to oleomargarine during or after manufacture. McCann v. Commonwealth, 48 Atl. 470, 471, 198 Pa. 509.

ADM'R.

The abbreviation "Adm'r" will be judicially presumed to mean "administrator." Moseley's Adm'r v. Mastin, 37 Ala. 216, 221.

ADOPT—ADOPTION.

To "adopt" means to take or receive as one's own what is not so naturally; to select and take and approve. The record of a city council showing that a report was "received and filed" does not show an adoption. City of Dallas v. Beeman, 45 S. W. 626, 628, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 335.

County Government Act, § 25, subd. 9, giving the county board the power to cause a jail to be erected, but providing that such building shall not be erected or constructed until plans and specifications have been made therefor and "adopted" by the board, construed not to require an unconditional adoption by the board, but to be satisfied if adopted on condition that a responsible party may bid on the building for a sum not exceeding a certain amount. Hall v. Los Angeles County, 16 Pac. 313, 314, 74 Cal. 502.

Of child.

Webster defines "adopt," to take a stranger into one's family as son or heir; to take one who is not a child and treat it as one. People v. Norton (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 169, 195; Cofer v. Scroggins, 13 South. 115, 117, 98 Ala. 342, 39 Am. St. Rep. 54.

"Adoption" means an assumption of the relationship of parent and child, with all the consequences of that relationship. State v. Thompson, 13 La. Ann. 515, 518.

The adoption of child "is an act by which a person appoints as his heir the child of another (Rep. & L. Law Dict.); to receive and to treat as a son one who is the child of another (Worcester. Dict.); to take into one's family as son and heir; to take and treat as a child, giving a title to the privileges and rights of a child (Webst. Dict.) The Imperial Dictionary (England) employs substantially both the definitions of Worcester and Webster." Russell v. Russell, 3 South. 900, 84 Ala. 48.

Adoption is the taking into one's family the child of another as son and heir, conferring on it the title to the privileges and rights of a child; an act, in other words, by which a person appoints as his heir the child of another. The right in Alabama is purely statutory; it has never been recognized by the rule of the common law. Abney v. De Loach, 4 South. 757, 759, 84 Ala. 393.

Adoption is the act by which the relations of paternity and affiliation are recognized as legally existing between persons not so related by nature. Adoption was not recognized by the common law of England, and exists in the United States only by special statute; but among many of the continental nations it has been practiced from the remotest antiquity. It appears to have been a necessary concomitant of the type of archaic society when the family constituted the unit of the community, and was an important factor in developing society into the broader community called "the state." Maine, in his work on Ancient Law, says: "We must look on the family as constantly enlarged by the absorption of strangers within its circle, and we must try to regard the fiction of adoption as so closely simulated or related to kinship that neither law nor opinion makes the slightest difference between the real and adoptive connection." Adoption flourished and was regulated by law in both of the classical nations of antiquity. In Greece, in the interests of the next of kin whose rights were affected by adoption, it was provided that the registration should be attended with certain formalities, and that it should take place at a fixed time, the festival of Thargelia. In Rome the system was in vogue long before the time of Justinian, and the ceremonies to accomplish the result were cumbered with much formality, and he reduced the statement to a code which simplified the proceedings, from which modern legislation on the subject has derived its principles. Justinian's Code either required an imperial rescript or a proceeding before a magistrate to accomplish an adoption, and if resort was not had to an imperial rescript, and the person to be adopted was alieni juris, the parties appeared before a magistrate and executed a deed in his presence declaring that the person giving the child and the person receiving it were personally present and consented to the adoption; but it was sufficient if the consent of the party adopted were expressed by his not declaring his assent, "non contradicenti." The effect of adoption was to cast the succession on the adopted, in case the adopted father died intestate, and created the relation of paternity and affiliation not before recognized as legally existing, and the change of name was more an incident than the object of the proceedings. In re Sessions' Estate, 38 N. W. 249, 253, 70 Mich. 207, 14 Am. St. Rep. 500.

"To adopt" means to take a stranger into one's family as son and heir; that is, to take a child into one's family and to treat it as one's own, giving it the privileges and rights of a natural child. Adoption was unknown to the common law, but is familiar to the civilian, and under the Roman law the person adopted entered into the family and came under the power of the person adopting him, and the person adopted stood not only himself in relation of child to him adopting, but his children became the grandchildren of such person. The French law also admitted of adoption, and the adopted succeeded to the inheritance of the adoptor. Code Napoleon, art. 350. It was also known to the Spanish, and the person adopted succeeded as heir to him who adopted him (title 16, 4th Partidas). Therefore, by the common acceptance of the word, "adoption" means the relation of parent and child, with all the consequences of that relationship, and it cannot be said that the Legislature used the word in a more restrained sense. Vidal v. Commagere, 13 La. Ann. 516, 518.

Adoption was unknown to the common law, but was recognized under civil law jurisprudence. Its effect was to make a stranger the son and heir of the person adopting him. The person adopted entered the family and came under the power and head of the family. He stood in the relation of a child to his adopter, and his children became the grandchildren of such person. By the Spanish law the person adopted succeeded as heir to the one adopting him. According to the law as it existed in Mexico while Texas was under the dominion of that government, no person having a legitimate child living could adopt a stranger as coheir with his child. Eckford v. Knox, 2 S. W. 372, 373, 67 Tex. 200, 204.

"Adoption" is defined as to take or bring into relationship and confer the privileges belonging to that relation; to accept, receive, or choose as one's own, make one's own, accept from some one else. In other words, it is the act of the person who receives, not that of the person who gives. It is defined by the adoption statute as the legal act whereby an adult takes a minor into the relation of a child, and thereby acquires the rights and incurs the responsibilities of parent in respect to such minor.

Thus, under a statute authorizing charitable institutions to bind out children by adoption with some suitable person by a written statement of adoption, the act of the corporation from whose custody the child is taken in entering on a book that such child was adopted by such persons does not constitute an "adoption." Smith v. Allen, 53 N. Y. Supp. 114, 117, 32 App. Div. 374.

The statutes relative to adoption have never given to the word "adoption" the broad and unrestricted meaning, in so far as relates to the person adopted, that it had during early periods of the public law, when the adoptant was entitled to the property of the son, and exercised towards him all the rights and privileges of a father; in short, when the relationship was to all intents and purposes the same as existed between natural father and son, when persons brought into a family by adoption obtained the same rights as if they had been born in that family, and when, on the other hand, persons who passed out of a family by adoption, which brought them under a new patria potestas, lost all which had been theirs by birth. And under the statute the adoptant does not acquire any right over the minor's property. Succession of Unforsake, 19 South. 602, 48 La. Ann. 546.

Where illegitimate children lived with their mother and were supported by the insured, who was their father, the fact that in his application he used the term "adopted children" could not have deceived the insurer. Statutory adoption changes the name of children to those of the adopted parents. In the case in issue, their names remained as that of the mother. Hanley v. Supreme Tent Knights of Maccabees, 77 N. Y. Supp. 246, 38 Misc. Rep. 161.

Same—As affecting inheritance.

"Adoption" is the act by which a person appoints as his heir the child of another. Bray v. Miles, 54 N. E. 446, 448, 23 Ind. App. 432.

"To adopt a child implies of itself, without more, that the child adopted possesses a right to inherit from the adopted parent." Fosburg v. Rogers, 21 S. W. 82, 84, 114 Mo. 122, 19 L. R. A. 201.

Laws 1873, c. 830, defines "adoption" as the legal act whereby an adult person takes a minor into the relation of child, and thereby acquires the rights and incurs the responsibilities of parent in respect to such minor. Under this definition the ability of an adopted child to inherit is distinct and apart from all the substantial elements entering into the relation by adoption. The meaning of adoption is that the child shall be adopted and treated in all respects as the parent's own lawful child should be treated, while the matter of inheritance is entirely between the child and the state. Dodin v. Dodin, 40 N. Y. Supp. 748, 749, 17 Misc. Rep. 35.

The word "adopt," as used in an instrument containing the provision that, although the present instrument binds the above-named child strictly as an apprentice, it is nevertheless the true intention of the parties that said apprentice be received as an "adopted" child, is a broad term, and of great significance. Webster's Dictionary defines "adoption" to be the act of adopting or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child. The Encyclopædia Britannica defines it to be "the act by which the relations of fraternity and affiliation are recognized as legally existing between persons not so related by nature." An adopted child is entitled to inheritance in the estate of its adopted parents. Simmons v. Burrell, 8 Misc. Rep. 388, 402, 23 N. Y. Supp. 625, 633.

"Adoption" of children was a thing unknown to the common law, but was a familiar practice under the Roman or civil law, and our modern statutes of adoption are taken from the latter, and so far modify the rules of common law as to the succession of property. Butterfield v. Sawyer, 58 N. E. 602, 604, 187 Ill. 598, 52 L. R. A. 75, 79 Am. St. Rep. 246.

Adopted children "are not children of the person by whom they have been adopted," though the right to inherit from the adopting parent is made complete, since the identity of the child is not changed. "One adopted has the rights of a child without being a child," and hence an adopted child of one to whom a life estate is given, with a contingent remainder to her children, takes no interest in the remainder. Schafer v. Eneu (Pa.) 4 Smith, 304, 306.

An "adopted child" by the event of adoption becomes the legal child of the adopting parent, and stands as to the property of the adopting parent in the same right as a child born in lawful wedlock, save in so far as the exceptions in the statute authorizing the adoption declare otherwise. And, when the statute authorizes a full and complete adoption, the child adopted thereunder acquires all of the legal rights and capacities, including that of inheritance, of a natural child, and is under the same duties. Virgin v. Marwick, 55 Atl. 520, 521, 97 Me. 578.

Same—As legitimization.

The term "adopts," as used in Civ. Code, § 230, providing that the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby "adopts" it as such, should be construed in the sense of "legitimizes"; and the acts of the father of an illegitimate child, if filling the measure required by the statute, would result, strictly speaking, in the legitimation of such child, rather than in its adoption. "Adoption," properly considered, refers to persons who are strangers in blood, and is not synonymous with "legitimation," which refers to persons where the blood relation exists. Blythe v. Ayres, 31 Pac. 915, 916, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40.

The expression "adopted into his family," as used in Comp. St. c. 23, § 31, providing that no illegitimate child shall be allowed to claim any part of the estate of his father or mother unless he is by the parent "adopted into his family," means taken in, given the family name, and treated and currently recognized as a child. Morton's Estate v. Morton, 87 N. W. 182, 184, 62 Neb. 420.

Of constitution.

The expression "adoption by the people," as used in article 6 of the Constitution of the state, which took effect January 1, 1870, providing that the act shall take effect on its "adoption by the people," meant that it should take effect when the result of the submission to the people was declared by the state board of canvassers. Real v. People, 42 N. Y. 272, 282; People v. Gardner, 45 N. Y. 812, 813.

As used in an amendment to the Constitution providing that "the existing county courts are continued and the judges thereof in office at the 'adoption' of this article shall hold their offices until the expiration of their respective terms," the word "adoption" means when the amendment should become of force as part of the organic law, and not a time prior to that, when it could have no voice or force or effect whatever, when the electors decided that it should form part of their Constitution and become of force at a future day. People v. Norton (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 169, 191.

The word "adoption," as used in reference to the adoption of a state Constitution, means the time the territory was admitted as a state, and not the final passage of the Constitution by the convention, nor the time of its subsequent ratification by a vote of the people, since it was not until the territory was admitted as a state that the proposed Constitution became actual and effective, and only after such time did it constitute a real subsisting Constitution, possessing the force of law. Board of Crook County Com'rs v. Rollins Inv. Co., 27 Pac. 683, 685, 3 Wyo. 470.

Of contract or act.

In reference to the "adoption" and ratification of a contract, there is in their primary signification a manifest difference between the two. The one signifies to take and receive as one's own that with reference to which there existed no prior relation, either colorable or otherwise; while the other is a confirmation, approval, or sanctioning of a previous act, or an act done in the name or on behalf of the person ratifying without sufficient or legal authority; that is to say, the confirmation of a voidable act. But as relating to contracts, some lexicographers treat them as synonymous. Thus, when a person affirms a voidable contract, or ratifies a contract made by his agent beyond his authority, he is said to adopt it. And a corporation will be bound by contracts made on its own behalf by promoters before organization, if, after it is organized, with full knowledge of all the facts, it assumes the contract and agrees to pay the consideration, or accepts and retains the benefit, whether such act is called adoption or ratification. Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Mills Co., 43 Pac. 719, 720, 29 Or. 1.

The terms "adopt and ratify" are properly applicable only to contracts made by a party acting or presuming to act for another. The latter may then adopt or ratify the act of the former, however unauthorized. To adoption and ratification there must be some relation, actual or assumed, of principal or agent. Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542, 551; Shepardson v. Gillette, 31 N. E. 788, 789, 133 Ind. 125. Hence, a board of trustees of a civil town having no authority to levy a tax for a special school fund, such unauthorized levy for such purpose by it cannot be legalized by ratification by the board of trustees of the school town. Shepardson v. Gillett, 31 N. E. 788, 789, 133 Ind. 125.

The term "adoption," as used in reference to the adoption of a contract by a person not a party thereto, "implies assent to the contract as it is. Adoption cannot imply the insertion of a new party to the contract, or any additional obligation arising from it as it stands." Barker v. Berry, 8 Mo. App. 446, 449.

The adoption by a corporation of a contract of its promoter is, in legal effect, the making of the contract by the corporation as of the date of the adoption, and not as of some former date. McArthur v. Times Printing Co., 51 N. W. 216, 217, 48 Minn. 319, 31 Am. St. Rep. 653.

"Adopted" is properly applied only to contracts made by a party assuming to act for another. It is frequently used in reference to confirmation or renewal of contracts of infants and of persons of unsound mind, but not properly in their technical sense. It is not a correct expression to say that a person "adopts" his own act. That which is his own is already so, and needs no adoption. The word "adoption" implies that some other person has acted other than the person who adopts it. Minnich v. Darling, 36 N. E. 173, 175, 8 Ind. App. 539.

The use of the term "adoption" in an instruction on the question of the "adoption" of a bank in the illegal act of its cashier so as to bind the bank and render it liable for the cashier's act, without expressly defining the term "adoption," was not objectionable, since the word was not a word of rare use, nor was it also a technical term applicable to any branch of learning or science, but was a word in common use and commonly understood, and is applicable to the case, and, as used in the instruction, it was used in its usual and ordinary acceptation to mean "acceptance," etc. Iowa State Sav. Bank v. Black, 59 N. W. 283, 284, 91 Iowa, 490.

Of resolution.

The term "adoption," as used in the charter of a city, regulating the "adoption" of resolutions for the imposition of taxes, means a passage of the resolution by both boards of the city council. In re Douglass (N. Y.) 58 Barb. 174, 176.

Of text-books.

Under the general school law providing that when text-books shall be once adopted they shall not be changed for five years, books are "adopted" when such action as the statute provides is taken, and not when every other book then in use has been removed and a new one substituted. Attorney General v. Board of Education (Mich.) 95 N. W. 746, 749.

ADOPTED CHILD.

See "Adopt—Adoption."

As child, see "Child—Children."

ADOPTED CITIZENS.

Within the meaning of Act Cong. May 2, 1890, providing that executions on judgments of other than Indian courts shall not be valid for sale of improvements on land owned by the Indian nation, and, on return of nulla bona on an execution on a judgment against an "adopted citizen" of any Indian tribe, such improvements may be subjected to the payment of the judgment by decree of the court rendering the judgment, by the phrase "adopted citizen" is meant all citizens not of the blood; that is, those who have been adopted by the nation, either by treaty or by act of the Indian Legislature. Those who have been adopted by treaty are intermarried white men, and negroes who were slaves to an Indian, and their descendants. Hampton v. Mays (Indian Ter.) 69 S. W. 1115, 1116.

ADOPTED HEIR.

The term "adopted heir" may properly be used to designate a child by adoption, who is "in a limited sense made an heir, not by the law, but by the contract evidenced by the deed of adoption." In re Sessions' Es- tate, 38 N. W. 249, 254, 70 Mich. 297, 14 Am. St. Rep. 500.

ADRIFT.

"Adrift" is properly applied to the condition of seaweed which has not been deposited on shore, but which during flood tide is moved by each rising and receding wave, although the bottom of the mass may touch the beach, and hence, under the Massachusetts statutes, such seaweed did not vest in the riparian proprietor. Anthony v. Gifford, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 549, 550.

ADS.

The word "ads" means ad sectam, which means "at the suit of." Bowen v. Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Mach. Co., 86 Ill. 11, 12.

ADULT.

As children, see "Child—Children."

"Adult," as used in Pen. Code, art. 496, subd. 5, declaring an aggravated assault to be one committed by an "adult" male on the person of a female or a child, or by an "adult" female on a child, signifies a person who has attained the full age of 21 years, according to its well-defined meaning, both in law and its common acceptation, which makes an adult one of full age, or one who has reached the years of manhood, the term "adult" and the phrase "having arrived at the age of 21 years" being used interchangeably. Schenault v. State, 10 Tex. App. 410, 411; George v. State, 11 Tex. App. 95, 96; Hall v. State, 16 Tex. App. 6, 10, 49 Am. Rep. 824; Henkel v. State (Tex.) 11 S. W. 671, 672; Galbraith v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 607.

"Adult" within the provisions of a statute providing for the prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors on petition by the majority of the adult inhabitants of the district, means all males of the age of 21 years, and females of the age of 18. Wilson v. Lawrence (Ark.) 69 S. W. 570, 571.

Where an indictment alleges an assault by an "adult male," and the evidence showed that the defendant was "a railroad hand," and he was spoken of as "a man," and there was no question raised below as to his being an adult, the Supreme Court will not reverse a conviction for lack of specific proof of such fact. Henkel v. State, 11 S. W. 671, 672, 27 Tex. App. 510.

ADULTERATED—ADULTERATION.

Base as synonymous, see "Base."

Adulteration is the act of corrupting or debasing; the act of mixing something impure or spurious with something pure or genuine, or an inferior article with a superior one of the same kind. Grosvenor v. Duffy, 80 N. W. 19, 20, 121 Mich. 220; Commonwealth v. Hufnal, 39 Atl. 1052, 185 Pa. 378.

Beer or wine.

The placing of salicylic acid in any quantity in beer to be sold as food, such beer being placed on sale without a label on the package notifying the purchaser that it contains such an ingredient, is, when found to be poisonous or deleterious to health by its continuous or indiscriminate use, an "adulteration" within the meaning of Ohio Pure Food Law (as amended April 22, 1890) § 3, par. "b," cl. 7. State v. Hutchinson, 45 N. E. 1043, 1044, 55 Ohio St. 573.

All liquors denominated as wine containing alcohol, "except such as shall be produced from the natural fermentation of pure, undried grape juice," or compounded with distilled spirits, or by both methods, whether denominated as wine or by any other name whatsoever, in the nature of articles for use as beverages, except compound wine, or for compounding with other liquors for such use, and all compounds of the same with pure wine, and all preserved fruit juices compounded with substances not produced from undried fruit, in character of or intended for use as beverages, and all wines (including all grades and kinds) which contain, or in the production or manufacture of which, any glucose, or uncrystallized grape or starch sugar, or cider, or pomace of grapes out of which the juice has been pressed or extracted, known as "grape cheese," has been used, and all wines, imitations of wines, or other beverages produced from fruit into which carbonic acid gas has been artificially injected, or which shall contain any alum, baryta, salts, caustic lime, carbonate of soda, carbonate of potash, carbonic acid, salts of lead, salicylic acid, or any other antiseptic coloring matter (other than produced from undried fruit or pure sugar), essence of either, or any foreign substance whatever, which is injurious to health, shall be denominated as "adulterated wine." Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4200—56.

Butter or oleomargarine.

The term "adulterated butter," as used in an act relating to oleomargarine, is defined to mean a grade of butter produced by mixing, reworking, rechurning in milk or cream, refining, or in any way producing a uniform, purified, or improved product from different lots or parcels of melted or unmelted butter or butter fat in which any acid, alkali, chemical, or any substance whatever is introduced or used for the purpose or with the effect of deodorizing or removing therefrom rancidity, or any butter or butter fat with which there is mixed any substance foreign to butter, with intent or effect of cheapening in cost the product, or any butter in the manufacture or manipulation of which any process or material is used with intent or effect of causing the absorption of abnormal quantities of water, milk, or cream. Supp. U. S. Comp. St. 1903, p. 267.

The act of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like butter is not "adulteration." Grosvenor v. Duffy, 80 N. W. 19, 20, 121 Mich. 220.

Drug.

A drug shall be deemed to be adulterated: (1) If, when sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity laid down therein. (2) If, when sold under or by a name not recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, but which is found in some other pharmacopœia, or other standard work on materia medica, it differs materially from the standard of strength, quality, or purity laid down in such work. (3) If its strength and purity fall below the professed standard under which it is sold. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 1175, § 75; Code Miss. 1892, §§ 2096, 2097; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 60, c. 75, § 18.

Food.

An article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated: (1) If any substance or substances have been mixed with it so as to lower or depreciate or injuriously affect its quality, strength, or purity. (2) If any inferior or cheaper substance or substances have been substituted wholly or in part for it. (3) If any valuable or necessary constituent or ingredient has been wholly or in part abstracted from it. (4) If it is an imitation of, or is sold under the name of, another article. (5) If it consists wholly or in part of a diseased, decomposed, putrid, infected, tainted, or rotten animal or vegetable substance or article, whether manufactured or not; or, in case of milk, if it is the produce of a diseased animal. (6) If it is colored, coated, polished, or powdered, whereby damage or inferiority is concealed; or if by any means it is made to appear better or of greater value than it really is. (7) If it contains any added substance or ingredient which is poisonous or injurious to health. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 3, col. 318, § 16; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 5012; Code Miss. 1892, § 2096; Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 1175, § 75. If it contains any added antiseptic or preservative substance, except common table salt, saltpeter, cane sugar, alcohol, vinegar, spices, or, in smoked food, the natural products of the smoking process. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 660, c. 75, § 18.

Milk.

The dilution of milk with water is adulteration. One of the definitions of the term "adulteration" given by Worcester is to corrupt by some foreign mixture, or by intermixing what is less valuable. People v. West (N. Y.) 44 Hun, 162, 164, 6 N. Y. Cr. R. 382, 384.

Whether mixing water with milk was intended by the terms of the statute to "adulterate" milk is a matter of doubt. The evident intent of the statute was to prevent the traffic in impure and unwholesome milk. Whether the addition of water to milk, without any other ingredient, renders it impure or unwholesome, is certainly not so clearly settled as to enable the court so to find without some evidence to establish the fact. People v. Fauerback (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 311, 312.

The sale as skim milk of milk from which the cream had been removed by the "centrifugal" method, instead of by the old-fashioned skimming process, is not a sale of an adulteration. Commonwealth v. Hufnal, 39 Atl. 1052, 185 Pa. 376.

"Adulterate" means to corrupt, to make impure by a mixture of baser materials; that is to say, to inject something into the thing. This definition agrees with the spirit of the law prohibiting the sale of adulterated milk, and, where the statute authorizes the sale of skim milk with more than 6 per cent. of the cream, such skim milk with 6 per cent. is not adulterated. "Adulterated milk" means milk to which any foreign substance has been added. Commonwealth v. Hough, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 51, 53.

As used in the act relating to the sale of impure milk, "adulteration" means the addition of water or ice to the milk. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 1, col. 1271, § 449.

If the milk is shown, upon analysis, to contain more than 88 per cent. of watery fluid, or to contain less than 12 per cent. solids, not less than one-fourth of which must be fat, it shall be deemed, for the purpose of the chapter relating to adulteration, to be adulterated, and not of good standard quality, except during the months of May and June, when milk containing less than 11½ per cent. of milk solids shall be deemed to be not of good quality. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4200-12.

ADULTERY.

See "Double Adultery"; "Single Adultery."

"Adultery" is illicit sexual intercourse between two persons one of whom is married. Banks v. State, 11 South. 404, 405, 96 Ala. 78; Hull v. Hull, 2 Strob. Eq. 174, 175; Territory v. Whitcomb, 1 Mont. 359, 362, 25 Am. Rep. 740; Dinkev v. Commonwealth, 17 Pa. (5 Harris) 126, 129, 55 Am. Dec. 542. Or both of them may be married. State v. Fellows, 6 N. W. 239, 50 Wis. 65; State v. Mahan, 46 N. W. 855, 81 Iowa, 121.

"Adultery" is the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with one not the husband or wife. Aitchison v. Aitchison, 68 N. W. 573, 574, 99 Iowa, 93; Lyman v. People, 64 N. E. 974, 198 Ill. 544; Helfrich v. Commonwealth, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 68, 70, 75 Am. Dec. 579.

"Adultery" is the unlawful voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with one of the opposite sex, whether married or single. Cook v. State, 11 Ga. 53, 56, 56 Am. Dec. 410. It is sexual intercourse between a married person and one of the opposite sex, whether married or single. Miner v. People, 58 Ill. 59, 60; Respublica v. Roberts (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 6, 7; In re Smith, 37 Pac. 1099, 1100, 2 Okl. 153. The offense cannot be committed by an unmarried person. Respublica v. Roberts (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 6, 7. When the crime is committed between parties only one of whom is married, both are guilty of adultery. St. Okl. p. 468, § 2173; In re Smith, 37 Pac. 1099, 1100, 2 Okl. 153; State v. Whealey, 59 N. W. 211, 5 S. D. 427.

"Adultery" by the Roman law was limited to illicit sexual intercourse with a married woman. State v. Fellows, 6 N. W. 239, 240, 50 Wis. 65.

Criminal intercourse between a married man and an unmarried woman is not adultery. State v. Searle, 56 Vt. 516, 518; State v. Lash, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 380, 384, 32 Am. Dec. 397.

"Adultery" is illicit connection by a married man with an unmarried woman as well as with a married woman. Pickett v. Pickett, 7 N. W. 144, 27 Minn. 299; Helfrich v. Commonwealth, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 68, 70, 75 Am. Dec. 579; State v. Fellows, 6 N. W. 239, 240, 50 Wis. 65.

"Adultery" is sexual intercourse between a married woman and a single man or a married one not her husband. Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 267, 26 Am. Rep. 21.

"Adultery" is when a married woman has sexual intercourse with any other person than her husband, and such intercourse is adultery in both parties, and is so called from its tendency to produce an adulterated, spurious, or counterfeit issue, and no other connection between the sexes is adultery, for from no other connection can such consequences follow. Ohio v. Connaway (Ohio) Tapp. 90, 91; State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 261, 263, 69 Am. Dec. 59.

"Adultery" is not a crime which, like conspiracy, is one which consists in the concurring act of two or more, necessitating that such joint action be alleged and proved. One person may be alone guilty of it. The act of sexual intercourse by a married man with an unmarried woman, or by an unmarried man with a married woman, is adultery in the man, without regard to the guilt of the woman. It is an act committed by him, between him and the woman, although she is not a criminal or conscious participant. That a man cannot commit rape upon a married woman without also committing adultery, only shows that he commits both crimes by one act, which includes all the elements of both. Upon an indictment against a man and a married woman for adultery, the man may be alone convicted, although at the time the act was committed the woman was in such a state of stupefaction as to be incapable of consent. Commonwealth v. Bakeman, 131 Mass. 577, 578, 41 Am. Rep. 248.

"Adultery" at the common law was not denounced as a crime. As the basis of a civil right of action it consisted only of a man having sexual intercourse with a married woman other than his wife, thereby introducing the danger of spurious issue of the marriage. State v. Hasty (Iowa) 96 N. W. 1115.

Where one of two statutes makes "adultery" a ground for divorce, and the other a criminal offense, "adultery" as a ground for divorce is not used in the restricted sense in which it is used in the statute, making it a criminal offense which requires it to be committed with a married woman, but in the more enlarged sense in which it is commonly used. "In a civil light, as a violation of the marriage contract, no distinction is made between illicit connection by a married man with a married or unmarried woman. In either case, for the purpose of a divorce, he is guilty of 'adultery.'" Pickett v. Pickett, 7 N. W. 144, 27 Minn. 299.

Adultery is sexual intercourse between a married woman and any man other than her husband. Names v. State, 50 N. E. 401, 20 Ind. App. 168 (citing State v. Smith, 47 N. E. 685, 18 Ind. App. 179).

Every act of adultery implies three things: First, the opportunity; secondly, the disposition in the mind of the adulterer; thirdly, the same in the mind of the particeps criminis. And the proposition is substantially true that whenever these three are found to concur the criminal act is committed. Jayne v. Jayne, 25 N. Y. Supp. 810, 811, 5 Misc. Rep. 307.

The term "adultery," as used in the chapter relating to offenses against chastity, morality, and decency, has the same meaning as when used in reference to the causes of a divorce, and the same which it bears according to the common usage of the language. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 11,689.

Marriage of one party necessary.

To constitute adultery under the statute, it is necessary that at least one of the parties to the act of sexual intercourse be married, and both may be.—State v. Mahan, 46 N. W. 855, 856, 81 Iowa, 121.

To constitute adultery, one of the parties must be married, as it imports a violation of the marriage bed. Under an indictment for adultery, one cannot be convicted of fornication. Smitherman v. State, 27 Ala. 23, 24.

Marriage of one party sufficient.

Adultery may be committed in three ways: By a married man having sexual intercourse with an unmarried woman, by a married woman having the same with an unmarried man, and by either having the like intercourse with a married person of the opposite sex other than such person's husband or wife. When the crime is committed between parties only one of whom is married, both are guilty of adultery under the statutes. State v. Roth, 17 Iowa, 336, 340; State v. Wilson, 22 Iowa, 364, 366.

"Adultery" is the illicit intercourse between two persons of different sexes, where either is married. White v. State, 74 Ala. 31, 34.

The term "adultery" has a more comprehensive signification than in the civil law, and renders both parties implicated equally liable for punishment if either the man or woman be married; but adultery can only be committed by parties one of whom at least is married, and by parties who are not married to each other. State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 261, 263, 69 Am. Dec. 59.

Where two persons live together in a state of cohabitation, one of them being married, they are both guilty of adultery. Parks v. State, 3 Tex. App. 337, 338.

Illicit intercourse between an unmarried man and a married woman is fornication in the man, and not adultery. Commonwealth v. Lafferty (Va.) 6 Grat. 672, 673.

Adultery is the unlawful voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with one of the opposite sex, and when the crime is committed between parties only one of whom is married both are guilty of adultery. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 68.

Other sexual offenses distinguished.

Adultery and bastardy are two separate and distinct offenses, and therefore the fact that the governor pardoned a man convicted of the crime of adultery did not toll his punishment for bastardy, or the judgment rendered against him for the maintenance of the bastard child, since such maintenance is designed to relieve the public from the cost of maintaining paupers, and has nothing whatever to do with the punishment of the other crime. Duncan v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 449, 451.

"Adultery" is the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than the offender's husband or wife, whether the latter is married or single. The offense of the married person is adultery, and of the unmarried person fornication. Lyman v. People, 64 N. E. 974, 198 Ill. 544.

"Adultery," as used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 466, providing that every person who shall live in open and notorious adultery or fornication shall be punished, etc., should be construed to mean sexual connection between a married woman and an unmarried man or a married man other than her own husband. Strictly, adultery consists in carnal connection with another man's wife. Such an act is adultery, and not fornication, and the sexual intercourse of any man with a married woman is adultery in both. The woman must not be single. As distinguished by Bacon in his Abridgment, Marriage and Divorce, 569, "Fornication is unlawful because children are begotten without any care for their education, but adultery goes further, as it entails a spurious race on a party for whom he is under no obligation to provide." Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 267, 26 Am. Rep. 21.

Fornication is not a common-law offense, and therefore both the information and proof under it must conform to the statute which prescribes the penalty. The commonly accepted legal meaning of "fornication" is illicit sexual connection between a man and woman as husband and wife, not being such. By Rev. St. § 4580, when a man commits fornication with a single woman both of them shall be punished. The offense is limited to a man and a single woman, thus creating a clear distinction between fornication and adultery, which latter crime can be committed only by a married man or with a married woman. The crime of rape may be committed upon an unmarried woman not the wife of the defendant. The crime of incest can be committed only with a woman of certain consanguinity or relationship with the man. The crimes of incest, adultery, and fornication differ, therefore, only as to the persons, while the crime of rape differs from the other crimes against chastity both as to the person and the manner of sexual connection, as by force and against the will of the woman. State v. Shear, 8 N. W. 287, 51 Wis. 460.

By "fornication" is meant illicit carnal connection; unlawful sexual intercourse. This unlawful intercourse, unaccompanied by any circumstances which tend to aggravate it, is simply fornication; and when, as the result of such fornication, a child is born, it is called "bastardy." If a man who is married is guilty of unlawful sexual intercourse, we call it "adultery" in him. When the act is between the parties sustaining relations to each other within certain degrees of consanguinity or affinity, we call it "incest." Where the female consents to unlawful intercourse through fraudulent acts, including a promise of marriage, we call it "seduction." In each case the essential fact which constitutes the crime is fornication. People v. Rouse, 2 Mich. (N. P.) 209, 210.

Adultery and fornication, while of the same grade, are essentially different offenses. To commit the former, one of the parties at least must be at the time a married person. Whether, if one of the offenders be married and the other single, the latter commits the offense of adultery or fornication the authorities are not in harmony. The better opinion seems to be that in such case the married offender is guilty of adultery, and the unmarried one of fornication. The offense of fornication proper is committed when neither of the offending parties is married. Buchanan v. State, 55 Ala. 154, 157.

"Adultery" is an unlawful carnal connection by a married person with another than his or her husband or wife, and the fact that the act was forcibly committed, and without the woman's consent, did not prevent the crime from constituting "adultery" on the part of the man, though it also amounted to rape. State v. Chambers, 53 N. W. 1090, 1092, 87 Iowa, 1, 43 Am. St. Rep. 349.

Single act.

Pen. Code, art. 567, providing that homicide is justifiable when committed by the husband on the person of any one taken in the act of "adultery" with the wife, did not mean the adultery which is defined as a specific offense, which is the living together, but ecclesiastical adultery—adultery as it is known in common parlance; violation of the marriage bed, whether the adultery consisted of but one act, or whether the parties lived in habitual carnal intercourse. Price v. State, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 474, 484, 51 Am. Rep. 322.

At common law adultery was not a crime, but adultery was made punishable by the ecclesiastical courts, and according to the ecclesiastical law unlawful sexual intercourse by a married man with another woman than his wife, whether she be married or single, constitutes adultery. Under section 208 of the Criminal Code, a single act of sexual intercourse by a married man with an unmarried woman constitutes the crime of adultery. State v. Byrum, 83 N. W. 207, 208, 60 Neb. 384.

A single act of unlawful sexual intercourse falls within the definition of "adultery" or "fornication," according as the party is married or not. State v. Brown, 23 N. E. 747, 748, 47 Ohio St. 102, 21 Am. St. Rep. 790.

ADVANCE—ADVANCES.

See "Agricultural Advances"; "To be Advanced."

See, also, "Moneys Advanced."
All advances, see "All."

To "advance" money is to pay it before it is due, or it is to furnish money for a spec-lified purpose, understood between the parties, the money or some equivalent to be returned; and this is its meaning as used in Rev. St. § 1001, providing that all contracts whereby any money is advanced to any person gaming or betting shall be void. Kinney v. Hynds, 49 Pac. 403, 404, 7 Wyo. 22. A like construction is given to the term as used in a contract for the production of an opera by defendants, which provided that the defendant would "advance" a certain sum for the drawings, which sum was to be deducted from the first fees due to the plaintiffs under the contract. Thorne v. French, 24 N. Y. Supp. 694, 696, 4 Misc. Rep. 436.

An "advance" is money paid before due on goods sold on credit, by way of accommodation, in expectation of reimbursement; and one who has paid more money or furnished more goods to another person than the latter is entitled to is said to be in advance to him. Lee v. Byrne, 75 Ala. 132, 133. Such is its meaning as used in St. 1869, p. 104, § 1, providing that any officer or person who has presented a claim against the state for services or "advances" authorized by law, which claim the board of examiners or state auditor has refused to allow, may commence an action for the recovery thereof. Ormsby County v. State, 6 Nev. 283, 287.

"Advance," as used in a contract between an inventor and a manufacturer, providing that the former should manufacture the article which he had invented, and that the corporation should "advance" to him from time to time certain materials entering into the composition of the article, meant "supply beforehand." Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 117, 24 L. Ed. 973.

The term "advances" does not, in ordinary cases, include money expended for the children's support. Its etymological and its ordinary use indicates money paid before or in advance of the proper time of payment. Thus, it is used as to moneys paid before the completion of work under a contract, and as to property given to a child at his full age or majority, and which is received in anticipation of the share which he will have in his parent's estate at their decease. Vall v. Vall (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 69, 73.

The word "advances," in St. 1869, p. 104, relating to claims for services or advances to the state, is used in its popular sense, and includes rents of buildings used by the state. Ormsby County v. State, 6 Nev. 283, 287.

Under articles of copartnership between an inventor and another, by which such other agreed to pay all expenses of obtaining future patents in this and foreign countries, and to have a half interest therein, and to also have a half interest in other patents upon paying such sum as he and his partner should agree therefor, and that he should advance all necessary moneys, funds, etc., for obtaining, protecting, and insuring the promotion and development of the inventions, improvements, and patents of which he is the joint owner with such inventor, and in consideration thereof should be repaid and reimbursed in full for all such expense so incurred from amounts derived and deducted from moneys or equivalent consideration received by the copartnership, on the dissolution of such firm such partner is entitled to reimbursement for the moneys advanced under the last-mentioned article, but not for moneys paid in procuring patents or for a half interest therein. The word "payment" indicates a finality; the word "advancement" indicates the return of the money advanced in some way; and the articles provided for the return only of those sums termed "advancements" therein, and not to the sums referred to as payments. Henderson v. Ries (U. S.) 108 Fed. 709, 711, 712, 47 C. C. A. 625.

Advancement distinguished.

Where a testator has money in the hands of his sons, and refers in his will to such moneys as "loaned or advanced," the word "advanced" means the payment or delivery of money for the purpose of a loan, and not an advancement from a parent to a child for a settlement in life. In re Luqueer's Estate (N. Y.) 1 Tuck. 236, 240.

Advancement is used to distinguish money or property given by a father to his child as a portion of his estate, and to be taken into account in the final partition or distribution thereof; and the word "advance" is not an appropriate term for money or property thus furnished, but in legal parlance has a different and far broader signification, and may be used to characterize a loan or a gift of money advanced, to be repaid conditionally. Chase v. Ewing (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 597, 612.

"Advances," as used in a will reciting, "I have made 'advances' to my children which are charged to them, and I may make further 'advances' to them, which may be charged on the books to their respective accounts," is used in the sense of furnishing; supplying in advance of the final distribution of the will. It is absurd to suppose that the word was used as equivalent to the technical word "advancements." In the nature of things, it is not possible for the testator to have intended by "advances" the same thing as "advancements," for that involves an intention, at the time of supplying the money, that it shall be such. Cowen v. Adams (U. S.) 78 Fed. 536, 546, 24 C. C. A. 198.

"Advances," as used in a will devising certain property to testator's son, and stating that with "advances" made by the testator to such son it would make the share of the latter equal to the share of testator's other children, construed to include not only "advancements," but also any benefits conferred on the son by the testator in his lifetime, and which he might reasonably consider to have been such an appropriation of his estate as, added to what he bequeathed him, would make him equal with his other sons. Baker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477, 488.

Change of title involved.

An "advance" to a child by a parent is a transfer of the property advanced to the child, divesting the parent and investing the child with the title. Knight v. Oliver (Va.) 12 Grat. 33-37.

Where a contract provided that a company should make "advances" of money and materials to a manufacturer in consideration that he turn his product over to them for sale, the term "advance" meant to "supply beforehand," to "loan before work is done" or goods are made, and the advances became the property of the manufacturer, and were not a bailment so as to entitle the corporation to replevy them when levied on under a judgment against the manufacturer. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 117, 24 L. Ed. 973.

Loan equivalent.

"Advance," as used in a contract by which a party agreed to purchase the master's certificate of sale of property under foreclosure, the owner's right to redeem from which had expired, and hold the same for his own benefit unless such owner should pay the amount "advanced" within a certain time, does not mean that the money advanced should be regarded as a loan to be repaid. Carpenter v. Plagge, 61 N. E. 530, 533, 192 Ill. 82.

"Advance," as used in Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 23, § 113, giving power to an insurance company to "advance" money on any property, real or personal, is not equivalent to "loan," as used in section 69, providing that no loan of money shall be made by any corporation to any stockholder, but that the section shall not apply to any building or homestead association, or any association for the loaning of money on real or personal property. Fisher v. Parr, 48 Atl. 621, 628, 92 Md. 245.

"Advances," as used in a clause in a will reciting that testator has loaned money to his children in certain sums which he wishes to be considered as "advances," and to be deducted from their share in his estate, construed to include the bond of one of the children to the father, as the words "loan" and "advance" were apparently used interchangeably. Appeal of Wright, 93 Pa. 82, 97; Id., 89 Pa. 67, 70.

A will provided that it was testator's desire that on the division of his property among his children each one should be charged with all money or property he had received from him, so as to make him share equally in the property to be divided and in advances. It is held that the word "advances" should be construed to mean loans as well as gifts or advancements. Nolan's Ex'rs v. Bolton, 25 Ga. 352, 355.

"Advances" are not always loans, but may mean, in an offer to make advances on a legacy, that the legacies are to be purchased. The word is capable of the former construction when so used, and will be so construed in reference to a defense made pursuant to such advancement, when the intent of the parties appears from the evidence to have been the making of a loan on the legacy. Trust & Deposit Co. v. Verity, 67 N. Y. Supp. 918, 920, 33 Misc. Rep. 4.

"Advanced," as contained in an instrument reciting that in consideration of certain money "advanced" certain property was bargained and sold to M., does not of itself convert the absolute transfer of property into a mere security, as the word may well be construed to mean an acknowledgment of the payment in cash of the price of the property sold in conformity with other terms of the paper. State v. Rice, 20 S. E. 986, 987, 43 S. C. 200.

As pecuniary advances.

"Advances," as used in a decree reciting that certain advances had been made by a husband to his wife's estate, and that the estate was chargeable with the sums so advanced, construed as referring only to pecuniary advances, and not to advances in the shape of personal services rendered by the husband in the improvement and management of the estate. Hodges v. Hodges, 9 R. I. 32, 34.

An advance note given by the master of a vessel to one of the seamen stipulated that 10 days after the ship sailed the undersigned agreed to pay, to any person who should "advance to the seamen on this agreement, the sum of six pounds." It was held to include any advance to that amount, whether in money or in money's worth. McKune v. Joynson, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 218, 230.

"Advances," as used in a contract by which a married woman agreed to become responsible for "advances" to her husband, referred to advances in money only, and did not make her liable for liquidated damages arising from his failure to fulfill the terms of the contract for the delivery of personal property. Greig v. Smith, 7 S. E. 610, 613, 29 S. C. 426.

By factor.

"Advances" in the commercial world are made where a commission merchant accepts the drafts of a planter, although they are not yet paid. Turpin v. Reynolds, 14 La. 473, 477.

An "advance" is something which precedes. As applied to the payment of money, it implies that the parties look forward to the time when the money will be due the recipient. An advancement by a factor is a prepayment, a mere anticipation of the avails of the goods consigned, and no more creates a debt in the first instance than an advancement by a father to a son in anticipation of his expected inheritance creates a debt. In re Atwood, 38 N. Y. Supp. 338, 340; Gihon v. Stanton, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 476, 477; Balderston v. National Rubber Co., 27 Atl. 507, 510, 18 R. I. 338, 49 Am. St. Rep. 772.

"Advances" are moneys paid by a factor to his principal on the credit of the goods consigned and in anticipation of the debt which will become due to the principal upon the sale of such goods. The ordinary use of the term indicates moneys paid before or in advance of the proper time of payment. To advance is to supply beforehand; to loan before the work is done or the goods are made. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 117, 24 L. Ed. 973; Balderston v. National Rubber Co., 27 Atl. 507, 510, 18 R. I. 338, 49 Am. St. Rep. 772.

By owner.

Under the supplemental mechanic's lien law (Pub. Laws 1895, p. 313, § 35), providing that payments made by an owner on a building contract in advance of the terms of the contract shall be no defense to the claim of a subcontractor who serves a stop notice under the statute, payments made by the owner of the building to one to whom the contractor has assigned a part or the whole of any of his payments cannot be considered in any sense as a voluntary "advance payment," no matter when made, but wholly involuntary. In such case he pays because he cannot ultimately escape payment. The fact that he pays sooner than he would be obliged to pay is immaterial, because it does not affect the result; for if he should defer payment until, by the strict terms of the contract, the money was actually due to the contractor, he would still be obliged to pay the holders of the orders, and nobody can be injured by the payment in advance. In short, such payments lack the essential elements of advance payments from the owner to the contractor. Binns v. Slingerland, 36 Atl. 277, 279, 55 N. J. Eq. 55.

In marine insurance.

"Advances," as used in a policy of marine insurance, refers to money paid to the crew in advance, and to money advanced to the captain to buy bait on a fishing voyage, but does not cover the outfit of the vessel. Burnham v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 1 N. E. 837, 839, 139 Mass. 399.

In a count on a policy of marine insurance in the ordinary form, the interest was declared to be on "money advanced on account of freight," and it was averred that the interest was in the shipowner in money advanced to him by the owners of the cargo. It was held that the interest was sufficiently described. The court would not infer that the expression "money advanced on account of freight" necessarily indicated that the insurance was effected by the charterers or shippers, and that the freight paid in advance was at his risk, not at the risk of the shipowner. Hall v. Janson, 4 El. & B. 500, 509.

The owners of a brig wrote to plaintiffs to procure a freight for the vessel, stating that if the plaintiffs accepted a charter they preferred the captain drawing against freight. In this letter was inclosed a letter to the captain in which they referred him to plaintiffs to procure a charter. The captain showed his letter to the plaintiffs, and asked them if they would draw on account of freight, and they said they would. The vessel was loaded as a general ship for Liverpool, and was intended to be consigned to M. & Co. Plaintiffs wrote the owners that the vessel was being loaded as a general ship, and stating that they would draw on the freight for the amount of disbursements. The captain accordingly drew on the consignees, requesting them to charge the same to account of freight. The consignees refused to accept the draft, and it was indorsed to plaintiffs' agents, who effected an insurance on the freight. In an action by the plaintiffs on the policy, it was held that the plaintiffs' insurable interest was correctly described in the policy as "advances on account of freight." Wilson v. Martin, 11 Exch. 684, 694.

The law of New York state gives a lien "for advances made for the purpose of procuring necessities for a ship or for the insurance thereof." Held that, to create a lien, the advances must be made for the purpose of obtaining the insurance, or paying off those who have a lien therefor; and where they are made merely for the purpose of repaying an old debt, not accompanied by any lien, no lien is created in favor of the person making such advances. The Allianza (U. S.) 61 Fed. 507, 509.

On crops.

"Advances," as used in a lease of farm land, providing that "advances" should be a lien on the crops, meant not only necessary supplies to carry on the business of farming, but also goods furnished by a plantation store open only to the laborers and employes on the place. Cain v. Pullen, 34 La. Ann. 511, 519.

Rev. St. § 2514, providing that "any person who shall make any advance or advances, either in money or supplies," to any person employed in the cultivation of the soil, shall be entitled to a lien on the crop, includes a note on which money is obtained from a corporation, which money was expended in the cultivation of the soil. Lockhart v. Smith, 27 S. E. 567, 570, 50 S. C. 112. A like statute is construed not to include a mule furnished to be used in cultivating the soil, since the mule, "instead of being worn out and rendered useless in producing a crop, may be in much better condition and more valuable after the crop is made than before." McCullough v. Kibler, 5 S. C. (5 Rich.) 468, 469. Such a statute includes only such things as the landlord furnishes or causes to be furnished to the tenant which did not previously belong to him, which definition does not include the landlord's forbearance to demand something due him from the tenant. Lumbley v. Gilruth, 3 South. 77, 65 Miss. 23.

An "advancement," in the sense of a statute relating to advancements to croppers, is anything of value pertinent for the purposes, to be used, directly or indirectly, in the making and saving of crops supplied in good faith to the lessee by the landlord. Thus, where the lessor furnishes table board to the lessee and his family in order that the latter may make and save his crops, such board at once becomes an advancement. Brown v. Brown, 13 S. E. 797, 109 N. C. 124.

The hire of a mule to work an agricultural crop is within the statute allowing a lien on the crop for "advances." McCaslan v. Nance, 46 S. C. 568, 24 S. E. 812.

On stocks, bonds, etc.

"In common understanding, an advance or loan of money on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes is an advance or loan where these species of property are pledged as collaterals or are hypothecated to secure the return of the advance or the payment of the sum lent." It is used in this sense in Rev. St. § 3407 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2246], providing that every person, firm, or company having a place of business where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, etc., shall be regarded as a bank or as a banker; and such statute does not include a corporation whose business is confined to the investment of its capital in bonds secured by mortgages, and to negotiation, sale, and guaranty of them. Selden v. Equitable Trust Co., 94 U. S. 419, 421, 24 L. Ed. 249.

ADVANCEMENT.

In a will devising property to a trustee for 21 years, but giving him a discretion to convey or pay over to either of the beneficiaries before that time, for his or her "advancement in life," the whole or any portion of his or her share of the trust estate, "advancement in life" cannot be construed as equivalent to "for his or her use and benefit," but the words "advancement in life" restrict his discretion. What is meant by "advancement in life" depends to a greater or less degree on circumstances, but it points to some occasion, out of the everyday course, when the beneficiary has in mind some new act or undertaking which calls for pecuniary outlay, and which, if properly conducted, holds out a prospect of something beyond a mere transient benefit or employment. Thus, if the beneficiary were going to enter upon a business or profession, or to get married or to build a dwelling house, or to make some unusual repairs or renovation, it would be a proper occasion for the trustee to use his discretion; but the trustee cannot transfer the trust estate to the cestuis before the expiration of the 21 years merely because he thinks it would be for their general benefit for him to do so, without any particular call for the transfer. Bailey v. Bailey, 14 Atl. 917, 918, 16 R. I. 251.

The word "advancement" indicates the return of the money advanced in some way. —Henderson v. Ries (U. S.) 108 Fed. 709, 712, 47 C. C. A. 625.

In an allegation that a son received as an "advancement" on the share of the estate of his father a certain sum, and has acknowledged the receipt of that sum in writing, the word "advancement" was employed merely to signify the receipt of the moneys in advance of the time for payment, and not in its technical meaning. Haberstich v. Elliott, 59 N. E. 557, 559, 189 Ill. 70.

"Advancements," as used in a will, need not necessarily be construed in its technical sense of money or property paid to children of the testator and to be deducted from their distributive share of the estate, but may refer to money loaned to them and secured by notes or mortgages, so as to not to have passed beyond the testator's control. Hammett v. Hammett, 16 S. E. 293, 299, 839, 38 S. C. 50.

An "advancement," in the sense of a statute relating to advancements to croppers, is anything of value, pertinent for the purposes, to be used directly or indirectly in the making and saving of crops, supplied in good faith to the lessee by the landlord. Thus, where the lessor furnishes table board to the lessee and his family in order that the latter may make and save his crops, such board at once becomes an advancement. Brown v. Brown, 13 S. E. 797, 109 N. C. 124.

ADVANCEMENT (To child).

See "Real Advancement."

An advancement is the giving by the intestate in his lifetime by anticipation the whole or a part of what it is supposed the donee will be entitled to on the death of the party making it. Grattan v. Grattan, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 167, 170; Gary v. Newton, 66 N. E. 267, 271, 201 Ill. 170; Wallace v. Reddick, 119 Ill. 151, 156, 8 N. E. 801; Weatherhead v. Field, 26 Vt. 665, 668; In re King's Estate (Pa.) 6 Whart. 370, 373; Beringer v. Lutz, 41 Atl. 643, 645, 188 Pa. 364; Dillman v. Cox, 23 Ind. 440, 442; Ruch v. Biery, 11 N. E. 312, 315, 110 Ind. 444; Daugherty v. Rogers, 20 N. E. 779, 783, 119 Ind. 254, 3 L. R. A. 847; Slaughter v. Slaughter, 52 N. E. 994, 21 Ind. App. 641; *Dillman v. An advancement is an irrevocable gift by a parent to a child in anticipation of such child's future share of the parent's estate. Brook v. Latimer, 24 Pac. 946, 947, 44 Kan. 431, 11 L. R. A. 805, 21 Am. St. Rep. 292; Moore v. Freeman, 35 N. "Advancement" has been defined to be that which is given by a father to a child or presumptive heir by anticipation of what he might inherit. Hattersley v. Bissett (N. J.) 25 Atl. 332, 335.

An "advancement" is a gift by a parent in present of a portion of the share of his child in his estate which would fall to each child at the parent's death by the statute of distribution or descent. Johnson v. Patterson, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 626, 633.

An advancement is a transfer of property from a person standing in loco parentis towards another to that other in anticipation of the share of the donor's estate which the donee would receive in the event of the donor dying intestate. Waldon v. Taylor, 45 S. E. 336, 339, 52 W. Va. 284.

All gifts and grants are made as advancements, if expressed in the gift or grant to be so made, or if charged in writing by the decedent as an advancement, or acknowledged in writing as such by the child or other successor or heir. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2843; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6907; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3754; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1106; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2545; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1863; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 9072.

An "advancement" is any provision by a parent made in, and accepted by a child out of, his estate, either in money or property during his lifetime, over and above the obligation of a parent for maintenance and education. Donations from affection, and not made with a view of settlement, nor intended as advancements, shall not be counted as such; nor shall the support of a child under the parental roof, although past majority, nor the expenses of education, be held as advancements, unless charged as such by the parent. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3474.

An "advancement" is a gift, and after it is made the donor has no interest whatever therein, although he might doubtless have converted it into a simple gift. Ellis v. Newell, 94 N. W. 463, 464, 120 Iowa, 71.

"An advancement is a present gift, and it does not make it any less a gift that it is part or the whole of what it may be supposed the donee may inherit on the death of the donor." Appeal of Potts (Pa.) 10 Atl. 887, 888; Gary v. Newton, 66 N. E. 267, 271, 201 Ill. 170.

"Advancement" imports a substantial benefit, in money or property, conferred by a parent on his child, without any equivalent from the latter by an act of the former in his lifetime, other than the making of a last will and testament. Where the gift or grant conveys a title to the thing, or the use of it, so as to bestow the immediate enjoyment, it is a present advancement; but where, from the want of a present title or effectual possession, the enjoyment has been postponed until the subsequent event or period, it is a future advancement. Chinn v. Murray, 4 Grat. (Va.) 348, 378.

Where a child, in consideration of the sum paid him by his father, releases his claim to his share of the inheritance, the sum advanced constituted an advancement, though the sum so paid was much less than the child's share of his father's estate at the time of the father's death. Kenney v. Tucker, 8 Mass. 143, 145.

An advancement is presumptively a satisfaction pro tanto or in the whole of anticipated ulterior benefits. Hattersley v. Bissett, 29 Atl. 187, 188, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 597, 40 Am. St. Rep. 532.

Advancements do not form a part of the personal estate of the testator. Ruch v. Biery, 11 N. E. 312, 315, 110 Ind. 444.

According to the decisions under the English and similar American statutes, the ancestor must have died intestate in order to make a gift an advancement. Grattan v. Grattan, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 167, 170.

Advance distinguished.

Debt distinguished.

"Advancement," in its legal acceptation, does not involve the idea of obligation or future liability to answer. It is a pure and irrevocable gift made by a parent to a child in anticipation of such child's future share of the parent's estate, and hence a debt due to the parent cannot be treated as an advancement. Appeal of Yundt, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 575, 53 Am. Dec. 496.

An advancement differs from a debt in that there is no enforceable liability on the part of the child to repay during the lifetime of the donor or after his death, except in the way of suffering a deduction from his portion of the estate. Waldron v. Taylor, 45 S. E. 336, 339, 52 W. Va. 284.

An advancement is distinguished from a debt, for in the case of an advancement the common relation of debtor and creditor does not exist, the property not being delivered or received as borrowed capital. In the case of charges on books or memoranda made by the intestate, the inference must be fairly drawn from the book itself that an absolute gift or debt was not intended. If that appears, the legal intentment will be that the property was delivered as an advancement. Weatherhead v. Field, 26 Vt. 665, 668.

"Taking a note or a chattel mortgage indicates a debt, and not an advancement." Kintz v. Friday, 4 Dem. Sur. 540, 542.

Where a testator signed notes as surety of his son, with the understanding that if compelled to pay the same the amount should be deducted from the son's share of the estate, and some of the notes were paid by the testator, the sums so paid were advancements, and not debts. In re Pickenbrock's Estate, 70 N. W. 1094, 1095, 102 Iowa, 81.

"It would be entirely contrary to the character of an advancement that it should be viewed in the light of a debt upon interest." Osgood v. Breed's Heirs, 17 Mass. 350, 358.

A writing acknowledged the receipt of $500 by a son from his father to be in full of all claims as heir against the latter's estate, such sum to bear interest from date. The court held that this was not an advancement as to the interest, and the father's estate could recover it. Slaughter v. Slaughter, 52 N. E. 994, 996, 21 Ind. App. 641.

Testator advanced to his daughter, for the purchase of premises and erection of a house thereon, certain money, and an agreement was entered into reciting that the amount so advanced exceeded the amount he had advanced to his other children in a certain sum, and that he held the premises under a deed of trust to secure such sum, she agreeing to pay interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum annually on such sum during his life, and that on his death the sum of $5,000 a year should be withheld from the income to be bequeathed to her until such sum and all accrued interest thereon had been paid. Thereafter in his will he directed that the debts from his children to him should be discharged. She owed no debt to her father other than this advancement. Even if originally an advancement, this sum had assumed the character of a debt; she had in terms agreed to pay the interest upon it annually, and, ordinarily, no advancement bears interest. There had been provided also a distinct method by which the principal sum and the accumulation of interest, if any, should be paid to the estate of testator. Therefore, being a debt, it was discharged by the will. Bradlee v. Andrews, 137 Mass. 50, 58, 59.

Gift distinguished.

An advancement differs from a gift, inasmuch as it is charged against the child. Waldron v. Taylor, 45 S. E. 336, 339, 52 W. Va. 284.

"Advancement" is not synonymous with "gift," though they are often used interchangeably, since, though "an advancement is always a gift," a gift is very frequently not an advancement. In re Dewees' Estate (Pa.) 3 Brewst. 314, 316.

An advancement is distinguished from a gift which the parents may make to their children, whether to a greater or less amount, for in such case there is no intention to have it chargeable to the child's share of the estate. Weatherhead v. Field, 26 Vt. 665, 668.

Intent essential.

In order that a gift may be construed as an advancement, proof of the testator's intention that it should be so must be clear and explicit, since its effect is to charge the child with the amount thereof in settlement of his share of the testator's estate. Osgood v. Breed's Heirs, 17 Mass. 350, 358.

"Whether the conveyance of property by a father to a son is to be considered as an advanced portion, or a gift, or partly one and partly the other, depends on the intention of the grantor at the time the conveyance is made." Appeal of Christy, 1 Grant, Cas. 369, 370.

An advancement is purely an expression of intention, and, in order to constitute it, the proof must be certain that the testator made the gift intending that the same should be an advancement to the child and should be deducted from his share in the estate. Dillman v. Cox, 23 Ind. 440, 442.

No particular form of words is required by the statute to constitute an "advancement," but it must appear that the money paid or property delivered was not paid or delivered as a loan or gift. It must appear that the money or property was intended as an advancement towards the child's future share of his father's estate. Cass v. Brown, 44 Atl. 86, 68 N. H. 85.

Every gift by a father to his children cannot be deemed an advancement in case of his dying intestate, and there is no reason for holding that it shall never be within the power of a parent to make a present to his child during his lifetime which shall not be considered in the law as an advancement. A parent has a right to give his property to his child as well as to third persons, and all such questions must depend on the intention of the parent in making the gift, and hence the fact that a father gave his daughter some furniture at the time of her marriage cannot be considered as an advancement, in the absence of evidence of an intention that it should be so considered. In re King's Estate, 6 Wm. 370 373.

An advancement is to be distinguished from a debt due, or from an absolute or independent gift or conveyance having no view whatever to the portion or settlement. Where a real gift from a parent to a child is unexplained, or the conveyance is silent as to its design, it is the province of the law to declare its effect, and in some states it must be proved to have been intended as an advancement, or it will be deemed an absolute gift, but in other states and in England the presumption of law is that it is an advancement, but the presumption may be repelled or rebutted by proper evidence, and in such cases the law leans in favor of the equitable rule of equality. It is not necessary to constitute an advancement that the provision should take place in the parent's lifetime, and the portion may be secured to the child in futuro, or may commence after the parent's death, or upon a contingency that has happened, or to arise within a reasonable time. Clark v. Willson, 27 Md. 693, 700.

The definition of an "advancement" is a payment or appropriation of money or a settlement of real estate made by a parent to or for a child in advance or in extinction of the share to which he would be entitled after the death of the parent. Therefore, when money is given, resort must be had to the facts and circumstances tending to make the transaction, in order to determine its character. The rule that the intent of the parent, if demonstrable, must prevail, seems to be established where there is nothing expressed upon the subject. Bruce v. Griscom, 9 Hun (N. Y. Sup. Ct.) 280, 282.

Subsequent legacy.

In a will, after providing for certain legatees, the testator added: "Any advancement that I may hereafter personally make to the legatees named in the item shall be deemed a partial satisfaction of such legacy equal in amount to the sum so advanced." Thereafter in a codicil the testator declared that the "testamentary disposition made in such will shall remain unchanged, and I again ratify the same." He then proceeded to make certain bequests of money which he had in Germany, where he then was, which he stated, "I shall dispose of in favor of other relatives," and directed specific sums to be paid to several relatives, some of whom were legatees in the prior will, and some of whom were not. These bequests in the codicil could not be deducted from the sums given to the same parties in the prior will as "advancements," but must be considered as cumulative. The term "advancement" does not of itself, either in its technical or in any popular sense, cover a subsequent legacy. Webster defines advancement as "the payment of money paid in advance," and payment in advance implies a payment beforehand, before an equivalent is received, or before the happening of an event in the contemplation of the parties in the contract. When used in a will, unless another event is mentioned prior to which the advance is to be made, or the context indicates a different meaning, the words "payment in advance to be applied in satisfaction of a legacy" import payment prior to the happening of the event on which the will is to take effect, to wit, the death of the testator. In re Zelle, 15 Pac. 455, 458, 462, 74 Cal. 125.

Support.

A provision in a will, in view of the nature of the estate, which was slow to realize on, giving testator's wife, who was executrix, five years in which to wind it up, and providing that in the meantime she should give to each of the two children $250 per month to live on, is not an "advancement" in the sense of being a gift during the life of the parent. In anticipation of what the children would receive on the death of their father, for it was not to be paid to them until after his death, and then only for their maintenance and support. It is a general rule, recognized in many cases, that money provided for education is not to be treated as an advancement, and, a fortiori, money provided for support and maintenance is not to be so treated. Ensley v. Ensley, 58 S. W. 288, 292, 105 Tenn. 107.

The term "advances" does not in ordinary cases include money expended for the children's support. Vail v. Vail, 10 Barb. 69, 73.

Transfer of real estate.

Where the purchaser of two lots had them conveyed to his two sons, such conveyance constituted an "advancement." Rhea v. Bagley, 38 S. W. 1039, 63 Ark. 374, 36 L. R. A. 86.

A conveyance of land by a parent to one of his children for a consideration of natural love and affection, or for a nominal consideration, is presumably an advancement within the meaning of the statute, providing that advancements shall be deducted from the share of an heir. Hattersley v. Blissett, 29 Atl. 187, 188, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 597, 40 Am. St. Rep. 532.

ADVANTAGE.

Any advantage, see "Any."

In Collection Law March 2, 1799, providing that, where sureties or executors shall pay to the United States moneys due on any bond given to the United States for their principal, they shall have the like "advantage" for the recovery of the money as is reserved to the United States, the word "advantage" is used as synonymous with "preference" and "priority." A preference of payment is nothing more nor less than a right to be first paid, and a right of priority is a preference of payment before the other creditors of an insolvent, and such a preference or priority is an advantage enjoyed by the United States which by this section is conferred on the sureties. United States v. Preston (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 617, 619.

ADVANTAGEOUSLY.

"Advantageously," as used in a lease of mining property providing that lessee should not be liable on the lease unless the ore could be advantageously mined, meant beneficially, conveniently, profitably, and gainfully, and were not intended merely to relieve lessee from hidden defects in the mine, such as a fault or some physical difficulty in getting out the ore, not contemplated by the parties. Garman v. Potts, 19 Atl. 1071, 1072, 135 Pa. 506.

ADVANTAGES.

The "advantages" which may be taken into consideration in determining the just compensation to which the landowner is entitled on condemnation of land are the direct and peculiar benefits or advantages accruing to him, in particular, in respect of the residue of his land unappropriated, and not any general benefit or increase of value received by such land in common with other lands in the neighborhood. Louisiana & F. Plank Road Co. v. Pickett, 25 Mo. 535, 539.

In an act prohibiting the conversion, loaning, or deposit for the benefit of officers, agents, and servants of public funds, and giving a right of action to municipalities against any such officer, agent, or servant who has contracted for or received any "benefits or advantages" because of the deposit of the public funds, the term "benefits or advantages" was clearly intended to include the interest on such deposits. State v. McFetridge, 54 N. W. 1, 12, 998, 84 Wis. 473, 20 L. R. A. 223.

ADVENTITIOUS VALUE.

The location of a railroad, the places or territories it connects, its capabilities for future expansion, are all elements going to make up its productiveness as a vendible thing in the market. It would be unreasonable to affirm that a road connecting two hamlets would under usual conditions bring as much if sold as a road connecting two large cities, the cost or district value of the same being equal. This additional value of the road imparted to it by reason of its location, etc., is its "adventitious value." Central R. Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 7 Atl. 306, 309, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 1.

ADVENTURE.

"Adventures," as used in a marine insurance policy, is a time-worn word, and is synonymous with "perils," and the fact that a policy stated that the "adventures" which the company was to bear were those of the lakes, seas, rivers, canals, railroads, fires, and jettisons, does not warrant considering adventures as more than perils of the river on which the boat was operated, since the association of the word "adventures" with the other words was merely a convenient form of general policy to receive any risk within the scope of the company's business, and it must be construed in relation to the particular risk, and if the risk be on the lake it is limited to lake navigation, and if on the seas to ocean navigation, and if on the river to river navigation, and if on the railroad to railroad transportation, and the contract is to be read as if these words were not so associated, and constitutes a kind of general distributing policy according to the subject-matter. Moore v. Louisville Underwriters (U. S.) 14 Fed. 226, 233.

The term "adventures and perils of the rivers," in a marine policy on a barge and cargo against all loss in voyage by reason of the "adventures and perils of said rivers" and all other perils, was construed not to include a loss occasioned by the vessel springing a leak and sinking at port. Gartside v. Orphans' Ben. Ins. Co., 62 Mo. 322.

The word "adventure," as used in a clause in a policy of insurance to the effect, "beginning the adventure upon said goods and merchandise from and immediately following the loading thereof on board said ship," fixed the time of the commencement of the risk; the words "beginning the adventure" being equivalent to the expression "risk commencing." Cottam v. Mechanics' & Traders' Ins. Co., 40 La. Ann. 259, 260, 4 South. 510.

ADVERSE.

The word "adverse," as used in relation to the "adverse" possession of real estate, means "hostile" and "distinct." Miller v. Beck, 35 N. W. 899, 900, 68 Mich. 76.

Under an instruction relating to adverse possession of real property, stating that, where the parties have held adverse, actual, open, continuous, and exclusive possession of the premises in controversy for a period of 10 years, a complete title was acquired, it was contended that the jury should have been further instructed that such possession to be effective must have been hostile, notorious, and under a claim or color of title. It was held that the word "adverse" used in the instruction is a general term, and in legal significance involves the elements of hostility under a claim or color of title; that this would be a reasonable and natural interpretation given to the instruction to the jury. Eastern Oregon Land Co. v. Cole (U. S.) 92 Fed. 949, 952, 35 C. C. A. 100.

ADVERSE CLAIM.

It is not essential to the jurisdiction of equity, in a suit brought under Code, § 550, to determine an adverse claim to real property, that such claim should constitute a technical cloud on title, as the term is understood in general equity jurisprudence, it being enough if the claim is such as is calculated to create doubt and uncertainty in respect to the title of the true owner, or if operating injuriously in any way to his enjoyment of, or beneficial domain over, the property. Any attempt persisted in to have such property sold on execution against a third person amounts to an adverse claim or cloud on the title, within the meaning of such section. Murphy v. Sears, 4 Pac. 471, 472, 11 Or. 127. In construing a like statute, it was held that the phrase "some claim adverse to the estate of the petitioner" is not restricted to claims appropriately enforceable by ejectment, but includes all claims which may be asserted in courts of equity as well, and includes the claim made by defendants that plaintiffs, as trustees of certain realty, are holding it in violation of their trust, and are offering it for sale to defray the expense of erecting another building for particular members of the cestui que trust. Bredell v. Alexander, 8 Mo. App. 110, 113.

An "adverse claim" in or to the land of another, considered apart from the evidence by which its existence is usually manifested to others, may be regarded essentially as nothing more than a certain complex mental state or condition. In this sense a claim differs from any and all assertions of it, and these last are but evidence of its existence. Miles v. Strong, 36 Atl. 55, 59, 68 Conn. 273.

ADVERSE ENJOYMENT.

"Adverse enjoyment," as used with reference to an adverse, exclusive, and uninterrupted enjoyment of a right of way, means a user without license or permission, for an adverse right of an easement cannot grow out of a mere permissive enjoyment, the real point of distinction being between a permissive or tolerative user and one which is claimed as a matter of right. Cox v. Forrest, 60 Md. 74, 79.

ADVERSE HOLDING.

The "adverse holding" of property, to constitute a bar of the statute of limitations, does not vest the title of the first holder in the adverse claimant, but extinguishes it; and the adverse title does not rest on the title it has defeated, but upon its own assurance and holding thereunder. Coal Creek Consol. Coal Co. v. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co., 59 S. W. 634, 635, 105 Tenn. 563.

ADVERSE INTEREST.

"Adverse interest," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5057, providing that no suit shall be maintainable, between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an "adverse interest touching any property or rights of property to or vested in such assignee," unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee, includes debts owed to or by the bankrupt. See Jenkins v. International Bank, 2 Sup. Ct. 1, 106 U. S. 571, 27 L. Ed. 304; Doty v. Johnson (U. S.) 6 Fed. 481. There can be no doubt that the limitation applies to all adverse claims to property of a bankrupt existing in favor of or against the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of the bankruptcy and appointment of the assignee. Bowen v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 47 N. E. 907, 909, 153 N. Y. 476, 60 Am. St. Rep. 667. Such section applies to any claims to the property in specie, or to any interests which are claimed by one of the parties to the suit and denied by the other, the determination of which claim will affect the quantum of the bankrupt's estate and the distributive share of the creditors. Gildersleeve v. Gaynor (U. S.) 15 Fed. 101, 103.

ADVERSE PARTY.

An "adverse party" entitled to notice of appeal is every party whose interest in relation to the judgment and decree appealed from is in conflict with the modification or reversal sought by the appeal; every party interested in sustaining the judgment or decree. Moody v. Miller, 33 Pac. 402, 24 Or. 179; The Victorian, 32 Pac. 1040, 1041, 24 Or. 121, 41 Am. St. Rep. 838; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Delahunt, 51 Pac. 649, 36 Or. 402; Lillenthal v. Caravita, 15 Pac. 280, 15 Or. 339; Stutter v. Baker County, 47 Pac. 705, 706, 30 Or. 294; Osborn v. Logus, 38 Pac. 190, 191, 28 Or. 302; Randall v. Hunter, 10 Pac. 130, 131, 69 Cal. 80; Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Fisher, 39 Pac. 758, 759, 106 Cal. 224; Mohr v. Byrne, 64 Pac. 257, 132 Cal. 250; United States v. Crooks, 47 Pac. 870, 871, 116 Cal. 43; O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 317, 319; Lancaster v. Maxwell, 36 Pac. 951, 952, 103 Cal. 67; Milliken v. Houghton, 17 Pac. 641, 642, 75 Cal. 539; In re Clarke, 76 N. W. 790, 791, 74 Minn. 8; Thompson v. Ellsworth (N. Y.) 1 Barb. Ch. 624, 627 (quoted in Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 5 Pac. 85, 87, 66 Cal. 193); Cotes v. Carroll (N. Y.) 28 How. Prac. 436, 446; Crowns v. Forest Land Co., 74 N. W. 546, 547, 99 Wis. 103; T. C. Power & Bro. v. Murphy, 68 Pac. 411, 412, 26 Mont. 387.

Every party whose interest in the subject matter of an appeal is adverse to and will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken is an "adverse party" and entitled to notice of appeal, irrespective of the question whether such party appears on the face of the record in the attitude of plaintiff, defendant, or intervener. Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637, 640; Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 5 Pac. 85, 87, 66 Cal. 193; Lancaster v. Maxwell, 36 Pac. 951, 952, 103 Cal. 67; Green v. Berge, 38 Pac. 539, 540, 105 Cal. 52, 45 Am. St. Rep. 25; Herriman v. Menzies, 44 Pac. 660, 661, 115 Cal. 16, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81; Vincent v. Collins, 55 Pac. 129, 130, 122 Cal. 387; Harper v. Hildreth, 33 Pac. 1103, 99 Cal. 265; Jones v. Quantrell, 9 Pac. 418, 419, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 153; Coffin v. Edgington, 23 Pac. 80, 81, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 627; Aulbach v. Dahler, 43 Pac. 192, 4 Idaho, 522; Seattle Trust Co. v. Pitner, 49 Pac. 505, 17 Wash. 365; Sutton v. Consolidated Apex Min. Co., 82 N. W. 188, 190, 12 S. D. 576.

A party whose interests will not be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment is not an "adverse party" on whom notice of appeal must be served. Sutton v. Consolidated Apex Min. Co., 82 N. W. 188, 190, 12 S. D. 576; Lillenthal v. Caravita, 15 Pac. 280, 15 Or. 339; Fitzgerald v. Cross, 30 Ohio St. 444, 449.

If the position of a party on the record makes him "adverse," he must be so considered for the purposes on appeal from the judgment thereon. So that a person who is joined as a defendant and answers without objection from other parties, and whose rights therein to subject-matter are favorably adjudicated by the decree, is an adverse party to any party attacking such a decree, without regard to whether originally a proper party or not. Herriman v. Menzies, 44 Pac. 660, 661, 115 Cal. 16, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81.

"Adverse party," as used in Code, § 348, requiring notice of the entry of judgment affirming a judgment appealed from to be served on the "adverse party" at least 10 days before commencing an action on the undertaking on appeal, means the parties to the original judgment by whom the appeal was taken. Yates v. Burch, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 622, 625.

The "adverse party" upon whom a notice of appeal is to be served is the party who appears by the record to be adverse. On an appeal from an order denying a new trial, the parties to the motion in the court below are the only proper parties to the appeal. In re Ryer's Estate, 42 Pac. 1082, 1083, 110 Cal. 556.

Code, § 75, provides that, before default judgment on constructive service shall be opened up, the applicant shall give notice to the "adverse party" of his intention, etc. Held, that by "adverse party" is meant the person having a real and substantial interest in the controversy, or, at least, one who is a necessary or proper party to such judgment. Accordingly, where action was brought by F. for the use of K., and the judgment was had in like form, and the record showed that F. had no interest therein, but was a nominal partner merely, and that the judgment was rendered for the sole use of K., it was sufficient, in proceedings to open up such judgment, to serve notice on K. Fitzgerald v. Cross, 30 Ohio St. 444, 449.

The words "adverse party," as used in 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4984, subd. 2, providing for challenge for bias of a person standing in the relation of guardian and ward, attorney and client, master and servant, to the adverse party, clearly refer to the parties to the action, the plaintiff and defendant, and are used to include both. The attorney of a party to the action is not an adverse party within the meaning of the section, any more than any other employé could be said to be an adverse party. He merely represents one of them. McCorkle v. Mallory, 71 Pac. 186, 188, 30 Wash. 632.

Administrator.

An administrator of an estate is an "adverse party" in adjudications of claims against an estate, within the provisions requiring notice of appeal to be served upon the adverse party. Kasson v. Bocker's Estate, 47 Wis. 79, 1 N. W. 418, 421.

It seems that a special administrator of an estate, appointed before probate of a will, is the "adverse party" to whom the bond on appeal from an order admitting the will to probate should run, under a statute requiring the giving of such a bond to the adverse party, and that this is certainly so where the special administrator is also the proponent of the will and the executor named in it. Appeal of Mullins, 40 Wis. 154, 156.

Aggrieved party synonymous.

Adverse party as used in Prac. Act, § 201, providing that certain rules will be deemed excepted to by the "adverse party," construed to have the same meaning as the term "aggrieved party" used in section 436 of the same act which authorizes appeal by the aggrieved party. Fox v. West, 1 Idaho, 782, 783.

Codefendants.

Notice of appeal by one of several codefendants should be served not only on the plaintiff but also on the nonappealing codefendants, they having an interest in the judgment to be affected by the reversal. Milliken v. Houghton, 17 Pac. 641, 642, 75 Cal. 539.

In a suit against a county and its treasurer and sheriff to restrain the levy of a tax, the county is an adverse party, so as to entitle it to a notice of an appeal by the other defendants from a decree granting the injunction. Stuller v. Baker County, 47 Pac 705, 706, 30 Or. 294.

Where a defendant, whose land, together with that of his codefendants, is condemned, appeals, the latter are adverse parties. United States v. Crooks, 47 Pac. 870, 871, 116 Cal. 43.

Where in an action the judgment is several and for different amounts against each defendant, and an appeal is taken from judgment against one defendant, the other defendants are not adverse parties. Aulbach v. Dahler, 43 Pac. 192, 4 Idaho, 522.

Where the judgment rendered against defendants was joint and several in character, and no decision of the Supreme Court can be rendered affecting one of the defendants without affecting all, such facts make them adverse parties. Coffin v. Edgington, 23 Pac. 80, 81, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 627.

Where plaintiff had judgment against one of two defendants, and appealed from a judgment for costs in favor of the other, the respondent codefendant was not an adverse party on whom notice of appeal must be served. Green v. Berge, 38 Pac. 539, 540, 105 Cal. 52, 45 Am. St. Rep. 25.

In an action against R. and K., R. put in an answer and K. made default. Judgment was rendered making R. first liable; and K. after him. R. appealed, not serving any notice of appeal on K., and the judgment as to R. was reversed and he released from liability. After the judgment of reversal, plaintiff issued execution against K. On a motion by K. to set aside the execution on the ground that he was by the original judgment not liable until after R., and was not bound by the appeal, not being made a party thereto, it was held that K., not having put in an answer, was not a party to the question of R.'s prior liability, and could not litigate it, and was not a "party aggrieved" under Code, § 325, or an "adverse party" within section 327, and hence could not appeal, and was not a necessary party to an appeal, on the issue between R. and the plaintiff. Garnsey v. Knights, 1 Thomp. & C. 259, 263.

Where, in an action on a note, there was judgment against defendants, and against an intervenor who claimed an interest in one of the notes, the defendants are not adverse parties to an appeal by the intervenor from the judgment against him. Mohr v. Byrne, 64 Pac. 257, 132 Cal. 250.

In an action against partners on a partnership demand on default by one of the defendants and judgment after trial against the others, the defendant making the default is not an adverse party, since if reversed as to the others it would still stand unreversed as to him, and if affirmed the judgment appealed from would remain unchanged. Randall v. Hunter, 10 Pac. 130, 131, 69 Cal. 180.

Contractor or materialman.

Where a decree in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien directed that if the property was not sufficient to pay the liens the deficiency shall be docketed as a personal judgment against the contractor, the contractor is an adverse party in an appeal by the owner. Lancaster v. Maxwell, 36 Pac. 951, 952, 103 Cal. 67.

Contractors to whom plaintiff furnished material, who, although named as defendant, were not served and did not appear in the lower court, are not adverse parties. Osborn v. Logus, 38 Pac. 190, 191, 28 Or. 302.

Where a materialman sued to foreclose a lien, making the contractor and owner both parties, and the contractor defaulted, and the court dismissed the suit, and plaintiff appealed, but did not serve the contractor with notice, it was held that, the owner not having alleged facts which would entitle him to relief against the contractor, the contractor was not an "adverse party." Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Delahunt, 51 Pac. 649, 36 Or. 402.

Creditors.

Under a statute providing that, where an administrator appealed from an order of the county court disallowing his personal claim against the estate, his appeal bond should be executed to the "adverse party," the appeal bond might properly run to such of the creditors as resisted the claim. Appeal of Spiegelburg, 5 N. W. 813, 49 Wis. 349.

Where one is admitted as party defendant to a pending foreclosure suit under a stipulation that the trial shall proceed without reference to his claim, and if, after the mortgaged premises are sold and plaintiff's claim is satisfied, there should be a surplus, these defendants' right should then be determined, and accordingly, after trial, a decree was entered to which such defendant was not a party, the latter is not, on appeal from such decree, an "adverse party." Shirley v. Burch, 18 Pac. 344, 349, 16 Or. 1.

Garnishee.

A garnishee is an adverse party on an appeal by a plaintiff from a judgment declaring defendant in the principal action not indebted. Seattle Trust Co. v. Pitner, 49 Pac. 505, 17 Wash. 365.

Heir.

On appeal from an order denying probate of a nuncupative will, the heir at law of the decedent is the "adverse party" within the meaning of a statute relative to appeal bonds. Nelson v. Clongland, 15 Wis. 392, 393.

Mortgagor.

Where a decree was entered for the foreclosure of a mortgage against the mortgagor and his assignee in insolvency, and the mortgagor, being the only defendant to appear, moved to set aside the sale for irregularities, which motion was denied, and he appealed from the judgment and order, the assignee was an adverse party. Vincent v. Collins, 55 Pac. 129, 130, 122 Cal. 387.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage given by a married woman on two tracts of land, where the husband, who owned one of the tracts, was made defendant, together with several subsequent incumbrancers, and the wife defaulted, and the court decreed the foreclosure of both tracts, and entered a personal judgment against the husband and wife for any deficiency, from which decree the husband and some of the incumbrancers appealed, the wife was an "adverse party," inasmuch as she would be injuriously affected by a reversal and modification of the decree. Moody v. Miller, 33 Pac. 402, 24 Or. 179.

A mortgagor is an adverse party on appeal by the mortgagee in an action to foreclose the mortgage from an adjudication that certain mechanics' liens are entitled to priority over the mortgage, where such modification might shift the personal responsibility as between the mortgagor and his grantee for the liens. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Fisher, 39 Pac. 758, 759, 106 Cal. 224.

Purchaser at judicial sale.

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of a vendor's lien on land owned by a testator also took an assignment of the debt secured by the lien, as well as of an unsecured debt against testator's estate. Afterwards testator's adult devisees instituted a proceeding against the minor devisees for the sale of testator's other land not subject to the vendor's lien, praying that the proceeds of the sale be distributed after payment of testator's debts. The land was ordered sold, and this proceeding was then consolidated with the vendor's lien suit. Held, that the purchaser at the foreclosure of the vendor's lien was entitled to notice of the confirmation of the sale ordered in the proceedings between the devisees, as he was an "adverse party" to the purchaser at such sale. Patterson v. Eakin, 12 S. E. 144, 145, 87 Va. 49.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale whose title has become absolute by confirmation, if a stranger to the record, is not an adverse party on whom notice of appeal must be served. Crowns v. Forest Land Co., 74 N. W. 540, 547, 99 Wis. 103.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale is an "adverse party" within Rev. St. § 3049, who should be served with a copy of notice of appeal from the order confirmed in the sale. Rogers v. Shove, 73 N. W. 989, 990, 98 Wis. 271.

A purchaser at a sale made by an assignee in insolvency subject to the approval of the court is a party to the proceedings resulting in an order confirming the sale, and hence an adverse party on an appeal from such order. Kells v. Nelson-Tenney Lumber Co., 76 N. W. 790, 791, 74 Minn. 8.

Party brought in by order of court.

The term "adverse party" means every person whose interests require that the order, judgment, or decree appealed from be sustained. And, if such party must be served with notice of appeal, this is so regardless of whether he appeared as one of the original parties to the action, or was brought in by order of court. A person who has once appeared in the action is a necessary party to the appeal, unless after his appearance he has ceased to have an interest in such action. Commercial Nat. Bank v. United States Savings, Loan & Building Co., 44 Pac. 1043, 1045, 13 Utah, 189.

Party not served or appearing below.

A person named as a party, but not served with notice, and not appearing in the suit, and against whom no judgment is entered, is not an "adverse party" on whom notice of appeal must be served. Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, 31 Pac. 849, 850, 99 Cal. 39.

Surety.

In an action to enforce a lien against a vessel, where claimant, to obtain its release, files an undertaking with sureties, and judgment is rendered against the claimant, notice of claimant's appeal need not be served on the sureties, as their interests are identical with claimant's. The Victorian, 32 Pac. 1040, 1041, 24 Or. 121, 41 Am. St. Rep. 838.

As witnesses.

Rev. Code 1855, § 3, declares that any party to a civil action or proceeding may compel any "adverse party" or person for whose benefit such action or proceeding is instituted to testify at the trial, or by deposition as a witness, etc. Held, that the term "adverse party" must be a party adversely interested, and not simply an opposing party on the records. Harris v. Harris, 25 Mo. 567, 568.

"Adverse party," as used in Pub. St. c. 167, § 49, authorizing the filing of interrogatories to be answered by the adverse party for the discovery of facts in proceedings in probate court, does not include a person appearing as next friend of a minor and instituting proceedings for the removal of the guardian of the latter. Gray v. Parke, 29 N. E. 641, 642, 155 Mass. 433.

The words "adverse party" as used in Gen. St. 1897, c. 95, § 333, relating to competency of witnesses, are not limited to the adversary positions of plaintiff and defendant, but affect any party, whether plaintiff or defendant, whose interests are actually adverse to those of another party to the action who appears in the capacity of executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignees, where the latter has acquired title to the cause of action immediately from the deceased person. American Inv. Co. v. Coulter, 61 Pac. 820, 8 Kan. App. 841.

Under Laws 1847, p. 630, providing "that any party in any civil suit, etc., may require any adverse party . . . to give testimony under oath in such suit or proceeding in the same manner as persons not parties to such suit or proceeding, and who are competent witnesses therein," the fact that one of two copartners sued for an alleged partnership debt, who has given his individual note for the debt, suffered a default, did not render him a competent witness for the plaintiff, as he did not thereby cease to be an adverse party within the meaning of the statute. Rich v. Husson, 6 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Sandf.) 115, 119.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

See "Title by Adverse Possession."

An "adverse possession" which will bar a legal title must be hostile, and under a claim of title, actual, open, and notorious, exclusive and continuous. Sallor v. Hertzogg, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 182, 185; Thomas v. England, 12 Pac. 491, 492, 71 Cal. 456; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 595, 49 Am. Rep. 100; Alta Land & Water Co. v. Hancock, 24 Pac. 645, 646, 85 Cal. 219, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217; Springer v. Young, 12 Pac. 400, 403, 14 Or. 280; Bryan v. Atwater, 5 Day, 181, 186, 5 Am. Dec. 136; Murray v. Hudson, 32 N. W. 889, 891, 65 Mich. 670; Cook v. Clinton, 31 N. W. 317, 319, 64 Mich. 309, 8 Am. St. Rep. 816; Sherin v. Brackett, 30 N. W. 551, 552, 36 Minn. 152; Washburn v. Cutter, 17 Minn. 361, 368 (Gil. 335, 344); Robinson v. Lake, 14 Iowa, 421, 424; Hempsted v. Huffman, 51 N. W. 17, 84 Iowa, 398; Ward v. Cochran, 14 Sup. Ct. 230, 233, 150 U. S. 597, 37 L. Ed. 1195; Ballard v. Hanson, 51 N. W. 295, 297, 33 Neb. 861; Goodson v. Brothers, 20 South. 443, 444, 111 Ala. 589; Taylor v. Town of Philippi, 14 S. E. 130, 132, 35 W. Va. 554; Sadtler v. Peabody Heights Co., 10 Atl. 509, 601, 66 Md. 1; Yeager v. Woodruff, 53 Pac. 1045, 1046, 17 Utah, 361.

Possession is denoted by the exercise of acts of dominion over the land in making the ordinary use and taking the ordinary profits of which it is susceptible. Williams v. Buchanan, 23 N. C. 535, 540, 35 Am. Dec. 760.

Adverse possession is a possession open, notorious, and characterized by visible occupation. Watts v. Griswold, 20 Ga. 732, 733, 65 Am. Dec. 647.

To acquire title by "adverse possession," the possession must not only be continuous for the time prescribed, but, under well-settled law, must be actual, open, and notorious, with an intention on the part of the claimant to claim the title as owner, and against the rights of the true owner; and, in addition to this, the adverse claimant must pay all the taxes which are lawful charges on the land. Dignan v. Nelson (Utah) 72 Pac. 936, 937.

The possession of land is rendered adverse by unequivocal assertion of the party in possession of a title in himself, exclusive of every other right. Sherry v. Frecking, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 452, 454.

To constitute "adverse possession" the possession must be actual, for otherwise there is no disseisin, and the real owner remains in possession, actually or constructively. It must be continuous, for upon its cessation or interruption the possession, in contemplation of law, is again in the holder of the legal title. It must be hostile to the real owner, and with the intention to claim the land adversely to him. This claim must be manifest from the nature or circumstances of the possession, so that the owner may be informed of it, and that he shall not be misled into acquiescence in what he might reasonably suppose to be a mere trespass when he would not have acquiesced in the assertion of a right adverse to his own title. The possession of land may consist in and may be shown by a great variety of acts, but the law prescribes no particular manner in which possession shall be maintained or made manifest. Costello v. Edison, 46 N. W. 299, 301, 44 Minn. 135.

"Adverse possession" of another's land is such a possession as, when accompanied by certain acts and circumstances, will vest title in the possessor. In all jurisdictions where the determination of what constituted "adverse possession" has arisen, the decisions and the text-books are unanimous in declaring that the possession must be actual, visible, exclusive, hostile, and continued during the time necessary to create a bar under a statute of limitations. Johnston v. City of Albuquerque (N. M.) 72 Pac. 9, 11.

Adverse possession is possession by one person which is inconsistent with possession or right of possession by another. Sheaffer v. Eakman, 56 Pa. (6 P. F. Smith) 144. In theory it is a possession founded in trespass or disseisin, an ouster of the true owner, and the continued exclusion of such owner for the period of the statute of limitations. Olewine v. Messmore, 128 Pa. 470, 484, 18 Atl. 495. Adverse possession cannot arise until there is some one to dispute the right claimed. Lucas v. White, 95 N. W. 209, 210, 120 Iowa, 735.

Adverse possession, such as to ripen into title by limitation, must be actual as contrasted with constructive, and must be an absolute dominion, evidenced by visible use in whole or in part; the evidence of ownership which the land itself exhibits to any one who sees fit to look and inquire for himself. It must be adverse in the sense that the occupant must hold for himself against all of the world, and exclusive in that he must either turn out or shut out other claimants. It must be uninterrupted and continuous, neither broken by another nor abandoned by himself; and honest or bona fide, in that his holding for himself shall involve no breach of faith or any duty he may owe to another, though he may not be ignorant of a better title; and such possession must exist for the statutory period under some colorable claim of title, which must be derived from another if his possession is to extend beyond his inclosure, but need not be so derived when the land is all visibly inclosed. Taylor v. Town of Philippi, 14 S. E. 130, 132, 35 W. Va. 554.

A possession which has been continuous, open, notorious, by one claiming to hold and own the property adversely to all persons whomsoever, is an adverse possession. Bowers v. Ledgerwood, 64 Pac. 936, 937, 25 Wash. 14.

"Adverse possession," as defined in Black's Dictionary, "means the possession or enjoyment of real property or estate lying in grant continuously for a certain length of time, held adversely and in denial and opposition to title of another claimant, or under circumstances which indicate an assertion or color of right or title on part of the person maintaining it as against another out of possession." A man may come in by rightful possession and yet hold adversely without title. Van Wickle v. Alrough, 2 N. J. Law J. 446, 449.

Possession, to be "adverse," must be accompanied by a payment of taxes by the possessor. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 595, 49 Am. Rep. 100; Thomas v. England, 12 Pac. 491, 492, 71 Cal. 456.

"Adverse possession" is an actual and peaceable appropriation of the land, commenced and continued under a claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claim of another. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3349.

For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by any person claiming a title founded upon a written instrument or judgment or decree, land shall be deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases: First, where it has been usually cultivated and improved; second, where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure; third, where, though not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel or of fencing timber for the purpose of husbandry, or for the use of pasture, or for the ordinary uses of the occupants; fourth, where a known lot or single farm, not exceeding 320 acres in extent, has been partially improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared or not inclosed, according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 3711; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4212.

Actual occupation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. §§ 370, 371, land, to be held by "adverse possession," must have been usually cultivated or improved or protected by a substantial inclosure, or used for the supply of fuel or fencing timber, either for the purposes of husbandry or for the ordinary use of the occupant. Wright v. Phipps (U. S.) 90 Fed. 556, 575.

To constitute an adverse possession under color of title so as to bar a strictly legal paper title, there must be other evidence than that of the mere residence on or inclosure of a small part of the tract included within the metes and bounds of the defective paper title. There should be proof of acts of ownership over the uninclosed part, such as it is usual and customary to exercise over land of that particular description, or as will amount to actual possession, and such as may fairly be considered evidence of an intention to assert an ownership and possession of the whole. Saxton v. Hunt, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 487, 491.

"Neither actual occupation, cultivation, or residence are necessary to constitute actual possession when the property is so situated as not to admit of any permanent useful improvement, and the continued claim of the party, as may be evidenced by the public acts of ownership, such as he would exercise over property which he claimed in his own right, and would not exercise over property which he did not claim." Ewing v. Burnet, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 41, 49, 53, 9 L. Ed. 624.

"Adverse possession" means possession made under claim of title, and accompanied by such visible acts as from their nature indicate a notorious claim of property in the land. The character of the acts necessary, of course, varies with the situation of the land, condition of the country, etc. Hollingsworth v. Sherman, 81 Va. 668, 671.

Possession, to be adverse, must be actual, by inclosures upon some part of the land, if the nature of the land admits of it; otherwise, by such acts of dominion as the nature of the land will allow. A possession may exist without an actual residence on the land. It is enough that the inclosures are kept up and the doors of the house closed, so as to indicate that the premises are not abandoned. These acts indicate a concurrence of act and intention, and fill the idea of actual occupation or possession. As a general rule, it may be said that an entry upon or possession of the lands claimed by another, which, in the first instance, would suffice to effect a disseisin or ouster of the real owner, will break the continuity of the holder claiming by adverse possession. It is not every entry, however, by the owner that will destroy the adverse possession, but to effect this he must assert his claim to the land by the acts of ownership. An entry by stealth, or for other purposes than those connected with the right to enter, will not break the continuity of adverse possession in another. The mere intrusion of a trespasser, not brought to the knowledge of the party in possession, or continued long enough to raise a presumption that it was known to him, is not an interruption. Cowan v. Hatchers (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 689, 691.

To constitute an "adverse possession" there need not be a fence, building, or other improvement, and it suffices for the purpose that visible and notorious acts of ownership are exercised over the premises in controversy for the time limited by statute. It may safely be said that where acts of ownership have been done upon the land which from their nature indicate a notorious claim of property in it, and are continued sufficiently long with the knowledge of an adverse claimant without interruption or an adverse entry by him, such acts are evidence of an ouster of a former owner and an actual adverse possession against him, provided the jury should think that the property was not susceptible of a more strict or definite possession than had been so taken and held. Batz v. Woerpel, 89 N. W. 516, 519, 113 Wis. 442 (quoting Illinois Steel Co. v. Bilot, 109 Wis. 418, 440, 447, 84 N. W. 855, 85 N. W. 402, 406, 83 Am. St. Rep. 905).

"There must be a real and substantial inclosure, an actual occupancy, a possessio pedis, which is definite, positive, and notorious, to constitute an adverse possession." Jackson v. Schoonmaker, 2 Johns. 230, 234.

There must be an actual occupancy, as distinguished from a constructive possession; that is, some one must be in actual possession of the property, not necessarily living upon the property. If the property is inclosed and cultivated, this would be a sufficient actual occupancy; and, if crops were continuously growing upon the premises, this would be a visible occupancy; and, even though in the interim between the harvesting of the crop and the recropping of the land the succeeding spring, no person was actually on the premises, and nothing was done with them, yet if, year after year, the land was thus cropped and cultivated, this would be a sufficiently continuous possession. A possession is sufficient and notorious if it is open and visible, and the premises are actually so that, if people pass to and fro, they may see the visible evidences of occupation. Cook v. Clinton, 31 N. W. 317, 319, 64 Mich. 309, 8 Am. St. Rep. 816.

"Adverse possession" may be said to be a collective fact made up of other facts which are essential, constituent elements to the creation of the collective fact. Among these constituent elements are an actual possession of the res; and an open and notorious assertion of claim of ownership hostile to the true owner. After its creation it is a continuance of this collective fact, without interruption for the period fixed by the statute of limitations as a bar to the commencement of a suit, that renders it effective as a defense. Washington v. Norwood, 30 South. 405, 406, 128 Ala. 383.

Possession, to be adverse, must be as definite as the character of the land will permit; but occupancy of a part, with color of title defining the extent of the claim, is deemed to extend to the boundaries expressed. Baucum v. George, 65 Ala. 259, 268.

To constitute adverse possession such as will work a disseisin of the lawful owner, there must be actual and visible occupancy of the premises, but what will constitute such occupancy will depend somewhat upon the nature and situation of the property and the use to which it can be applied. Murphy v. Doyle, 33 N. W. 220, 221, 37 Minn. 113.

"While the possession, to be adverse, must be actual, yet it may be by agent or tenant." Omaha & F. Land & Trust Co. v. Parker, 51 N. W. 139, 140, 33 Neb. 775, 29 Am. St. Rep. 506.

Neither actual cultivation nor residence is necessary to constitute actual possession, where the property is so situated as not to admit of any permanent useful improvements, and the continued claim of the party has been evidenced by public acts of ownership. Copeland v. Murphey, 42 Tenn. (2 Cold.) 64, 70.

Color of title.

Adverse possession is a hostile possession of real estate which will ripen into a title thereto. "In order to be adverse it need not be under any muniment of title. Adverse possession is a possession inconsistent with the right of the true owner, and depends upon the intention with which it is taken and held; and an actual occupation of the land by one, accompanied by acts of ownership inconsistent with the act of ownership in another, is presumptively adverse possession." Faloon v. Simshauser, 22 N. E. 835, 836, 130 Ill. 649.

It is not necessary that a title set up as adverse should be a rightful title; it is sufficient if it be a possession under claim or color of title. When an adverse possession is set up, all idea of right is excluded, and the only question is quo animo the possession was taken. The sum of all the authorities is that, to negative the adverse possession, it must be shown that such possession is held in subjection to and is consistent with the true title. Innerarity v. Mims' Heirs, 1 Ala. 660, 668, 669.

All that is necessary to render possession of lands adverse, so as to set the statute of limitations in motion, is that the disseisor enter and take possession with the intention of holding land for himself to the exclusion of all others. It is not necessary that he should enter under color of title, or under a claim that he has a legal right to enter. Carpenter v. Coles, 77 N. W. 424, 75 Minn. 9.

The only distinction which can be recognized between title acquired under the statute of limitations by adverse occupancy under claim and color of title, and without such claim or color, is that in the latter case title will only be coextensive with actual, visible, continued occupancy, while in the former color of title may by construction embrace lands only a part of which were thus actually occupied. Roots v. Beck, 9 N. E. 698, 700, 109 Ind. 472 (cited in Gildehaus v. Whiting, 18 Pac. 916, 919, 39 Kan. 706).

Fifteen years' uninterrupted, wrongful possession, with actual notorious occupation, claiming land as the occupier's own, whether at first the occupier's entry was with or without color of title, tolls the entry of the rightful owner, and impairs any possessory action which he may bring, giving title to the occupler by adverse possession. Hapgood v. Burt, 4 Vt. 155, 160.

In Commonwealth v. Gibson, 85 Ky. 666, 4 S. W. 453, 454, it was said: "If one in fact enters under a purchase, although it may be verbal, and holds the land by actual, open possession, claiming it as his own, such possession is adverse, and right of action at once accrues to the vendor." The law is well settled in Kentucky that an entry under a parol purchase of land the extent of which is definitely fixed is adverse to the vendor, and ripens into a title after the lapse of the requisite statutory period. Gilbert v. Kelly (Ky.) 57 S. W. 228, 229.

Entry under claim of title is generally sufficient to constitute an adverse possession, and it is not material whether the title is valid or not. Hoye v. Swan's Lessee, 5 Md. 237, 250.

Possession of land by an adverse occupant for more than 15 years, which possession is actual, notorious, continuous, and exclusive, will give title thereto, though such possession is entirely destitute of color of title. Anderson v. Burnham, 34 Pac. 1056, 1057, 52 Kan. 454.

An uninterrupted possession, accompanied by occupancy and ownership, constitutes adverse possession, whether the alleged ownership depends on a written instrument, inheritance, a deed, or even an instrument which may not convey all the land in controversy. Probst v. Trustees of Board of Domestic Missions, 9 Sup. Ct. 263, 265, 129 U. S. 182, 32 L. Ed. 642.

Possession under color and claim of title amounts to adverse possession, and it has never been considered as necessary, to constitute adverse possession, that there should be a rightful title, and it is wholly immaterial whether the claim of title be under a good or a bad, a legal or an equitable, title. Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Grat. 137, 141.

One who enters on land without title is deemed to have possession of so much only as he actually occupies, but when he enters under color of title he is presumed to occupy according to the boundaries named in his deed. Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 247, 249, 47 Am. Rep. 196.

Color of title is not essential to adverse possession. Murray v. Romine, 82 N. W. 318, 319, 60 Neb. 94.

Continuousness.

Claim of adverse possession may be made up by tacking together the adverse possessions of several successive holders, but such adverse possessions must be connected by privity, since, unless they are so connected, the disseisin of the real owner resulting from the adverse possession would be interrupted, and during such interruption, though but for a moment, the title of the real owner draws to it the seisin or possession. Sherin v. Brackett, 30 N. W. 551, 552, 36 Minn. 152 (citing Melvin v. Proprietors of Locks and Canals on Merrimack River, 46 Mass. [5 Metc.] 15, 38 Am. Dec. 384; Haynes v. Boardman, 119 Mass. 414, 415; McEntire v. Brown, 28 Ind. 347; Jackson v. Leonard [N. Y.] 9 Cow. 653; Wood, Lim. § 271; City and County of San Francisco v. Fulde, 37 Cal. 349, 99 Am. Dec. 278; Crispèn v. Hannavan, 50 Mo. 536; Shuffleton v. Nelson [U. S.] 22 Fed. Cas. 45; Ang. Lim. §§ 413, 414; Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, §§ 740, 745-747; Riggs v. Fuller, 54 Ala. 141).

"Adverse possession is that kind of continued occupation and enjoyment of real estate which indicates assertion of right on the part of the person maintaining it." Rivers v. Thompson, 43 Ala. 633, 641 (quoting Webster's Dict.).

Disseisin.

Adverse possession cannot begin until there has been a disseisin, and to constitute a disseisin there must be an actual expulsion of the true owner of the land for the full period prescribed by the statute, and hence the possession must be one not under the legal proprietor, but one entered into without the proprietor's consent, either directly or indirectly. Bryan v. Atwater (Conn.) 5 Day, 181, 186, 5 Am. Dec. 136; Springer v. Young, 12 Pac. 400, 403, 14 Or. 280; French v. Pearce, 8 Conn. 439, 440, 443, 21 Am. Dec. 680; Larwell v. Stevens (U. S.) 12 Fed. 559, 560; Morse v. Seibold, 35 N. E. 369, 370, 147 Ill. 318; Yeager v. Woodruff, 53 Pac. 1045, 1046, 17 Utah, 361.

"Adverse possession" is now understood to denote a disseisin on which an adverse title is founded, the term "disseisin" being expressive of any act the necessary effect of which is to divest the estate of the former owner. "Adverse possession" is generally considered as synonymous with "disseisin," and disseisin anciently was nothing less than some act or mode by which the disseisor acquired the tenure and usurped the place and feudal relation of the tenant. And adverse possession is therefore something more than the mere possession accompanied with hostile claim of ownership; and though, ordinarily, the actual occupancy of lands, accompanied with an open, notorious, and uninterrupted claim of ownership, with intention to claim hostile to the title of the real owner, constitutes adverse possession, yet this is so only where the possession of the occupying claimant is hostile to the claim and right of possession of some one else; and if there be no other person entitled to present possession there can be no repugnancy, actual or constructive, between the possession of the occupant and the rights of any one else. A possession, to be adverse, must operate to dis-seise or oust some other claimant of his possession or right. An adverse possession has been defined to be an occupancy which disclaims the title of the negligent owner, and it is impossible to conceive of an adverse possession which is not exclusive of the rightful owner, or does not operate to encroach on his right of possession so as to oust or disseise him. Pickett v. Pope, 74 Ala. 122, 131.

To constitute that "adverse possession" which gives title to real estate under the statute of limitations, two things must concur: (1) An ouster of the real owner, followed by an actual possession by an adverse claimant; and (2) an intention on the part of the latter to so oust the owner and possess for himself the property. Pioneer Wood Pulp Co. v. Chandos, 47 N. W. 661, 662, 78 Wis. 526; Ivy v. Yancey, 31 S. W. 937, 938, 129 Mo. 501.

"There must be an actual entry and ouster under claim of title in hostility to that of the true owner, accompanied or manifested by acts of ownership, and followed by actual and continuous possession. That is to say, the claim of the disseisor must be asserted as a matter of right, so as to be notice to the owner and expose him to an action by the latter, for it is the fact of his being thus exposed to an action, and the neglect of the opposite party to bring suit within the statutory period, which forms the basis of the title by prescription or adverse possession." Village of Glencoe v. Wadsworth, 51 N. W. 377, 378, 48 Minn. 402.

Exclusiveness.

Adverse possession is an actual, visible appropriation of land, commenced and continued under a claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claim of another. Rev. St. 1895, art. 3349. Occupancy of a part of the survey by the true owner interrupts adverse possession as to all of the survey not actually occupied by the adverse claim. Freedman v. Bonner (Tex.) 40 S. W. 47, 49.

"Adverse possession is an occupancy of land indicative of an exercise of ownership such as is usual by the owner of property. It must appear as a fact that the possession is adverse, and not under a tenancy or otherwise in subordination to the title of the true owner. There is no necessary implication of any wrongful act or intention in effecting the entry, or actual hostility in maintaining possession. It is immaterial whether the occupant obtains his seisin as a purchaser or a trespasser, or whether the claim of title was originally based on a written or parol contract, or no contract at all. An exclusive possession for the statutory period under a claim of ownership will create a good title." Martin v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 21 Atl. 740, 741, 83 Me. 100.

A husband who during the lifetime of his wife received the rents and profits of her farm, and on her death, she never having had any children, took possession of the farm, and claimed thereafter to have a life estate therein, held such farm in adverse possession to the title of her heirs. To constitute adverse possession it is not necessary that the possessor claimed the entire estate, or that he claimed to the exclusion of all other rights; it is sufficient that the possession be in opposition to the rights of the lawful owner. Hanson v. Johnson, 62 Md. 25, 29, 50 Am. Rep. 199.

Good faith.

"Adverse possession," in order to be effective, must consist of an occupancy of lands in good faith and under the belief that the claimant has a good title, and an adverse possession which is not characterized with good faith and honesty is a mere sham, and cannot avail as against the true owner or his grantee. Woodward v. McReynolds (Wis.) 2 Pin. 263, 275, 1 Chand. 244.

Hostile character.

Adverse possession is the occupancy of real estate by a person holding in opposition to the rights of all others. To constitute valid adverse possession, the possession must be hostile to the rights of others in its inception. Heermans v. Schmaltz (U. S.) 7 Fed. 566, 576 (quoting Tyler, Ej. 874); Pickett v. Pope, 74 Ala. 122, 131; Washington County v. Norwood, 30 South. 405, 406, 128 Ala. 383; Innerarity v. Mims' Heirs, 1 Ala. 660, 668; Alexander v. Polk, 39 Miss. 737, 755.

Adverse possession is an actual appropriation of the land, commenced and continued under a claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claim of another. Stanley v. Schwably, 13 Sup. Ct. 418, 420, 147 U. S. 508, 37 L. Ed. 259; Walsh v. McIntire, 13 Atl. 348, 350, 68 Md. 402; Kearney v. Borough of West Chester, 49 Atl. 227, 228, 199 Pa. 392; Morse v. Selbold, 35 N. E. 369, 370, 147 Ill. 318.

Adverse possession is an actual possession and exclusive appropriation of land, commenced and continued under a claim of right, either under an openly avowed claim, or under a constructive claim arising from the fact and circumstances pending the appropriation to hold the land against him who is seised. Magee v. Magee, 37 Miss. 138, 152; Davis v. Bowmar, 55 Miss. 671, 751.

The mere possession of land is not prima facie adverse to the title of the true owner, and all presumptions and intendments are favorable to the title, and possession is not presumed to be hostile, but rather in subordination to it. The whole doctrine of adverse possession rests on the presumed acquiescence of the party immediately affected by such possession; therefore, when possession of property was originally acquired in subordination to the title of the true owner, there must be a disclaimer of the owner's title in order to make the continued possession adverse. Dothard v. Denson, 72 Ala. 541, 545.

Adverse possession is occupancy of land without the permission, and not in subservency to the rights, of the true owner, and, as a general rule, is founded on reasons of public policy that a tenant shall never be permitted to controvert his landlord's title, or to set up against him a title which is hostile in its character to that which the tenant acknowledged when he accepted the demise; and therefore, if an adverse claimant comes into possession of land by tampering with the tenant, he cannot resist the landlord's claim, since the tenant himself could not. Forbes v. Caldwell, 17 Pac. 478, 480, 39 Kan. 14.

Possession that in its commencement is not adverse becomes so only when the holder changes his mind or intends it to become adverse, and there is united with such change or intent a knowledge thereof on the part of the true owner. Gay v. Mitchell, 35 Ga. 139, 141, 89 Am. Dec. 278.

No possession consistent with the right of the true owner can be adverse to him. Thus, where inclosed land was dedicated to the public, the city had the right to postpone the removal of the obstructions and the opening of the streets until such time as its resources permitted and the public necessity demanded. As the city only acquired the right to use the land as streets, and the dedicatory reserved all other rights, he had authority to use the land for pasturage or crops, or any purpose consistent with the rights of the city, until the authorities of the city, in the lawful exercise of its power, determined to open the streets; and such use would not constitute "adverse possession." City of Little Rock v. Wright, 23 S. W. 876, 878, 58 Ark. 142.

The possession of land which will ripen into a title valid against the real owner must be such a one as would subject the claimant to an action of ejectment, and the mere fact that one offers the land for sale or pays taxes thereon is insufficient. Fuller v. Elizabeth City, 23 S. E. 922, 118 N. C. 25.

In order to acquire title by adverse possession, the occupation or possession must be of that nature that the real owner is presumed to have known that there was a possession adverse to his title, under which it was intended to make title against him. Foulke v. Bond, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 527, 545.

Intent.

"Adverse possession" is the act of holding possession and claiming the right to do so against one having a superior right or title. Two things, it is said, must occur: First, an ouster of the real owner, followed by an actual possession by the adverse claimant; and, second, an intention on the part of the latter to oust the owner and possess for himself. Ivy v. Yancey, 31 S. W. 937, 938, 129 Mo. 501; Pioneer Wood Pulp Co. v. Chandos, 47 N. W. 661, 662, 78 Wis. 526. Under such definition, the possession of the grantor in a deed of trust is not adverse to the trustee, unless the grantor specifically repudiate the deed; and after the land is sold under the trust deed, if the grantor remains in possession, his possession is not adverse to the purchaser's title, unless he specifically repudiate the trust deed. Ivy v. Yancey, 31 S. W. 937, 938, 129 Mo. 501.

Adverse possession is an entry by one person on the land of another under a claim and color of right, and, in legal language, it is the intention of the party taking the possession which fixes the character of the entry, and any one in possession with no claim to the land whatever must, in the presumption of law, be in possession in amity with and in subservience to the title of the rightful owner, and the fact that possession is taken under a claim of title is sufficient to show the intention of the party to hold adversely, and it is not necessary that the adverse title must be found in some written instrument. Ewing v. Burnet, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 41, 53, 9 L. Ed. 624; Harvey v. Tyler, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 328, 349, 17 L. Ed. 871; Probst v. Trustees of Board of Domestic Missions, 9 Sup. Ct. 263, 265, 129 U. S. 182, 32 L. Ed. 642.

The adverse possession of real estate sufficient to ripen into a title thereto, "must not only have been actual, open, and continuous, but it must be accompanied by an intention to hold the land as owner of it. It must have been under a claim of ownership. No matter how exclusive and hostile to the real owner in appearance, it cannot be effectually adverse unless accompanied by the intent on the part of the plaintiff to make it so. A naked possession unaccompanied with any claim of right will never constitute a bar, but will inure to the advantage of the real owner. Colvin v. Republican Valley Land Ass'n, 30 N. W. 361, 863, 23 Neb. 75, 8 Am. St. Rep. 114.

Mistake.

Where one, at the time of buying a claim to land, erroneously thought it was government land, and intended to make a homestead of it, his possession prior to learning his mistake was not an "adverse possession." Hunnewell v. Burchett, 54 S. W. 487, 152 Mo. 611.

Where adjoining landowners occupy land under mistake, and believe that the land located was correct, and that neither intended to claim more than the true amount, the plaintiff did not hold the excess by adverse possession. Kahl v. Schmidt, 78 N. W. 204, 205, 107 Iowa, 550.

Occupancy distinguished.

The terms "adverse possession" and "occupancy," though nearly synonymous, are yet to be distinguished. The former term cannot, with strict propriety, be applied to the possession of the owners of land, for his possession cannot be adverse to any one other than himself; which is to say, that it cannot be adverse in the ordinary sense of the term. But to such possession—that is, the possession of the owner—the term "occupancy" is entirely appropriate, and indeed, as compared with possession without title, applies for much stronger reasons. Crocker v. Dougherty, 73 Pac. 429, 431, 139 Cal. 521.

Openness and notoriety.

"Whatever construction may have prevailed in England, it is clear that when a man hath obtained a grant of land he thereby gains a constructive possession, which continues until an actual 'adverse possession' commences, and that adverse possession must be continued seven years before the right of possession of the first grantee is lost. A single act of entry cannot take away the grantee's right of possession, because such entry may be made without any notoriety, whereas seven years' actual possession affords notoriety, and, as it were, calls on the owner to assert his right." Slade v. Smith, 2 N. C. 248, 249.

"To constitute adverse possession two facts must concur: First, there must be an entry under color of right, claiming title hostile to the true owner and the world; second, that the entry must be followed by possession appropriate to the terms to be used publicly and notoriously, so that the other claimants may take notice and others may be cognizant of the fact." Dixon v. Cook, 47 Miss. 220, 226.

Adverse possession must be a possession that is notorious, in the sense of being generally known by those residing in the neighborhood, and must be open, visible, and exclusive, and accompanied by such acts of ownership as would enable any one upon a visit to and inspection of the land to see that some person or persons held it in actual possession. Leeper v. Baker, 68 Mo. 400, 404.

Adverse possession is the occupancy of another's land under claim of right, which must consist of such acts as will establish an ouster of the owner, and must be open and notorious, as well as continuous, in order to set the statutes of limitation in motion, and of such a character as to operate as notice to the holder of the true title that possession is held under a claim of right; and the acts of possessor should clearly indicate that he holds for himself and in opposition to the owner. Mauldin v. Cox, 7 Pac. 804, 808, 67 Cal. 387.

Adverse possession is occupancy of another's land, which must be under a claim of ownership, though it need not be under color of title; and it is sufficient if a party goes on the land and declares to the world by his acts and conduct that he is the owner of it, and maintains that attitude for the statutory period. Swift v. Mulkey, 21 Pac. 871, 872, 17 Or. 532.

"Where the acts done upon a tract of land are such as give unequivocal notice to all persons of a claim to it adverse to the claim of all others, and this is accompanied by an actual possession, exclusive in its character, then limitations will run in favor of the persons so asserting adverse claim and enjoying an exclusive possession from the time such exclusive occupancy began, whether the land be inclosed or not." Richards v. Smith, 4 S. W. 571, 573, 67 Tex. 610.

"A subjection of land by a claimant for such use as is ordinarily susceptible to the exclusion of others is an adverse possession, and that subjection may appear by its cultivation or occupation for ordinary husbandry or pasturage. The extent of land to which an adverse possession is claimed must, of course, be properly indicated, so that others may see and respect it, but it need not be shown by an artificial inclosure." Zellin v. Rogers (U. S.) 21 Fed. 103, 108.

"To constitute adverse possession of real estate, entry must be made with definite claim of title and of possession continued while the statute runs. It must be visible and notorious, and such as may fairly imply, on notice to the owner, an acquiescence on his part. Proof of occupation and use by the adverse claimant for more than 20 years, when such occupation and use are consistent with the claim of ownership, may raise the presumption that the entry was under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right." Graeven v. Dieves, 31 N. W. 914, 915, 68 Wis. 317.

It is not necessary that the land should be inclosed by a fence, or that the same should be resided upon, or that buildings should be erected thereon. It is sufficient if the acts of ownership are of such a character as to openly and publicly indicate and assume control or use, or such as are consistent with the character of the premises in question. It is not necessary that the occupation should be such that a mere stranger passing by the land would know that some one was asserting title to and dominion over it. It is not necessary that the land be cleared or fenced, or any buildings be placed upon it. Murray v. Hudson, 32 N. W. 889, 891, 65 Mich. 670.

"Adverse possession" is when there is such an appropriation of land as will inform the vicinage that it is for the exclusive use and enjoyment of such known person. Morrison v. Kelly, 22 Ill. (12 Peck) 609, 624, 74 Am. Dec. 169.

To constitute "adverse possession" so as to bar or limit the right of the true owner thereof to recover them, such lands need not be surrounded by fences or rendered inaccessible by water, but it is sufficient if the possession, occupation, and improvements are open, notorious, and comport with the ordinary management of a farm, though part of the same which composed the woodland belonging to such farm, and used therewith as a wood lot, is not so inclosed. Rev. St. c. 105, § 10. Adams v. Clapp, 87 Me. 316, 32 Atl. 911.

To make out an adverse possession in ejectment, the tenant must show a substantial inclosure, an actual occupancy definite, positive, and notorious. It is not enough to make what is called a "possession fence" or "lot fence" merely by felling trees and lapping them one upon another around the land. Coburn v. Hollis, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 125, 129.

It is manifest that there can be no absolutely unvarying rule with reference to every class of real estate, and that the required occupancy of or dominion over a section of desert lands or of a mining camp, a nonnavigable lake, a prairie, a forest, a fertile farm in a high state of cultivation, or a town lot, would not answer as to a lot in the business center of a populous and thrifty city. Adverse possession of unproductive lands, consisting of barren sand hills cut up by sloughs, is shown by recording the deed under which the occupant claims, cutting all the timber of any value thereon, having the land surveyed and boundary lines grubbed out and staked, going upon the land at intervals, claiming absolute ownership, clearing a small portion, building a brush fence around the portion cleared, employing agents in the neighborhood of the land to look after it, and paying taxes, without proof of actual occupation. Worthley v. Burbanks, 45 N. E. 779, 781, 146 Ind. 534.

It is impossible to specify the particular acts which under every condition would constitute "open and visible possession of land." In the nature of things, the right of way of a railway company, within the limits of an incorporated city or village, cannot be inclosed as a lot or farm might be, nor occupied by permanent structures or improvements, but must be left free for approach to the tracks, and for such other purposes as the exigencies and necessities of the railroad company, in the operation and maintenance of the railway, may require; and therefore, if there have been such unequivocal acts of dominion and control over the land as are sufficient to give notice of the claim of ownership, it will amount to open, notorious, and visible possession. Penn v. Preston (Pa.) 2

Rawle, 14. Where part of a city lot was fenced in by one claiming title to the whole, and the rest of it was covered by a railroad embankment, though the tracks only occupied a small part of the land, the railroad company had actual possession of all of the lot outside the fence. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Nugent, 39 N. E. 263, 265, 152 Ill. 119.

Building on or inclosing the land of another without right is constructive notice to the owner of an adverse claim thereto. Alden v. Gilmore, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 178, 180.

The erection of a small cow pen on a boundary line separating two lots of land and immediately contiguous to the defendant's improvements, an occasional felling of trees, and permitting the cattle to range over the uncultivated land, are not altogether such an assertion to the world of claim of right as against the true owner as to constitute adverse possession. Royall v. Lisle's Lessee, 15 Ga. 545, 549, 60 Am. Dec. 712.

Getting rails, boards, shingles, wood, and timber for building houses from a woodland or uninclosed lot are not such acts of ownership as will constitute adverse possession. Carrol v. Gillion, 33 Ga. 539, 547.

"Adverse possession" includes a case where the land purchased was measured and monuments of stone erected, and hay cut and stacked on the premises, and furrows for fire guards were ploughed around the stacks, and taxes paid, and an open claim of ownership made. Dickinson v. Bales, 61 Pac. 403, 62 Kan. 865.

It is essential to the validity of an "adverse possession" that there shall be an actual entry upon the land of the rightful owner, and an actual, visible possession taken of some part of it. Residence and possession, with cultivation, on adjoining land, with boundaries including the valid title of another, will not give actual possession of the latter, although accompanied by the ordinary use of it as woodlands in connection with that part resided on or cultivated. Olewine v. Messmore, 128 Pa. 470, 482, 18 Atl. 495, 496.

A possession that ripens into title must be such as continually subjects some portion of the disputed land to the only use of which it is susceptible, or it must be an actual and continuous occupation of the house, or the cultivation of the inclosed field according to the usages of husbandry. Shaffer v. Gaynor, 23 S. E. 154, 155, 117 N. C. 15.

That one planted tobacco on different portions of land for more than the statutory period, the land not being inclosed except for the period of cultivation, did not fall within the possession necessary as a predicate for title. Hamilton v. Icard, 23 S. E. 354, 117 N. C. 476.

Acts of notoriety, such as building a fence around the land, entering on it and making improvements, and payment of taxes on the land, are sufficient to constitute adverse possession. Tourtelotte v. Pearce, 42 N. W. 915, 917, 27 Neb. 57.

Trespass.

A mere trespass by occasional entry on land for the purpose of cutting timber or grass thereon for the full period of limitation is not such "adverse possession" as to confer title thereby. Barr v. Potter (Ky.) 57 S. W. 478, 479.

Adverse possession is a hostile holding of real estate which is sufficient to give title thereto. An "adverse possession," such as to prevent the true owner from maintaining trover for trees, timber, or other things severed and taken from it, "should be of such a kind and so long continued as to be clearly distinguished from that which the claimant has while engaged in the mere act of committing the waste or severing and removing the property from the freehold. It should be something different from that which every trespasser has and must have in order to commit the trespass. If it be only the possession enjoyed by the trespasser, and taken and held by him for the very purpose, and that alone, of committing the trespass, it is not an adverse possession within the meaning of the rule that trover will not lie for timber and logs taken from it. Wadleigh v. Marathon County Bank, 17 N. W. 314, 317, 58 Wis. 546.

One who merely cut logs upon unoccupied and wild land, it not appearing whether the land was capable of cultivation, or whether the cutting of the trees was for the purpose of occupancy and improvement of the land, or merely for the purpose of stripping it of the timber, was not an "adverse possession" of such land. Washburn v. Cutter, 17 Minn. 361, 368 (Gil. 335, 344).

Adverse possession is the enjoyment of land or such estate as lies in grant under such circumstances as indicates that such enjoyment has been commenced and continued under assertion or color of title or right on the part of the possessor, and hence the entry of a stranger and the taking of rents and profits by him is not an adverse possession. Omaha & Grant Smelting & Refining Co. v. Tabor, 21 Pac. 925-929, 13 Colo. 41 (citing Wallace v. Duffield, 2 Serg. & R. 527, 7 Am. Dec. 660; French v. Pearce, 8 Conn. 439, 21 Am. Dec. 680; Smith v. Burtis, 9 Johns. 174).

"It is not necessary that there should be an express claim of title, or that there should be color of title; but when a person disclaims title in himself, or does not claim title, but asserts the right to be in another, it is not such an adverse possession as will give title under the act of limitations." Rung v. Shoneberger (Pa.) 2 Watts, 23, 27, 26 Am. Dec. 95.

ADVERSE USER.

"Adverse user is nothing more than such a use of the property as the owner himself would exercise; and that when a party in this manner and for the purposes of a way have received no permission from the owner of the soil, and uses the way as the owner would use it, disregarding claims entirely, using it as though he owned the property himself, that is an adverse user." Blanchard v. Moulton, 63 Me. 434, 437.

The terms "limitation," "prescription," or "adverse user" may be used interchangeably in setting up an easement of water in the land of another, as they mean substantially the same thing. "Prescription properly applies only to incorporeal hereditaments, and is of the same length of time as limitation by statute; and an adverse user is the same." Murray v. Scribner, 43 N. W. 549, 74 Wis. 602.

"Adverse user" is construed by the court in Ward v. Warren, 82 N. Y. 265, in speaking of the phrase that the user "must have been with a knowledge and acquiescence of the owner," as opposed to a use which is claimstine and by stealth. And where the evidence showed that a use was the open and constant exercise of the very right which the plaintiffs claimed, and in the absence of opposition and objection, it was sufficient to show that the claim was adverse. Hey v. Collman, 79 N. Y. Supp. 778, 779, 78 App. Div. 584.

Where defendant, in building a wall on his lot line, inclosed part of the adjoining lot, and the wall so stood for over 20 years, he acquired title to the strip on which the wall actually stood by "adverse user." Pear-sall v. Westcott, 60 N. Y. Supp. 816, 818, 45 App. Div. 34.

ADVERSE VERDICT.

Rev. St. c. 24, § 38, relating to condemnation proceedings for the establishment of highways, provides that a party appealing from the award of the commissioners shall give bond for the payment of costs if the verdict shall be "adverse" to the petitioner. Held, that the word "adverse" in this connection meant that the amount of damages allowed to the petitioner by the selectmen of the town was as great or greater than the amount subsequently allowed by the jury on the appeal. Hamblin v. Barnstable County Com'rs, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 250, 259.

ADVERSE WITNESS.

"Adverse," as used in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, authorizing a party producing a witness whose testimony is adverse to contradict him by evidence of former contradictory statements made by him, construed as meaning hostile, and not merely unfavorable, and hence a witness cannot be contradicted by showing his former statements, unless he shows hostile mind to the party calling him. Greenough v. Eccles, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 786, 801.

ADVERTISE.

"Advertise" means to give public notice; to announce publicly, especially by a printed notice. One insertion of the advertisement of a tax sale in each calendar week during the period of 30 days immediately preceding the day of sale is sufficient under a city charter declaring that tax sales shall be advertised for 30 days. Montford v. Allen, 36 S. E. 305, 306, 111 Ga. 18.

Where a contract by which lands were placed with an agent for sale recited that, if the lands were sold without the instrumentality of the agent, the owner would pay them $50 in full for all trouble in showing and "advertising" the land, the word "advertising" meant the publication of a notice in a newspaper in the usual way that such matters are advertised, and not the showing of the land to prospective buyers, the word being taken in connection with the subject-matter and conditions. The word "advertise," as defined by Webster, meant "to publish notice of; to publish a written or printed account of"; and Bouvier defines "advertisement" to mean "a notice published in handbills or a newspaper." Darst v. Doom, 38 Ill. App. 397, 400.

ADVERTISEMENT.

"Advertisement," as used in the astray law, requiring the "advertisement" of "astray notices," is to be construed as including not only newspaper publications, but publication by the posting of notices. Haffner v. Barnard, 24 N. E. 152, 154, 123 Ind. 429.

"Advertisement," as used in Code 1873, § 880, providing that no irregularity or informality in the "advertisement" of sales for taxes shall affect the legality of the sale, is synonymous with "notice," and hence includes both the publication and the posting. Davis v. Magoun, 80 N. W. 423, 430, 109 Iowa, 308.

"Advertisement," as used in an act prohibiting the tearing down of show bills, poster or other "advertisement," is insufficient to cover a constable's notice of sale. The word is not used to apply to anything and everything set up along the highway which may be designated as an "advertisement," but rather the bills and posters giving notice of or advertising public entertainments. Commonwealth v. Johnson, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 222, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 543, 544.

A signboard erected at a person's place of business, giving notice that lottery tickets are there for sale, is an advertisement within the meaning of St. 1825, c. 184, prohibiting the advertisement of lottery tickets for sale. Commonwealth v. Hooper, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 42, 43.

ADVICE.

"Advice" is optional with the giver; that is, he can advise or remain silent. It is optional with him to whom it is directed; that is, he can accept or decline it. Commonwealth v. Mercer, 42 Atl. 525, 526, 190 Pa. 134.

Act April 18, 1878, providing that the recorders of the cities of the first class shall be appointed by the governor by and with the "advice of the senate," construed not to confer the appointing power on the senate, but only gives the senate a supervisory power over the governor's appointments. Commonwealth v. Lane, 18 Wkly. Notes Cas. 29, 32.

ADVISE.

To "advise" is to give advice; to offer an opinion as worthy or expedient to be followed; to counsel. Webst. Dict.; Long v. State, 36 N. W. 310, 315, 23 Neb. 33, 45.

"Advise," as used in Pen. Code, § 294, providing that any person who advises or causes a woman to take medicine with intent to produce a miscarriage shall be guilty of abortion, construed to mean advice which is acted on by the woman, and not that on which she does not act. People v. Phelps, 15 N. Y. Supp. 440, 441, 61 Hun. 115.

The words "counsel, advise, or assist" may be, and frequently are, used to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it to be done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 685, 90 Ky. 651; Omer v. Commonwealth, 25 S. W. 594, 596, 95 Ky. 353.

There are no words in the law that have acquired a more definite and specific meaning than "procure, advise, and assist," as contradistinguished from the actual commission of the crime. The latter is the principal offense; the former only accessory. If a person does no more than procure, advise, or assist he is only an accessory; but if he is present, consenting, aiding, procuring, advising, and assisting, he is a principal, and must be indicted as such. United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 699, 710.

As instruct.

Pen. Code, § 1118, providing that, if at any time after the evidence on either side is closed the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may "advise" the jury to acquit the defendant, does not authorize the court to instruct the jury to acquit, since the court cannot direct, but only "advise." People v. Daniels, 38 Pac. 720, 721, 105 Cal. 262; People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 18, 11 Pac. 470.

As procure.

"To advise is to give advice to; to offer an opinion, as worthy or expedient to be followed; to counsel"; while "procure" means to bring about, to cause, contrive; and hence an instruction that if defendant requested, "advised," and incited, etc., is unobjectionable under a statute using the term "aid, abet, and procure." Long v. State, 36 N. W. 310, 315, 23 Neb. 33.

ADVISABLE.

That is "advisable" which is expedient, prudent, and proper to be done, and therefore proper to be advised to be done. Its synonyms, according to Webster, Worcester, and the Century Dictionary, are expedient, proper, desirable, prudent, wise, best; and, as used in the act authorizing the dissolution of a savings institution by its manager if deemed advisable, the word "advisable" includes those qualities as applied to the continuance of the corporation, in view of the best interests of the property generally. Barrett v. Bloomfield Sav. Inst., 54 Atl. 543, 549, 64 N. J. Eq. 425.

The act of February 16, 1863, declaring that the board of supervisors may, if deemed "advisable," levy a special tax to pay a judgment against the county, held to be mandatory, and not giving the board discretion in the matter, the decision being based on the construction of "may" as "shall." Rock Island County v. United States, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 435, 445, 18 L. Ed. 419.

ADVISEMENT.

"Advisement" is the act of a judge or justice in taking time to consider all his judgment before rendering the same. A judge may take such time as is necessary to arrive at a decision, but must give the parties notice when he will give judgment. If delay in rendering judgment arises from improper motives or is unnecessarily protracted, a party may compel the entry of judgment. Clark v. Read, 5 N. J. Law (2 South.) 486, 487.

ADVOUTRY.

A term used in old statutes and authors to mean the crime of adultery between parties both of whom were married. Hunter v. United States (Wis.) 1 Pin. 91, 92, 39 Am. Dec. 277.

ADVOUTRER.

A word now obsolete, but signifying the same as our word "adulterer." Beatty v.

Richardson, 34 S. E. 73, 75, 56 S. C. 173, 46 L. R. A. 517.

ADVOWSON.

In modern times and in ordinary language the term "advowson" has been used to mean the perpetual right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. Lord Coke, however, in 1 Inst. p. 17 B., defines it thus: "Advowson, advocatio, signifying an advowing or taking into protection, is as much as jus patronatus. The patronage or jus patronatus in this case was not certainly to present to a church or an ecclesiastical benefice, but in every respect, other than that of having the cure of souls attached to the office, it exactly resembles, if it be not identical with, an ecclesiastical benefice; and accordingly in 8 Edw. III, 3 Ass. Pl. 29, 31, the right of nomination to the guardianship of a hospital is called an advowson." Attorney General v. Chaplains of Ewelme Almshouse, 21 Eng. Law & Eq. 409, 418.

In what is known as the common law as the right of advowson or presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice, and of institution, and induction, the first belongs to the founder or patron of the church; the second to the bishop, which, according to Blackstone, "is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice"; and the last to the churchwardens and vestrymen, which is a giving of the possession or an investiture of the temporal part, as "institution" is of the spiritual. Humbert v. St. Stephens' Church, 1 Edw. Ch. 308, 315.

ÆQUUS.

"Æquus" means even, equal; and such is its meaning in a will which, after disposing of half of testator's estate, provided the other half should be distributed "ex æquus" among the other bequests and legacies. Archer v. Morris, 47 Atl. 275, 276, 61 N. J. Eq. 152.

AEROLITE

An aerolite is a substance in the nature of a stone falling from the heavens, which attaches to and becomes a part of the real estate on which it falls. Goddard v. Winchell, 52 N. W. 1124, 86 Iowa, 71, 17 L. R. A. 788, 41 Am. St. Rep. 481.

AFFAIRS.

See "Fiscal Affairs"; "Municipal Affairs"; "Prudential Affairs."

"Affairs" is well defined to be business; something to be transacted; matter; concern. Public affairs are matters relating to government; and an act requiring school directors to assess a tax to repay certain money due by the district deals with the affairs of the district, as it imposes a specific business on the district which it was not chargeable with before. It is a matter which concerns every person in the district who was thereby made subject to additional taxation. Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125, 133.

Of city.

A law fixing the excise tax on the liquor traffic is not a law relating to the property, affairs, or government of cities, within the meaning of the words as used in the Constitution. People v. Murray, 44 N. E. 146, 150, 149 N. Y. 367, 32 L. R. A. 344.

Of county.

See "County Affairs."

Of railroad.

"Affairs," as used in Act 1869, § 5, providing that when a railroad company which the state has aided has paid the debt the state treasurer shall withdraw the receiver appointed by him from the management of its "affairs," is a word of large import. A receiver having the management of the affairs of a railroad company must necessarily have the control and management of its road. Tompkins v. Little Rock & Ft. & S. R. Co. (U. S.) 15 Fed. 6, 13.

Of testator.

"Affairs," as used in the introductory clause of a will which stated that testator desired to have his "affairs" properly arranged, refers to the condition and management of property, and does not signify property itself, so as to show an intention to dispose by will of all of testator's property, including land. Bragaw v. Bolles, 25 Atl. 947, 950, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 84.

AFFECT.

In Act Mont. March 4, 1897, § 25, relating to building and loan associations, and providing that, except as to taxation, this act shall not "affect" any association heretofore organized under the laws of Montana, "affect" is used in the sense of operate, act upon, or concern. Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Nolan, 53 Pac. 738, 740, 21 Mont. 205.

Within the provisions of an act providing that agreements for the sale of land, duly acknowledged by the wife, shall be good and effectual to convey or "affect" the lands or her interest therein thereby intended to be conveyed or "affected," it was held a familiar way to affect the interest of a person in land to contract to convey it. Goldstein v. Curtis, 52 Atl. 218, 221, 63 N. J. Eq. 454.

As act on injuriously.

In Act June 13, 1812, § 1, relating to rights of property in the territory acquired from France by treaty of April 30, 1803, and providing that the rights, title, and claims to certain lots and commons in, adjoining, and belonging to towns and villages in the territory of Missouri are confirmed to the inhabitants according to their several rights or rights of common thereto, provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to "affect" the rights of any persons claiming the same lands or any part thereof, whose claims have been confirmed by the board of commons for adjusting and settling claims to lands in the said territory, "affect" should be construed as having been used in the sense of acting injuriously upon persons and things. Such interpretation accords with the reason and manifest intent of the proviso, unsettles no confirmed title, and secures to the inhabitant of the village, according to their respective rights, the protection which Congress thought proper to afford them. Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78, 84, 23 L. Ed. 807.

"Affect" is often used in the sense of acting injuriously upon persons; and hence where an act provides that nothing contained therein should be construed to "affect" the rights of any person, etc., it means that the section must not be so construed as to prejudice or injuriously affect such rights. Baird v. St. Louis Hospital Ass'n (Mo.) 21 S. W. 11, 13; Id., 116 Mo. 419, 427, 22 S. W. 726.

"Affect," as used in an act providing that it should not "affect or impair the rights," etc., means injuriously affect. Undoubtedly a party may be beneficially affected as well as injuriously affected, and the word "affect," standing alone, might be said to be ambiguous, but its meaning is clearly the same as impair or affect injuriously. Tyler v. Wells, 2 Mo. App. 526, 538.

Const. art. 19, § 27, providing that nothing in the constitution shall be construed to prevent the General Assembly from authorizing the assessment of lands for local improvements in towns and cities where such improvements are based on the consent of the majority of the adjoining property holders whose property is "affected" thereby, means any property adjoining or near the improvement which is physically affected, or the value of which is materially affected directly by the improvement to a degree in excess of the effect on the property in the city generally. City of Little Rock v. Katzenstein, 12 S. W. 198, 52 Ark. 107.

"Affected," as applied to abutting property on the improvement of a street, relates to property which is burdened with the expense of the grading. Stowell v. City of Milwaukee, 31 Wis. 523, 526.

As change.

The word "affect" means to act upon; to produce an effect or change upon. It is so used in a statute providing that nothing therein contained shall be so construed as to affect any appointments theretofore made under certain other acts. Canniff v. City of New York, 4 E. D. Smith, 430, 439.

"Affect" means to act upon; to change; and hence Acts 25th Gen. Assem. c. 62, known as the "Mulct Law," is not applicable to cities acting under special charters, as it changes the method of control of sale of intoxicating liquors, and is within the provision of Acts 16th Gen. Assem. c. 116, § 23, providing that no general law shall be construed to "affect" the charters or laws of cities organized under special charters. Clark v. Riddle, 70 N. W. 207, 211, 101 Iowa, 270.

"To affect does not mean to impair, but to work a change upon. A right is affected if it is either enlarged or abridged. This is the meaning of the word in Code 1873, § 50, providing that this repeal of existing statutes shall not 'affect' any act done, or any right accruing, or which may have accrued or been established, nor any suit or proceedings had or commenced in a civil case before the time when such repeal takes effect, and therefore the statute does not change pre-existing rights." Holland v. Dickerson, 41 Iowa, 367, 373.

In Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, § 6, providing that such act "shall not affect" the allowance to bankrupts of the exemptions which are prescribed by the state laws in force at the time of the filing of the petition, etc., "shall not affect" means shall not enlarge or diminish. Richardson v. Woodward (U. S.) 104 Fed. 873, 874, 44 C. C. A. 235.

As promote.

"Affect," as used in Code, § 400, providing that no person who, previous to his examination, had an interest in the subject-matter in litigation, however it may have been transferred to a party to the action, shall be examined as to communication between the witness and a person deceased against a person defending as assignee, when such interest may be "affected" by the judgment, means to promote. Westbury v. Simmons, 35 S. E. 764, 765, 57 S. E. 467.

AFFECTING.Affecting ambassadors, etc.

Const. art. 3, § 2, providing that in all cases "affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls," the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction, cannot be construed to apply to a case of an indictment under Crimes Act 1790, c. 36, § 39, for an infraction of the law of nations by offering violence to the person of a foreign minister, since the case is one in which the minister has no concern in the event of the prosecution or in the costs attendant thereon. United States v. Ortega, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 467, 468, 6 L. Ed. 521.

Affecting character.

An action for breach of contract of marriage is an action "affecting the character of the plaintiff," within the meaning of Mill. & V. Code, § 3560, providing that actions for wrongs "affecting the character of plaintiff" shall abate by the death of either party. Weeks v. Mays, 10 S. W. 771, 772, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 442, 3 L. R. A. 212.

Affecting public rights.

See "Public Right."

Affecting a substantial right.

See "Substantial Right."

Affecting title.

An action brought to set aside a deed and to compel a conveyance is an "action affecting the title of real property or an interest therein." Warren v. Wilder, 23 N. Y. St. Rep. 108, 111.

Not every action which relates to real property or in some way affects it is an "action affecting the title to real property or an interest therein"; as, for instance, actions for an injury to the property, or to foreclose a lien thereon, though affecting the property, do not affect the title thereto. Nichols v. Voorhis, 74 N. Y. 28, 29.

AFFECTION OF THE LIVER.

An application for a life policy required the insured to answer whether he had ever had certain diseases, among which was included "affection of liver." Held, that it was difficult to define precisely what was meant by "affection of liver"; that ordinarily there would be understood from such term, some chronic disease of the organ; but that it should be construed to mean some affection of the liver amounting to a disease—that is, of a character so well defined and marked as to materially derange, for a time, the functions of the organ. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 119, 123, 112 U. S. 250, 28 L. Ed. 708; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 30 S. E. 383, 385, 95 Va. 773.

It does not include every accidental disorder or ailment which lasted only for a brief period, and was unattended by substantial injury or inconvenience or prolonged suffering. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 30 S. E. 383, 385, 95 Va. 773.

AFFIANT.

As witness, see "Witness."

AFFIDAVIT.

See "False Affidavit"; "Supplemental Affidavit"; "Verified by Affidavit."

An affidavit is "a statement or declaration reduced to writing, and sworn or affirmed to before some officer who has authority to administer an oath." "An affidavit is a voluntary ex parte statement, formally reduced to writing, and sworn to or affirmed before some officer authorized by law to take it." "An affidavit is simply a declaration on oath, in writing, sworn to by a party before some person who has authority under the law to administer oaths." Cox v. Stern, 48 N. E. 906, 170 Ill. 442, 62 Am. St. Rep. 385 (citing Harris v. Lester, 80 Ill. 307); Morris v. State, 2 Tex. App. 502, 503; Shelton v. Berry, 19 Tex. 154, 155, 70 Am. Dec. 326; Gill v. Ward, 23 Ark. 16, 17; Metcalf v. Prescott, 25 Pac. 1037, 1039, 10 Mont. 283; Davidson v. Bordeaux, 38 Pac. 1075, 1076, 15 Mont. 245; Williams v. Stevenson, 2 N. E. 728, 731, 103 Ind. 243; Blyth & Fargo Co. v. Swensen, 51 Pac. 873, 874, 7 Wyo. 303; Norton v. Hauge, 47 Minn. 405, 406, 50 N. W. 368; Barhydt v. Alexander, 59 Mo. App. 188-192.

An "affidavit" is defined by Blackstone to be a voluntary oath before some judge or officer of the court to evince the truth of certain facts. Shelton v. Berry, 19 Tex. 154, 155, 70 Am. Dec. 326.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration, under oath, made without notice to the adverse party. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4523; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5666; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 504; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1352; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 3704; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 4789; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 2026; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 2003; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5262; B. & C. Comp. Or. 1901, § 815.

The terms "oath" and "affidavit" include every mode authorized by law of attesting the truth of that which is stated. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 14.

To make an "affidavit" to a thing is to testify to it upon oath, in writing. William v. Stevenson, 2 N. E. 728, 731, 103 Ind. 243.

An "affidavit" is a voluntary ex parte statement, formally reduced to writing, and sworn to or affirmed before some officer authorized to take it. The essential requisites are, apart from the title, that there shall be an oath administered by an officer authorized by law to administer it, and that what the affiant states under such oath shall be reduced to writing before such officer. Lutz v. Kinney, 46 Pac. 257, 258, 23 Nev. 279.

An affidavit is an oath in writing signed by the party deposing, sworn before and attested by one who had authority to administer the same, and the component parts of an affidavit are (1) the written oath; (2) the signature of the deponent; (3) the attestation or administering of the oath by the officer who had administered it; and, if any of these elements are lacking, the affidavit is defective. Hargadine v. Van Horn, 72 Mo. 370.

An affidavit is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the adverse party. To make such a document legal and authoritative in a court of justice, it takes both the affiant and an officer authorized to administer the oath acting together. And the oath must be either administered by the officer to the affiant, or asseveration to the truth of the matter contained in the affidavit by the party making it to the officer, with his signature. Without a direct administration of the oath there can be no affidavit under the statute. State v. Finn, 52 Pac. 756, 757, 32 Or. 519.

An affidavit reduced to writing, and sworn and subscribed to before an officer, is not invalid because the affiant's name does not appear in the body thereof. Davidson v. Bordeaux, 38 Pac. 1075, 1076, 15 Mont. 245.

An "affidavit" is a declaration under oath, and where the verification by the affiant is only "according to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, true in substance and in fact," it is not sufficient. City of Atchison v. Bartholow, 4 Kan. 124, 139.

"Affidavits" are usually made to facts, not to opinions; to actual expenditures, not to estimates of them. So that, under an insurance policy requiring the insured to attach to the preliminary proofs of loss a duly verified certificate of a builder as to the actual cash value of the building immediately before the fire, such certificate need not be sworn to, such value being the expression of an opinion. Summersfield v. Phoenix Assur. Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 292, 296.

A professional statement of a counsel, being received by a court, is to be regarded as an affidavit. Rice v. Griffith, 9 Iowa, 539, 540.

"It is a settled rule of practice in the English court that on a motion for an information or any affidavit to hold to bail the affidavit must not be entitled, and if it be entitled it cannot be read. The reason assigned is that there is at the time no cause pending in the court, and an indictment for perjury in making such an affidavit must fail, as it could not be shown that such a case existed in the court in which the affidavit was made." Haight v. Turner, 2 Johns. 371, 372.

Caption or venue, necessity of.

An "affidavit" is merely a declaration on oath and in writing, sworn to by a party before some person who has authority under the laws to administer oaths. Its weight does not depend on the fact whether it is entitled to any cause, or in a particular manner, nor is any caption whatever necessary. Harris v. Lester, 80 Ill. 307, 311.

Under Comp. Laws, §§ 5278, 5279, defining an "affidavit" as being a written declaration under oath made without notice to the adverse party, a written statement under oath having a jurat and seal attached thereto is sufficient though a venue is not shown. State v. Henning, 54 N. W. 536, 537, 3 S. D. 492.

The omission of the venue makes an affidavit prima facie a nullity, but where the affidavit was in fact sworn to within the jurisdiction, as appears from an affidavit used to procure an amendment of the notary who administered the oath, the omission did not invalidate the oath, nor did it render the affidavit a nullity when it appeared that the oath was duly administered. Fisher v. Bloomberg, 77 N. Y. Supp. 541, 542, 74 App. Div. 368.

An "affidavit" is simply a declaration on oath in writing, sworn to by a party before some person who has authority to administer oaths. It does not depend on the facts whether it is entitled in any cause or in any particular way. Without any caption it is nevertheless an affidavit. A declaration, therefore, sworn to by defendant before a person who has authority to administer oaths, is an "affidavit," within the meaning of the Illinois practice act, requiring an affidavit of merits to be filed with a plea in certain cases, and it is not necessary that it should have a caption or be entitled in any cause or particular way. It is sufficient if it can be identified as having been filed in the cause Hays v. Loomis, 84 Ill. 18, 19.

Complaint or answer.

As the term "affidavit" is used in the United States statute authorizing extradition on copy of indictment or affidavit made before a magistrate charging the commission of a crime specified, which must accompany the requisition, it does not mean the same thing as "complaint," and therefore a requisition accompanied by a paper styled a "complaint" against the person sought to be extradited is not sufficient. State v. Richardson, 24 N. W. 354, 355, 34 Minn. 115, 117.

Code Civ. Proc. § 290, declares that an injunction may be granted at the time of the commencement of the action or at any time afterwards, on its appearing satisfactorily by the "affidavit" of the plaintiff that sufficient ground exists therefor. Held, that where plaintiff states all the facts necessary to lay the foundation for an injunction, and swears to the complaint positively, the complaint is an affidavit, within section 290. Blatchford v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 7 Abb. Prac. 322, 323.

The word "affidavit," as used in Code, providing for the granting of an injunction where the right to do so depends upon facts established by affidavits, includes a verified pleading in an action or a verified petition or answer in a special proceeding. Clark v. Herbert Booth King & Bro. Pub. Co., 57 N. Y. Supp. 975, 976, 40 App. Div. 405.

The term "affidavit," within the meaning of Comp. Laws, § 5278, providing that an affidavit is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the adverse party, includes a verified complaint showing a cause of action against a defendant; and therefore it is sufficient, under section 4900, authorizing publication where it appears by affidavit that defendant cannot be found, and that a cause of action exists against him. Woods v. Polard, 84 N. W. 214, 217, 14 S. D. 44.

The term "affidavit," as used in Laws 1833, c. 271, § 8, providing that in all actions at law a certificate of the notary, under his hand and seal, on the presentment by him of any promissory note for payment, and of the protest thereof for nonpayment, shall be presumptive evidence of the facts contained in the certificate, unless the defendant shall annex to his plea an affidavit denying the fact of having received notice of nonpayment of said note, means an affidavit separate and distinct from the answer, and attached thereto, and the sworn answer cannot be treated as being such an affidavit. Gawtry v. Doane, 51 N. Y. 84, 89.

Date, necessity of.

A date is not essential to the affidavit, and if a mistake has been made in the date it is competent to show it by parol. Bell v. City of Spokane, 71 Pac. 31, 32, 30 Wash. 508.

Deposition distinguished.

The word "deposition" is sometimes used both in common parlance and legislative enactment as synonymous with "affidavit" or "oath," and is thus defined by Webster. State v. Dayton, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 49, 54, 53 Am. Dec. 270.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the adverse party. Civ. Code Proc. § 3321. A "deposition" is a written declaration on oath, made upon notice to the adverse party, for the purpose of enabling him to attend and cross-examine. Both affidavit and deposition are declarations under oath. And a distinction recognized by the court between the two is simply for the purpose of preserving the right of cross-examination. So that in a probate proceeding, where there is no adverse party, an affidavit will be treated as a deposition. In re Litter's Estate, 48 Pac. 753, 755, 19 Mont. 474.

"An 'affidavit' is the mere voluntary act of the party making the oath, and may be, and generally is, taken without the cognizance of the one against whom it is to be used." It is distinguished from a deposition in that the latter "is given by a witness under interrogatives, oral or written, and usually written down by an official person." Stimpson v. Brooks (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 100.

An "affidavit" is a voluntary ex parte statement formally reduced to writing, and sworn to or affirmed before some officer authorized by law to take it. The distinction between an affidavit and a deposition is that the former is ex parte and voluntary, and the latter is made after notice, and is compulsory. If the witness is subpoenaed, sworn, and required to answer, his evidence, reduced to writing, is his deposition. Crenshaw v. Miller (U. S.) 111 Fed. 450, 451.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration under oath, without notice to the adverse party; and hence includes a deposition taken under oath, and without notice to the adverse party. Hanna v. Barrett, 18 Pac. 497, 39 Kan. 446.

As evidence or testimony.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the adverse party. It is one of the forms of taking or presenting testimony. First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743-746, 3 Wyo. 356.

An "affidavit" is a voluntary ex parte declaration, sworn to before some officer, and can only be used to verify pleadings, prove service of notices or other process in support of motions, or to obtain provisional or other remedies, and in chancery proceedings, unless specially authorized by law, and does not constitute evidence. Watkins v. Grieser, 66 Pac. 332, 334, 11 Okl. 302.

"Affidavit" is defined to be a statement or declaration reduced to writing, and sworn or affirmed to before some officer who has authority to administer an oath or affirmation. It differs from a deposition, in this: that in the latter the opposed party has an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, whereas an affidavit is always taken ex parte. An affidavit includes the oath, and may show what facts affiant swore to, and thus be available as an oath, although unavailable as an affidavit. By general practice affidavits are allowable to present evidence upon the hearing of a motion, although the motion may involve the very merits of the action, but they are not liable to present evidence on the trial of an issue raised by a witness. Here the witness must be produced before the adverse party. According to this definition of the word "affidavit" it may contain evidence, and, if evidence, then it is in a sense testimony, because it is a statement of facts witnessed by the affiant, and testimony is defined as a solemn declaration or affirmation for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact.

Hence a juror who has formed an opinion of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, based on reading an affidavit of the witness to the transaction, is within the criminal code, which renders incompetent jurors who have formed or expressed opinions based on conversations with witnesses to the transaction or reading their testimony or hearing them testify. Woods v. State, 33 N. E. 901, 903, 134 Ind. 35.

Jurat as part of.

A jurat is that part of an affidavit where the officer certifies that it was sworn to before him. It is not the affidavit. Theobald v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 75 Ill. App. 208, 213.

An "affidavit" is simply the written declaration on oath, in writing, sworn to by the declarant before a person who has authority to administer oaths. The jurat certificate is no part of the oath or affidavit, but simply evidence that the oath was made or the affidavit was sworn to. Bantley v. Finney, 62 N. W. 213, 215, 43 Neb. 794; Williams v. Stevenson, 2 N. E. 728, 731, 103 Ind. 243; Cox v. Stern, 48 N. E. 906, 170 Ill. 442, 62 Am. St. Rep. 385; Turner v. St. John, 78 N. W. 340, 346, 8 N. D. 245. So that under a statute requiring a claim for lien to be verified by affidavit the affidavit is sufficient, though in place of the jurat there is attached a regular form of acknowledgment. Turner v. St. John, 78 N. W. 340, 346, 8 N. D. 245.

To entitle an affidavit to be read in court, the fact that it was sworn to by the party whose oath it purports to be must be certified by the officer before whom it was taken, which certificate is commonly called a "jurat," and must be signed by such officer. This certificate, however, is no part of the affidavit. Garrard v. Hitsman, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 124, 125.

An "affidavit" is defined by Webster to be a sworn statement in writing. Technically considered, the word is doubtless broad enough to include the jurat or certificate of the officer before whom the oath is taken. In common acceptance, however, it has the more restricted meaning, and refers to those statements sworn to and subscribed by the affiant, but does not include the notarial certificate. And this use in such sense in Rev. St. § 4746, provides for the punishment of every person who knowingly or willfully in any wise procures or makes a presentation of any false or fraudulent affidavit concerning a claim for a pension, and the fact that the jurat of the notary attached contains a false statement does not render it a false affidavit. United States v. Glasener (U. S.) 81 Fed. 568, 568.

A paper stating grounds of an attachment, but which did not show on its face that plaintiff signed it before an officer authorized to take oaths, and which was not signed by such officer, is not an "affidavit," within Rev. St. § 2517, requiring an affidavit before a warrant of attachment can issue. Doty v. Boyd, 24 S. E. 59, 60, 46 S. C. 39.

An "affidavit" is an oath in writing, sworn before and attested by one who has authority to administer the same; hence, if the jurat is not signed, that which purports to be an affidavit is a mere nullity. Knapp v. Duclo, 1 Mich. N. P. 189; Morris v. State, 2 Tex. App. 502, 503.

As an oath.

Rev. St. c. 127, § 47, provides that in trials before a justice of the peace, if the defendant shall appear and "make oath" that, from prejudice or other cause, he believes the justice will not decide impartially in the matter, the justice shall transfer the cause to another justice. Held, that in this connection the word "oath" had the same meaning as "affidavit," since an affidavit includes the oath, and may show what facts the affiant swore to, and is therefore available as an oath within the statute, though it might not contain all the requisites of an affidavit. Burns v. Doyle, 28 Wis. 460, 463.

An "affidavit" is an oath reduced to writing, and attested by him who has authority to administer the same. So that the statute giving notaries the power to take oaths in all cases is sufficiently broad to cover affidavits. Walker v. People, 45 Pac. 388, 389, 22 Colo. 415.

An "affidavit" is one method of taking an oath. Metcalf v. Prescott, 10 Mont. 283, 294, 25 Pac. 1037, 1039.

An "affidavit" includes the oath, and may show what facts affiant swore to, and thus be available as an oath, although unavailable as an affidavit. Woods v. State, 33 N. E. 901, 903, 134 Ind. 35.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration under "oath." City of Atchison v. Bartholow, 4 Kan. 124. An "oath" is a declaration or promise made by calling on God to witness what is said. Hence an order granting an execution against the person of defendant is not void because it recites that it was issued on oath, in place of affidavit, the oath being in that case a written statement. In re Heath, 19 Pac. 926, 927, 40 Kan. 333.

An affidavit is defined to be a formal written or printed voluntary ex parte statement, sworn or affirmed to before an officer authorized to take it, to be used in legal proceedings. Unless a statute or rule of court otherwise require, any one authorized to administer an oath may take an affidavit. An affidavit taken before a consular agent of the United States is an affidavit, under Code, § 158, providing that proof of service outside of the state shall be by affidavit. Marine Wharf & Storage Co. v. Parsons, 28 S. E. 956, 966, 49 S. C. 136.

Petition distinguished.

Under Dawson's Code, § 334, requiring a "petition and affidavit" to be filed in mandamus proceedings, a single paper styled a "petition and affidavit" is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute, since the expression "petition and affidavit" does not necessarily mean two separate papers. Golden Canal Co. v. Bright, 6 Pac. 142, 149, 8 Colo. 144.

An affidavit is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the opposite party. In all affidavits and depositions the witness must be made to speak in the first person. The word "petition," when used in the statute, is generally understood to mean a written application addressed to a court or judge, praying for the exercise of some judicial power, or to a public officer, requesting the performance of some duty enjoined upon him by law, or the exercise of some discretion with which he is vested. While there is a distinction between an affidavit and a petition, yet where the petition alleges sufficient facts, and is duly verified, it will be sufficient as an affidavit, under Laws 1898, p. 34, authorizing executors and administrators, with the consent of the county court, to make mortgage loans on estate real property when it is shown by affidavit that the money can be procured for the same or else a higher rate of interest than that already paid. Lawrey v. Sterling, 69 Pac. 460, 463, 41 Or. 518.

Signature, necessity of.

An affidavit is an oath in writing sworn to and attested by the deposing party before one who has authority to administer an oath, and it is not absolutely essential, where there is no statute or rule of court requiring it, that the deposing party should sign the writing. Crist v. Parks, 19 Tex. 234, 235. To the same effect, Shelton v. Berry, 19 Tex. 154, 155, 70 Am. Dec. 326; Alford's Adm'rs v. Cochrane, 7 Tex. 485, 488; Watts v. Womack, 44 Ala. 605, 607; Bates v. Robinson, 8 Iowa, 318, 320; Norton v. Hauge, 47 Minn. 405, 406, 50 N. W. 368.

The signing or subscribing of the name of the affiant to the writing is not generally essential to its validity. It must be certified by the officer before whom the oath is taken. Alford v. McCormac, 90 N. C. 151. In the absence of statute requiring the affidavit to a chattel mortgage to be signed by the affiant, the mortgage is sufficient without such signature. Lutz v. Kinney, 46 Pac. 257, 258, 23 Nev. 279.

An affidavit is "a statement of fact under oath, reduced to writing, certified to by the officer before whom the same is made, and usually, though not necessarily, unless required by statute, signed by the affiant." The sworn testimony of witnesses reduced to writing by the official stenographer are sufficient affidavits to support a motion for change of venue. State v. Sullivan, 17 S. E. 865, 868, 39 S. C. 400.

The word "affidavit," as used in Rev. St. art. 2072, providing that executors and administrators shall allow no claim unless accompanied by an "affidavit" of its correctness, includes the signature of the affiant, the decisions having defined an affidavit as a voluntary oath before some judge or officer of the court to evince the truth of certain facts, including the signature. Anderson v. Cochran, 57 S. W. 29, 30, 93 Tex. 533.

Code, § 3598, providing that the basis of proceedings to obtain a writ of error is an affidavit, means a written declaration, under oath, signed by the affiant, and an affidavit not signed by the affiant is not sufficient. Crenshaw v. Taylor, 30 N. W. 647, 70 Iowa, 386.

A paper described and referred to in an attachment proceeding as an "affidavit," on which the attachment issued, but not signed by any one, is no affidavit. Hargadine v. Van Horn, 72 Mo. 370.

"It is necessary that affiant should sign the affidavit. He must make it; that is, he must swear to the facts stated, and they must be in writing. It is then his affidavit. And, as evidence that it was sworn by the party whose oath it purports to be, it must be certified by the officer before whom it was taken, which certificate is commonly called the 'jurat,' and must be signed by the officer." While it is true that Bacon defines an affidavit to be "an oath in writing signed by the party deposing, sworn before and attested by him who hath authority to administer the same" (1 Bac. Abr. tit. "Affidavit"), "this definition was probably founded on the practice under rules of court in England, and, though it is better practice that every officer before whom an affidavit is made should require the party sworn to subscribe his name to the body of the affidavit, the omission of the affiant's signature does not affect the validity of the affidavit." Gill v. Ward, 23 Ark. 16, 17; Garrard v. Hitsman, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 124, 125.

An affidavit has been defined to be an oath in writing, signed by the party deposing, and sworn to before an officer authorized to put an oath. But the Supreme Court has held that the writing is an affidavit in law, though not signed by the deponent, if his name appears in the body of it, and it be duly sworn to. Haff v. Spicer, 3 Caines, 190; Millus v. Shafer, 3 Denio, 60. Chancellor Walworth differed with the Supreme Court, and afterward held that an affidavit must be subscribed at the foot of it. People v. Sutherland, 81 N. Y. 1, 7 (citing Hathaway v. Scott, 11 Paige, 173).

An affidavit must be a writing, and must in some way purport to contain a statement or declaration of the person sworn or purporting to have been sworn. Thus, an instrument reciting that plaintiff, being sworn, deposes that defendants are indebted to plaintiff, and signed in the name of plaintiff, by "F.," managing agent, is not an affidavit of the plaintiff or an agent. Blyth & Fargo Co. v. Swensen, 51 Pac. 873, 874, 7 Wyo. 303.

Writing, necessity of.

The expression "writing and affidavit," while it may mean two different documents, may also properly signify but one, and thus mean a writing called an affidavit. United States v. Corbin (U. S.) 11 Fed. 238, 239.

The word "affidavit," ex vi termini, means an oath reduced to writing. Thus, under a statute requiring an application for change of venue to be based on affidavits, oral evidence cannot be introduced. State v. Headrick, 51 S. W. 99, 101, 149 Mo. 396.

An affidavit is a sworn statement in writing, and there is no such thing as an unwritten affidavit. Windley v. Bradway, 77 N. C. 333, 334.

The word "affidavit," as used in the Revised Code, relating to bail, and providing that in certain personal actions it shall be lawful for any judge of the general court upon proper affidavit to direct bail to be taken, etc., imports an oath in writing. Hawkins v. Gibson (Va.) 1 Leigh, 476, 480.

"Affidavit" is not an ambiguous word. It signifies a written attestation or asseveration of the truth, in contradistinction to "oath," which is a mere oral attestation. Black v. Cochran, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 326, 327.

The term "affidavit," as used in 2 Rev. St. (3d Ed.) p. 338, § 84, providing that the proof required to obtain an attachment for a witness in any suit before a justice of the peace may be made by affidavit of the party applying therefor, is to be construed to be used in its popular sense. The words "oath," "deposition," "testimony," and "affidavit," when used in reference to legal proceedings, convey to the unprofessional ear the same meaning as do the verbs "to swear," "to make oath," "to depose," "to testify," "to make affidavit." Hence the affidavit need not be in writing, but may be oral. Baker v. Williams, 12 Barb. 527, 530.

Verified pleading included.

The word "affidavit" includes a verified pleading in an action, or a verified petition or answer in a special proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 11.

AFFIDAVIT OF DEPOSIT.

An affidavit of deposit is the promise of a bank issuing it to pay money either on demand or at a fixed time. State v. Hill, 47 Neb. 456, 532, 66 N. W. 541.

AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.

An affidavit of merits, within Code, § 2871, requiring a party in default to file an affidavit of merits in order to have the judgment set aside, is a setting out and showing of facts constituting the claim alleged to be meritorious, and an affidavit that one has a meritorious defense is not sufficient. Palmer v. Rogers, 30 N. W. 645, 70 Iowa, 381.

AFFILIATED SOCIETIES.

Affiliated societies are local societies connected with the central society or with each other. The relative bodies should continue to exist, since one body cannot be said to be connected with itself, and hence affiliation excludes any relation involving an extinguishment of any of the affiliated bodies. Allison v. Smith, 16 Mich. 405, 433.

AFFINITY.

The only kind of affinity known to the Roman law is that which exists between one of the parties joined by marriage and the relations of the other; and this alone, properly speaking, is affinity. Poydras v. Livingston (La.) 5 Mart. (O. S.) 292, 295.

"Affinity" is the tie which arises from marriage between the husband and the blood relations of the wife, and between the wife and the blood relations of the husband. Tegarden v. Phillips (Ind.) 39 N. E. 212, 213; State v. Wall, 26 South. 1020, 1021, 41 Fla. 463; Paddock v. Wells (N. Y.) 2 Barb. Ch. 331, 333; Solinger v. Earle, 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. (13 Jones & S.) 80, 84; Ex parte Harris, 7 South. 1, 2, 26 Fla. 77, 6 L. R. A. 713, 23 Am. St. Rep. 548; Kirby v. State, 8 South. 110, 111, 89 Ala. 63; Blodget v. Brinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30; Chinn v. State, 26 N. E. 986, 987, 47 Ohio St. 575, 11 L. R. A. 630; Doyle v. Commonwealth, 40 S. E. 925, 926, 100 Va. 808; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Iowa Water Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 467, 468; Holt v. Watson (Ark.) 71 S. W. 262, 263 (citing North. Arkansas & W. R. Co. v. Cole [Ark.] 70 S. W. 312).

The word "affinity," when applied to the marriage relation, signifies the connection existing in consequence of marriage between each of the married persons and the blood relatives of the other. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17, subd. 9.

Computation.

Affinity is the connection between the husband and his wife's parents, and the wife and the husband's parents. There are no degrees, strictly speaking, in affinity, as there are in parentage or consanguinity, but a man is considered as related to the parents of his wife in the same degree as she is. Waterhouse v. Martin, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 374, 389.

The rule of computing the degrees of affinity is that the relations of the husband stand in the same degree of affinity to the wife in which they are related to the husband by consanguinity; which rule holds also, eo converso, in the case of the wife's relations. Thus where one is brother by blood to the wife, he is brother-in-law, or by affinity, to the husband. Chinn v. State, 26 N. E. 986, 987, 47 Ohio St. 575, 11 L. R. A. 630 (quoting Erskine's Institutes, 1b., 6, t. § 8).

While the marriage tie remains unbroken, the blood relations of the wife stand in the same degree of affinity to the husband as they do in consanguinity to her. Thus, the father of the wife stands in the first degree of affinity to his son-in-law, and in the first degree of consanguinity to his daughter. Relationship by affinity may also exist between the husband and one who is connected by marriage with the blood relations of the wife. Thus, where two men marry sisters, they become related to each other in the second degree of affinity as their wives are related in the second degree of consanguinity. Paddock v. Wells, 2 Barb. Ch. 331, 333.

The blood relations of each party to a marriage are held as related by affinity to one spouse as by consanguinity to the other. State v. Wall, 26 South. 1020, 1021, 41 Fla. 463, 49 L. R. A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 195; Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 531, 545; Kelly v. Neely, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 657, 659, 56 Am. Dec. 288.

The relation of affinity is contracted by the union of man and woman in the bonds destined for the propagation of the species, and its computation is in the same order as the relation of consanguinity in respect to the collateral line, and it extends only to the eighth degree of civil computation if the union be by legitimate matrimony, and to the fourth if the union be without matrimony, it being observed that the man and woman only who contracted the union are individually connected by affinity with the blood relations of the other party, and those blood relations are connected by affinity with the consort of their blood parent; and this relationship shall only be valid for the civil purposes which may be explained in the laws and acts of individuals of the human race. Comp. Laws N. M. § 1413.

Consanguinity distinguished.

"Affinity" is the connection existing in consequence of marriage between each of the married persons and the kindred of the other, being distinguished from consanguinity, which denotes relationship by blood. Te- garden v. Phillips, 42 N. E. 549, 551, 14 Ind. App. 27; Carman v. Newell (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 25, 26; Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 531, 545; Doyle v. Commonwealth, 40 S. E. 925, 928, 100 Va. 808.

"Affinity" is a connection formed by marriage, which places the husband in the same degree of nominal propinquity to the relations of the wife as that in which she herself stands towards them, and gives to the wife the same reciprocal connection with the relations of the husband. It is used in contradistinction to consanguinity. It is no real kindred. Affinity arises from marriage, by which each party becomes related to all the consanguineal of the other party to the marriage, but in such case these respective consanguineal do not become related by affinity to each other. In this respect modes of relationship are dissimilar. The relationship by consanguinity is in itself not capable of dissolution, but the relationship by affinity ceases with the dissolution of the marriage which produces it. Therefore, though a man is, by affinity, brother to his wife's sister, on the death of the wife he may lawfully marry the sister. Kelly v. Neely, 12 Ark. 657, 659, 56 Am. Dec. 288.

Dissolution of marriage.

The relation by affinity is not lost on the dissolution of the marriage any more than a blood relation is lost by the death of those from whom it is derived. The dissolution of the marriage, once lawful, by death or divorce has no effect on the issue, and can have no greater effect to annul the relation by affinity. Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 531, 545.

Where a defendant during the life of her husband stood in the fourth degree of affinity to the chancellor, as her husband was related to him in the fourth degree of consanguinity, the death of the husband did not sever the tie of affinity where there was living issue of the marriage in whose veins the blood of both parties was commingled, since the relationship of affinity was continued through the medium of the issue of the marriage. Paddock v. Wells, 2 Barb. Ch. 331, 333.

"Relationship by consanguinity is in its nature incapable of dissolution, but relationship by affinity ceases with the dissolution of the marriage which produced it." Blodget v. Brinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30; Kelly v. Neely, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 657, 659, 56 Am. Dec. 288. Hence though a man is by affinity brother to his wife's sister, on the death of the wife he may lawfully marry the sister. Kelly v. Neely, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 657, 659.

A justice whose brother's widow became the wife of plaintiff's brother, of which marriage there was no issue, the wife being dead at the time of trial, is not related by affinity to plaintiff. Carman v. Newell (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 25, 26.

Kinsmen of wife and of husband.

Relationship by affinity does not extend to the nearest relations of a husband and wife so as to create a mutual relation between them. The consanguineous relations of relatives by affinity are not related at all. Thus, the sister of a man's wife is not related by affinity to that man's blood relatives. Oneal v. State, 47 Ga. 229, 248; Hume v. Commercial Bank, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 1, 2, 43 Am. Rep. 290; Blodget v. Brinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30; Ex parte Harris, 7 South. 1, 2, 26 Fla. 77, 6 L. R. A. 713, 23 Am. St. Rep. 548; Higbe v. Leonard, 1 Denio, 186, 187; Paddock v. Wells, 2 Barb. Ch. 331, 333; Doyle v. Commonwealth, 40 S. E. 925, 926, 100 Va. 808; Waterhouse v. Martin, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 374, 389; North Arkansas & W. R. Co. v. Cole (Ark.) 70 S. W. 312, 313.

There is no affinity between the husband's brother and his wife's sister, which is called by the doctors affinitas affinitatis, because then the connection is formed, not between one of the spouses and the kinsman of the other, but between the kinsmen of both. Chinn v. State, 26 N. E. 986, 987, 47 Ohio St. 575, 11 L. R. A. 630.

A husband holds the same relationship to his wife's relatives by affinity as she does, and she stands in the same relation to his relatives; but those sustaining a relationship to him would not hold the same to her relatives, and those related to her would not hold the same relation to his relatives. Chase v. Jennings, 38 Me. 44, 45.

The father of a son whose wife is the aunt of the plaintiff is not connected by affinity with the plaintiff, nor vice versa, for the son has only formed a connection with which the father is not affected. Waterhouse v. Martin, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 374, 389.

A juror who was a cousin of the stepfather of the deceased was related by affinity to the mother of the deceased, but bore no relation to deceased himself. Kirby v. State, 8 South. 110, 111, 89 Ala. 63.

"Affinity," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 275, § 2, prohibiting a judge of any court sitting in any cause in which he would be excluded from being a juror by reason of "affinity" to either of the parties, does not bar a justice the two brothers of whom intermarried with two sisters of the plaintiff, all of whom were living, for, although he was related by "affinity" to the plaintiff's two sisters, there was no such relation between him and plaintiff. Higbe v. Leonard (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 186, 187.

There is no affinity between the blood relatives of the husband and the blood relatives of the wife, and hence a judge who is a brother of the husband of the sister of a petitioner is not disqualified to take action in the cause by reason of affinity. Ex parte Harris, 7 South. 1, 2, 26 Fla. 77, 6 L. R. A. 713, 23 Am. St. Rep. 548.

"Affinity," as used in a statute disqualifying a person related by affinity within a certain degree to the party in an action from being a juror, construed to include a person marrying a sister of the wife of a party. Foot v. Morgan (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 654.

Act July 1, 1877, § 2, making fornication between persons related by affinity or consanguinity nearer than cousins criminal, construed not to include a husband and the wife of the brother of his wife. The court says that "the term affinity, as used in determining the persons between whom marriage may be lawfully solemnized, and those between whom sexual intercourse is to be regarded as incestuous, has received in law, by its application and use, a definite signification; and we must assume that the Legislature, in enacting this section defining the crime of incest, used it in the same sense. It expresses the relationship which arises by marriage between one of the parties and the blood relation of the other." Chinn v. State, 26 N. E. 986, 987, 47 Ohio St. 575, 11 L. R. A. 630.

AFFIRM.

A judgment of affirmance in the High Court of Errors and Appeals does not affect the lien of the judgment below, the meaning of the word "affirm" being to "ratify" or "confirm," and not "to destroy." Planters' Bank v. Calvit, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 143, 194, 41 Am. Dec. 616.

An appeal bond conditioned that appellant shall pay, etc., if judgment "be affirmed," does not authorize a forfeiture of the bond in case of dismissal of the appeal for want of prosecution. Drummond v. Husson, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 60, 61.

The jurat of a notary public to the certificate of the publisher of a delinquent tax list, reciting that it was "affirmed to" before him, is sufficient to authorize a judgment of sale of property for a special assessment therein shown. It need not set out the language of the affirmation, the presumption being that it was in the form prescribed by statute. Colvin v. People, 46 N. E. 737, 166 Ill. 82.

AFFIRMANCE.

The term "judgment of affirmance," in Code Civ. Proc. § 191, as amended by Laws 1896, c. 559, which provides that no appeal shall lie from the judgment of affirmance unanimously rendered by the Appellate Division, etc., includes an appeal from an order overruling the exceptions to the verdict heard in the first instance by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, and ordering judgment on the verdict. Huda v. American Glucose Co., 45 N. E. 942, 151 N. Y. 549.

The affirmance or disaffirmance by an infant of his contract is in its nature a mental assent, and necessarily implies the action of a free mind exempt from all constraint and disability. Thus, an alleged affirmance by a daughter of a contract made by her before attaining her majority to induce her mother to give her consent to the daughter's marriage was held to have been procured by an undue influence, and therefore not properly an affirmance. Sayles v. Christie, 58 N. E. 480, 488, 187 Ill. 420.

AFFIRMATION.

As included in oath, see "Oath."

AFFIRMATIVE DAMAGES.

Affirmative damages are damages which a respondent in a libel for injuries to a vessel may recover, which may be in excess of any amount which the libellant would be entitled to claim. Ebert v. The Reuben Doud (U. S.) 3 Fed. 520-524.

AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.

The term "affirmative defense" is frequently used to designate what the Code terms a defense in pleading, which consists only of new matter constituting a defense; that is, new matter which, assuming the complaint to be true, constitutes a defense to it. Carter v. Eighth Ward Bank, 67 N. Y. Supp. 300, 303, 33 Misc. Rep. 128.

AFFIRMATIVE PLEA.

An "affirmative plea" is one that sets up a single fact not appearing in the bill, or sets up a number of circumstances all tending to establish a single fact, which fact, if existing, destroys the complainant's case. Potts v. Potts (N. J.) 42 Atl. 1055, 1056.

AFFIRMATIVE PREGNANT.

An affirmative pregnant is an allegation implying some negative in favor of the adverse party, and makes instructions in a criminal case objectionable, as well as pleadings in civil actions. Fields v. State, 32 N. E. 780, 782, 134 Ind. 46.

AFFIRMATIVE PROOF.

The expression "affirmative proof," as used in an instruction that the second proposition propounded by the plaintiff cannot be found in the affirmative by inference, but must be established by "affirmative proof," is strictly meaningless, for it is equivalent to saying that the jury must find affirmatively if there is sufficient proof in favor of the affirmative side of the proposition. If it means anything, it means that the proposition must be established by direct or positive proof. Gates v. Hughes, 44 Wis. 332, 336.

AFFIRMATIVE RELIEF.

The affirmative relief to which a defendant may be entitled in a judgment to be rendered under Code, § 274, means such relief as may properly be given within the issues made by the pleadings, or according to the legal or equitable rights of the parties as established by the evidence, not to that redress which is equally applicable after as before judgment, and may be obtained on motion or by action. Garner v. Hannah, 13 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Duer.) 262, 273.

AFFIRMATIVE REPRESENTATIONS.

In the law of insurance, representations are of two classes, affirmative and promissory. The former are those which affirm the existence of a particular state of things at the time the contract of insurance is made and becomes operative; the latter are those which are made by the insured concerning what is to happen during the term of the insurance, stated as matters of expectation, or, it may be, of contract. The one is an affirmation of a fact existing when the contract begins; the other is a promise to be performed after the contract has come into existence. New Jersey Rubber Co. v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., 46 Atl. 777, 778, 64 N. J. Law, 580.

AFFIRMATIVE WARRANTY.

An affirmative warranty is one which affirms the existence of certain facts at the time of the insurance. King v. Tioga County Patrons' Fire Relief Ass'n, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1057, 1058, 35 App. Div. 58; McKenzie v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co., 44 Pac. 922, 924, 112 Cal. 548; Wood v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 13 Conn. 533, 539, 35 Am. Dec. 92.

A warranty, in insurance, is affirmative where the insured undertakes for the truth of some positive allegation, as that the thing is neutral property, or that the ship sailed on such a day, etc. Hendricks v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 1, 13.

Warranties are of two kinds, affirmative and promissory. Affirmative consists of representation in the policy of facts; promissory are those that require that something shall be or shall not be done after the policy takes effect. If the affirmative warranty is false, it avoids the contract; and, if a promissory warranty is not complied with, it avoids the policy. Maupin v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co., 45 S. E. 1003, 1004, 53 W. Va. 557.

There are two classes of conditions usually inserted in insurance policies, the first pointing to the time of the contract, which is called an "affirmative warranty," and the second to things which may occur or which may have to be performed at a time subsequent, or "promissory warranties." Affirmative warranties are sometimes called "warranties in present," and the breach of an affirmative warranty consists in the falsehood of the affirmation; but the breach of a promissory warranty consists in the nonperformance of the stipulation. A stipulation that a watchman shall be kept on the premises is a promissory warranty, where the statements or representations related to the descriptive character and value of the property insured, they are affirmative warranties. Cowan v. Phenix Ins. Co., 20 Pac. 408, 411, 78 Cal. 181 (citing Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cothéal [N. Y.] 7 Wend. 72, 22 Am. Dec. 567; De Hahn v. Hanley, 1 Term R. 343).

In the law of insurance, warranties which affirm the existence of certain facts pertaining to the risk are denoted "affirmative warranties." An instance of this class is found in Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 13 S. E. 973. There the insured, in answer to a question, stated that a watchman slept on the premises at night. On the night of the fire the watchman was absent, but it was held that the policy was not thereby avoided, because the answer related to the present and not to the future: in other words, that the statement was manifestly intended merely as an affirmative of the usual existing state of facts, and had nothing promissory as to the future. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 18 S. E. 191, 192, 90 Va. 290.

AFFIRMATIVELY AUTHORIZED BY LAW.

The phrase "affirmatively authorized by law," as used in the river and harbor bill of 1890, § 10, 26 Stat. 454, prohibiting the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by law and the navigable capacity of any of the waters of the United States, embraces state authorization as well as congressional authorization, and a construction of a bridge under the authority of such state was an obstruction affirmatively authorized by law. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. J. T. Wiygul & Son (Miss.) 33 South. 965, 966, 61 L. R. A. 578.

AFFIX.

A trade-mark is deemed to be affixed to an article of merchandise when it is placed in any manner in or upon either (1) the article itself, or (2) a box, bale, barrel, bottle, case, cask, or other vessel or package, or a cover, wrapper, stopper, brand, label or other thing, in, by, or with which the goods are packed, inclosed, or otherwise prepared for sale or disposition. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 367.

A thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is attached to it by roots, as in the case of trees, vines, or shrubs; or imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to what is thus permanent, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws. Sluice boxes, flumes, hose, pipes, railway tracks, cars, blacksmith shops, mills, and all other machinery or tools used in working or developing a mine, are to be deemed affixed to the mine. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, §§ 1076, 1077.

Under Civ. Code, § 660, providing that a thing is deemed to be affixed to realty when it is attached to it by roots, as in case of trees; or imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting on it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to a building by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws—an engine or boiler erected in a wooden building, adjoining a brick structure, for the purpose of connecting power to the machinery in the brick building by means of shafts extending into and through the walls, will be held to be affixed. McNally v. Connolly, 11 Pac. 320, 321, 70 Cal. 3. So, under the same section, a house of a permanent nature, but which is erected without disturbing the soil, will be deemed to be affixed to the land. Miller v. Waddingham (Cal.) 25 Pac. 688, 689.

AFFRAY.

See "Sudden Affray."

As defined by Webster, an "affray" is the act of suddenly disturbing any one; an assault or attack; the fighting of two or more persons in a public place, to the terror of others. He also says that a fighting in private is not, in a legal sense, an affray. He also gives the synonyms: Quarrel; brawl; scuffle; encounter; fight; contest; feud; tumult; disturbance. The word, as used in an instruction that the jury should find accused guilty of manslaughter if the act was done in a sudden affray, does not mean that two persons must engage in a fight on a public road, or be guilty of the common-law offense of affray. Where A. halts B. on a public highway and attempts to draw a gun on him, and B. fires four shots at him, and A. fires one at him, it certainly constitutes an "affray." Burton v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 60 S. W. 526, 528.

An affray is a fighting between two or more persons in a public place. Simpson v. State, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 356, 358; State v. Priddy, 23 Tenn. (4 Humph.) 429; Wilkes v. Jackson (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 355, 360; O'Neill v. State, 16 Ala. 65, 67.

An affray is a mutual combat voluntarily engaged in by two or more persons in a public place. Strutton v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 62 S. W. 875, 877; State v. Gladden, 73 N. C. 150, 155.

"Affray" is defined by Lord Coke to be a public offense, to the terror of the King's subjects, so called because it affrighteth and maketh men afraid. State v. Huntly, 25 N. C. 418, 421, 40 Am. Dec. 416.

An "affray" is defined to be the fighting of two or more persons in a public place, to the terror of the people. State v. Sumner (S. C.) 5 Strob. 53, 56; Thompson v. State, 70 Ala. 26, 28; Commonwealth v. Simmons, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 614, 615; State v. Brewer, 33 Ark. 170, 178; Childs v. State, 15 Ark. 204, 205; Hawkins v. State, 13 Ga. 322, 324, 58 Am. Dec. 517.

An "affray" is the fighting of two or more persons in a public place, to the terror of the citizens. State v. Allen, 11 N. C. 356, 357; State v. Stanly, 49 N. C. 290, 292; State v. Perry, 50 N. C. 9, 10, 69 Am. Dec. 768. This definition does not include every instance, as one person might be guilty of it by publicly riding or going armed offensively, to the terror and alarm of the peaceful citizens of the state. State v. Woody, 47 N. C. 335, 337. It is an essential ingredient of the offense that it be committed in a public place. State v. Woody, 47 N. C. 335, 337; Childs v. State, 15 Ark. 204, 205. Design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the breach of the peace happened without any previous intention. Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 3 N. E. 818, 822, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298. This circumstance alone distinguishes an affray from another distinct substantive offense at common law, to wit, an assault. An allegation, in an indictment for an affray, that it took place in the town of Clarksville, is not sufficient, as it might have been in such town and yet out of the sight and hearing of all but the parties concerned. State v. Herlin, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 84, 85.

An affray "is a disturbance of the public peace by fighting with the mutual consent of the combatants." Duncan v. Commonwealth, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 295.

"Affray," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 1980, providing that if two or more persons by agreement fight in any public place they shall be guilty of an "affray," means a fight in which both persons must be guilty of an agreement to violate the law and engage in fighting by such agreement. Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 3 N. E. 818-822, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

It is not essential to an affray that the fighting should be by consent of the parties. It is because the violence is committed in a public place and to the terror of the people that the crime is called an affray instead of an assault and battery. Saddler v. Republic (Tex.) Dall. Dig. 610, 611; Pollock v. State, 22 S. W. 19, 20, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 29. To make a man guilty of an affray, it is not necessary that the fighting take place with the consent of both parties. It is because the violence is at any public place and to the terror of the people that the crime is called an affray instead of assault and battery, and not because it took place by the mutual consent of both parties. Therefore, on the trial of an indictment for an affray, one may be acquitted while another may be found guilty. Cash v. State, 2 Tenn. (2 Overt.) 198, 199.

An affray is a mutual fighting, and an indictment, therefore, is charge against each person. One may be acquitted and the other convicted of assault, or one may be found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon and the other of simple assault. State v. Albertson, 18 S. E. 321, 113 N. C. 633.

In constituting an affray, there must have been a fighting. An admission that the parties were engaged in a friendly scuffle is not an admission of guilt as regards the offense of an affray. State v. Freeman, 37 S. E. 206, 207, 127 N. C. 544.

The fighting of two persons in the presence of seven others constitutes an affray, the seven other persons making the place a "public place" within the meaning of that term as used in the definition of an "affray." State v. Fritz, 45 S. E. 957, 958, 133 N. C. 725.

An affray is an assault, aggravated under the circumstances under which it is committed. On an indictment against two for an affray for mutually assaulting and fighting with each other, the defendant was found not guilty of an affray, but one was found guilty of assault and battery on another, and one was acquitted. Held, that the judgment on the conviction for assault and battery was proper. State v. Allen, 11 N. C. 356, 357.

As an accident.

See "Accident—Accidental."

Assault and battery distinguished.

"The qualities that distinguish an affray from an assault and battery are that two or more persons must be engaged in the same combat and in a public place." Thompson v. State, 70 Ala. 26, 28.

An affray "is the fighting of two or more persons in some public place to the terror of others, for, if the fighting be in private, it is no affray, but an assault, because, if it be neither heard nor seen by any but the parties concerned, it cannot be said to be to the terror of the people." Commonwealth v. Simmons, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 614, 615; State v. Sumner (S. C.) 5 Strob. 53, 56; State v. Brew- er, 33 Ark. 176, 178; Childs v. State, 15 Ark. 204, 205.

Riot distinguished.

"Affray is when persons come together with a premeditated design to disturb the peace, and suddenly break out into a quarrel between themselves, and it is contradistinguished from a riot by being more of a private nature." People v. Judson (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 1, 58.

"Affray" means the fighting of two or more persons in some public place to the terror of others. It differs from a riot in not being premeditated. Thus, if a number of persons meet together at a fair or market, or on any other lawful or innocent occasion, and happen on a sudden quarrel to engage in a fight, they are not guilty of a riot, but of an "affray," only because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful and the breach of the peace happened without any previous intention. Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Garrigus, 3 N. E. 818, 822, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

Words as constituting.

Words alone will not constitute the offense of "affray," but words accompanied by acts indicating an attempt to fight in the public streets of the city, which attempt is prevented by bystanders, are sufficient to constitute the offense, since such acts are calculated to incite the terror of peaceable citizens and disturb the public peace. Hawkins v. State, 13 Ga. 322, 324, 58 Am. Dec. 517.

"An affray is a fight of two or more persons in some public place, but no quarrelsome words merely will constitute the offense. It is probable, however, that if the persons arm themselves with deadly or unusual weapons for the purpose of an affray, and in such manner as to strike terror to the people, they may be guilty of this offense without coming to actual blows." O'Neill v. State, 16 Ala. 65, 67.

Mere words are not a fighting, and if one by insulting language provokes another to attack him in a public place, but offers no resistance to the attack when made, he does not become guilty of the offense of affray. Pollock v. State, 22 S. W. 19, 20, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 29.

AFFREIGHTMENT.

Demise distinguished, see "Charter Party."

"Affreightment contracts are of two kinds, and they differ from each other very widely in their nature, as well as in their terms and legal effect. Charterers or freighters may become the owners for the voyage without any sale or purchase of the ship, as in cases where they hire the ship, and have

by the terms of the contract, and assume in fact, the exclusive possession, command, and navigation of the vessel for the stipulated voyage. But where the general owner retains the possession, command, and navigation of the ship, and contracts for a specified voyage, as, for example, to carry a cargo from one port to another, the arrangement in contemplation of law is a mere affreightment, sounding in contract, and not a demise of the vessel, and the charterer or freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership. Auten v. Bennett, 84 N. Y. Supp. 689, 692, 88 App. Div. 15; United States v. Shea, 14 Sup. Ct. 519, 521, 152 U. S. 178, 38 L. Ed. 403 (citing Reed v. U. S., 78 U. S. [11 Wall.] 591, 600, 20 L. Ed. 220).

Where a shipowner agrees to carry goods by water, or to furnish a ship for the purpose of carrying goods in return for a sum of money to be paid, by some such contract is called a "contract of affreightment." The charterer thereby acquires right to the temporary use of the vessel for the carrying of his goods, but the control and possession of the vessel remains in the owner, through the master and crew, who continue to be his servants. Bramble v. Culmer (U. S.) 78 Fed. 497, 501, 24 C. C. A. 182.

AFORESAID.

See "As aforesaid."

Where a prior clause in the will prescribes the manner in which property of testator is to pass, and a subsequent clause devising certain property states that it shall pass in the manner "aforesaid," the property under the last devise will pass in the same manner as that specified in the first. Woodall v. Woodall, 3 C. B. 349, 376.

In a deed by the overseers of a certain county, witnessed by the justices of the peace of "said county," describing themselves as "justices of the peace of the county aforesaid," the words "county aforesaid" have the same meaning as the words "said county" in the body of the deed. Rex v. Inhabitants of Countesthorpe, 2 Barn. & Adol. 487.

All preceding referred to.

U. S. St. 1864, c. 106, § 30, authorizes every national bank to charge interest at the rate allowed by the law of the state or territory where the bank is located, except that, where the law of the state limits the rate for banks of issue organized under the state laws the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act; that, where no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may charge not exceeding 7 per cent; and that the knowingly taking, receiving, or charging a rate of interest greater than "aforesaid" shall be held and adjudged as a forfeiture of the entire interest. Held, that the expression "rate of interest greater than aforesaid" refers as well to the rate established by adopting the rate allowed by the laws of the states or territories, as to the rate fixed at 7 per cent. if no rate was fixed by said laws; there being no rule of grammatical construction which limits the word "aforesaid" to the paragraph immediately preceding it. Central Nat. Bank v. Pratt, 115 Mass. 539, 544, 15 Am. Rep. 138.

"Aforesaid," as used in a will in which testator gave a daughter certain real estate and a half part of his books, and declared that if the daughter should die unmarried her part "aforesaid" should be equally divided amongst testator's brothers and sisters, referred not merely to the gift of the books, but to all the property, both real and personal. Gibson v. Gell, 2 Barn. & C. 680.

As aforesaid equivalent.

An indictment charged the commission of larceny in the county "aforesaid," which was in the exact language of the Code (section 4297), except that the statute uses the words "as aforesaid." Held, that "aforesaid" and "as aforesaid" were equivalent terms, and hence there was no variance. State v. Lillard, 13 N. W. 637, 59 Iowa, 479.

First mentioned referred to.

"Aforesaid," as used in a deed conveying all the right in equity which A. has of redeeming certain mortgaged real estate at the time "aforesaid," refers not to the date of sale, which was the date last mentioned in the deed, but to a day previously named therein as being the time when the same was attached on mesne process. Sanborn v. Chamberlin, 101 Mass. 409, 418.

In an indictment averring that certain acts essential to the crime of libel charged occurred at the city of N. in the county of E., wherein the venue is laid in the margin, and then sets out the libelous publication, in the body of which the city of H. in H. county is mentioned, and then proceeds to aver that other acts essential to the crime "occurred at the city and county aforesaid," the words "city and county aforesaid" refer to the city of N. in the county of E., and not to the city and county mentioned thereafter in the setting out of the publication. Hasse v. State, 20 Atl. 751, 752, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 34.

As next before.

Although the word "aforesaid" means generally next before, yet a different signification will be given to it if required by the context and the facts of the case. Simpson v. Robert, 35 Ga. 180.

"Aforesaid," as used in a statute imposing a penalty on masters acting as pilots in entering certain ports, but providing that it shall not apply to the masters and mates of vessels residing at certain places in conducting or piloting their ships or vessels into or from any of the places "aforesaid," will be construed to mean the places designated at which such masters and mates reside. Williams v. Newton, 14 Mees. & W. 747, 749.

In the construction of statutes the words "preceding" and "aforesaid" mean, generally, next before, unless the context requires a different construction. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2.

Previous words repeated.

"Aforesaid," as used in an indictment referring to the act committed as having been done in the parish "aforesaid," has the same meaning and effect as if the description of the parish were repeated. Reg. v. Albert, 5 Q. B. 37, 41.

The words "articles aforesaid" in the second count in an indictment for larceny, with a reference to the goods mentioned in the prior count, do not operate to make an allegation of the value of the property in the first count and part of the second count. State v. Wagner, 24 S. W. 219, 220, 118 Mo. 626.

AFORETHOUGHT.

"Aforethought" means thought of beforehand, for any length of time, however short, for a moment as well as a day. State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441; State v. Tate, 56 S. W. 1099, 1100, 156 Mo. 119; State v. Musick, 14 S. W. 212, 213, 101 Mo. 260.

"Aforethought" means malice pre-conceived. State v. Peo, 33 Atl. 257, 258, 9 Houst. 488.

"Aforethought" is synonymous with "premeditated," and "premeditated malice" and "malice aforethought" are the same. Edwards v. State, 25 Ark. 444, 446.

"Aforethought," as used in the statute defining murder as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice "aforethought," means "premeditated" or "premeditated and deliberate" malice. People v. Ah Choy, 1 Idaho, 317, 319.

"Aforethought" is defined as thought of before; premeditated; pre-pense. Thus, in the phrase "malice aforethought," the adjective "aforethought" describes not the intent to take life, but the malice, and that malice must exist, must be previously and deliberately entertained when the purpose to take life is formed, and must co-operate with the blow producing death, to constitute murder. State v. Fiske, 28 Atl. 572, 573, 63 Conn. 388.

AFTER.

See "From and After."

Const. 1864, authorizing the Governor to grant pardons "after conviction," does not empower him to issue a pardon before conviction, and hence the constitutional provision authorizing him to grant pardons after conviction did not prohibit the Legislature from passing an act pardoning certain persons who were liable to be charged with crime. State v. Nichols, 26 Ark. 74, 78, 7 Am. Rep. 600.

The words "after the completion of the railroad," in a statute exempting a railroad from taxation for 10 years after the completion of the railroad, operates to preclude the exemption from taking effect prior to the completion of the road; the object apparently being to procure its completion as soon as possible. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 6 Sup. Ct. 625, 627, 116 U. S. 665, 29 L. Ed. 770.

At the end of.

A lease providing that rent is payable "after the termination of each month" means the end of the last day of the monthly term, and, though rent accrues on the last day of the term, it does not accrue until the end of that day, and hence a conveyance in the afternoon of the last day of the monthly term is a conveyance before rent accrues, within the rule that a lessor conveying the premises before rent accrues cannot recover the appropriated amount due to the time of the conveyance, though there is no eviction by him or attornment to him. Hammond v. Thompson, 47 N. E. 137, 168 Mass. 531.

Charge or condition imposed.

The term "after" does not always designate the time at which one thing is to be done in reference to something else, but it expresses the relative priority and subordination of one claim to another in matter of right. And where the testator provides that the residue of his estate after the payment of his just debts, etc., shall be disposed of in a certain way, the residue is to be formed subject to the payment of debts and charges, though they may be actually paid afterwards. Treadwell v. Cordis, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 341-353.

"After payment of debts," when used in a will devising real estate after the payment of debts and legacies, is sufficient to charge testator's real estate with the payment of such debts and legacies. Reynolds v. Reynolds' Ex'rs, 16 N. Y. 257, 259; In re Rosenfield (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 251, 255; Smith v. Coup (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 45, 48; Lupton v. Lupton (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 614, 623; In re Fox's Will, 52 N. Y. 530, 536, 11 Am. Rep. 751; In re Hesdra, 20 N. Y. Supp. 79, 80, 2 Con. Sur. 514; Fenwick v. Chapman, 34

U. S. (9 Pet.) 461, 481, 9 L. Ed. 193; Wright v. West (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 716, 717; Kidney v. Coussmaker, 1 Ves. Jr. 436, 440.

"After all my debts are paid," when used in a will, where the phrase is followed by a devise, indicates an intention that the lands devised shall be subject to the debts. Smith v. Coup (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 45, 48; King v. King, 14 R. I. 143, 146.

The use of the words "after payment of my debts," in a will in which the testator gives certain devises "after payment of my debts," means that he will not give anything until his debts are paid. "After payment of his debts" means that until his debts are paid he gives nothing; that everything he has shall be subject to his debts. To give these words any effect, they must charge the real estate. I am very clearly of the opinion that, whenever a testator says he wills that his debts will be paid, that will ride over every disposition, either as against his heirs at law or devisee, and the words "after my debts paid" mean the same thing. Shallersoss, v. Finden, 3 Ves. 738, 739.

The words "after the payment of my lawful debts" in a will, in which, after directing the payment of his lawful debts, the testator proceeds to dispose of his property, is to be construed as a direction to the executors to pay the debts before distribution be made of the estate in pursuance of the will. Appeal of Hoff, 24 Pa. (12 Harris) 200, 203.

"After inventory and appraisement," as used in Gen. St. 1883, § 3575, providing that whenever, "after inventory and appraisement," it shall appear that the personal estate of intestate is insufficient to discharge his debts, resort may be had to the real estate, "can properly be taken only as a designation of the time at which or before which the administrator may not make his application. It is simply a statutory method of fixing the order of the proceedings, and in no sense can it be so held to be a condition precedent to the right to resort to real property as to make a failure to observe that statutory provision necessarily fatal to the proceedings." Nichols v. Lee, 26 Pac. 157, 160, 16 Colo. 147.

Day excluded.

Where a time is to be computed "after" a certain date, it is meant that such date should be excluded in the computation. Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 495.

2 Rev. St. 252, § 152, providing that a prisoner may be discharged on affidavit "after" he shall have remained in prison 30 days, means 30 full days after the commitment of the defendant, and the first day the prisoner was committed must be excluded in computing the 30 days. Where a prisoner was committed on the 26th day of August, he cannot be discharged until the 26th day of September. Judd v. Fulton (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 117, 118.

"After," as used in 2 Rev. St. § 24, making it the duty of an officer making a distress for rent to appraise the goods five days "after" making the distress, means five full days from the time the distress was made, and, where distress was made on the 9th day of March, the earliest date on which an appraisal could be made was on the 15th day of March. Butts v. Edwards (N. Y.) 2 Denlo, 164, 167.

"After," as used in 2 Geo. II, c. 23, § 23, declaring that no attorney shall commence an action for his fees until the expiration of one month "after" he shall have delivered his bill, means 30 days, exclusive of the day on which the bill was delivered. Blunt v. Heslop, 8 Adol. & El. 577.

"After," as used in Sess. Laws 1840, p. 334, § 24, prohibiting the issuance of a fi. fa. until after the expiration of 30 days from the entry of judgment, construed to exclude the day on which the judgment was rendered. Commercial Bank of Oswego v. Ives (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 355.

The words "after date" and the words "from the day of the date" bear the same legal signification, as the law rejects fractions of a day. It views it for most purposes as an indivisible point, and consequently, "after date" or the "day of the date" being coextensive with the entire day, excludes it when it occurs in a bill, note, or bond, and to say that the day of payment in a note payable one day after date is not the day after the date, but the day of the date itself, would be contrary to the plain meaning of the words and the obvious design of the parties, who evidently intended that the note should be payable on the second day. Taylor v. Jacoby, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 495, 497, 45 Am. Dec. 615.

In a contract for the sale of real estate, requiring the vendor to deliver a good deed one year "after" the date of the agreement will be held to exclude the day on which the agreement is made, and include the day at the end of the year. Thus, one year after the 24th day of June, 1887, would be the 24th day of June, 1888, and the failure of the vendor to deliver the deed on such day amounted to a breach of the contract. Vorwerk v. Nolte (Cal.) 24 Pac. 840, 841.

Under St. 1821, c. 122, relating to the settlement and support of paupers, and providing for the removal of paupers who are found in a town where they have no settlement to the proper town, upon notice given to such town, "and if such removal is not effected nor objected to in writing after such notice, to be delivered in writing, within two months after such notice to the overseers of the town," the day of the service of such notice is to be excluded in the computation of the two months, and an objection made on the 20th day of December to a notice served on the 20th day of October is within time. The Legislature must have intended that the town notified should have two whole months in which to answer such notice, but, if the day on which the notice was served should be included in the two months, such town would not have two months in which to object. Inhabitants of Windsor v. Inhabitants of China, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 298, 302 (cited and approved in Moore v. Bond, 18 Me. [6 Shep.] 142, 143).

Under a statute authorizing an appeal from an award of arbitrators to be taken within 20 days after the entry of the award on the docket of the prothonotary, the party has a right of appeal for 20 days after the day on which the rule is so entered, and, where the award was entered on the second day of the month, an appeal taken on the 22d day of the same month was held within time. Sims v. Hampton (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 411, 412.

A patent providing that a specification should be enrolled within one calendar month next and immediately "after the date" thereof meant that the month did not begin to run until the day after the date of the patent, and a specification filed on the 10th of June for a patent dated on the 10th of May was in sufficient time. Watson v. Pears, 2 Camp. 294, 296.

Where the time for redemption was fixed at one day after the sale, that day cannot be the day of the sale, for the sale might be made at the last moment of the day, and the owner thus be prevented from tendering on that day, and therefore the time mentioned must be the following day; and the same is true of one or two years after. Edmundson v. Wragg, 104 Pa. 500, 502, 49 Am. Rep. 590.

"After," when used in a statute providing for redemption of land a certain time after judicial sale, is held to exclude the day of sale, on the ground that a day is an indivisible point of time, the day of sale being therefore a full day, and "after" it necessarily begins on the next day. Cromellen v. Brink, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 522, 524 (citing Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. [1 Pick.] 485, which provided for redemption within one year after execution of deed, and People v. Sheriff of Broome [N. Y.] 19 Wend. 87, where the period of redemption was three months after one year after sale on execution).

In statutes of limitations providing that suit must be brought within six years "after" the cause of action accrues, "after" will be construed as excluding the day on which the cause accrued (citing Appeal of Green [Pa.] 6 Watts & S. 327; Cromellen v. Brink, 29 Pa. [5 Casey] 522; Mark's Ex'rs v. Russell, 40 Pa. [4 Wright] 372; Brisben v. Willson, 60 Pa. [10 P. F. Smith] 452; Duffy v.

Ogden, 64 Pa. [14 P. F. Smith] 240)—which are to the effect that “from and after” exclude the first day. In the discussions of the subject no distinction seems to be made between “after,” “from and after,” or “within,” as to the question of the exclusion of the first day. Menges v. Frick, 73 Pa. (23 P. F. Smith) 137, 140, 13 Am. Rep. 731.

In Code 1844, c. 112, § 1, providing that where a debtor has assigned his property for the benefit of creditors his estate shall be distributed among his creditors “after” three months’ notice has been given to his creditors to become parties to the proceedings, “after” means that the creditors must be allowed three months to become parties to the assignment, and not that the distribution shall be made three months from the date of the assignment, but three months after notice was given, and, in computing the three months, the day on which the notice was given must be excluded. Page v. Weymouth, 47 Me. 238-244.

Const. art. 6, § 10, declaring that, in case the office of any judge shall become vacant before the expiration of the regular term for which he is elected, the vacancy shall be filled by appointment by the Governor until a successor is elected and qualified, and such successor shall be elected at the first annual election that occurs more than 30 days “after” the vacancy shall happen, means more than 30 days excluding the day on which the vacancy happens and the day on which the election occurs. State v. Brown, 22 Minn. 482, 483.

Cr. Code, § 391, declaring that a person held in custody from criminal prosecution shall be discharged unless he is brought to trial before the end of the third term “after” the indictment, must be construed as excluding the term at which the indictment is found. Hammond v. State, 58 N. W. 92, 93, 39 Neb. 252.

Day included.

The word “after,” like the words “from,” “succeeding,” “subsequent,” and other similar words, in a devise of property to a beneficiary on condition that he shall pay to another a certain sum within one year after the testator’s decease, or from, succeeding, or subsequent to his decease, where it is not expressly declared to be exclusive or inclusive, is susceptible of different significations, and is used in different senses, and with an exclusive or inclusive meaning according to the subject to which it is applied, and, as it would deprive it of some of its proper significations to affix one invariable meaning to it in all cases, it would of course in many of them pervert it from the sense of the writer or speaker. Its true meaning, therefore, in any particular case, must be collected from its context and subject-matter, which are the only means by which the intention is ascertained. Sands v. Lyon, 18 Conn. 18, 27.

All the best authorities hold that the word “after” may be construed to include or exclude the day of the act as will best serve to carry out the intent of the Legislature, subserve public policy, avoid forfeiture, and validate a proceeding rather than to annul the same, and, when the statute provided that the term of office of a jury commissioner should commence on the 1st day of June after his appointment, an appointment made by the judge on the 1st day of June conferred on the appointee the office of jury commissioner, and his term commenced on the said 1st day of June. State v. Mounts, 14 S. E. 407, 36 W. Va. 179, 190, 15 L. R. A. 243.

The word “after,” like “from,” “succeeding,” “subsequent,” and similar words, where it is not expressly declared to be exclusive or inclusive, is susceptible of different significations, and is used in different senses, and with an exclusive or inclusive meaning according to the subject to which it is applied. Sands v. Lyon, 18 Conn. 18, 27.

Enjoyment of estate devised referred to.

The cases are common which hold that adverbs of time, such as “when,” “then,” “after,” “from and after,” etc., in the devise of a remainder limited upon a life estate, are to be construed merely as relating to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting in interest, and that the law favors such a construction of a will as will avoid the disinheritance of remaindermen who may happen to die before the determination of the precedent estates. In Connelly v. O’Brien, 60 N. E. 20, 166 N. Y. 406, the Court of Appeals carried this doctrine so far as to hold that where testator gave his property to his widow during her life, and to such of his children that may “then” be alive, the adverb was intended by him to refer to the time of his own death, and not to that of his widow, and that consequently a daughter who survived him, but died before the widow, took a vested share. Ackerman v. Ackerman, 71 N. Y. S. 780, 781, 63 App. Div. 370.

When used in a devise of a remainder, limited upon a particular state and terminable on an event which may necessarily happen, “after” will be construed to relate merely to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting. Canfield v. Fallon, 57 N. Y. Supp. 149, 154, 26 Misc. Rep. 345, 43 App. Div. 561 (citing Moore v. Lyons, 25 Wend. 119, 144; Sheridan v. House, *43 N. Y. [4 Keyes] 569; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, 123; Ackerman v. Gorton, 67 N. Y. 63, 66; Nelson v. Russell, 135 N. Y. 137, 31 N. E. 1008; Haug v. Schumacher, 60 N. E. 245, 247, 166 N. Y. 506; Vanderheyden v. Crandall (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 919; Lamb v. Lamb, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 371, 379; In re Tienken, 15 N. Y. Supp. 470, 473, 60 Hun. 417 (citing Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512, 515).

In Rev. Laws, p. 774, § 1, providing that where lands, tenements, etc., are devised to any person for life, the remainder at the death of such person to go to his or her heirs, or to his or her issue, or to the heirs of his or her body, then in such case, "after the death of" such devisee for life, the said lands, etc., shall go and be vested in the children of such devisee as tenants in common in fee, "after the death of" construed as referring to the time of enjoyment rather than the time of vesting of the title. Hopper v. Demarest, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 525, 539.

Generally a bequest "after" the death of the particular person to whom an antecedent interest is given in the same will does not denote a condition that the legatee shall survive such a person, nor define when the interest shall vest, but only marks the time that the act shall take effect in possession, that possession being deferred merely on account of the life interest limited to the person on whose death the gift is to take effect. Appeal of Chew, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 23, 29.

A will giving testatrix's husband the interest, rents, and profits of one-third of the residue of testatrix's estate during his natural life, and devising the remainder of said one-third to my stepchildren "after the decease of my said husband," gives a vested interest to the stepchildren. In re Allen's Estate, 109 Pa. 489, 496, 1 Atl. 82.

"After his death to his children," as used in a devise, means that the devisee shall take only a life estate, and that the devisee's children in being at the death of the testator shall take a vested remainder, which opened to let in any after-born children of the devisee. Gernet v. Lynn, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 94, 97.

As immediately after or upon.

The phrase "after his death," as occurring in a devise "my will is that if my son J. D. should not marry and have lawful issue of his own body, after his death all the real estate that I have given him shall be equally divided between his three brothers," means "upon his death," "as soon as he is dead"; and therefore fixes a definite time for the failure of issue upon which the limitation over should take effect, and so renders it valid. Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 9, 86, 49 Am. Dec. 139.

The words "after her death," in a bequest of all of testator's estate to her daughter for life, with a remainder over, if the daughter die without issue, of a certain sum to a certain seminary, to be paid after the death of the daughter, indicate that the legacy is to take effect on the death of the daughter or not at all, and therefore the legacy is not void because limited on the happening of a contingency which is too remote. Theological Seminary v. Kellogg, 16 N. Y. 83, 87.

"After their death," as used in a will bequeathing property to testator's children, and "after" their death to his then living heirs, means immediately after their death, not an indefinite length of time afterwards; the words being introduced to fix definitely the time at which the bequest over is to take effect. In re Swinburne, 14 Atl. 850, 852, 16 R. I. 208 (citing Pinbury v. Elkin, 1 P. Wms. 563; Wilkinson v. South, 7 Term R. 555, 558; Trotter v. Oswald, 1 Cox, 317).

The words "after her death," in a devise of a negro slave to testator's daughter, directing that "after her death, if no lawful issue," the slave should be divided among testator's children, are to be construed to mean at or immediately after the death of the daughter. Atwell's Ex'rs v. Barney (Ga.) Dud. 207, 208.

"After the death of my two daughters," as used in a will in which testator directed that "from and immediately after the death of my two daughters I give and bequeath all my estate unto the child or children of my said two daughters share and share alike," means at the death of the two respectively, and not the death of the survivor of the two. Appeal of Pennsylvania Co. (Pa.) 10 Atl. 130, 132.

In a devise of testator's farm to his nephew, providing that if he has no lawful issue "after him" the farm should go to other designated parties, means no more than "if he leaves no lawful issue," and hence the language imports an indefinite failure of issue, and not at the death of the nephew. Whitford v. Armstrong, 9 R. I. 394, 395.

As of.

In Ex parte Fallon, 5 Term R. 283, the annuity act (17 Geo. III, c. 26, § 1), directing that a memorial of a deed shall within 20 days "of" the execution thereof be enrolled, etc., was held to mean 20 days exclusive of the day of execution. 3 Geo. IV, c. 39, § 1, provides that warrants of attorney to confess judgment shall be filed within 21 days "after" the execution thereof. Section 2 provides that, unless they be so filed within the said space of 21 days from the execution, they shall be void, etc. Held, that the decision in Ex parte Fallon was applicable to the statute under consideration, the words "after" and "of," as used in the two statutes, having the same meaning. Williams v. Burgess, 12 Adol. & El. 635.

As simultaneously.

A contract providing that the title should remain in the plaintiff until "after" the purchase price and interest aforesaid shall be paid is equivalent in law to a sale simultaneously with payment; in other words, it amounts to a sale on payment. Hawley v. Kenoyer, 1 Wash. T. 609, 611.

As subject to.

A will provided that, "after settling my estate, my wife shall have the 'interest' of the remainder of my personal estate, and the judge of probate shall appoint a disinterested person to take charge of said personal estate, and pay the interest to her so long as she remains my widow," etc. Held, that the word "interest" should be construed to include the interest of the personal property not applied to the payment of debts and charges of administration from the death of the testator, and not merely from the time when the estate should be settled. The word "after," being construed in connection with the word "settling," is equivalent to "subject to," and does not refer to time. Lamb v. Lamb, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 371, 378.

As thereafter.

"After," as used in schedule to the new Constitution (section 16), providing that, "'after' the expiration of the term of any president judge of any court of common pleas in commission at the adoption of this Constitution the judge of such court learned in the law and oldest in commission shall be the president judge thereof," does not mean "upon," and thereby limit "the application of the rule of succession to the single event of the expiration of each commission in force at the adoption of the Constitution. It was evidently used in the sense of 'thereafter,' referring not only to the expiration of the respective commissions then in force, but to the expiration of every subsequent commission." Commonwealth v. Pattison, 109 Pa. 165, 170.

AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

"After-acquired property," as used in reference to the estate of a married woman in whose marriage settlement her property designated as the "presently acquired property" included all of the property possessed by her at the time of her marriage, means such property as she became owner of after the time of her marriage. Hughes-Hallett v. Hughes-Hallett, 26 Atl. 101, 102, 152 Pa. 590.

AFTER-BORN CHILD.

As included in term child, see "Child—Children."

"An after born child," as used in Act April 8, 1833, making a will void as to such child, means physical birth, and does not apply to a case where a child is born before the marriage of its parents and the father makes his will two days before the marriage which legitimates the child. Appeal of McCulloch, 6 Atl. 253, 255, 113 Pa. 247.

AFTER THE DEATH.

AFTER DUE PUBLICATION.

See "Due Publication."

AFTER THE FIRE.

A provision in a policy of insurance that the proof shall be filed within 60 days "after the fire" does not mean 60 days after the fire commenced, but within 60 days after the fire has ceased to burn. National Wall Paper Co. v. Associated Manufacturers' Mut. Fire Ins. Corp., 67 N. E. 440, 441, 175 N. Y. 228.

AFTER JUDGMENT.

The phrases "after judgment entered of record," "next after judgment," "next after the rendering of judgment," "from the rendition of judgment," and "after entering up final judgment," occurring in various statutes providing that certain proceedings may be had within fixed times after the event designated by such phrase, all refer to the same time. And this, according to an intendment of law and the practice of the New Hampshire courts, is the last day of the term in which the record shows the judgment to have been rendered, unless the true time of entering the judgment appears upon the record. New Hampshire Strafford Bank v. Cornell, 2 N. H. 324, 331.

AFTER PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

See "After."

AFTER REFLECTION.

"After reflection," as used in an instruction that if defendant purposely killed deceased after reflection, with wickedness or depravity of heart, etc., the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, construed as equivalent to a statement of deliberation. Lang v. State, 4 South. 193, 195, 84 Ala. 1, 5 Am. St. Rep. 324.

AFTER SALE.

See "After."

AFTER SIGHT.

The term "after sight," as used in a bill payable so many days after sight, means such number of days after legal sight. It is not merely the fact of having seen the bill or known of its existence that constitutes a presentment to the drawee in legal contemplation; it must be presented to him for acceptance, and the time of the bill begins to run, not from the mere presentment, but from the presentment and acceptance. Mitchell v. Degrand (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 494, 496.

AFTERNOON.

"Afternoon" may mean the whole time from noon to midnight, or it may mean the earlier part of that time as distinguished from the evening. It was used in this latter sense in a statute prohibiting the opening of a public house during the usual hours of afternoon divine service, and did not include a service at 6 p. m. Reg. v. Knapp, 2 El. & Bl. 447, 451.

Though, accurately and properly speaking, "afternoon" signifies from noon till evening, an indictment charging the violation of Sess. Laws 1881, p. 350, No. 259, prohibiting saloons from keeping open after 9 o'clock at night, which alleges that a saloon was kept open at 11 o'clock in the "afternoon," will be construed as sufficiently alleging the keeping open of the saloon after 9 o'clock at night. People v. Husted, 18 N. W. 388, 389, 52 Mich. 624.

AFTERWARDS.

In a count in a declaration, after stating an assault by defendant alleging "and thereafterwards the said B. continuing his assault," "afterwards" may be understood to imply nothing more than a continuance of the trespass without intermission of time. Benson v. Swift, 2 Mass. 50, 53.

"Afterwards," as used in Civ. Code, § 139, defining separate property as that owned before marriage and that acquired by certain means "afterwards," means after the marriage but during the existence of community rights in property. In re Spencer, 23 Pac. 37, 38, 82 Cal. 110.

"Afterward die leaving no issue" in a bequest of property by a testator to his wife for life, and if his daughter M. should be dead at the death of the wife without issue, or should "afterwards die leaving no issue," then to the beneficiaries, is to be construed as importing the failure of issue at the death, and not an indefinite failure of issue. Griswold v. Greer, 18 Ga. 545, 546.

AGAINST.

"Against bonds," as used on ballots in an election to determine the question of the issuance of bonds, is equivalent to the phrase "against the bonds," as used in the order authorizing the election, which required that those voting against the bonds should deposit ballots "against the bonds." State v. Metzger, 26 Kan. 395, 396.

The ballots at a public election in which the question of a bond issue was to be voted on had the words "for the bonds" printed thereon. Ballots were cast on which such words were stricken out with a lead pencil, and the word "against" written directly underneath. Held, that the word "against" was to be construed as "against the bonds," and should have been counted as such. Clark v. Montgomery County, 6 Pac. 311, 313, 33 Kan. 202, 52 Am. Rep. 526.

A settlement of a statement of facts at the request of defendant in a criminal prosecution, and the hearing of a bill brought on by him, are not "proceedings against" him, within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 766 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 597], providing that, pending habeas corpus proceedings in the federal courts, any proceedings against the person imprisoned in any state court shall be deemed void, the defendant having moved for the proceedings himself, and the act of settling the statement being performed solely for his benefit. State v. Humason, 30 Pac. 718, 719, 4 Wash. 413.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors is a proceeding by and not against a debtor, within Pub. Laws, c. 723, § 4, providing that "proceedings against a debtor" under the insolvent act for the purpose of procuring a preference shall be void. James v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 12 R. I. 460, 461.

Competency of witness.

Within a statute providing that no party, as to certain transactions, shall be competent as a witness against certain other persons, does not mean by "against" on opposite sides of a suit, but as having opposing interests in a suit, though they may be on the same side as coplaintiffs or codefendants. Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, 465; Coffman v. Hedrick, 9 S. E. 65, 67, 33 W. Va. 124.

Within the statute making husband and wife competent witnesses in all cases, except that in divorce on account of adultery neither shall be competent or compellable to give evidence for or "against" the other, a wife, when accused of adultery in divorce proceedings against her, by denying her guilt does not give evidence against the husband merely because it tends to defeat his action. Broom v. Broom, 41 S. E. 673, 674, 130 N. C. 562.

Code 1873, § 3641, providing that neither husband nor wife shall in any case be a witness against the other, except in a criminal proceeding for a "crime committed by one against the other," etc., is not confined to crimes committed against the person, but would include incest committed by the husband with the wife's sister. State v. Cham- bers, 53 N. W. 1090, 1091, 87 Iowa, 1, 43 Am. St. Rep. 349.

Contact implied.

"Against," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did make and assault at and "against" the said B., and did shoot a certain pistol, with intent, etc., was to be construed in its usual acceptation, in which it means to push or run against and coming in contact or collision, and the indictment was sufficient to charge an assault and battery. State v. Prather, 54 Ind. 63, 64.

The word "against" does not always import physical contact, so the word "against," as used in a declaration alleging that defendant negligently drove its locomotive upon and "against" plaintiff and his horse and wagon, in which he was then driving, does not necessarily import a physical contact, and therefore there is no variance between the declaration and the proof showing that the train ran at a high rate of speed very close to the horse and wagon, thereby frightening the horse, though not actually striking either the horse or the wagon. Beyel v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co., 34 W. Va. 538, 546, 12 S. E. 532.

As without consent.

A will providing that, if the testator's daughter should marry "against" the consent of the testator's executors and her mother, she should receive but $5,000, does not mean that the condition in the will could be broken only where there was an affirmative prohibition of the marriage before it took place, since such a construction would permit a clandestine or secret marriage to be contracted without involving a forfeiture, and the word must be read in the sense of "without," and a marriage without the consent of either the executor or the devisee's mother was a breach of the condition. Hogan v. Curtin, 88 N. Y. 162, 169, 42 Am. Rep. 244.

AGAINST EVIDENCE.

A finding which negatives the existence of a fact admitted by the pleadings is a finding "against evidence," and the judgment rendered thereon is erroneous. Silvey v. Neary, 59 Cal. 97, 98.

A ruling that the verdict is "against the evidence" amounts to a decision that the verdict is against the weight of evidence. Laclede Power Co. v. Nash-Smith Tea Co., 69 S. W. 27, 28, 95 Mo. App. 412 (citing Parker v. Cassingham, 130 Mo. 348, 32 S. W. 487).

In the statement by a trial judge in setting aside a verdict as "against the evidence," where the verdict was in favor of the party who sought to have it set aside, the phrase "against the evidence" can have no other meaning than that the verdict was not sufficiently large in the opinion of the court. Jenkins v. Hankins, 41 S. W. 1028, 1029, 98 Tenn. 545.

A finding against evidence is one which cannot be supported by the evidence approved or admitted; in other words, a finding that is so palpably in conflict with the proof that the conclusion stated in the finding could not have been arrived at by properly construing the evidence in any light in which it might be viewed. Harris v. Harris, 59 Cal. 620, 621.

The phrase "against and contrary," as used in a motion for new trial because the finding of the court is against and contrary to the weight of the evidence and the law of the case, challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision. Adams v. Smith (Wyo.) 70 Pac. 1043.

AGAINST HER WILL.

"Against her will," as used in an indictment charging rape, is equivalent to an allegation that the act was committed without the prosecutrix's consent. State v. Gaul, 50 Conn. 578, 579.

Gen. St. art. 4, c. 29, § 9, providing that whoever shall unlawfully take or detain any woman "against her will," with intent to have carnal knowledge with her, shall be guilty of a felony, should be construed to include the taking and detaining of a woman who was asleep and incapable of exercising her will at the time. Malone v. Commonwealth, 15 S. W. 856, 91 Ky. 307.

An act is against the will where it is not approved by the will, or the will did not concur with the act. In all cases where there is no sensibility or consciousness or freedom of the will, the act is said to be against the will. It may be that in a similar sense the word "consent" has sometimes been unguardedly used, in cases where the will has been overcome by fear of personal violence and has no power of action whatever and no power to oppose or dissent, as passive consent, and not dissenting as consenting. To "will" or "consent" is an operation of the mind, and implies positive mental action, and when these words are used as the ground of responsibility for any given act their meaning is the same. Consenting is to be willing, as a condition of the mind. In the law, and in defining crime the terms "against the will" and "without consent" are used convertibly. When the mind is subjugated as well as the body, so that the power of volition and mental capacity to either consent or dissent is gone, then the act is against the will, and so also it may be said to be without consent. Whittaker v. State, 7 N. W. 431, 432, 50 Wis. 521, 36 Am. Dec. 856.

"Against her will," as used in Gen. St. c. 160, § 26, defining rape to be the ravishing and carnally knowing a woman by force and "against her will," should be construed as synonymous with the phrase "without her consent," meaning the enforcement of a woman without her consent; and hence a man who had carnal intercourse with a woman without her consent when, as he knew, she was drunk, and wholly insensible, so as to be incapable of consenting, and with such force as was necessary to accomplish the purpose, was guilty of rape. Commonwealth v. Burke, 105 Mass. 376, 377, 7 Am. Rep. 531.

"Against her will," as used in Gen. St. c. 29, art. 4, § 9, providing that whoever shall unlawfully take or detain any woman "against her will," etc., "shall be punished," etc., when applied to the case of an insane woman, includes "any act done toward the alleged victim by the defendant, other than acts of kindness, courtesy, or friendship." Higgins v. Commonwealth, 21 S. W. 231, 94 Ky. 54.

2 Rev. St. p. 604, § 25, prescribing a punishment for the offense of taking a woman unlawfully, "against her will," with the intent to compel her, by force, menace, or duress, to be defiled, means that the person defiled did not go of her own volition with any such purpose, and that she did not willfully assent to her own defilement, and imports a case where a person, contrary to her will, and without her knowledge of the purpose in contemplation, was induced to go with another for a lawful object, and afterward, in accordance with the original intent, and by force, menace, or duress, was unlawfully defiled. It means that the person defiled was an unwilling victim of misrepresentation, fraud, and falsehood, and that she in no way assented to the act; and hence, where a person falsely represented to the prosecutrix that he had procured her a situation as a servant in a respectable family, and that, unsuspecting of the object he had in view, and relying upon his statement, she was induced to proceed with him to a disreputable house, the crime was consummated against her will. Beyer v. State, 86 N. Y. 369, 373.

AGAINST LAW.

The statute authorizing a new trial on the ground that the verdict is "against law" does not intend to include in that phrase all or any other of the several distinct and separate grounds of the motion which are specified in the act, but presents the question whether the finding of the jury is in accord with the law embodied in the instruction. Drexel v. Daniels, 68 N. W. 399, 49 Neb. 99.

A verdict in disobedience to the instructions of the court upon a point at law is a verdict "against law." Declez v. Save, 71 Cal. 552, 553, 12 Pac. 722, 723; Emerson v. Santa Clara County, 40 Cal. 543, 545.

The words "against law," as used in a notice of a motion to set aside a judgment and verdict as "against law," are too vague to mean anything more than that they were erroneous. Carpenter v. San Joaquin County, 19 Pac. 174, 175, 75 Cal. 596.

Within the provisions of the statute that a verdict or other decision of facts may be set aside and a new trial granted if such verdict or decision of fact is "against law," "against law" meant if error of law be committed resulting from an erroneous decision of fact. While a verdict may be set aside as against law, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that a judgment is against law. Froman v. Patterson, 24 Pac. 692, 694, 10 Mont. 107.

Where it appears that the jury must either have disregarded the law as given in the instructions, or else must have found a fact wholly contrary to the evidence, the verdict was "against law." Sweeney v. Central Pac. R. Co., 57 Cal. 15, 18.

AGAINST THE PEACE.

An allegation in a criminal complaint that the acts are against the peace and contrary to the statute is equivalent to an allegation that the act was unlawfully or maliciously done. State v. Tibbetts, 29 Atl. 979, 86 Me. 189.

AGAINST THE STATUTE.

The office of the words "against the statute," as used in indictments, is to show that the offense is statutory, and will be read as a part of the charge, if the charge without them would not set forth the offense with completeness. State v. Murphy, 10 Atl. 585, 589, 15 R. I. 543.

AGAINST US.

See "Us."

AGE.

See "Full Age"; "Lawful Age."

AGE OF CONSENT.

"Age of legal consent," within the meaning of the statute providing for the annulment of a marriage when either party had not at the time of the marriage attained the age of legal consent, was construed to mean the age of legal consent according to the common-law definition of the term, and not the age of consent established by a statute increasing the age of consent, in cases of unlawful carnal knowledge, to 14 years, there being no difficulty in believing that the Legislature intended to guard a female child from carnal knowledge for a time after she was capable of contracting a marriage. Fisher v. Bernard, 27 Atl. 316, 317, 65 Vt. 663.

AGED.

"Mr. Webster defines 'aged' as follows: 'Old; having lived long; having lived almost the usual time allotted to that species of being.' Therefore the term does not characterize a person only 37 years of age." Hall v. State, 16 Tex. App. 6, 11, 49 Am. Rep. 824.

While the term "aged" as applied to human beings is not for all purposes susceptible to precise definition, and while it is not practicable to arbitrarily fix a period of life at which the condition of being aged may be said to have certainly begun, a man of 66 years is entitled to an exemption of his property under Civ. Code, § 5912, allowing this right to every aged or infirm person, and this though the applicant may be a hale and hearty man. Allen v. Pearce, 28 S. E. 859, 860, 101 Ga. 316, 39 L. R. A. 710, 65 Am. St. Rep. 306.

AGENCY.

See "Actual Agency"; "Commercial Agency"; "Contract of Agency"; "Exclusive Agency"; "Intervening Agency"; "Mercantile Agency"; "Ostensible Agency"; "Special Agency or Agent."

An "agency" is created by contract, express or implied. It "is a legal relation by virtue of which one party (the agent) is employed and authorized to represent and act for the other (the principal) in business dealings with third persons. The distinguishing features of the agent are his representative character and his derivative authority." Sternaman v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 62 N. E. 763, 765, 170 N. Y. 13, 57 L. R. A. 318, 88 Am. St. Rep. 625.

"Agency" is the relation, created either by express or implied contract or by law, whereby one party sui juris, called the principal, constituent, or employer, delegates the transaction of some lawful business with more or less discretionary power to another party, called the agent, attorney, proxy, or delegate, who undertakes to manage the affairs and render to him an account thereof. State v. Hubbard, 51 Pac. 290, 292, 58 Kan. 797, 39 L. R. A. 860.

"Agency," in its prima facie sense, implies the relationship of principal and agent, but is often used in commercial matters where the relationship is that of vendor and purchaser. Robinson v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 28 Pac. 796, 797, 93 Cal. 80, 27 Am. St. Rep. 167.

A contract of partnership is a contract of agency, and it differs from a pure agency only in this: that in a pure agency the agent binds his principal only; in a partnership all of the principals or partners are bound, which, of course, includes the actor. Persson v. Carter, 7 N. C. 321, 324.

"Agency," in its legal sense, always imports commercial dealings between parties through the medium of another. An agent negotiates with third parties in commercial matters for another, while the word "servant" relates more to matters of manual or mechanical execution. Kingan & Co. v. Silvers, 37 N. E. 413, 416, 13 Ind. App. 80.

It is laid down as an universal principle that, whether the agency be of a special or general nature, it includes, unless the inference is expressly excluded by other circumstances, all the usual modes and means of accomplishing the end and objects of the agency. Story, Ag. § 85. And, if the agency arises by implication from numerous acts done by the agent with the tacit consent or acquiescence of the principal, it is deemed to be limited to acts of a like nature. Michigan Southern & N. I. R. Co. v. Day, 20 Ill. 375, 378, 71 Am. Dec. 278 (citing Story, Ag. § 87; Paley, Ag. 209, 210).

In all agencies there is a relation of trust and confidence by reason of which the legal right to discontinue that relationship is more strongly implied, and any stipulation providing for its continuance must be the more clearly stated; and where plaintiff contracted to sell and to continue to sell defendant a certain variety of wine at a certain price, and that defendant should have the sole agency for such wine in the town where he was located, the contract was one of purchase and sale, and did not create the relation of principal and agent. Roosevelt v. Nusbaum, 77 N. Y. Supp. 457, 459, 75 App. Div. 117.

The term "agency," in an ordinance imposing a license on every insurance agency doing business in the state, or any insurance company or companies not therein located, for each and every company represented by the agent, the sum of $10, is to be construed as fixing the license on the agent and not the companies represented by him, and they enter into the question only as an element of calculation, and measure the license to be paid by the agency. The ordinance is invalid for the reason that such a rule violates the rule of equality and uniformity. City of New Orleans v. Rhenish Westphalian Lloyds, 31 La. Ann. 781, 784.

As place of business.

The word "agency," according to its strict legal signification, refers to the relation existing between the principal and agent, and which is created by the contract entered into between them. In this sense it applies rather to the person occupying the position of agent than to the place at which the business of the company is transacted by the agent. There is another sense, however, in which the word "agency" is employed colloquially, and in this sense it designates the place at which the business of the company is to be transacted by the agent. And in this latter sense the word "agency" is used by the statute which provides that suit against insurance companies may be brought in any county where such insurance company may have an agency or place of doing business. Atlanta Acc. Ass'n v. Bragg, 29 S. E. 706, 707, 102 Ga. 748.

The word "agency" in a statute authorizing suit against a company in any county where such company may have an "agency" or place of business, is intended to designate a place at which the company's business was transacted by an agent. Thus, an allegation that defendant had an office in the county, and had also an agent in the county, and was doing business therein, is sufficient allegation that it had an agency in the county. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Bailey, 42 S. E. 89, 90, 115 Ga. 725, 61 L. R. A. 933.

In treatment of disease.

In construing the word "agency" as used in 62 Ohio Laws, p. 44, which forbids the prescribing of any drug or medicine or other agency for the treatment of diseases by a person who has not received a certificate of qualification, its meaning must be limited by that of the associate words "drugs and medicine," and it does not include the system of rubbing and kneading the body, commonly known as "osteopathy," for the treatment, cure, and relief of diseases. State v. Liffing, 55 N. E. 168, 169, 61 Ohio St. 39, 46 L. R. A. 334, 76 Am. St. Rep. 358.

AGENCY COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST.

To constitute an "agency coupled with an interest," both agency and interest must be derived from the same source. Black v. Harsha, 54 Pac. 21, 7 Kan. App. 794.

The word "interest," as used in the statement of the rule that, in order to render an agent's authority irrevocable, it must be coupled with an interest, signifies the interest in the thing itself on which the authority is to be exercised, and not merely an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the authority. Attrill v. Patterson, 58 Md. 226, 250.

AGENCY OF NECESSITY.

The law is well settled that a wife is entitled to procure what is reasonably necessary for her support and maintenance on her husband's credit, when he fails to make proper provision for her necessities. Although the wife is sometimes described as his agent for that purpose, such a characterization is apt to be misleading, as the power is not only in no wise dependent upon the authority of the husband, but, in a proper case, may be exercised against his consent and in spite of his protest. Hence it has been called an "agency of necessity," and the husband is said to be estopped from disputing it by reason of his misconduct in failing to perform his legal obligation. Bostwick v. Brower, 49 N. Y. Supp. 1046, 1047, 22 Misc. Rep. 709.

AGENT.

See "Business Agent"; "Commercial Agent or Broker"; "Emigrant Agent"; "Fiscal Agent"; "General Agency or Agent"; "Inferior Agents"; "Innocent Agent"; "Local Agent"; "Managing Agent"; "Mercantile Agent"; "Particular Agent"; "Permanent Agents"; "Real Estate Broker"; "Rental Agent"; "Soliciting Agent"; "Special Agency or Agent"; "State Agent"; "Station Agent"; "Universal Agent"; "Vice Commercial Agent." Agent or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

The term "agent" is one of wide signification. It is defined to be one who acts for another by authority from him (Webst. Int. Dict.); one who undertakes to transact some business or manage some affair for another by authority and on account of the latter, and to render an account of it. The term "agent" may therefore be said to apply to any one who by authority performs an act for another. Wynegar v. State, 62 N. E. 38, 39, 157 Ind. 577; Metzger v. Huntington, 37 N. E. 1084, 1088, 39 N. E. 235, 236, 139 Ind. 501; Nichols v. State, 63 N. E. 783, 784, 28 Ind. App. 674. An "agent" is a person authorized by another to act for him. Barr v. Rader (Or.) 49 Pac. 962, 963, 31 Or. 225; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cottrell, 3 S. E. 123, 125, 83 Va. 512. The term "agent," as used in Code, § 3143, which provides for the punishment of any "agent" of any private person who embezzles or fraudulently converts to his own use any property of another which comes into his possession by virtue of his employment, means "one who is authorized to act for another; a substitute; a deputy; a factor." Hinderer v. State, 38 Ala. 415, 419.

An agent is a person duly authorized to act on behalf of another, or one whose unauthorized act has been duly ratified. Flesh v. Lindsay, 21 S. W. 907, 911, 115 Mo. 1, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374.

An agent is one who has been intrusted with the business of another. Wilson v. Menne-chas, 20 Pac. 468, 469, 40 Kan. 648.

St. 52 Geo. III, c. 63, for preventing the embezzlement of securities by agents, only includes persons to whom such securities are intrusted in the exercise of their functions or business. Rex v. Prince, 2 Car. & P. 517, 519.

The term "agents" in a general sense applies to persons in the service of another, but in a legal sense an agent is one who stands in the place of his principal and is his representative. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262.

The agent is the representative of the principal in the transaction of business embraced within his agency. Whatever he does lawfully in a transaction of that business is the act of the principal. First Nat. Bank of Portland v. Linn County Nat. Bank, 47 Pac. 614, 615, 30 Or. 296; Zelgler v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 14 Atl. 237, 239.

The term "agent," in general, designates those employments where the persons exercising them are not under the immediate control of a superior. State v. Sarila, 34 N. E. 1129, 1130, 135 Ind. 195.

An agent is a person appointed to act for another in the transaction of some lawful business, and, in general, the power conferred upon an agent is based upon special confidence or trust reposed in the agent, and such power, in the absence of authority, express or implied, cannot be redelegated by the agent so as to bind the principal. Williams v. Moore, 58 S. W. 953, 954, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 402.

"The term 'agent' is one of very wide application, and includes a great many classes of persons, to which distinctive appellations are given, as 'factors,' 'brokers,' 'attorneys,' 'cashiers of banks,' 'clerks,' 'consignees,' etc." Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cottrell, 3 S. E. 123, 125, 83 Va. 512; Porter v. Hermann, 8 Cal. 619, 624.

An "agent" is one who represents another, called the "principal," in dealings with third persons. Such representation is called "agency." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4303; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1658; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3070; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2295.

The word "agent," as employed in the provision relating to the service of process on the agent of certain corporations, shall be construed to include a telegraph operator, telephone operator, depot or station agent of a railway company, and toll gatherer of a canal or turnpike company. Code Va. 1887, § 3227.

The term "agent" or "agents," used in the title relating to insurance, shall include an acknowledged agent or surveyor, and any person who shall in any manner aid in transacting the business of an insurance company. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 3620.

The term "agent" or "agents," as used in a provision of the title relating to insurance, requiring every agent of any insurance company to publish in all advertisements of his agency the location of the company, includes an acknowledged agent or surveyor, or any other person or persons who shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, transact, or aid in transacting, the insurance business of any insurance company not incorporated by the laws of this territory. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2120.

The term "agent," as used in the act relating to mines, is defined to mean any person, other than the owner thereof, having the care and management of any coal mine, or any part thereof, and, in case the mine is owned or occupied by a corporation, then any of its officers shall be deemed its agent. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 5463.

Every person who shall receive or transmit applications for suretyship, or receive for delivery bonds founded on applications forwarded from the state, or otherwise procure suretyship to be effected by such company upon the bonds of, or the bonds given to, persons or corporations in the state, shall be deemed an agent of such company. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 3646.

Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, receive or transfer money or other valuable things to or for the use of foreign corporations, or who shall in any manner make, or cause to be made, any contract, or transact any business, for or on account of any such foreign corporation, shall be deemed an agent of such corporation. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 3026.

An allegation that one is an agent in a prosecution under Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 2171, making it criminal to act as "agent" for any lottery scheme or gift enterprise, is proper as an allegation of fact, and is not a mere conclusion. Nichols v. State, 63 N. E. 783, 784, 28 Ind. App. 674.

The word "agent," following the name of one who has signed a contract, is prima facie descriptive only, and does not tend to show that the contract was executed in such capacity. Peterson v. Homan, 44 Minn. 166, 46 N. W. 303, 304, 20 Am. St. Rep. 564.

The word "agent," as used in the Delaware insurance act (Act March 24, 1879, § 1, as amended by Act March 17, 1881), providing that the Insurance Commissioner shall not be a director, officer or "agent" of, or directly or indirectly interested in, any insurance company, except as an insured, creates a legal inability in one, while holding the office of Insurance Commissioner, to be or act as the agent of any insurance company of another state for the receipt of service of process in Delaware, as required by section 7 of said insurance act, which prohibits any insurance company from doing business within the state of Delaware without first having obtained authority therefor, and without having filed a certificate containing the name and residence of some person or "agent" within the state upon whom service of process may be made. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Fowler (U. S.) 125 Fed. 88, 90.

As acting in fiduciary capacity.

See "Fiduciary Capacity or Character."

Advertising solicitor.

An employé who is sent into the state as traveling solicitor of advertisements, whose only authority is to take orders at rates dictated by the home company, and for space, subject to the approval of the home company, and without authority to make definite contracts, is not an "agent," within the meaning of the Minnesota statutes, upon whom service of process is binding upon the corporation. Boardman v. S. S. McClure Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 614, 616.

As agency coupled with interest.

The word "agent," as used in Civ. Code, § 3038, providing that an "agent" having possession, actual or constructive, of the property of his principal, has a right of action for any interference with that possession by third persons, will be held to mean an agent who has a special interest or property in the chattel. Mitchell v. Georgia & A. Ry., 36 S. E. 971, 975, 111 Ga. 760, 51 L. R. A. 622.

Attorney at law.

The term "agent," as used in Pasch. Dig. arts. 2421-2423, limiting the embezzlement of property by private persons to any clerk or "agent" of any private person or partnership, or any assignee or bailee of money or property, factor, or commission merchant, or carrier, cannot be construed to include one employed as an agent or attorney at law, who, while so employed, received and took possession of certain money which he embezzled, for he was only such an agent as an attorney at law may be; but it means one who is an agent in fact. State v. McLane, 43 Tex. 404, 405.

The word "agent," as used in How. Ann. St. Mich. § 9151, authorizing the punishment of any agent for embezzlement, will be construed to include attorneys at law. In re Converse (U. S.) 42 Fed. 217, 219; People v. Converse, 42 N. W. 70, 71, 74 Mich. 478, 16 Am. St. Rep. 648.

Wag. St. p. 734, § 37, forbids a superintendent of insurance of the state to employ in any capacity any agent or employé of any insurance company. Held, that the term "agent or employé" applied to and included an attorney who was a salaried officer of such company. In re Bowman, 7 Mo. App. 569.

The word "agent," as used in Const. art. 6, § 24, declaring a suitor in any cause in any court of the state shall have the right to prosecute or defend either in his own person or by an "agent" or attorney, is synonymous with attorney at law. Cobb v. Judge of Superior Court, 5 N. W. 309, 310, 43 Mich. 289.

Attorney in fact.

"The term 'agent' is not synonymous with 'attorney in fact.' All attorneys in fact are agents, but all agents are not necessarily attorneys in fact. 'Agent' is the general term, which includes brokers, factors, consignees, shipmasters, and all other classes of agents. By 'attorneys in fact' are meant persons who are acting under a special power created by deed. It is true, in loose language, that the terms are applied to denote all agents employed in any kind of business, except attorneys at law, but in legal language they denote persons having special authority by deed." Porter v. Hermann, 8 Cal. 619, 624.

Bailee.

The word "agent," as used in an indictment charging embezzlement by the defendant as "agent," will be construed to include bailees, and the indictment held sufficient under Pen. Code, § 507, declaring that any bailee fraudulently converting the bailed property shall be guilty of embezzlement. People v. Johnson, 12 Pac. 261, 262, 71 Cal. 384.

Rev. St. c. 126, § 29, providing that if any "agent or servant" of any private person shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use the property of the principal which shall have come to his possession or be under his care by virtue of his employment, is to be construed as only including those who stood in the relation of an agent to a principal, and cannot be construed as including a case of a mechanic or manufacturer to whom articles are sent for the purpose of being manufactured into articles for use, he not being the "agent or servant" of the person sending him the materials to be manufactured. Commonwealth v. Young, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 5, 6.

Where a person entered a saloon kept by defendant, and requested him to keep money for him in the safe until a following day, and defendant appropriated the money to his own use, he was an "agent" of such person, within Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 2022, declaring that every officer, agent, or employé who shall, while in such employment, take any money belonging to the person in whose employment said agent may be, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement. Wynegar v. State, 62 N. E. 38, 39, 157 Ind. 577.

Bridge.

Laws 1850, c. 140, § 44, and Laws 1854, c. 282, § 8, making a railroad company which fails to fence its right of way liable for any damages done by its engines or agents to any cattle, horses, etc., thereon, construed not to include a railroad bridge which the horses ran into and injured themselves. Knight v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 1 N. E. 108, 110, 99 N. Y. 25.

Broker.

A "broker" is defined as an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade, commerce, or navigation, for a compensation commonly called "brokerage." Story, Ag. (8th Ed.) § 28. Every broker is in a sense an agent, but every agent is not a broker. There are, however, so many incidents common to both relations that it is difficult to define the precise line of demarkation. We would say the idea of exclusiveness enters into an employment of agency, while in respect to the broker there is a holding out of one's self generally for employment in matters of trade, commerce, and navigation. It is the business or calling of acting or offering to act generally, as distinguished from isolated employment, not induced by or resulting from a general business or calling. In determining whether particular facts constitute one an "agent," strictly so called, or a "broker," the circumstances that the employments are many or few cannot be made the controlling test. Stratford v. City Council of Montgomery, 20 South. 127, 128, 110 Ala. 619.

The word "agent" may acquire a peculiar meaning in a certain business, and, when its construction arises in connection with such business or occupation. It is to be taken according to its usage, as where it was proper to show that persons selling pianos of a particular make within a certain territory were called in such trade "agents," although they bought and sold on their own account. Whittemore v. Weiss, 33 Meen 348, 351.

In Comp. Laws, § 11,372, providing that whenever money shall be delivered to any person as agent, with written instructions as to the use to which it shall be applied, and such person shall intentionally appropriate the money in any other manner than as directed, he shall be guilty of a felony, the term "agent" as so used included a broker, and justified his conviction for misapplying money deposited with him to be used in the purchase of stock. People v. Karste (Mich.) 93 N. W. 1081, 1082.

Clerk or collector.

Clerk synonymous, see "Clerk."

Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 5, declaring that personal property not capable of manual delivery may be attached by leaving a copy of the writ with the person having possession of the property, or his "agent," does not embrace a clerk, in a store belonging to a mining corporation, who has charge of certain funds, keeps the pay roll, and pays the miners. Blanc v. Paymaster Min. Co., 30 Pac. 765, 767, 95 Cal. 524, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149.

A bartender is the agent of the saloon keeper. Zeigler v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 14 Atl. 237, 239.

As used in Rev. St. § 1944, providing that any "agent," clerk, servant, or employé who shall appropriate moneys in his control belonging to his employer shall be guilty of embezzlement, includes a person engaged in making collections for others on commissions, since the term "agent" designates those employments where the persons exercising them are not under the immediate control of a superior. State v. Sarlls, 34 N. E. 1129, 1130, 135 Ind. 195.

Contractor.

The term "agent," as used in a statute giving a lien for all debts contracted by the master, owner, agent, or consignee of a boat or vessel on account of supplies or stores furnished, is construed to mean only a person who is authorized to contract on behalf of the owners of the boat and bind it by his agreements, and hence cannot be construed to include a ship carpenter who contracts to repair a boat and furnish materials, and purchases the lumber with which to make the repairs from the claimants of the lien, he having no authority to represent the owner of the vessel in the purchasing thereof. Childs v. The Brunette, 19 Mo. 518, 520.

The term "agent," as used in Code, § 1957, providing that every person performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction of a building has a lien thereon, whether furnished at the instance of the owner or his agent, and that for the purpose of the act every contractor, etc., shall be held to be the owner's agent, "has an accepted legal and popular meaning, and makes all contracts, notices, and knowledge of the main contractor that of the owner himself. It makes the owner privy with both contractor and subcontractor." Spokane Mfg. & Lumber Co. v. McChesney, 21 Pac. 198, 200, 1 Wash. St. 609.

As used in General Railroad Act, Comp. Laws, § 1987, requiring every corporation formed under it to "erect and maintain fences," and providing that, until such fences shall be duly made, the corporation and their "agents" shall be liable for all damages which shall be done by their agents or engines, and to animals thereon, and all other damages which may result from neglect of such corporation to erect and maintain fences, should be construed to apply to a contractor with the company for grading the track. He "was an agent within the law and spirit of the act." It was evidently intended to embrace under the term "agents" every one in the employment of the company. The word is to be taken in the enlarged sense to include those who exercise the power of the company upon or over the road, as well as those acting as engineers or in any other subordinate capacity, and who may be connected with the commission of the injury. Gardner v. Smith, 7 Mich. 410, 441, 74 Am. Dec. 722.

One in control or management of property.

The term "agent," as used in Code, art. 3, § 4, providing that any person may contract with any "agent" or factor intrusted with any goods for the purchase thereof, and may receive from and pay for the same to such agent, and that such contract and payment shall be good against the owner notwithstanding such person shall have notice that the person making the contract is an agent or factor, does not mean a mere servant or caretaker, or one who has possession of goods for carriage, safe custody, or otherwise, but one whose employment corresponds to that of some known kind of commercial agent, such as a factor. Levi v. Booth, 58 Md. 305, 317, 42 Am. Rep. 332.

In Rev. St. art. 1040, providing that personal property of a nonresident who has an "agent" residing in the state in charge of such property shall be assessed in the district in which the agent resides, the word "agent" means one who has charge or possession of the property for any purpose, and it is not essential that he should be a general agent to sell the property, or that he should have authority to act for the owner in all matters relating to the property, but the possession or care, custody, or management of the property by another is sufficient to sustain the tax. City of Merrill v. P. B. Champagne Lumber Co., 43 N. W. 653, 654, 75 Wis. 142.

A company which has in its possession notes and mortgages executed to it, and by it assigned to third persons under assignments stipulating that the notes and mortgages shall remain with it for safe-keeping and collection, and that it shall retain all interest in excess of a specified per cent. as compensation for its services, is an "agent" within Code 1897, § 1320, providing that any person acting as agent for another, and having in his "possession or under his control or management any money, notes, credits," etc., of such other person, "with a view to investing or loaning or in any other manner using or holding the same for pecuniary profit for himself or the owner," shall list the same for taxation. German Trust Co. v. Board of Equalization of City of Davenport Tp. (Iowa) 96 N. W. 878.

Debtor.

Process in an action was issued and served on a debtor of the defendant, and on no one else. To serve a notice on a man's debtor is no notice to the man of a claim against him. The debtor is in no sense his agent. Martin v. Central Vt. R. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 82, 83, 84, 50 Hun, 347.

As employé.

See "Employé."

Engineers and firemen.

The word "agent," as used in Rev. Laws, § 3412, requiring railroad companies to maintain sufficient fences and cattle guards, and making them and their "agents" responsible for the failure to do so, has a broad meaning, and was entitled to embrace such servants as engineers and firemen, and is not limited to those who, by lease or other contract, stand in place of the company, and control and operate the road. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. v. Hunt, 7 Atl. 277, 278, 59 Vt. 294; Clement v. Canfield, 28 Vt. (2 Williams) 302, 304.

Guardian or committee.

An "agent" is one who has been intrusted with the business of another. The natural guardian of a minor is, for the purpose of making an affidavit in replevin, the "agent" of such minor. Wilson v. Menchase, 20 Pac. 468, 469, 40 Kan. 648.

The committee of a lunatic who is a resident in the same county with the lunatic cannot be regarded as his agent, within the meaning of 1 Rev. St. tit. 2, pt. 1, c. 13, art. 1, § 5, providing that personal property under the control of persons as "agents," trustees, executors, or administrators, must be assessed against such person, since the term "agent," as used in the statute, applies only to one whose principal is not a resident of the state. Boardman v. Tompkins County Sup'rs, 85 N. Y. 359, 362; People v. Tax Comm'rs, 3 N. E. 85, 86, 100 N. Y. 215.

Implied agent.

Under statutes authorizing the service of process on "agents" of foreign corporations in order that the service will constitute due process of law, the agent must be one having in fact a representative capacity and a derivative authority. Such agent must be one actually appointed and representing the corporation as a matter of fact, and not one created by construction or implication contrary to the intention of the parties. Mikolas v. Hiram Walker & Sons, 76 N. W. 38, 73 Minn. 305.

The definition of an "agent" at the common law, as quoted in Story, Ag. § 3, is: "An attorney is he who is appointed to do anything in the place of another." The appointment need not be in writing; it may be inferred from the words or acts of the principal. These words or acts must, however, be such as point clearly to the agent as such. In Evans on Agency (Ewell's Ed.) the definition given is: "An agent is a person duly authorized to act on behalf of another, or one whose unauthorized act has been duly ratified." Metzger v. Huntington, 39 N. E. 235, 236, 139 Ind. 501.

As laborer.

See "Laborer."

Lessee.

The term "agent," as used in Comp. St. c. 26, § 41, making a railroad company and its agents liable for damages occasioned by want of fences and cattle guards, is a very extensive term, and may be fairly applied to almost any one who performs the office of another, and includes a lessee of the company, since such lessee must be an agent of the company performing the company's functions, or he could not be allowed to collect tolls and fare, or to run engines. Clement v. Canfield, 28 Vt. 302, 304.

As managing agent.

Within the provisions of an act fixing a tax on all "agents" of packing houses doing business in this state, the word "agents" means managing or superintending agents, and includes every agent who is the alter ego of the principal by whom he is employed. Stewart v. Kehrer, 41 S. E. 680, 682, 115 Ga. 184.

The mining law recognizes agents by name as known representatives upon whom process may be served. They are the persons who have charge personally of the local business at the mines, and are necessarily to be treated in law as general agents, to do all that is fairly within the scope of corporate business in conducting the operations in that locality. Adams Min. Co. v. Senter, 28 Mich. 73, 76 (cited in Sacalaris v. Eureka & P. R. Co., 1 Pac. 835, 836, 18 Nev. 155, 51 Am. St. Rep. 737).

Temporary employé.

The term "agent," in Gen. St. c. 257, § 8, fixing a punishment for embezzlement by the clerk, servant, or agent of any person, is not limited to agents engaged in a general or continuous agency or service, but applies to a person authorized on a single occasion by the maker of certain notes to exchange them in renewal of others. The person authorized to make the exchange may be an agent for that purpose, within the meaning of the statute, although the notes are made for his accommodation as well as the maker's. State v. Barter, 58 N. H. 604, 605.

Act Cong. Jan. 16, 1883, 22 Stat. 405, c. 27, § 6 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1221], requiring every clerk, agent, or person employed to undergo a competitive examination, does not apply to a merchant appraiser selected to appraise the market value and wholesale price of imported goods, where the position of such appraiser was not for any certain duration, continuing emolument, or of continuous duties, and where he acted only occasionally and temporarily. Auffmordt v. Hedden, 11 Sup. Ct. 103, 108, 137 U. S. 310, 34 L. Ed. 674.

Code, § 4377, providing that any clerk, "agent," or servant or apprentice who embezzles or converts to his own use any money or property deposited with him must be punished as if he had stolen it, means any one who undertakes to transact business or to manage some affair for another by the authority and on the account of the latter, and to render an account of it, and imports a principal, and implies employment, service, delegated authority to do something in the name and stead of the principal, and an employment by virtue of which the money or property came into his possession, the employment need not be permanent, but may be temporary or occasional, and general to transact any business, or special to make a single transaction. Pullam v. State, 78 Ala. 31, 34, 56 Am. Rep. 21.

Officers of corporation.

In Rev. St. c. 133, § 10, providing that in a prosecution for embezzling money of any person by his "agent," it shall be sufficient to allege generally the sum embezzled, the word "agent" is not synonymous with "president" or "director," but includes persons employed in the management or transmission of the funds of a bank, but who were not officers of the bank. Commonwealth v. Wyman, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 247, 259.

Comp. Laws, § 6463, providing that summons on a corporation garnishee may be served on its general or special "agent," does not mean every man who is intrusted with a commission or employment, but designates the principal officers of the corporation who, either generally or in respect to some particular department of the corporate business, have a controlling authority, either general or special. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Hunt, 39 Mich. 469, 471.

The vice president of a corporation is an agent within the purview of Rev. St. 1874, c. 110, § 5, allowing service, when the president of the county cannot be found, to be made upon "any agent of said company." Cook v. Imperial Bldg. Co., 38 N. E. 914, 152 Ill. 638.

Under Acts 1883-84, p. 701, providing that in certain cases process may be served on a corporation by serving it on any agent thereof, it was held that the word "agent" included a railroad general superintendent, and also the vice president of the railroad. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cottrell, 3 S. W. 123, 125, 83 Va. 512.

The term "agent" in Rev. St. 1879, § 2882, providing that a statement in replevin shall be verified by the affidavit of the superintendent, his "agent" or attorney, includes the superintendent of a company, as the superintendent is the managing agent; and therefore an affidavit signed by a person who designates himself as a superintendent is a sufficient compliance with the statute. South Missouri Land Co. v. Jeffries, 40 Mo. App. 360, 361.

Though it be conceded that a vice president is not an officer generally known to the law creating corporations, but that he comes under the class usually known as "such other officers and agents as shall be determined by the directors or managers," yet the vice president of a corporation may act as its agent, and, if he is by it so recognized and treated or held out to the world, his acts within the scope of the authority given to him are as binding as those of any other agent. Union Inv. Ass'n v. Geer, 64 Ill. App. 648, 650, 654.

Officer of county or state.

Within Laws 1873, p. 177, § 1, providing that any officer, "agent," clerk, or servant of any corporation, or person employed in such capacity, who has embezzled or converted to his own use any goods or valuable security belonging to any person or corporation, shall, on conviction, be punished as for stealing the property, the term "agent" includes every "agent," whether of an individual, a partnership, a corporation, or the state, and is broad enough to include an officer or "agent" of the state. State v. Bancroft, 22 Kan. 170, 204, 205.

2 Rev. St. p. 678, § 59, making it criminal for any clerk or servant of any private person or of any copartnership, or any agent, clerk, or servant of any incorporate company, to embezzle funds, etc., construed not to include agents or servants of any public body, either politic or corporate, and hence not to include a county superintendent of the poor. Coats v. People, 22 N. Y. 245, 247.

As owner.

See "Owner."

Partner.

A partner virtually embraces the character both of principal and of agent. So far as he acts for himself and his own interests in the common concern of the partnership he may properly be deemed a principal, and so far as he acts for his partners he may as properly be deemed an agent. Eastman v. Clark, 53 N. H. 276, 290, 16 Am. Rep. 192 (citing Story, Partn. § 1).

Partners are the general agents of each other and of the firm, within the scope of the business of the partnership. Commonwealth v. Rovnianek, 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 86, 93.

Gen. Laws, c. 275, § 8, declaring that if the clerk, servant, or "agent" of any person shall embezzle to his own use any property of such person he shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or imprisoned not exceeding five years, cannot be extended to mean a partner, acting as the agent for his firm, who embezzles the property of the firm. If the Legislature had intended to use the word "agent" in such sense, it would seem to have been unnecessary to insert the words "officer," "clerk," or "servant," inasmuch as an officer or clerk of a corporation is their agent for some purposes, and the clerk or servant of a person is his agent for the discharge of duties within the sphere of his employment. If it was the legislative intent to include partners, they would probably have been specified in the statute. State v. Butman, 61 N. H. 511, 516, 60 Am. Rep. 332.

As personal representative.

See "Personal Representative."

Principal distinguished.

The county court directed the selectmen of a town, within a specified time, to put a certain highway in good repair, and, in case of their neglect, appointed the defendant as agent to do it at the expense of the selectmen. In performing this duty the defendant employed plaintiff to do certain work on the highway. In considering the claim of plaintiff that defendant was acting not as agent but as principal in doing such work, the court said: "I feel constrained by civility to take notice of an objection which, if it had not been distinctly made, would never have occurred to me. It has been said that from the facts stated the defendant was not an agent but a principal. Who, then, is a principal? I answer, one primarily and originally concerned, and who is not an accessory or auxiliary. Who is an agent? A substitute, or a person employed to manage the affairs of another. The test on this inquiry is, Who derives the benefit? The person receiving goods or employing workmen for his own advantage is a principal, and he who receives or employs workmen for another is an agent. It contradicts the plainest meaning of language to assert that the defendant, who derives no more advantage from the repaired highway than every other man in the state, and whose only business it is to act by an appointment, was other than an agent. Adams v. Whittlesey, 3 Conn. 560, 567.

Relation to principal implied.

The provision of Comp. St. p. 274, § 10, that no "agent or attorney" shall write or draw up the deposition of any witness, includes an agent or attorney employed to attend to the taking of the deposition, although not otherwise employed in the case, but does not extend to one employed to assist the magistrate in drawing up the deposition, who has no other agency in the matter, although he is paid by the party. Moulton v. Hall, 27 Vt. (1 Williams) 233, 234.

As used in Act 1886, § 3797, punishing embezzlement by an "agent" or servant, imports a correlative idea of principal or master, and implies employment, service, delegated authority to do something in the name or stead of the principal, or an employment by virtue of which the money or property came into the agent or servant's possession; and hence a mail rider in the employment of the United States is not an agent or servant of the person who sent the letter. Brewer v. State, 3 South. 816, 83 Ala. 113, 3 Am. St. Rep. 693.

Receiver.

The term "agent" is one of wide application, and, as used in the statute relating to embezzlement by agents, seems to fairly include receivers. Thus Webster defines an agent as one who acts for or in the place of another, or by authority from him. To constitute agency in its broader sense, it is not essential that it should be created by agreement or contract. It may arise under the law, and any one who represents another or undertakes to do something for him or on his authority is properly designated as an "agent." Though such construction of the word "agent" is given by the writer of the opinion, the court held that a receiver was not included within such a term. State v. Hubbard, 51 Pac. 290, 292, 58 Kan. 797, 39 L. R. A. 860.

In an action against a bank it was contended that its receiver was its agent, so as to bind it by his admissions by letter. The court, however, said, conceding but not deciding that the receiver was an agent, the letter was not admissible for other reasons. First Nat. Bank v. Linn County Bank, 47 Pac. 614, 615, 30 Or. 296.

Scrivener.

Within Rev. St. 1881, § 500, declaring that a living party may testify as a witness to a transaction with the decedent when the "agent" of the deceased has testified concerning it, the word "agent" does not include a scrivener employed by deceased to prepare a deed. Kenney v. Phillipy, 91 Ind. 511, 514.

Servant distinguished.

The words "agent" and "servant" are not wholly synonymous; both, however, relating to voluntary action under employment, and each expressing the idea of service. The service performed by a servant for his employer may be inferior in degree to work done by an agent for his principal. A servant is a worker for another under an express or implied agreement; so also is an agent, only he works not only for but in place of his principal. In the sense of service, an agent is the servant of his principal; therefore designating him in an information or indictment for embezzling as agent and servant is not such a misnomer of his capacity as affects any of his substantial rights. People v. Treadwell, 10 Pac. 502, 508, 69 Cal. 226.

The words "agent" and "servant," in a general sense, both apply to persons in the service of another; but in the legal sense, an agent is one who stands in the place of his principal—his representative—while a servant is one in the master's employment, but not clothed with any representative character. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262.

Mr. Wharton, in speaking of the introduction of the word "agent" in the embezzlement statutes, in reference to embezzlement by agents, servants, or clerks, says: "As used in the Massachusetts Statutes, the term 'agents' is much wider in its significations than servants or clerks. The latter are restricted to the performance of specific acts in a specific way; the former may or may not be restricted, and may in fact be clothed with full power to represent their principal, with the same discretion as he might exercise himself." Territory v. Maxwell, 2 N. M. 250, 262 (citing 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1022).

There is a distinction between an "agent" and a servant. An agent has more or less discretion, while a servant acts under the master's control and direction. McCroskey v. Hamilton, 34 S. E. 111, 112, 108 Ga. 640, 75 Am. St. Rep. 79. See, also, Kinagan & Co. v. Silvers, 37 N. E. 413, 416, 13 Ind. App. 80.

In legal essence there is no difference between the relation of master and servant and that of principal and agent, the terms "servant" and "agent" being fundamentally interchangeable, and the distinction between them evidential only. Brown v. German-American Title & Trust Co., 84 Atl. 335, 339, 174 Pa. 443.

Station agent.

In common acceptance the agent of a railroad company is the person representing the company at a station or depot on its line, and such is its meaning in the statute requiring an application for cars from a railroad company for loading, in order to subject the company to liability for the penalty for failure to furnish them, to deposit with the agent of the company at the time of making the application one-fourth the amount of the freight charges. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 40 S. W. 431, 433.

The word "agent," as used in relation to whether notice to an agent is notice to the principal, means the person who has power to act for the principal with reference to the very subject-matter to which the notice relates, and does not include a person who has no such power, though he may have power to act for the principal with reference to similar subjects. Thus a station agent at one station cannot be said to be an agent of the company in relation to a contract of shipment from another station. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Belcher, 32 S. W. 518, 519, 88 Tex. 549.

Superintendent.

Where, in an action to foreclose a laborer's lien under Code, § 1901, par. 1, the affiant averred that he demanded payment of a debt due him as a laborer of the general superintendent of the defendant corporation, "whose duty it was to settle with laborers in and around said sawmill," this was a sufficient allegation of demand "on the owner, agent or lessee of the property," as required by the Code. Hobbs v. Georgia Lumber & Turpentine Co., 74 Ga. 371, 372.

Trustee.

As trustee of an express trust, see "Express Trust."

"A trustee is not an agent." An agent represents and acts for his principal, who may be either a natural or artificial person; but a trustee may be defined generally as a person in whom some estate, interest, or power in or affecting property is vested for the benefit of another. When an agent contracts in the name of his principal, the principal contracts, and is bound, but the agent is not. When a trustee contracts as such, unless he is bound, no one is bound, for he has no principal; and the contract is therefore the personal undertaking of the trustee. He is personally bound by the contracts he makes as trustee, even when designating himself as such. Taylor v. Mayo, 4 Sup. Ct. 147, 150, 110 U. S. 330, 28 L. Ed. 163.

Wharfinger.

A wharfinger receiving goods in that capacity, without authority to sell, is not an "agent" within Act 6 Geo. IV, c. 94, § 4, protecting purchases made innocently, and in the ordinary course of business, from "agents intrusted with goods." Monk v. Whittenbury, 2 Barn. & Adol. 484.

AGER.

The word "ager" was sometimes employed to signify something different from a tilled field. Its primitive signification is soil, ground, and it sometimes means a country or territory. Municipality No. 2 v. Orleans Cotton Press, 18 La. 122, 167, 36 Am. Dec. 624.

AGGRAVATED ASSAULT.

As a misdemeanor, see "Misdemeanor."

An "aggravated assault" at the common law is one that has, in addition to the mere intention to commit, another object, also criminal; as, an assault with intent to kill or wound, or the like. Norton v. State, 14 Tex. 387, 393.

An "aggravated assault" is, at the common law, one that has, in addition to the mere intent to commit it, another object, which is also criminal; but it may be doubted whether at common law the term had a technical and definite meaning. It seems rather to have been a phrase used by the commentators and text-writers, in contradistinction to "common assault," to include all those species of assault which, for various reasons, have come to be regarded as more heinous than common assaults, or had been singled out and made the subject of special legislative provisions. In the criminal codes of some of the states of the Union, the term "aggravated assault" is given a definite and peculiar meaning of its own. Norton v. State, 14 Tex. 387, 393. Using the term in the large and general sense, not only assaults with certain prescribed intents, but also assaults by stabbing, wounding, shooting, or by any use of a deadly weapon, are aggravated assaults—in some states made felonies. By statute, in most of the states, one class of aggravated assaults is made to depend upon the character of the weapon used in the assault. The provisions of the statutes are varied. Some statutes are directed against the use of deadly or dangerous weapons with intent to kill a human being or to commit a felony upon the person or the property of the one assaulted, or with intent to inflict grievous bodily harm, while under other statutes the mere use of the weapon, without reference to the intent with which it is employed, is sufficient. Under statutes which make the intent with which the weapon is used a constituent element, the use of the dangerous or deadly weapon, with intent to inflict bodily harm, constitutes the gist of the offense, as distinguishing the act from an ordinary assault. Therefore the mere possession of a deadly weapon, without using it or the intent to use it, will not constitute the offense, nor will the intent without the use. But, under statutes which declare the crime complete by the mere use of a dangerous or deadly weapon, it is unnecessary to allege or prove any intent whatsoever. Aggravated assault includes the offense described in Ann. St. Ind. T. § 909, which provides for the punishment of an assault with intent to inflict upon the person of another a bodily injury, where no considerable provocation appears, or where the circumstances of the assault show an abandoned and malignant disposition. In re Burns (U. S.) 113 Fed. 987, 992.

An assault becomes aggravated when committed by an adult male on the person of a female or child. Ellers v. State (Tex.) 55 S. W. 813.

Under the statutes of Texas an assault with a whip is an aggravated assault, and therefore, on a prosecution for an aggravated assault with a whip, it is not necessary to show that disgrace resulted to the assaulted person, as that fact is conclusively presumed. Coolidge v. State (Tex.) 24 S. W. 904.

Under Rev. Code 1895, art. 601, subd. 6, defining an "aggravated assault" as one that "inflicts disgrace on the person assaulted, as an assault and battery with a whip or cowhide," a male is guilty of an aggravated assault by forcibly feeling the private parts of a chaste female against her will. Slawson v. State, 45 S. W. 575, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 176, 73 Am. St. Rep. 914.

AGGRAVATION.

See "Matter of Aggravation."

AGGREGATE.

"Aggregate" is defined as a sum, mass, or assemblage of particulars; a total or gross amount. It implies a plurality of units, whose total amount it represents, and, hence as used in St. 1893, p. 499, § 204, providing that certain supervisors shall receive a per diem and mileage, all of which compensation in the "aggregate" shall not exceed a certain sum, will include both per diem and the mileage, in making up the aggregate. Chapin v. Wilcox, 46 Pac. 457, 458, 114 Cal. 498.

The expression "aggregate amount of tax," in a statute providing that the "aggregate amount of tax" to be voted under the act shall not exceed a certain per cent. of the assessed value of the taxable property, means the sum of the taxes—the whole amount voted and levied as made by the addition of the several taxes. Dumphy v. Humboldt County Sup'rs, 12 N. W. 306, 307, 58 Iowa, 273.

AGGREGATE CORPORATION.

See "Corporation Aggregate."

AGGREGATE MARKET VALUE.

The aggregate market value of the stock of a business corporation approximates an amount reached by capitalizing the aggregate annual dividends on a basis of something higher than the usual rate of interest for money loaned, the rate varying as interest of money loaned varies with the risk of the investment and the certainty of annual payments. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Poe (U. S.) 61 Fed. 449, 456.

AGGREGATE PAYMENT.

St. Louis City Charter 1870, art. 8, § 18, requires every ordinance requiring work to be done to provide a specific appropriation based upon an estimate of the cost, and that every contract for such work shall contain a clause to the effect that it is subject to the provisions of the charter that the "aggregate payments" thereon shall be limited by the amount of the specific appropriation for such work. It was held that the words "aggregate payment" do not include the payment made by the property owners to the contractor, but is limited to the amounts which are to be paid on the contract out of the city treasury. Seibert v. Cavender, 3 Mo. App. 421, 424.

AGGREGATE VALUE.

See "Fair Aggregate Value."

AGGREGATION.

It is a commonly accepted rule of the law of patents that the inventive idea is not ordinarily present in the conception of a combination which merely brings together two or more functions to be availed of independently of each other. The mechanism which accomplishes such a result and no more is ordinarily spoken of as a mere "aggregation," although this expression is misleading when not used with great discrimination. Osgood Dredge Co. v. Metropolitan Dredging Co. (U. S.) 75 Fed. 670, 672, 21 C. C. A. 491.

AGGRESSOR.

The term "aggressor," in the rule that the aggressor cannot kill his opponent in self-defense, necessarily imports that the aggressor must provoke the difficulty with the intent to kill his adversary, or do him great bodily harm, or to afford him a pretext for wrecking his malice upon his adversary. The use of opprobrious language to another does not render the person using the language an aggressor. State v. Foutch, 34 S. W. 423, 424, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 711, 45 L. R. A. 687.

AGGRIEVED.

As determining right to appeal, see "Aggrieved Party."

"Aggrieved," as used in Wag. St. 1272, § 15, providing that, if a Secretary of State shall at any time neglect or refuse to perform any of the duties enjoined on him by law, he shall be liable to the person aggrieved, means any person whose rights have been denied. Switzler v. Rodman, 48 Mo. 197, 199.

The terms "party aggrieved" and the "person entitled thereto" held to refer to the same person and to mean the same thing in Rev. St. c. 60, § 64, making an officer selling property under execution, and not having the amount of such sale and paying over the same according to the law, liable to pay the whole amount thereof to the "person entitled thereto," with lawful interest thereon, and damages in addition at the rate of 10 per cent. to be recovered in an action against such officer, "or the party aggrieved may proceed against such officer by motion before the court." Humphries v. Lawson, 7 Ark. (2 Eng.) 344, 347.

The statute directing proceedings against forcible entry and detainer, giving a right of action for trespass to the "party aggrieved," by irresistible implication gives a right to the person forcibly ejected, though the title of the party committing the offense is superior to that of the person ejected. Bliss v. Bange, 6 Conn. 78, 80.

Election of corporation directors.

"Aggrieved," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 603, § 5, providing that a proceeding for a new election of directors for a railroad company may be brought by any person that may be "aggrieved by or complain of the election," does not mean that any person whomsoever who chooses to make a complaint may institute the proceeding, but it must be some person whose rights have been infringed and who is justly entitled to the claim, who is not himself the author of the wrong complained of. In re Syracuse, C. & N. Y. R. Co., 91 N. Y. 1, 2.

Failure to receive or transmit telegram.

The "aggrieved" party, under the statute allowing the recovery of a penalty of a telegraph company for failure to receive or transmit a telegram, is the person whose message the telegraph company has refused to receive or failed to transmit on the terms or in the manner prescribed by the statute. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Ferguson, 60 N. E. 679, 680, 157 Ind. 37 (citing Hadley v. Western Union Tel. Co., 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845).

Forfeiture of administrator's bond.

Nix. Dig. p. 257, § 12, provides that if an administration bond shall become forfeited it shall be the duty of the ordinary to cause the same to be prosecuted at the request of any party "aggrieved" by such forfeiture. Held, that a general creditor of an estate was a party aggrieved within the terms of the statute, and this though he had not established his claim by a judgment. In re Hounass, 14 N. J. Eq. (1 McCart.) 493, 495.

Fraudulent conveyance.

"Aggrieved," as used in Comp. St. c. 104, §§ 23, 24 (Rev. St. c. 95, §§ 19, 20), providing that the party "aggrieved" by a fraudulent conveyance has the right to recover a penalty therefor, should be construed to include a surety for the grantor, he being an "aggrieved" party from the date of his suretyship and before he pays any portion of the debt, and his right to recover the penalty is perfected by paying the debt, and dates from the time he became surety. He is more within the requisites of a prior creditor than even the primary creditor was, who may be supposed, as is commonly the fact, to look more to the surety for his indemnity than to the property of the debtor, and under these circumstances the surety is, far more obviously than the principal creditor, a party "aggrieved." He is, if responsible, the only party aggrieved in the general and popular sense. The grantor must be understood to have intended to defraud the surety by depriving him of all redress or indemnity for his undertaking. The party "aggrieved" must be the party and all the parties whose right, debt, or duty is attempted to be avoided. In popular language, and within the evil intended to be remedied by the statute, the surety has a right, and the principal owes him a duty, which is of the nature of a debt, to save him harmless. Beach v. Boynton, 28 Vt. 725, 726, 731.

Refusal to enter payment of mortgage.

A "party aggrieved," within the meaning of a statute giving a right of action for a penalty by a party aggrieved by the refusal of a mortgagee to enter the fact of payment on the margin of the record upon request, if within two months he fails to do so, means one who had himself made the request. Jowers v. Brown Bros., 34 South. 827, 828, 137 Ala. 581.

Sale of liquor.

"Aggrieved," as used in a statute giving a right of action to the person aggrieved by the sale of liquor to a minor, means the father or mother of the minor, and has no other than the legal significance of designating the person to whom the right of action may be given. Qualls v. Sayles, 45 S. W. 839, 840, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 400.

In construing a statute giving a right of action to the one "aggrieved" for any injury to person or property by reason of a sale, to a person when drunk, the court said: "That a widow is a person aggrieved by the injury or death of her husband is a conclusion of law which rests, not upon the sudden sundering of the most interesting relation of human life, but upon the pecuniary advantages which were lost thereby. Her right of support from his industry; her right of dower from the accumulations of his life, giving her a fixed pecuniary interest in his existence; the loss of his society; of his assistance in rearing children and managing whatever estate they may have; and the consequent labor and trouble that have devolved on her—are circumstances to aggrieve her." Fink v. Garman, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 95, 105.

Under a like statute it was held that where liquors were sold to a major son, in consequence of which injuries resulted to him, his father was not an "aggrieved" person within the meaning of the statute, where neither a subsisting family relation nor that of master and servant was shown to exist between the father and the son. Veon v. Creaton, 20 Atl. 865, 138 Pa. 48, 9 L. R. A. 814.

"Aggrieved," as used in a statute providing that a liquor dealer's bond may be sued on at the instance of any person or persons "aggrieved" by the violation of its provisions, should be construed in its legal sense instead of its common acceptance; and in its legal sense it means "having suffered loss or injury; damaged; injured." Where the bond was conditioned that an open, orderly, and quiet house should be kept, a person residing in the vicinity who is disturbed and annoyed by music, dancing, and loud and indecent language occurring in such house, and whose sleep is often disturbed thereby, and whose boards have left him on account thereof, is an "aggrieved" person. Cunningham v. Porchet, 56 S. W. 574, 575, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 80.

The words "any person aggrieved" are not in very frequent use in statutes relating to the right of appeal, and such words are generally construed as to mean any person having an interest, recognized by law in the subject-matter of the judgment, which he considered injuriously affected by the action of the court. In a legal sense, a person is aggrieved by an act when a legal right is invaded by the act complained of. A college has a direct interest in the enforcement of the law against the sale of intoxicants to students, and has the right to its enforcement, as, in addition to the moral responsibility resting upon the authorities of the institution, its financial success depends in a large measure on the influences which affect the characters of its students and which are manifested in their deportment, and a college may recover a statutory penalty for violation of a law prohibiting the sale of liquor to students. Daniels v. Grayson College, 50 S. W. 205, 206, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 562.

Scandalous pleading.

Code Civ. Proc. § 545, providing that scandalous matter contained in a pleading may be stricken out on motion of a person aggrieved thereby, is not limited to a party to an action, but motion may be made by plaintiff's attorney when he is the person aggrieved. Wehle v. Loewy, 21 N. Y. Supp. 1027, 1028, 2 Misc. Rep. 345.

AGGRIEVED PARTY.

As determining rights other than that of appeal, see "Aggrieved."

"Aggrieved," as used in a statute giving parties "aggrieved" the right to appeal, refers to a substantial grievance, and denial of some personal or property right, or the imposition upon a party of a burden or obligation. McFarland v. Pierce, 45 N. E. 706, 707, 151 Ind. 546. He must be a person who is a party to the action or proceeding, and will thereby be affected in some manner by a judgment authorized therein. Philippe v. Levy, 3 N. Y. Supp. 664, 56 N. Y. Super. Ct. (24 Jones & S.) 606. A person against whom some error has been committed. Kinealy v. Macklin, 67 Mo. 95, 99; State ex rel. Kinealy v. Boyle, 6 Mo. App. 57, 58. Any one against whom an unauthorized judgment has been rendered, as where defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor under an act which provided a penalty of not less than $5, and he was fined $4, he was aggrieved, owing to the unauthorized judgment, so as to authorize an appeal. Taff v. State, 39 Conn. 82, 85.
1 Wds. & P.—18

In legal acceptance, a party is aggrieved by a judgment or decree when it operates on his rights of property, or bears directly on his interests. Lamar v. Lamar, 45 S. E. 498, 500, 118 Ga. 684.

The word "party," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 285, authorizing an action to set aside a fraudulent judgment, etc., to be brought by the party aggrieved, means a party to the action in which the judgment was recovered. Stewart v. Duncan, 42 N. W. 89, 90, 40 Minn. 410.

The term "aggrieved," as used in a statute providing for a review of the admeasurement of dower, cannot be applied to a person not a party to the judgment. Lowery v. Lowery, 64 N. C. 110, 112.

The person whom the record shows to be aggrieved may appeal, although he has not appeared in the case. In re Meade's Estate (Cal.) 49 Pac. 5.

The mere fact that a person is hurt in his feeling, wounded in his affections, or subjected to inconvenience, annoyance, or discomfort, does not entitle him to appeal from it, so long as he is not concluded thereby from asserting or defending his claims of personal or property rights in any proper court. Sherer v. Sherer, 44 Atl. 899, 900, 93 Me. 210, 74 Am. St. Rep. 339.

No person can be said to be aggrieved by an order which, without affecting his rights of property or impairing his interests, simply facilitates the decisions of the questions before the court. The rule generally adopted in construing statutes on this subject is that a party is aggrieved by the judgment or decree when it operates on his rights of property or bears directly upon his interests. The word "aggrieved" refers to a substantial grievance, or denial of some personal or property right, or the imposition upon a party of a burden or obligation. The definition given in Smith v. Bradstreet, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 264, and adopted in Bryant

v. Allen, 6 N. H. 116, and approved in Wiggin v. Swett, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 194, 197, 30 Am. Dec. 716, viz.: "A party aggrieved is one whose pecuniary interest is directly affected by the decree; one whose right of property may be established or divested by the decree"—is enlarged in Lawless v. Reagan, 128 Mass. 592, where it is said: "In order to give a right of appeal from a judgment of the court, it must appear that the party appealing has some pecuniary interest or some personal right which is immediately or remotely affected or concluded by the decree appealed from." Tillinghast v. Brown University, 52 Atl. 891, 892, 24 R. I. 179.

Those not parties to an action, and not made parties to a motion for a writ of assistance issued therein, cannot be aggrieved by such writ, since it would be inoperative as to them, and hence have no right to appeal from an order granting such writ. Miller v. Bate, 56 Cal. 135, 136.

A party aggrieved is a party against whom an appealable order or judgment has been entered; therefore, when an order is made directing injunction on condition that an undertaking be issued and filed, the party against whom the order is made may appeal at once, without waiting until the injunction is issued. Ely v. Frisbie, 17 Cal. 250, 260.

Where plaintiff recovered less than the amount claimed in the declaration, he was aggrieved within St. 1893, c. 396, § 24, allowing the party aggrieved to appeal from the district to the superior court. Kingsley v. Delano, 51 N. E. 186, 172 Mass. 37.

In a suit wherein a receiver for a corporation had been appointed, a stockholder petitioned for an order directing the receiver to permit an examination of the books of accounts, and the court permitted the company to file a so-called "answer," which alleged that petitioner had acted, in the interests of a rival company, to hinder a contemplated reorganization, and to force a sacrifice of defendant's property. Under Acts 1895, p. 91, § 1, providing that an appeal lies in favor of "any party in a suit aggrieved" by a judgment or order, the company was not entitled to appeal from an order granting such permission, since the mere filing of an answer by courtesy, and not of right, did not constitute the company a party to the proceedings, and it was not aggrieved by the order, which related merely to the management and control of its property in the hands of the court, and did not affect its pecuniary or property rights, though a disclosure of its accounts might indirectly injure it. State ex rel. People's Ry. Co. v. Talty, 40 S. W. 942, 944, 139 Mo. 379.

The term "party aggrieved" is emphatically applicable to those who suffer from the aggressions of others, but is inappropriate and rarely applied to plaintiffs and parties who prosecute on contracts and liabilities for debts and damages. Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 47, 69, 49 Am. Dec. 287.

A creditor is not a party aggrieved by the refusal of the insolvency court to permit certain creditors to withdraw their assent to the discharge of the insolvent, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 157, § 15, giving the Supreme Judicial Court supervising jurisdiction of insolvency matters on proper process of any party aggrieved. Clarke v. Stanwood, 44 N. E. 537, 539, 166 Mass. 379, 34 L. R. A. 378.

In an action against R. and K., R. put in an answer and K. made default. Judgment was rendered making R. first liable, and K. after him. R. appealed, not serving any notice of appeal on K., and the judgment as to R. was reversed and he released from liability. After the judgment of reversal, plaintiff issued execution against K. In a motion by K. to set aside the execution on the ground that he was by the original judgment not liable until after R., and was not bound by the appeal, not being made a party thereto, it was held that K., not having put in an answer, was not a party to the question of R.'s prior liability, and could not litigate it, and was not a "party aggrieved" under Code, § 325, or an "adverse party" within section 327, and hence could not appeal, and was not a necessary party to an appeal on the issue between R. and the plaintiff. Garnsey v. Knights (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 259, 263.

Where the liability of a defendant on a judgment is joint, the fact that it is also several does not give him the right to appeal therefrom, although the right of appeal is given to the "person aggrieved." Bassett v. Loewenstein (R. I.) 48 Atl. 934.

An "aggrieved person," within the meaning of a constitutional provision for appeal, cannot be considered to include a stranger to partition proceedings before the orphans' court having no right that will be affected by a partition, and claiming the land by title paramount to that of the parties to such proceedings. Raleigh v. Rogers, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 C. E. Green) 506, 507.

"Person aggrieved," within Code, § 1296, authorizing an appeal from a judgment or order by the person aggrieved, means a person who is a party to, or entitled to be made a party to, the proceeding, and will be affected by the judgment or order. "In order that a person can be said to be aggrieved, within the meaning of the section, by an adjudication, it must have binding force against his rights, his person, or his property. But before one not a party can claim the right to appeal, he must not only be aggrieved, but he must be entitled to be substituted; and hence a receiver who was no party to an action, and was in no way bound or affected by the order, and was not entitled to be substituted in the place of the defendant, was not a person aggrieved nor entitled to appeal. Ross v. Wigg, 3 N. E. 180, 181, 100 N. Y. 243, 246.

A "party aggrieved," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1257, providing that in a proceeding to redeem land for public purposes a "party aggrieved" may appeal from a final judgment, means either a party to the action or one prejudiced by the judgment; and hence a person permitted to intervene in a condemnation proceeding, but whose complaint is afterwards dismissed, and the order permitting such intervention revoked, is not aggrieved within the meaning of the Code. People v. Pfeiffer, 59 Cal. 89, 91.

Administrator or executor.

"Aggrieved," as used in the statute giving a right of appeal to a party aggrieved, includes an executor of a deceased plaintiff after such executor has caused himself to be made a party to the record for the purposes of appeal. Beach v. Gregory (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. 203, 210.

The term, as so used, "does not necessarily in all cases mean a party who has a direct pecuniary interest in the question," and hence executors having no direct interest in a bequest may appeal from a judgment refusing to revoke such bequest. Bryant v. Thompson, 14 N. Y. Supp. 386, 387, 59 Hun, 627.

An executor whose application for the probate of a codicil is refused is an aggrieved party under such statute. A distinction is to be observed between directing an executor as to the precise manner in which he shall act and in denying him the right to act at all. In the latter case he becomes a "party aggrieved," because he is charged with the duty of probating the instrument by virtue of which he receives his office; and thus he is entitled to appeal from a decree which ousts him from the exercise of such functions, and which denies to the beneficiaries whom he represents the right to receive the property as set forth in the will or codicil. This principle was fully recognized in the authority, relied upon, of Bryant v. Thompson, 28 N. E. 522, 525, 128 N. Y. 426, 13 L. R. A. 745, wherein the court defined a "party aggrieved" as one "having an actual and practical, as distinguished from a mere theoretical, interest in the controversy," and said: "The case of People v. Jones, 110 N. Y. 509, 18 N. E. 432, is not contrary to these views. In that case the Commissioners of the Land Office, representing the state, made a grant of land under water to an individual. Subsequently the determination of the Commissioners * * * was reversed by the Supreme Court on certiorari, and the commissioners appealed to this court, where a motion to dismiss was denied. The order appealed from in that case in effect nullified the grant made by the state, and the Commissioners, as public officers representing the state, were in duty bound to defend the grant against the effect of an erroneous decision, and so were aggrieved." And in Bliss v. Fogg, 27 N. Y. Supp. 1053, 76 Hun, 508, it was held (headnote) that: "Where a judgment is rendered for defendants in an action by executors to compel a transfer to them of certain property, the executors are parties 'aggrieved,' within Code Civ. Proc. § 1294." In considering similar language in Green v. Blackwell, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 768, 772, where the statute there gave an appeal to "any person aggrieved," the court said: "Whoever stands in a cause as the legal representative of interests which may be injuriously affected by the decree made is, within the meaning of these laws, aggrieved, and therefore may appeal." In re Stapleton's Will, 75 N. Y. Supp. 657, 658, 71 App. Div. 1.

The term "aggrieved party," as used in a like statute, does not mean every one who is dissatisfied with a decree, but a "party aggrieved" is one whose pecuniary interest is directly affected by the decree, one whose right of property may be established or divested by the decree. An administrator de bonis non is a "party aggrieved," and may appeal from a decree allowing the account of his predecessor in the trust, since, as the balance in the hands of the former administrator is to be paid into the hands of the administrator de bonis non, and constitutes assets, such an administrator has a direct interest in increasing such balance. So, if the balance is in favor of the former administrator, and there is real estate liable to be sold on license by the administrator de bonis non to pay such balance, he has a direct interest, as trustee for the legatees, to diminish such balance; in other words, he becomes the sole representative of the estate, the trustee for all persons having an interest in it, and as such it is his province to see that the account is settled correctly. He is "aggrieved" in his property if there be any failure to account for all that is due to the estate. Wiggin v. Swett, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 194, 197, 39 Am. Dec. 716.

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 1296, giving the right of appeal to a party aggrieved by an order, except where the judgment or order was rendered or made upon his default, the words, "party aggrieved" embrace the representatives of a deceased party, so that an administratrix has a right of appeal from a judgment against the decedent. Campbell v. Gallagher, 9 N. Y. Supp. 432, 433, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 90.

Adverse party synonymous.

See "Adverse Party."

Sureties.

"Aggrieved," as used in a statute providing that parties "aggrieved" are entitled to appeal, etc., includes the sureties on an assignee's bond in an action on the bond, and hence they have the right to appeal for a finding as to the amount unaccounted for that came into the assignee's hands and which he was ordered to pay over. Moulding v. Wilhartz, 48 N. E. 189, 190, 169 Ill. 422.

Gen. St. c. 117, § 8, giving the right of appeal to "any person aggrieved" by an order, sentence, decree, or denial by the probate court or judge, includes a wider range of persons than those entitled to an appeal in other courts, in which it is provided that any "party" aggrieved may appeal, as in suits at law in the other courts there are well-defined parties whose names appear as litigants on the record, which is not so in cases in the probate court, and hence sureties on a guardian's bond may appeal from an order of the probate court charging the administratrix of the guardian who has died insolvent. Farrar v. Parker, 85 Mass. (3 Allen) 556, 557.

Under Rev. St. 1874, c. 3, § 123, relating to appeals, and providing that any person considering himself aggrieved by any judgment of the county court may appeal to the circuit court, and from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, it is not necessary that the person aggrieved should be a party of record to the litigation in which the judgment may be rendered. Where a guardian dies, having in his hands funds belonging to his ward, his surety on the guardian's bond, though not a party to the record, has a right to appeal from an order of the county court transferring a claim other than the ward's, allowed as of the seventh class, against the estate of the deceased, and ordering the administrator to pay it as of the sixth class. Weer v. Gand, 88 Ill. 490, 492.

Appointment of receiver.

The "party aggrieved," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1804, § 1245 (Rev. St. 1881, § 1231), giving such persons the right to appeal, is one whose legal right is infringed by the decree complained of, and whose legal interest may be changed by the result of the appeal. Where a complaint charges a defendant stockholder and officer of the defendant corporation with appropriating its money to his own use, and asks an accounting by him, such stockholder may not appeal from the appointment of a receiver for the corporation, as he is not a party within the statute. McFarland v. Pierce, 45 N. E. 706, 707, 151 Ind. 546.

Decision of school committee.

"Aggrieved," as used in a statute giving any "party aggrieved" the right to appeal from any decision or doings of any school committee, district meeting, or trustees, should be construed to include a property holder in the district whose convenience in sending to school and the value of his property therein may be seriously affected by the distance of the location of a schoolhouse from his dwelling. Appeal of Cottrell, 10 R. I. 615, 616.

Decree or order in probate.

The term "aggrieved," as used in the statute relating to appeals from probate by a party aggrieved, applies only to those who can show a direct pecuniary interest in the matter in controversy. Appeal of Beard, 30 Atl. 775, 64 Conn. 526. Only those who have rights which may be enforced at law and whose pecuniary interests might be established in whole or in part by the decree. Moore v. Phillips, 47 Atl. 913, 914, 94 Me. 421. One whose pecuniary interest is directly affected by the decree, or whose right of property may be established or divested by it. Swackhamer v. Kline's Adm'r, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 C. E. Green) 503, 505; Dietz v. Dietz, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 483, 485.

"Aggrieved person," as used in a like statute, is held not to mean a mere possibility of some unknown and future contingency by which one may be affected, but there must be some present interest, as where a legatee's legacy is directed to be paid and there is a surplus for distribution beyond what is necessary to meet it, and there is no reason to suppose there can be any contingent claims which will reduce the assets so as to affect his legacy, he may not interfere with the distribution by an appeal. Labar v. Nichols, 23 Mich. 310, 311.

A person entitled to a share in a fund, either under the testator's will or under the statute of distribution, can appeal from a decree allowing the final account of an administratrix. "It is settled that the right is not confined to those who would be legal parties to the suit under proceedings at common law or in equity, but extends to others whose pecuniary interests are affected." Pierce v. Gould, 9 N. E. 568, 569, 143 Mass. 234.

Where two wills were offered for probate, one by testator's brother, and the other by his widow, and both parties applied for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, and the orphans' court thereupon appointed a person not interested in the estate or related to either party, and required the appointee to give a proper bond, the decedent's brother was not an aggrieved party and not entitled to an appeal. Dietz v. Dietz, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 483, 485.

"Person aggrieved," as used in the Vermont statute providing that any "person aggrieved" at or dissatisfied with any order, sentence, or decree of a court of probate appointing an administrator may within a certain time thereafter appeal therefrom to the next session of the Supreme Court, does not mean that any person who felt dissatisfied, without having any interest whatever in the estate, might subject an administrator to the expense and trouble of establishing his claim to the administration of that estate, or that the estate should be subject to that expense to gratify an individual in no way connected with the estate, the "person aggrieved" must be some one having an interest in the estate, or in some way connected with it. Woodward v. Spear, 10 Vt. 420, 423.

"Aggrieved," as used in Rev. St. c. 117, § 24, providing that any person aggrieved by a sale of lands by an administrator by order of the probate court is entitled to prosecute an appeal, includes any person who has acquired an interest in the land in controversy; and hence a person who claimed land, though a grantor who had purchased it at an administrator's sale, was aggrieved by an order vacating the administrator's sale, and entitled to prosecute an appeal. Betts v. Shotton, 27 Wis. 667, 670.

Within Gen. St. 1878, c. 49, § 14, providing that an appeal from an order appointing an administrator can only be taken by a party aggrieved, the term "party aggrieved" refers to one who, as heir, devisee, legatee, or creditor, has what may be called a legal interest in the assets of the estate and their due administration. A mere debtor of decedent's estate may have a personal preference as to who shall be appointed administrator, but in law that is a question in which he has no interest, and therefore its determination in one way or another cannot aggrieve him in any legal sense. In re Hardy, 28 N. W. 219, 35 Minn. 193.

The term "party," as used in Code, art. 5, § 58, authorizing an appeal from a judgment of the orphans' court by the party deeming himself aggrieved thereby, is not used in a technical sense, necessarily importing a litigant before the court, in the proceedings in which the decree or order passed, at the time of or antecedently to its passage, but may also mean one in whose interest the decree or order has a direct tendency to operate injuriously, and who, after its passage, may appear in the court and claim the privilege of appeal. Stevenson v. Schriver (Md.) 9 Gill & J. 324, 335. A legatee interested in sustaining the validity of a will may, under this section, appeal from a judgment revoking its probate, though he is not a party to the record. Meyer v. Henderson, 41 Atl. 1073, 1075, 88 Md. 585.

The right of an administrator with will annexed, and of an heir of a beneficiary under the decedent's will, to appeal from a decree granting a distribution of the estate, will not be determined on a motion to dismiss the appeals, based on the theory that they are not aggrieved by the decree, they being parties aggrieved within Code Civ. Proc. § 1721, granting the right of appeal to parties aggrieved. In re Davis' Estate, 70 Pac. 721, 722, 27 Mont. 235.

Discharge of prisoner.

A prisoner is not legally "aggrieved" by an order that he be discharged and go without day; he, therefore, cannot appeal therefrom. Commonwealth v. Graves, 112 Mass. 282, 283.

Equalization of taxable values.

As used in Mansf. Dig. § 568, creating a board for the equalization of taxable values in each county, and providing that any "party" aggrieved by any action of the board may appeal therefrom to the county court, does not mean a party, in its technical legal sense, to a suit, but in its popular signification of "person"; giving any person aggrieved by any action of the board a right to appeal. Prairie County v. Matthews, 46 Ark. 383, 386.

Establishment or change of highway.

"Aggrieved," as used in Gen. St. 1878, giving any person who shall feel himself aggrieved a right to appeal from an order of the town supervisors laying out, altering, or discontinuing a road, means any person who is in a position to be injuriously affected by the determination appealed from, and who would sustain a special injury, disadvantage, or inconvenience not common to himself with the other inhabitants or property owners similarly situated. Schuster v. Town of Lemond, 6 N. W. 802, 27 Minn. 253.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, giving any "aggrieved party" a right to appeal from any final judgment, does not include the city in proceedings in which a judgment is rendered refusing to confirm a report fixing the amount of damages awarded for a change in the street grade. In re City of Yonkers, 75 N. Y. Supp. 923, 71 App. Div. 534.

Grant of liquor license.

The term "aggrieved," as used in Pub. Acts 1893, c. 175, giving a right of appeal from the decision of the county commissioners granting a liquor license to any taxpayer who shall be "aggrieved," means any resident taxpayer who feels aggrieved at the granting of a license, and he need not have any grievance or interest in the matter peculiar to himself, either in his own motion for an appeal before the county commissioners, or by reasons of appeal in the superior court. Appeal of Beard, 30 Atl. 775, 64 Conn. 526.

"Aggrieved," as used in 9 Geo. IV, c. 61, § 27, authorizing an appeal by any person thinking himself aggrieved by any act of any justice in relation to the granting of licenses to innkeepers, means a person immediately aggrieved, as by refusal of a license to himself, and not one who is only consequently aggrieved; and therefore a licensee cannot appeal upon the act of the magistrate in granting a license to open a public house a short distance from the house of the licensee. King v. Justices of Middlesex, 3 Barn. & Adol. 938.

Improvement assessment.

"Aggrieved," as used in Improvement Act, 9 Geo. IV, c. 26, relating to assessments for certain improvements, and giving the right of appeal to any person aggrieved, is to be construed as meaning any person who had legal ground for saying he was aggrieved, and did not mean to confer the right on any person who merely fancied or said he was aggrieved. Harrup v. Bayley, 6 El. & Bl. 218, 223.

"Aggrieved," as used in Laws 1858, p. 574, c. 338, providing that the party aggrieved in proceedings relative to any assessment for local improvement in the city of New York may apply to vacate the same, should be construed to mean a mortgagee of the property who has foreclosed his mortgage and purchased the property for a sum less than the assessments and less than the mortgaged debt, for "a person aggrieved by an act or a motion is one injured thereby. Doubtless the injury sustained must not be a remote and consequential result, but a direct one. The owner of the land affected by the assessment is directly injured thereby, for his property is rendered so much the less valuable to him; it is worth so much the less in the market, so much as the assessment has taken from his other means to relieve his land from the assessment, or the land itself is sold or leased by virtue of the lien." In re Walter, 75 N. Y. 354, 357.

Prima facie, and in the absence of modifying facts, it is the owner of land who is aggrieved by the imposition of an unlawful assessment. Consequently one who purchased land after the confirmation thereon of an assessment for a local improvement, and who took, by the terms of his deed, "subject to any and all assessments," is a party aggrieved within the meaning of the act of 1858, entitling the "party aggrieved" to move to vacate the assessment. His ownership established, the illegality of the assessment imposed made out his case; if in fact he had been indemnified, or assumed and agreed to pay the assessment, or deducted the amount from the purchase price, those are facts for the city to show, not for the courts to presume. In re Gantz, 85 N. Y. 536, 538.

Inquisition of lunacy.

A wife, the validity of whose marriage is affected by an inquisition in lunacy, is a "person aggrieved" within Act May 8, 1874, giving such person a right to traverse the finding. Commonwealth v. Pitcairn, 54 Atl. 328, 329, 204 Pa. 514.

Partition sale.

A party interested in a sale under partition is quite as much "aggrieved," within the rule granting a right of appeal to a "party aggrieved," when the sale is refused confirmation as when it is confirmed, and a purchaser in partition sale which has been confirmed in part and denied confirmation in part is an aggrieved party. Dunn v. Dunn, 69 Pac. 847, 849, 137 Cal. 51.

AGIST.

"Agist" is defined by Webster as meaning "to take, to graze or pasture at a certain sum." Williams v. Miller, 9 Pac. 166, 168, 68 Cal. 290.

AGISTER.

An "agister" "is one who takes any horses or other animals to pasture at certain rates." Williams v. Miller (Cal.) 6 Pac. 14.

An "agister" is one who takes the cattle of another into his own ground to be fed for a consideration by the owner; he is not an insurer of the cattle, is only liable for ordinary neglect, and not liable for the keeping of the animals, unless it is expressly so agreed. Bass v. Pierce (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 595, 596.

AGISTMENT.

"Agistment," as defined by Webster, is "the taking and feeding other men's cattle in the King's forest, or on one's own land, at a certain rate." Williams v. Miller, 9 Pac. 166, 168, 68 Cal. 290.

"Agistment" is where a person takes in or feeds or depastures horses, cattle, or similar animals upon the land for reward. The cattle must be delivered into his possession so exclusively that he may maintain a trespass or trover against a wrongdoer for any injury to their possession, and is responsible only for ordinary negligence. Auld v. Travis, 39 Pac. 357, 358, 5 Colo. App. 535.

AGITATOR.

See "Seditious Agitator."

AGONY.

"Agony" is defined as violent pain of body or distress of mind connected with or arising from the physical injury, so that evidence of condition of mind is admissible under an allegation that plaintiff suffered great pain and agony. City of Chicago v. McLean, 133 Ill. 148, 153, 24 N. E. 527, 528, 8 L. R. A. 765.

AGREE.

Mutually agree, see "Mutually"; "It is hereby Agreed."

"Agree," as used in Acts 1890, c. 538, § 152, providing that the board of supervisors should appoint two ballot clerks for each election district, each one of the supervisors having a vote upon the proposed selection or nomination of an election clerk, and if in any instance, in consequence of such vote, the board could not "agree" upon such appointment, the names of three persons who are eligible should be submitted for selection for election clerks by the supervisor or supervisors belonging to the leading political party entitled to be represented by such election clerk, means a concurrence or agreement of each supervisor, and does not mean that a mere majority should have the power to appoint without regard to the minority supervisor. Sudler v. Lankford, 33 Atl. 455, 456, 82 Md. 142.

Assume synonymous.

See "Assume."

Consideration imported.

Agree, as used in a writing signed by the person to be charged thereby, and stating that "I hereby agree to pay the rent of a certain house," construed not to show an agreement stating a consideration, as required in 2 Rev. St. p. 135, providing that every agreement to be performed in one year, or any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, shall be void unless the agreement, or some memorandum thereof, expressing a consideration, shall be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith. Newcomb v. Clark, 1 Denio, 226, 228.

Contract synonymous.

"Agreed," as used in a bill averring that the defendant agreed that his daughter was to have certain slaves at her majority, has a technical meaning, and is synonymous with contracted, and hence evidence that the defendant gave the slaves to his daughter did not support the allegation. McKisick v. McKisick, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 427, 433.

Covenant synonymous.

"Agreed" in a deed will make a covenant, and, though in the connection it is applicable to both parties, it may refer to the party upon whom the doing or not doing the thing agreed upon devolves. If a lessee for years covenants to repair, etc., provided always, and it is "agreed" that the lessor shall find great timber, this is a covenant on the part of the lessor to find the timber, and not merely a qualification of the lessee's covenant. And where it is agreed that the time to perform a contract shall not be less than four years from a certain date, it is a covenant to complete the contract within less than four years, or, in other words, that the party shall be allowed four years for the completion of the contract. Randel v. Chesapeake & D. Canal (Del.) 1 Har. 151, 172.

Fund synonymous.

"Agree," when employed with reference to the verdict of a jury in a criminal case, means the same thing as "find." Both signify that the jury upon consideration of the evidence have determined that the accused is guilty or not guilty of the crime charged. The word "agree" is almost invariably used when the jury are addressed on the subject of their verdict. Mr. Chitty says "that when the jury have come to a unanimous decision with respect to their verdict, and return to the box to deliver it, the clerk then calls them over by their names, and asks them whether they have agreed on their verdict; and it certainly cannot be a bad answer if they reply that they have agreed, and state what that agreement is. Benedict v. State, 14 Wis. 423, 428.

Grant synonymous.

"Agree," as used in a deed providing that the "grantors agree that no building shall be erected on the lot next east of the granted premises, nearer than four feet from the west line," means the same as the word "grant," and therefore where such clause is inserted after the description, and before the habendum clause, an easement attached to the land conveyed. Hogan v. Barry, 10 N. E. 253, 254, 143 Mass. 538.

Offer synonymous.

"Agree," when employed unilaterally, is equivalent to the word "offer," so that the assent of the other party is necessary in order to make a contract. Marshall v. Old, 59 Pac. 217, 218, 14 Colo. App. 32 (citing Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240).

"Agree" is sometimes used to signify an offer merely, but, properly speaking, it imports concurrence or assent. As used in a memorandum whereby one agrees to sell certain land, and acknowledges the receipt of certain money on account of the sale, the contract is complete, and only remains to be carried into effect. Thornton v. Kelly, 11 R. I. 498, 499.

"Agree," as used in a letter stating that I hereby "agree" to purchase certain bonds, subject to approval by some lawyer, will be held to have been used in the sense of "offer," which might be withdrawn any time before acceptance, and not as constituting a contract to purchase absolutely. Riner v. Husted's Estate, 58 Pac. 793, 794, 13 Colo. App. 523.

"Agree to sell," as used in a written contract for the sale of property, which states that the other party agrees to purchase the property, and specifies the time for the payment of the price, construed to import an agreement for a present sale, and not an offer to sell in the future. Martin v. Adams, 104 Mass. 262, 263.

Where carriers wrote to defendants: "We hereby agree to receive in this port either from yard or vessel, and transport, * * * not exceeding six thousand tons gross in and during the months of * * *, upon the terms and for the price hereinafter specified," referring to railroad iron, and the plaintiff answered, "I assent to your agreement, and will be bound by its terms," it was manifest that the word "agree" in the letter was used as synonymous with the word "offer"; the letter being a mere proposition to transport for plaintiff any quantity of iron on the terms specified, not exceeding 6,000 tons. Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240, 242.

Mutuality imported.

"Agreed," as used in a contract, of itself imports mutuality. Greene v. Creighton, 7 R. I. 1, 8.

"Agreed" means the concurrence of both parties. Wells v. New York Cent. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 181, 183; Thornton v. Kelly, 11 R. I. 498, 499.

"Agree," as used in a contract wherein one party agrees to pay the expenses of a specified improvement, is to be deemed the word of both, and implies an undertaking by the other party to make the improvement. Baldwin v. Humphrey, 44 N. Y. 609, 615.

"Agree," as used in a contract, means an agreement by both parties, and when used in a contract for services imports that the employer agreed to employ the servant in consideration that the servant would serve the master. Payne v. New South Wales Coal & Intercolonial Steam Nav. Co., 10 Hurl. & G. 283, 291.

Where, in a written contract signed by two, it is said that it is agreed that one shall furnish the other with certain property at a specified price, it embraces a promise by the latter to accept and pay for it. "Agreed" is to be deemed the words of both parties. Barton v. McLean (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 256, 258.

Promise synonymous

"Agreed," as used in a declaration formed under the common counts in assumpsit, is equivalent to the word "promised." Corbett v. Packington, 6 Barn. & C. 268, 273.

"Agreed," as used in a count alleging that defendant, in consideration of certain things done by plaintiff, agreed and undertook to effect an insurance on plaintiff's house, amounts to a promise. It is not necessary that the word "promise" should be used, the word "agreed" being equivalent to it. Bodley v. Roop (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 158, 159.

The word "agreed" in a declaration in assumpsit is equivalent to the word "promised." Pierson v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (Del.) 31 Atl. 966, 974, 7 Houst. 307.

"Agreed," as used in a complaint alleging that a party "agreed" to do a certain thing, must be taken as synonymous with "promised" or "undertook," signifying that he agreed in a valid and legal manner, so that if under the circumstances an oral promise could not constitute an enforceable agreement the effect of the allegation is to plead a written promise, since otherwise the defendant would not have "agreed" for the purpose of the complaint. Jenkinson v. City of Vermillion, 52 N. W. 1066, 3 S. D. 238.

One meaning of the word is to "promise," and the two words are given as synonymous by Cent. Dict.; and an affidavit stating that certain parties agreed that certain claims, on the happening of a contingency, should, at the option of the holder of them, become due and payable, does not characterize the language which follows as the legal conclusions of the affiant instead of the purport of the writing to which it refers, and its use does not show that the affiant was stating the legal conclusions drawn by him from the alleged contract. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Columbia Spinning Co., 47 N. Y. Supp. 442, 444, 21 App. Div. 383.

A declaration in an action of assumpsit for hogs sold averred that after making the contract it was "agreed" between the parties that the delivery should be extended to a certain day. Held, that the use of the word "agreed" in such count did not make the declaration one in "debt," since the count may show notwithstanding that the defendant "undertook and promised" to accept and pay for the hogs. North v. Kizer, 72 Ill. 172, 175.

The word "promise" means an acknowledgment without regard to an expressed consideration or corresponding duty of the other party, while the word "agreement" has been held to import a reciprocity of obligation. Campbell v. Findley, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 330, 332.

AGREE TO LET.

"Agree to let," as used in a lease, means the same as the word "let," and operates as a present demise, unless there is something in the instrument showing that a present demise could not have been in the contemplation of the parties. Phillip v. Benjamin, 9 Adol. El. 644, 650; Kabley v. Worcester Gaslight Co., 102 Mass. 392, 394.

The words "agreed to let" were effectual in creating a present demise, and the new term began from the date of the execution of the instrument, though the tenant's former term had not yet expired. Chapman v. Bluck, 4 Bing. N. C. 187, 192; Western Boot & Shoe Co. v. Gannon, 50 Mo. App. 642, 646.

"Agree to let," as used in an instrument which contained no mention of any length of term except that in the stipulation "to make a lease," where no agreement for entry before the lease is made, or that the proposed tenant shall commence his occupation before the landlord shall have made certain repairs, is an executory contract for a lease to be begun hereafter, and not as a present demise. McGrath v. City of Boston, 103 Mass. 369, 371.

AGREE TO PAY.

The words "agree to pay," in a deed of land subject to mortgage, which contains a covenant against incumbrances except mortgages, which mortgages the said second party accept and agree to pay, do not show an assumption of the mortgages by the grantee in the absence of other evidence explaining the language. Hopper v. Calhoun, 35 Pac. 816, 817, 52 Kan. 703, 39 Am. St. Rep. 363.

The words "agrees to pay," in a deed which recites that the grantee expressly agrees to pay a certain mortgage on the land, renders the grantee personally liable for the mortgage debt. Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 93, 54 Am. Rep. 209; Davis v. Hulett, 4 Atl. 139, 58 Vt. 90; Saunders v. McClintock, 46 Mo. App. 216, 223; Lappen v. Gill, 12 Mass. 349, 350.

AGREEABLY TO LAW.

"Agreeably to law," as used in Act April 8, 1858, § 693, providing that a person, to be eligible to election or appointment to office in the military forces of the state, must be a resident of the proper military district, city or village, "agreeably to law," implies the existence of other legal provisions on the subject, and refers the question of eligibility entirely to such other provisions. People v. Smith, 23 N. Y. 53, 59.

AGREEABLY TO THE USUAL MODE OF PROCESS.

By the use of the phrase "agreeably to the usual mode of process," in the thirty-third section of the judiciary act, providing that the procedure in respect to preliminary proceedings against persons accused of a violation of the criminal enactments of Congress shall be "agreeably to the usual mode" of process against offenders in the state in which the offenders may be arrested and the proceedings had, it has been said by Mr. Justice Curtis in United States v. Rundlett (U.S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 915, to have been the intention of Congress to assimilate all proceedings for holding accused persons to answer before a court of the United States to proceedings had for similar purposes by the laws of the state where the proceedings should take place, and as a necessary consequence that the commissioners have power to order a recognizance to be given to appear before them in those states where justices of the peace or other examining magistrates, acting under the laws of the state, have such power. United States v. Horton (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 375, 376.

The term must be construed so as to include all the regulations and steps incident to the proceeding before the officer from its commencement to its termination, as prescribed by the state laws, so far as they may be applicable to the federal courts, so that the authority of a commissioner to take bail for the appearance of an accused person depends on the laws of the state. United States v. Sauer (U. S.) 73 Fed. 671, 674.

AGREED CASE.

"Agreed case," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1894, § 562, providing that parties may submit any matter of controversy between them to any court on an agreed statement of facts, to be made out and signed by the parties, accompanied by an affidavit that the controversy is real and the proceeding in good faith, does not apply to a case where the parties agree to the facts, reduce them to writing, and submit the case to the court. Reddick v. Board of Com'rs of Pulaski County, 41 N. E. 834, 14 Ind. App. 598.

AGREED DISMISSAL.

See "Dismissal Agreed."

AGREED ORDER.

The only difference between an "agreed order" and one which is made in the due course of the proceedings in an action is that in the one case it is agreed to, and in the other it is made as authorized by law. A receiver who acts under an agreed order is acting as an officer of the court, as much as he would be in acting under an order made without agreement in the due course of proceedings in the case, and his sureties on the official bond which he gives are as much bound in the one case as in the other, because he is acting under an order of the court. H. B. Claflin Co. v. Gibson (Ky.) 51 S. W. 439, 440.

AGREED STATEMENT.

An agreement of counsel annexed to the case, filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, to the effect that the foregoing shall constitute the case for hearing on appeal before the Supreme Court, construed as an agreed statement of the case, as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 345, subd. 5, which provides that an "agreed statement" or case on appeal, prepared by counsel for the respective parties, shall dispense with the necessity of a return or any other paper from the circuit court. McNair v. Craig, 12 S. E. 367, 34 S. C. 9.

An "agreed statement of facts" may be the equivalent of a special verdict or a finding of facts upon which a reviewing court may declare the applicable law for such agreed statement, as of the ultimate facts. But if it is merely a recital of testimony or evidential fact it brings nothing before an appellate court for consideration. United States Trust Co. v. New Mexico, 22 Sup. Ct. 172, 174, 183 U. S. 535, 46 L. Ed. 315.

AGREED TO.

An indorsement on a judgment of "agreed to" is insufficient to show that it was rendered by consent, or that the words were intended to mean anything more than that the draft of the judgment prepared to be handed to the judge was agreed to, as properly expressing the judgment to be ordered by the court. San Francisco Sav. Union v. Myers, 18 Pac. 686, 76 Cal. 624.

A father and sons executed an agreement whereby the father "agreed to give" his sons his plantation to farm, etc., and in consideration the sons agreed to bind themselves to keep the father and his wife in everything they need for their comfort, etc., during their lives, and pay the father's debts. Held, that the phrase "agreed to give" did not indicate an intention that the agreement should operate as a present transfer of the land, but that it was merely a contract to allow the sons to farm the land and maintain the parents, being compensated by what they could make. Shirley v. Shirley, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 267, 272, 273.

AGREED UPON.

"Agreed upon," as used in the preliminary articles of the treaty of Paris, providing that the peace between the United States and England shall take effect from the time the terms of peace are agreed upon between Great Britain and France, should be construed to mean, "when the ministers have come to an understanding as to the terms of the treaty and have reduced them to writing." Hylton v. Brown (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 1129, 1132.

AGREEING.

"Agreeing to stay," as used in a declaration which alleged that, in consideration of plaintiff's "agreeing to stay" a certain action, defendant promised to pay a certain sum, was sufficient to admit proof that the consideration was a promise in consideration of the plaintiff's "having agreed" to stay the action. Tanner v. Moore, 9 Q. B. 1, 4.

AGREEMENT.

See "Collateral Agreement"; "Express Agreement"; "Implied Agreement"; "Positive Agreement"; "Reasonable Agreement."

Composition agreement, see "Composition."

An "agreement" concerning things personal is a mutual assent of the parties. Rohr v. Baker, 10 Pac. 627, 13 Or. 350 (citing Plowd. 5).

An agreement is the result of the mutual assent of two parties to certain terms. Jones v. Williams, 40 S. W. 353, 367, 139 Mo. 1, 37 L. R. A. 682, 61 Am. St. Rep. 436.

The term "agreement" signifies a mutual agreement on consideration between two or more parties. Arnold v. Scharbauer (U. S.) 116 Fed. 492, 497.

An agreement is the coming together in accord of two minds on a given proposition. Leonard v. Marshall (U. S.) 82 Fed. 396, 399.

"An agreement is an assent of two minds to the same thing." Richardson v. Clements, 89 Pa. 503, 505, 33 Am. Rep. 784.

An agreement means a completed contract. Durham v. Taylor, 29 Ga. 166, 176.

"An 'agreement,' as defined by Webster, is the union of two or more minds in a thing done or to be done; a coming or knitting together of minds. One of the definitions of the term given by Bouvier is a coming together of parties in opinion or determination; the union of two or more minds in a thing done or to be done; a mutual assent to do a thing. Another definition quoted by the last-named author is that it consists of two persons being of the same mind, intention, or meaning, concerning the matter." Woodworth v. State, 20 Tex. App. 375, 382.

"To constitute an agreement, the minds of both parties must meet. That means that one mind cannot make an agreement alone; that both must understand the agreement alike, and must assent to that agreement; or, to use the term the law uses in such case, the minds of the parties must meet upon the subject of the agreement." Bingham v. Insurance Co. of North America, 43 N. W. 494, 495, 74 Wis. 498.

"The word 'agreement' does not necessarily import any direct and express stipulation, nor is it necessary that it should be in writing. If there is a verbal understanding to which both parties have assented, and upon which both are acting, it is an agreement." Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 540, 571, 10 L. Ed. 579 (quoting Vattel, p. 192, §§ 152-154; Id. p. 218, §§ 206, 218).

"Agreement" embraces a mutual act of two parties, though in a popular sense it is frequently used as declaring the engagement of one only. A man may agree to pay money or to perform some other act, and the word is then used synonymously with "promised" or "engaged." Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, 131, 9 Am. Dec. 123.

"Agreement," as used in the charter of a fire insurance company, authorizing the execution of such contracts, bargains, agreements, policies, or other instruments as might be necessary, but requiring them to be in writing and under the seal of a corporation, and signed by the president and attested by the secretary or other officer appointed for that purpose, held not to include a preliminary parol contract for insurance which is to be consummated by the execution of a written policy, and hence such oral contract is valid. Franklin Ins. Co. v. Colt, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 560, 566, 22 L. Ed. 423.

An "agreement" is an act done, and thereby differs from a simple declaration. It is provable in like manner as a payment of money or property would be. Holcomb v. Campbell, 27 N. Y. St. Rep. 848, 850 (citing Smith v. Schanck, 18 Barb. 344, 346).

"Agreement," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, p. 603, § 18, providing that an action upon any agreement, contract, or promise in writing must be brought within five years, does not include an action for the recovery of taxes illegally collected. Richards v. Wyandotte County Com'rs, 28 Kan. 326, 334.

Contract synonymous.

"Agreement," as used in the statute of frauds providing that no suit shall be brought on any contract or "agreement" whereby to charge the defendant on any special promise unless in writing, is synonymous with "contract." Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn. 81, 84.

An agreement of appraisal is a contract. An appraiser who makes his award under such an agreement is presumed to have acted in accordance with the law and the terms of the contract. Barnard v. Lancashire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 101 Fed. 36, 37, 41 C. C. A. 170.

"Agreement," as used in Act Feb. 26, 1885, 23 Stat. 332 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], making it unlawful to prepay the transportation of an alien when he is known to be under contract or agreement to perform labor or service in the United States, means a contract or agreement which lacks none of the elements of a valid agreement, and is an enforceable contract, either express or implied. United States v. Edgar (U. S.) 45 Fed. 44, 46.

Deed or will.

The term "agreement" includes deeds and wills as well as contracts between parties. Daw v. Niles, 37 Pac. 876, 877, 104 Cal. 103.

Within a statute providing that the terms of an agreement which have been reduced to writing are considered as containing the whole contract, and that no evidence can be introduced to change its terms except in certain cases, the term "agreement" includes deeds and wills as well as contracts between the parties. Bogk v. Gassert, 13 Sup. Ct. 738, 740, 149 U. S. 17, 37 L. Ed. 631.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 3136, the term "agreement" includes deeds and wills as well as contracts between parties relating to the introduction of parol evidence to various terms of any written agreement. Riddell v. Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Co., 69 Pac. 241, 242, 27 Mont. 44.

"Agreement," as used in Civ. Code, § 696, providing that parol evidence of the circumstances under which an "agreement" was made is admissible to explain any ambiguity or to establish illegality or fraud, includes deeds and wills as well as contracts between the parties. Hicklin v. Le Clear, 22 Pac. 1057, 1060, 18 Or. 126.

The term "agreement," as used in the provision that an agreement reduced to writing is deemed the whole, includes deeds and wills as well as contracts between parties. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1856.

Judgment.

"Agreement," as used in the statute of limitations defining the time in which an action on a specialty, or any agreement, contract, or promise in writing, must be brought, construed not to include a judgment. Kimball v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 280, 282.

Receipt.

A receipt, such as is usually given by express companies for goods delivered to them to be carried by express, is not an agreement within the meaning of the stamp act requiring a stamp of five cents. De Barre v. Livingston (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 511, 521.

Understanding synonymous.

"Agreement" and "understanding" are synonymous terms, at least to such an extent that where a special query was propounded to a jury as to the existence of an understanding, and they answer that there was no such agreement, the answer was responsive. Barkow v. Sanger, 3 N. W. 16, 21, 47 Wis. 500.

The term "agreement" is often defined as synonymous with "understanding," and either word, when used in a question relating to an understanding or agreement, cannot be said to call for a conclusion of the witness. Garrett v. Western Union Tel. Co., 58 N. W. 1064, 1065, 92 Iowa, 449.

Warrant or promise synonymous.

The term "agreement," in its usual popular signification, is synonymous only with "promise," and means no more than the union of two or more minds or a concurrence of views and intention. This concord or union of minds may be lawful or unlawful; with consideration or without; creating an obligation. Still, by the universal understanding, it is an "agreement," and it is not the less so because it is opposed to law, or even good morals. In short, everything done or committed by the compact of two minds is universally and familiarly called an "agreement" by every one who understands the use and meaning of language. Of this every person has intuitive evidence, and frequently employs the term in question to manifest that operation of minds denominated "mutual assent." Whether a consideration exists is a distinct idea, and enters not into the popular meaning of the term. The word "agreement" is used more frequently to denote a mutual assent of minds without legal consideration than it is to denote one's promise or undertaking. Like many other words, it is sometimes restricted or limited by the subject of its application. If the inquiry be made whether there exists an agreement which the law will enforce, the subject-matter limits the signification of the term "agreement," and gives it a new and peculiar meaning. The question does not regard the broad and comprehensive intendment of the term, nor its usual and popular meaning, but the object of inquiry is an agreement of a special nature, distinguished by a legal consideration, and enforceable in the court of justice. The mind, influenced by the popular and most familiar use of the term "agreement," considers the law as pointing to promises only; but if, from any source, it appear that the consideration was meant to be embraced, the peculiar and technical sense of the legal and sufficient contract is intended. The word "agreement," if there be nothing to limit its meaning, regards promises only, and not their consideration, and hence, to make an agreement valid within the statute of frauds, the consideration need not be expressed in writing. Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn. 81, 84.

"Agreement," as used in the statute of frauds, providing that no suit, in law or equity, shall be maintained upon any agreement to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless the agreement or a memorandum thereof shall be made in writing and signed by the person to be charged therewith, should be construed not to be used in its technical sense, as being synonymous with "contract" or "mutual obligation," but only to require a written promise which need not necessarily state the consideration therefor. It is equivalent to promise. Smith v. Ide, 3 Vt. 290, 299.

A party as a witness was asked if certain services performed by him as set out in his declaration were under any agreement, warrant, or promise with defendant or any one, and he answered that he did not make an agreement with any one. Held, that the word "agreement," as used in the answer, was intended to cover the three synonyms of "agreement," "warrant," or "promise," as used in the question. Stratford v. Ames, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 577, 579.

"Agreement," as used in Gen. St. p. 66, providing that no action shall be brought on any agreement not to be performed within one year unless the promise, contract, or agreement on which such action shall be brought is in writing, is synonymous with special promise or undertaking. Sheehy v. Adarene, 41 Vt. 541, 543, 98 Am. Dec. 623.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN STATES.

"Agreement," as used in the federal Constitution prohibiting a state from making any compact or agreement with another state or foreign power, means any compact or agreement tending to the formation of a combination increasing the political power in the states which may encroach upon or interfere with the supremacy of the United States. Stearns v. Minnesota, 21 Sup. Ct. 73, 82, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. Ed. 162. Agreements or compacts in their nature political, or such as may in any wise conflict with the powers which the states, by the adoption of the federal Constitution, delegated to the federal government. Union Branch R. Co. v. East Tennessee & G. R. Co., 14 Ga. 327, 339. All connection and communication between states and foreign powers. Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 540, 571, 10 L. Ed. 579 (citing Vattel, p. 192, §§ 152, 153, 154; Id., p. 218, § 206).

AGREEMENT FOR COMMON-LAW COMPOSITION.

An agreement by creditors, for the purpose of reopening a bank, to accept in payment of the amounts due from the bank certificates of deposit of the bank or its successor, payable in annual installments, is what is usually termed an "agreement for a common-law composition," and applies to all creditors; not a part, or even a majority, of them. Abel v. Allemania Bank, 82 N. W. 680, 681, 79 Minn. 419.

AGREEMENT FOR HIRE OF LABORER.

"Agreement for the hire of any laborer," as used in St. 55 Geo. III, c. 184, Schedule, pt. 1, tit. "Agreement," exempting any "agreement for the hire of any laborer" from stamp duty, construed to include an agreement of employment for the purpose of discharging the duty and doing the work of fireman and stokers on board a ship under the direction of engineers. Wilson v. De Zubueta, 14 Q. B. 405, 414.

AGREEMENT IN CONSIDERATION OF MARRIAGE.

The term "agreement made upon consideration of marriage" in the statute of frauds, requiring such agreements to be in writing, does not include a promise to marry made in consideration of a similar promise by the other party. Clark v. Pendleton, 20 Conn. 495, 508.

"Agreement," as used in statute of frauds providing that no action shall be brought to charge any person on an agreement made in consideration of marriage, or upon any agreement not to be performed within one year, unless such promise or agreement be in writing, means promises in consideration of marriage, agreements for other things made in consideration of marriage, and does not apply to the mutual promises constituting the contract to marry. Derby v. Phelps, 2 N. H. 515, 516.

"Agreement," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring agreement made in consideration of marriage to be in writing, is to be construed not to include an antenuptial agreement, by which the prospective husband and wife agree that if either dies the other will make no claim on the property of the one dying. Rainbolt v. East, 50 Ind. 538, 540, 26 Am. Rep. 40.

The phrase "agreement made in consideration of marriage," as used in the statute of frauds, does not embrace a case where an unmarried woman, being the owner of lands, agrees with a man that in consideration that he will marry her and make improvements on the land she will convey the same to him, inasmuch as the additional consideration of making improvements on the land does not change the character of the agreement. Henry v. Henry, 27 Ohio St. 121, 128.

AGREEMENT TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER.

As used in the statute of frauds, providing that no person shall be charged upon any promise to pay the debt of another unless the agreement is in writing, construed as requiring an agreement expressing a consideration as well as a promise. Wain v. Writers, 5 East, 10, 16; Sears v. Brink, 3 Johns. 210, 215, 3 Am. Dec. 475.

As used in St. 1788, c. 16, providing that no action shall be brought to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or misdoings of another person unless the "agreement" is in writing and signed by the person to be charged therewith, is to be construed in its popular meaning, as synonymous with "promise" or "engage," and not in a technical legal meaning, as synonymous with "contract," and hence the writing is not required to recite a consideration. Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, 132, 9 Am. Dec. 123.

AGREEMENT TO BE PERFORMED WITHIN A YEAR.

See "Perform."

AGREEMENT TO BUY.

An "agreement to buy" is a contract by which one engages to accept from another, and pay a price for the title to a certain thing. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1728. An agreement to buy is a contract by which one engages to accept from another and pay a price for the title to a certain thing. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3952; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1303. An "agreement to buy" is a contract by which one engages to accept from another, and pay a price for the title to a certain thing. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2322.

AGREEMENT TO SELL AND BUY.

An "agreement to sell and buy" is a contract by which one engages to transfer the title to a certain thing to another, who engages to accept the same from him and to pay the price therefor. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2323; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1729; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3953; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1304.

AGREEMENT TO SELL OR CONVEY.

Sale distinguished, see "Sale."

An "agreement to sell" is a contract by which one engages for a price to transfer to another the title to a certain thing. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2321; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3951; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1302; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1727.

There being a controversy concerning certain land, the plaintiff and P. entered into a written contract, reciting that he had given P. a power of attorney to prosecute the action to judgment, and had agreed to grant, bargain, and sell, and did thereby grant, bargain, and sell the land in controversy to P. and his heirs, but which provided that P. should prosecute the suit "by virtue of the power of attorney" from the plaintiff, and that if he should be successful he should pay the plaintiff a certain sum, and the plaintiff should convey the land to him in fee; otherwise P. was not to pay such sum or any part thereof. Held, that the instrument constituted an agreement to convey rather than a conveyance. Maus' Lessee v. Montgomery, 11 Serg. & R. 329, 331.

An "agreement to convey to R., his heirs or assigns," etc., is of an executory character, only binding the grantor to convey the interest described at a future day, and does not vest in the grantee immediately any right or title, nor put him in the constructive possession of the land, though the lands may not at the time have been in the actual possession and occupation of the grantor. Seltzinger v. Ridgway (Pa.) 4 Watts & S. 472, 487.

"There is a broad distinction between a license and a contract or agreement for the sale of land. A license is but an authority to do an act or series of acts on the lands of the licensor. It needs no consideration to support it, and transfers no interest in the land, and is from its nature revocable at the will of the licensor. A contract, on the other hand, requires a consideration to support it, and confers rights which may be enforced at law." Baltimore & H. R. Co. v. Algire, 63 Md. 319, 322.

A contract reciting that S. "hath agreed to sell and has sold to P.," and that P. "hath agreed to purchase and has purchased," the lease of certain property, and providing that the consideration for such lease was certain property for which P. was "to give good and sufficient deeds" on or before the 1st day of May next, at which time or before conveyance was "to be made by both parties of the property hereby agreed to be conveyed," was an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance. Jackson v. Moncrief (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 26, 29.

An agreement to sell land "is a contract to be performed in the future, which if fulfilled results in a sale of land. It is preliminary to the sale, and is not the sale. Purchase, rescission, or release may occur by which the contemplated sale never takes place. Ide v. Leiser, 24 Pac. 695, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17.

There is a difference between a sale of personal property and an "agreement to sell." Under an agreement to sell no title passes, but whenever parties have agreed upon the time of sale and the property sold is identified, and nothing remains but to deliver it, and if it appears from the evidence that the parties understood and intended the title to pass without actual delivery at the time of the sale then the title would pass without such delivery. Baker v. Guinn, 23 S. W. 604, 605, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 539.

A call as used in stock exchange is an "agreement to sell," whether it is referred to as an offer or an option or a call, and comes within the stamp act, requiring certain stamps to be fixed on all sales or agreements to sell. Treat v. White, 21 Sup. Ct. 611, 612, 181 U. S. 264, 45 L. Ed. 853.

Inasmuch as a sale is a contract or agreement, it is frequently spoken of as a "contract of sale" or an "agreement of sale"—two phrases which in the law mean no more and no less than the word sale. No amount of offering to sell will make a contract of sale, unless some one accepts the offer by agreeing to buy; so that a call or memorandum or writing executed for a valuable consideration, giving the bearer a right to call upon the subscriber for a certain share of stock therein, within a stated time and at a given price, is not a contract or agreement to sell. White v. Treat (U. S.) 100 Fed. 290, 291.

"Agreement" necessarily embraces two parties in a contract of sale—one to sell and one to buy—and when R. agrees to sell his farm to E. for a certain sum, and E. signs the agreement, there is a promise to purchase and pay for the farm the consideration expressed, as clearly implied as though it was expressed in words. It was not merely a promise by one party to the other, but it was an agreement made by both, and binds both by every principle of law and morality. Richards v. Edick (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 260, 263.

AGRI LIMITATI.

"Agri limitati" are lands whose boundaries are strictly limited by the lines of government surveys, so that when they border on streams or other waters they are not entitled to accretion or alluvion or to islands in the stream. Hardin v. Jordan, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 818, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. Ed. 428.

AGRICULTURE.

As business, see "Business."
Engaged in agriculture, see "Engage."

"Agriculture" is defined to be the art or science of cultivating the ground, especially in fields or large quantities, including the preparation of the soil, the planting of seeds, the raising and harvesting of crops, and the rearing, feeding, and managing of live stock. The variety of products of the earth, of agricultural implements, and of domestic animals invited and put on exhibition at agricultural fairs attests the comprehensiveness of the term "agriculture." It refers to the field or farm, with all its wants, appointments, and products, as horticulture refers to the garden, with its less important, though varied, product. Dillard v. Webb, 55 Ala. 468, 474.

"Agriculture," as defined by Webster, "is the art or science of cultivating the ground, including the preparation of the soil, the planting of seeds, the raising and harvesting of crops, and the rearing, feeding, and management of live stock." Binzel v. Grogan, 29 N. W. 895, 897, 67 Wis. 147.

"Agriculture," as used in Acts 1870-71, c. 71, § 3 (Thomp. & St. Code, § 2109a), exempting five head of sheep in the hands of the head of a family "engaged in agriculture," means "in its original sense, the cultivation of the ground for the purpose of procuring vegetables and fruits for the use of man and beast, or the act of preparing the soil, sowing and planting seeds, dressing the plants, and removing the crops. In this sense the word includes gardening or horticulture, and also the raising and feeding of cattle or stock; but in a more common and appropriate sense is used to signify that specie of cultivation which is intended to raise grain and other field crops for man and beast. It is equivalent to husbandry, and 'husbandry' Webster defines to be the business of a farmer, comprehending agriculture or tillage of the ground, the raising, managing, and fattening of cattle and other domestic animals, the management of the dairy, and whatever the land produces; but the word 'agriculture,' as used in these exemption laws, has its peculiar legal sense, and relates to the vocation." While "it is true that two or more vocations may be combined, we are not accustomed to think of an artist, merchant, or a banker, who, living within a great town or city, and following his vocation, chooses in addition to cultivate a little patch of earth in vegetables for his table, as an agriculturist, even in its most general sense. If he produce them on any extensive scale for market, or for man and beast, in the sense of husbandry, then he might be regarded as an agriculturist in the sense of the law. A butcher who bought five head of sheep, not to stock a farm, but to butcher on the next day for market, is not engaged in agriculture, in the sense of the exemption laws." Simons v. Lovell, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 510, 514.

"Agriculture," as used in Act Assem. April 22, 1846, § 8, exempting property "owned by any person actually engaged in the science of agriculture," means any person who "derives the support of himself and family, in whole or in part, from the tillage and cultivation of fields. He must cultivate something more than a garden, though it may be much less than a farm. If the area of cultivation can be called a field, it is agriculture as well in contemplation of law as in the etymology of the word; and if this condition be fulfilled, the uniting of any other business not inconsistent with the pursuit of agriculture does not take away the protection of the act. The keeping tavern and boarding house, and the working at his trade as a tailor in the intervals of the seasons for farming, did not divest "one of the benefits which the statute was intended to secure to him." One is engaged in agriculture during the winter, when he is obliged to suspend his labors in the field, as effectually as in the summer, while actually engaged in rearing or harvesting crops. Springer v. Lewis, 22 Pa. (10 Harris) 191, 193.

AGRICULTURAL ADVANCES.

"Agricultural advances," as used in a mortgage to secure agricultural advances, construed to include both money and supplies advanced. Smith v. Smith, 11 S. E. 761, 763, 33 S. C. 210.

AGRICULTURAL CROPS.

"Agricultural crops," as used in Pol. Code, § 3495, authorizing the entry of lands suitable for raising ordinary "agricultural crops," construed to include fruits, and hence that the statute authorizes the entry of lands only useful for the cultivation of fruits. Reeves v. Hyde, 19 Pac. 685, 686, 77 Cal. 397.

AGRICULTURAL LABORER.

"Agricultural laborer," as used in a statute giving agricultural laborers a lien on crops made by them, and as used in homestead acts exempting the products of such laborers from levy and sale, does not include an overseer. Barkman v. Duncan, 10 Ark. (5 Eng.) 465, 466; Isbell v. Dunlap, 17 S. C. 581, 583.

AGRICULTURAL LIEN.

In order to create a valid "agricultural lien" under Battle's Revisal, c. 65, § 19, relating to agricultural liens, it must appear (1) that the advances were in money or supplies; (2) they were made to the person engaged or about to engage in the cultivation of the soil; (3) they were made after the agreement is perfect; (4) they were made to be expended in the cultivation of the crop during that year; (5) the lien must be on the crop of that year made by reason of the advances so made. Clark v. Farrar, 74 N. C. 686, 690.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCT.

Beef cattle.

In ordinary usage, the term "agricultural products" is confined to the yield of the soil, as corn, wheat, rye, hay, etc., in its primary form. Thus Code, § 1605, providing that a municipal corporation shall not levy or assess a tax on any "agricultural products," does not exempt beef cattle. Davis v. City of Macon, 64 Ga. 123, 134, 37 Am. Rep. 60.

Dairy and poultry yard products.

"The common parlance of the country and the common practice of the country have been to consider all those things as farming products or agricultural products which have the situs of their production upon the farm, or which are brought into condition for the uses of society by the labor of those engaged in agricultural pursuits, in contradistinction from manufacturing or other pursuits. The product of the dairy and the product of the poultry yard, while it does not come directly out of the soil, is necessarily connected with the soil and those who are engaged in the culture of the soil." District of Columbia v. Oyster, 15 D. C. 285, 286, 54 Am. Rep. 275.

Flour.

The product of agriculture is that which is the direct result of husbandry and culture of the soil. It embraces the product in its natural unmanufactured condition, as cotton is a product of agriculture; yet cotton cloth or other fabrics made from cotton could hardly be termed "agricultural products." Flour, being the product of manufacture, is not strictly an "agricultural product," as used in the charter of corporation reciting that its purpose was for the conversion and disposal of "agricultural products" by means of mills, elevators, stores, or otherwise, though in one sense it may be said that flour is a product of agriculture. Getty v. C. R. Barnes Milling Co., 19 Pac. 617, 618, 40 Kan. 281.

AGRICULTURAL PROPERTY.

"Agricultural property," within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 683, providing a penalty for the willful and malicious injury or destruction of any growing fruit, corn, grain, or other agricultural product or property, does not include a buggy and harness, even though the buggy and harness, necessary for the use of the family, is exempt under the general exemption laws. Terry v. State, 8 S. W. 934, 25 Tex. Cr. App. 714.

AGRICULTURAL PURPOSE.

"Agricultural purposes," as used in Rev. St. § 2983, authorizing the selection of a homestead not exceeding forty acres used for "agricultural purposes," means the using of the soil for planting seeds and raising and harvesting the crops, the rearing, feeding, and management of live stock; and hence, where defendant kept and fed his horse on land claimed as a homestead, he used it for at least one agricultural purpose. Binzel v. Grogan, 67 Wis. 147, 150, 29 N. W. 895.

AGRICULTURAL PURSUITS.

The business of a vegetable dealer in the markets is not such an agricultural pursuit as exempts the dealer from a license, under Const. art. 206, exempting agricultural pursuits from license acts. State v. Cendo, 38 La. Ann. 828, 829.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

An agricultural society "is one seeking to bring together people engaged in agricultural pursuits, and in the manufacture of articles adapted to the use and cultivation of the soil, and to exhibit to those in attendance the crops resulting from the various methods of farming, and give to the people of the state engaged in agricultural pursuits an opportunity of discussing various methods of farming, farm implements used, different breeds of stock raised, and to educate the people in this way in the pursuits of agriculture, that the condition of the agriculturist may be improved by knowledge of the best methods of farming, best machinery, and best breeds of stock." Downing v. Indiana State Board of Agriculture, 28 N. E. 123, 126, 129 Ind. 443, 12 L. R. A. 664.

An agricultural society is not a quasi but an aggregate corporation, created by the union of certain individuals, their successors and assigns, and is continued by a succession of members united in one society, and, being the mere creature of the law, possesses only those qualities conferred by charter, either expressly or as incidental to its existence, and best calculated to effect the object of its creation. Brown v. South Kennebec Agricultural Soc., 47 Me. 275, 283, 74 Am. Dec. 484.

Under the Ohio statute, county agricultural societies are corporations for public purposes, with definite and limited powers. In the absence of statutory authority, they have no power to mortgage fair grounds to secure debts. Stewart v. Hardin County Agricultural Soc. Com'rs, 7 Am. Law Rec. 668.

"'Agricultural societies' are not corporations, in the ordinary sense of the term, but rather agencies of the state, created for the purpose of assisting in promoting the interests of agriculture." State v. Robinson, 53 N. W. 213, 214, 35 Neb. 401, 17 L. R. A. 383.

Though its objects are public, an agricultural society is essentially a private corporation. The fact that it was organized for pecuniary profit does not change its character. Thompson v. Lambert, 44 Iowa, 239.

An agricultural society is in no sense a corporation for pecuniary profit. It is an agency for the state. It exists for the sole purpose of promoting the public interest in the business of agriculture, and therefore is not liable for the illegal action of its agents, as in case of wrongful arrest and assault. Jordan v. Iowa State Agricultural Soc., 58 N. W. 1092, 1093, 91 Iowa, 97, 24 L. R. A. 655.

"Agricultural societies" organized under Act Feb. 28, 1846, are the result of voluntary association by the persons composing them, for purposes of their own. It is true their purpose may be public in the sense that their establishment may conduce to the public welfare, by promoting the agricultural and household manufacturing interests of the country; but, in the sense that they are designed for the accomplishment of some public good, all private corporations are for a public purpose, for the public benefit is both the consideration and the justification for the special privileges and franchises conferred. These agricultural societies are not only of the free choice of their constituent members, but they are also by their active procurement; for it is only when they organize themselves into a society, adopt the necessary constitution, and elect the proper officers that they become a body corporate. The state neither compels their incorporation nor controls their conduct afterwards. They may act under the organization, or at any time dissolve or abandon it. Dunn v. Brown County Agricultural Soc., 46 Ohio St. 93, 18 N. E. 496, 1 L. R. A. 754, 15 Am. St. Rep. 558.

AGRICULTURAL SUPPLIES.

See "Supplies."

AGRICULTURIST.

An agriculturist is a student of the science of agriculture. Downing v. Indiana State Board of Agriculture, 28 N. E. 123, 126, 129 Ind. 443, 12 L. R. A. 664.

AID.

See "Mutual Aid."

Consent distinguished, see "Consent."

The mere standing by and witnessing the commission of a crime is not the doing of an act "in aid thereof" which will authorize a conviction for the crime. People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176.

An allegation in a claim against a decedent's estate for services in the care of, and "aiding and supporting," decedent's sister and minor children, includes aid and support by the contribution of money. Grimm v. Taylor's Estate, 55 N. W. 447, 448, 96 Mich. 5.

"Aid and relief," within a resolution proposing to extend the same to a family or dependents of a soldier in service, implied want, need, or necessity on the part of the applicant. Russell v. City of Providence, 7 R. L. 568, 574.

Aid absconding debtor.

"Aid, within the meaning of a statute punishing any person who shall aid in moving a debtor out of the county with an intent to defraud creditors, does not mean advice. Most people are willing to give advice. Some do it officiously, but if called on to give aid or assistance the subject is looked at from a different point of view. Advice costs nothing. Aid or assistance is doing of some act whereby the party is enabled, or it is made easier for him, to do the principal act or effect some primary purpose. If a debtor's object be to remove out of the county, and I let him have my horse or carry him or his family or his property some distance of the way to the county line in my wagon, it is giving him aid and assistance. But mere words of advice, no matter with what intent they are used, are not giving aid and assistance in removing out of the county." Wiley v. McRee, 47 N. C. 349, 351.

"Aiding" in removing a debtor outside of the county, with intent to defraud his creditors, includes helping him by carrying him or his property a part of the way, and this although the person who helped him did not convey the debtor or his goods entirely out of the one county into the other. Godsey v. Bason, 30 N. C. 260, 264.

"Aiding" an absconding debtor is the doing of some act whereby he is enabled, or it is made easier for him, to do the particular act. The going with the debtor to the depot and bringing back his horse, thereby making it easier for him to abscond and leave the country secretly, so as not to attract the attention of his creditors by giving to the movement the appearance of an ordinary act of a gentleman going to market to sell his cotton, is "aiding" within the meaning of the law. Moss v. People, 51 N. C. 140, 142.

A person "aids" in removing a debtor out of the county if he waits until the debtor crosses over the county line and then carries his property to him, or where the debtor, being out of the county, is aided by a supply of money to leave the country, and induced not to return to the county of his residence by a promise to forward his property to him, which is accordingly done. Moore v. Rogers, 48 N. C. 90, 94.

Aid in completion of railroad.

The words "aid in the completion of," as used in a statute authorizing counties to subscribe to the stock of a railroad when necessary to aid in its completion, must be taken in their ordinary colloquial sense. In its narrow significations the word "completion" means to carry out something already begun, to fill out something already outlined, and, as used in the statute, the term means to come to the assistance of a railroad begun and contemplated and aid in accomplishing its end; that is, to complete it to its terminus. Coler v. Stanly County Com'rs (U. S.) 89 Fed. 257.

Aid in construction of bridges.

In Act 1871, entitled an act to provide aid to counties for constructing highway bridges across the Platte river, and authorizing all organized counties through which the Platte river runs, or which are bounded thereby on the north and south, to aid under the act, the word "aid" means that the county may contribute toward the cost of the improvement, by issuing its bonds, a portion of the fund necessary to make the improvement to be contributed in some other manner, as by grant from the state, donations, by two counties bordering on the river uniting in the enterprise, etc., but does not necessarily repel the conclusion that the county may construct the desired improvement for the benefit of the public. Union Pac. R. R. v. Colfax County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 450, 456.

Aid in construction of railroad.

"Aid," as used in Comp. St. c. 45, § 1, authorizing any county or city to issue bonds to "aid" in the construction of any railroad or any other work of internal improvement, may include the donation of a bond. State v. Babcock, 27 N. W. 98, 101, 19 Neb. 230.

Rev. St. 1874, p. 797, being an act entitled an act to limit and determine the time for which counties, cities, townships, towns and precincts in the state shall be liable and holden to issue "aid" for the building of any railroad in pursuance of any vote taken in conformity to the laws of the state, should be construed to cover and embrace subscriptions to capital stock of a railroad company in "aid" of it, for subscription to stock is one form of "aid," and hence the act may determine the time within which such municipality shall be liable and holden to make subscriptions to capital stock of a railroad company in pursuance of a vote, though no mention is made of subscriptions in the title of the act. People v. Town of Granville, 104 Ill. 285, 291.

Aid of corporation.

The constitutional provision providing that the General Assembly shall never authorize any city, etc., to aid any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever, cannot be construed to preclude the Legislature from authorizing a city to build a steam railroad. Salker v. City of Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 54.

Aid of individual.

Under Const. art. 4, § 55, declaring that the General Assembly shall have no power to authorize any county, city, town, or other subdivision of the state to lend its credit or to grant public money or anything of value in "aid of any individual" association or corporation whatever, it is held that an act authorizing certain counties to erect a bridge which might be either a free foot and wagon bridge for the traveling public, or a railroad bridge, or both combined, was an act in aid of an individual, association, or corporation within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition. Garland v. Montgomery County, 6 South. 402, 87 Ala. 223.

Under Const. art. 4, § 47, providing that the General Assembly shall have no power to authorize any city or other political subdivision of the state to grant money in "aid of any individual," etc., it is held that an act requiring a city to pension policemen who were injured in the service, or the family of policemen killed in the service, or of patrolmen who have served in the force for 20 years or more, etc., was a grant of money in aid of an individual, within the meaning of that phrase as used in the Constitution, and hence was void. State v. Ziegenhein, 45 S. W. 1099, 1100, 144 Mo. 283, 66 Am. St. Rep. 420.

Aid of judge.

In Rev. St. § 596 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 482], providing that it shall be the duty of every circuit judge, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to designate and appoint the district judge of any judicial district within his circuit to hold a district or circuit court in the place of or "in aid of" any other district judge within the same circuit, "in aid of" naturally implies some existing judge to be aided, so that such circuit judge has no power to make such an appointment when the office is vacant. McDowell v. United States (U. S.) 74 Fed. 403, 405, 20 C. C. A. 476.

Aid in maintenance of nuisance.

Rev. St. c. 17, § 4, punishing the offense of aiding in the maintenance of a nuisance in keeping a house of ill fame, includes a person charged with aiding in the maintenance of such a house by knowingly permitting a tenement to be used for such purposes. State v. Frazier, 8 Atl. 347, 79 Me. 95.

Aid offender.

The word "aid," in its broader significance, might include assistance like the failure to disclose a felony by one having knowledge of its commission, or assisting the offender in obtaining witnesses to testify in his behalf, or giving untruthful testimony in his behalf at the trial. But as used in a statute providing that every person who shall be convicted of having concealed any offender after the commission of any felony, or of having given such offender any other aid, etc., shall be deemed an accessory after the fact, such acts were not contemplated, and where a wife advised a daughter who had given birth to an illegitimate child, of which the woman's husband was the father, to tell the county attorney a falsehood with respect to the paternity, such advice does not constitute such aid. State v. Doty, 48 Pac. 145, 146, 57 Kan. 835.

"Aid other," as used in the By-Laws of 1885, c. 31, § 288, providing that every person who shall conceal any offender after the commission of any felony, or give him any other aid, may be convicted as an accessory, requires more than merely giving the offender information of his danger by trying to secure from him security on certain obligations on which the defendant was liable, but the aid must be of a substantial character, such as furnishing the offender personal help, or some means of transportation, or a key, or some place of concealment. State v. Fry, 19 Pac. 742, 746, 40 Kan. 311.

Aid prisoner to escape.

Rescue is the forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment. Code § 4478. A rescue takes place where there is no effort on the part of the prisoner to escape, but his delivery is effected by the interference of others without his co-operation, whereas the offense of aiding a prisoner to escape consists in inciting, supporting, and re-enforcing his exertions in his own behalf, tending to the accomplishment of the object. Robinson v. State, 9 S. E. 528, 529, 82 Ga. 535.

Aid of public officer.

A statute provided that actions against a public officer, or against a person who, by his command or "in his aid," shall do anything touching the duties of such officer, shall be tried in the county where the cause of action or some part thereof arose. An action against the sureties on an indemnity bond given to the sheriff to induce him to levy on certain property, which it was claimed had been fraudulently conveyed by the debtor, is not within the terms of such statute. The words "in his aid" were meant to extend immunity to all who assisted and took part in the act with his assent, though not by his direct order; but the sureties in such bond did not do anything touching the duties of such officer, nor did the giving of such bond aid him in the performance of the duties of his office. Harvey v. Brevard, 3 S. E. 911, 912, 98 N. C. 93.

Aid of school.

Under Const. art. 6, § 3, providing that no sectarian instruction shall be allowed in any school aided or supported by the state, it is held that the term "aided" applies to all appropriations to sectarian schools, whether made as a donation, or in payment for services rendered the state by such schools. Synod of Dakota v. State, 50 N. W. 632, 635, 2 S. D. 368, 14 L. R. A. 418.

The phrase "aid of common schools," in a constitutional provision providing that the school fund, etc., may be appropriated in aid of common schools, but for no other purpose, "has not in itself a certain and definite meaning, and, being capable of covering more or less ground according to the intention of the framers of the Constitution, we are to adopt that sense which, without departing from the import of the words, best harmonizes with the scope, object, and design of the provision." The term in such connection is limited to mean that such fund shall be used exclusively in aid of common schools in the same manner in which the school fund has been previously appropriated, and therefore an act directing the purchase of Collins' Historical Sketches of Kentucky for each school district is unconstitutional in so far as it provides for the appropriation of any part of the school fund for that purpose. Collins v. Henderson, 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 74, 82.

Aid slave to run away.

The term "aid," in Clay's Dig. 419, § 15, making it criminal for any person to knowingly aid any negro or other slave to run away or depart from his master's service, comprehends all those appliances which may be resorted to as means to induce or assist a slave in running away. An affidavit charging that defendant was about to persuade and trying to persuade affiant's negroes to leave his premises is sufficient to state the offense created by the statute.—Crosby v. Hawthorn, 25 Ala. 221, 223.

AID AND ABET.

A person may "aid" in the commission of an offense by doing innocently some act essential to its accomplishment, and hence the word "aid" does not imply guilty knowledge or felonious intent. So that an instruction that "if the defendant aided, abetted, or assisted any other person to commit the crime, then you will find him guilty," is erroneous, in that it authorizes a conviction for aiding in the commission of the offense without criminal intent. People v. Dole, 55 Pac. 581, 584, 122 Cal. 486, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50.

In True v. Commonwealth, 90 Ky. 651, 14 S. W. 684, the words "encourage, aid or abet, counsel, advise, or assist," were said to be words in appropriate use to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it to be done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. Omer v. Commonwealth, 25 S. W. 594, 596, 95 Ky. 353.

By technical legal construction a person may assist or aid in the commission of a crime and still be possessed of no criminal intent, and therefore in no sense an accessory to the crime; but to the ordinary mind one who aids or assists in the commission of the crime of forgery is guilty, and this is true because to such a mind criminality is included as an element in the act of the party aiding or assisting. To the ordinary understanding it would seem that a person could not commit the crime of forgery without knowing that it was a crime, neither could he aid or assist in its commission without being aware of the criminality of his acts, and the use of such terms in an instruction would not tend to mislead the jury. People v. Dole (Cal.) 51 Pac. 945, 946.

The statement and definition in regard to the use of the words "aid and abet," in People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, quoted and approved, holding that it was erroaneous to instruct that a person is an accomplice who aids and abets or assists in the commission of a crime, and that aid does not imply guilty knowledge or felonious intent, and hence should not have been used disjunctively. State v. Corcoran, 61 Pac. 1034, 1042, 7 Idaho, 220.

It is said in Raiford v. State, 59 Ala. 106, that the words "aid and abet" are pretty much the synonyms of each other"; and this has doubtless come to be true in the law, though originally a different meaning attached to each. The legal definition of "aid" is not different from its meaning in common parlance. It means to "assist"; "to supplement the efforts of another." Rap. & L. Law Dict. p. 43. Chief Justice Stone defined the two terms as follows: "The words 'aid' and 'abet,' in legal phrase, are pretty much the synonyms of each other. They comprehend all assistance rendered by acts or words of encouragement or support, or presence, actual or constructive, to render assistance should it become necessary. No particular acts are necessary. If encouragement be given to commit the felony, or if, giving due weight to all the testimony, the jury are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was present with a view to render aid, should it become necessary, then that ingredient of the offense is made out." This definition was sufficient for the case then in hand, and it is in the form not infrequently found in the books. But it is incomplete. Mere presence, for the purpose of rendering aid, obviously is not aid; in the substantive sense of assistance by an act supplementary to the act of the principal; nor is it aid in the original sense of abetting, nor abetting in any sense, unless presence with the purpose of giving aid, if necessary, was preconcerted, or in accordance with the general plan, conceived by the principal and the person charged as an aider or abettor, or, at the very least, unless the principal knew of the presence, with intent to aid, of such person. It is essential to the guilt of a person charged with aiding or abetting the commission of a felony that such person's acts should have contributed to the effectuation of the design to kill. It is not essential that the assistance given contributed to the criminal result, but it is sufficient if it facilitated a result that would have transpired without it, or if the aid merely rendered it easier to accomplish the end intended, though in all human probability the end would have been attained without it. State v. Tally, 15 South. 722, 737, 102 Ala. 25.

The words "aid and abet," as used in the statute abolishing the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission though not present, manifestly have reference to some work or act or encouragement or assistance in the commission of the offense, and not to something done after the crime is complete. In other words, an accessory after the fact is not an aider and abettor under this statute. State v. Jones, 88 N. W. 196, 197, 115 Iowa, 113.

"Aid and abet," as used in Act Cong. April 20, 1818, c. 375, § 3, making it criminal to aid or abet the importation of slaves, are not "used as technical phrases belonging to the common law, because the offense is not made a felony, and therefore the words require no such interpretation. The statute punishes them as substantial offenses, and not as accessorial, and the words are therefore to be understood as in the common parlance, and import assistance, co-operation, and encouragement. United States v. Gooding, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 460, 475.

As used in Act 1855, § 19, providing that those who "aid and abet, though not present," the commission of a misdemeanor, shall be punished as principals, etc., are used in an enlarged sense, including all which go to constitute an accessory before the fact at common law. Shannon v. People, 5 Mich. 71, 84.

To aid and abet, as used in criminal law, consists in being present at the time and place of the crime and doing some act which renders aid to the perpetrator, but does not include the mere mental approval by a bystander of a crime committed in his presence. State v. Cox, 65 Mo. 29, 33.

There is a plain distinction between consenting to a crime and aiding and abetting in its perpetration. Aiding and abetting are affirmative in their character; consenting may be a mere negative acquiescence, not in any way made known to the principal malefactor. Such consenting, though involving moral turpitude, does not come up to the meaning of the words "aid and abet." White v. People, 81 Ill. 333, 337 (quoted in State v. Douglass, 26 Pac. 476, 479, 44 Kan. 618; Drury v. Territory, 60 Pac. 101, 107, 9 Okl. 398).

The fact that a person is present at the commission of an assault and battery, or within a reasonable distance, so that he knows what is going on, without disapproving or opposing it, is evidence on which, in connection with other circumstances, it is competent for the jury to infer that he "aided and abetted" the same. Kuney v. Dutcher, 22 N. W. 866, 868, 56 Mich. 308.

Code Cr. Proc. § 115, providing that any person who counsels, aids, or abets in the commission of any offense may be punished as a principal, held not to include a case where a detective employed by a railroad company to watch defendant laid a tie upon the tracks, defendant being present at the time and mentally consenting to the act, whether the act was a crime, or whether it was innocent in itself but was looked on by defendant as a crime, since such acts did not constitute aiding, abetting, or assisting as required by the statute, defendant merely having stood by, and not having done any act of assistance. The court says: "We have no statute that makes the consenting to a thing which is innocent in itself an offense, although the person consenting thereto may have believed the thing to be an offense; nor have we any statutes making the consenting to even the commission of a crime an offense, unless the consent amounts to the counseling, aiding, or abetting in its commission (citing Allen v. State, 40 Ala. 334, 91 Am. Dec. 477; Spelden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156; Reg. v. Johnson, 1 Carr. & M. 218, 41 E. C. L. 123; State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498). * * * In the case of White v. People, 81 Ill. 337, the Supreme Court of Illinois used the following language: "The jury were instructed that one who stands by when a crime is committed in his presence by another, and consents to the perpetration of the crime, is a principal in the offense, and must be punished as such. The law is that one who 'stands by and aids, abets, or assists the perpetration of the crime' is an accessory, and shall be considered as a principal." Rev. St. 1874, p. 393, § 274. There is a plain distinction between consenting to a crime and 'aiding, abetting, and assisting' in its perpetration. Aiding, abetting, or assisting are affirmative in their character, while consent may amount to a mere negative acquiescence; such consenting, though involving moral turpitude, does not amount to aiding, abetting, or assisting." State v. Douglass, 26 Pac. 476, 479, 44 Kan. 618.

"Aiding and abetting," as used in reference to a crime, involves some participation. "Mere presence without participation will not suffice if no act whatever is done in concert, and no confidence intentionally imparted by such presence to the perpetrators." Connaught v. State, 1 Wis. 159, 166, 60 Am. Dec. 370.

A person who, with knowledge that a crime is being committed, watches for his companions in order to prevent surprise, or remains at a convenient distance in order to favor their escape, or is in such a situation as to be able readily to come to their assistance, knowledge of these things being calculated to give additional confidence to his companions, is "aiding and abetting" in the commission of the crime. State v. Walker, 9 S. W. 646, 652, 98 Mo. 95.

A person who is present at the commission of an assault and battery, and encourages and incites by words, gestures, looks, or signs, or by any other means, is "aiding and abetting" the same, and is liable as a principal. Kuney v. Dutcher, 22 N. W. 866, 868, 56 Mich. 308.

AID AND COMFORT.

The words "aid and comfort," as used in Act March 12, 1863, 12 Stat. 820, providing that the owner of property captured or abandoned in the War of the Rebellion may bring suit for the proceeds thereof, on proof of his ownership and right for such proceeds, and that he had never given "aid or comfort" to the Rebellion, are used in the same sense as they are in the clause of the Constitution defining treason; that is, in their hostile sense. The acts of aid and comfort which will defeat a suit must be of the same general character as those necessary to convict of treason, where the offense consists in giving "aid and comfort" to the enemies of the United States. But there may be "aid and comfort" without treason, for "treason is a breach of allegiance, and can be committed only by him who owes allegiance, either perpetual or temporary." The benefits of the statute are withheld, not for treason only, but for giving "aid and comfort" as well. The claimant, to be included, need not have been guilty of treason. It is sufficient if he has done that which would have made him a traitor if he had owed allegiance to the United States. A nonresident alien was not a traitor, but by entering into and confirming a contract of copartnership with the state of North Carolina in 1863 to provide the country with its chief requirements from abroad, of warlike supplies, and to assist in running out through the blockade a quantity of cotton for the state, to enable it to obtain the benefit of the high price in Great Britain, and supplying the government of the Confederacy with all kinds of munitions of war, and acting as agent of North Carolina for the sale in England of its obligations for the delivery of cotton, was guilty of acts which would have made him guilty of treason had he been a citizen of the United States, and therefore gave "aid and comfort" to the Rebellion. Young v. United States, 97 U. S. 39, 62.

AIDER AND ABETTOR.

An "aider and abettor" is one who advises, counsels, procures, or encourages another to commit a crime, though not personally present at the time and place of the commission of the offense. Pearce v. Territory, 68 Pac. 504, 506, 11 Okl. 438.

Any person who is present at the commission of an assault by one upon another, encouraging or inciting the same by words, gestures, looks, or signs, or who in any manner or by any means countenances or approves the same, is in law deemed an "aider and abettor." Hilmes v. Stroebel, 59 Wis. 74, 17 N. W. 539; Rhinehart v. Whitehead, 24

N. W. 401, 402, 64 Wis. 42; Brown v. Perkins, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 89, 98.

The mere presence of a person at the place where a crime is being committed is not of itself sufficient to constitute such person an "aider or abettor" in the commission of the crime. People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176.

Aiders and abettors were formerly defined to be accessories at the fact, and the rule was that they could not be tried until the principal had been convicted or outlawed; but it has been long settled that all those who are present aiding or abetting when a felony is committed either in the first or second degree, and, if in the second degree, that they may be arraigned and tried before the principal in the first degree, and that they may be convicted even though the party charged as principal in the first degree is acquitted. United States v. Hartwell (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 196, 199.

AIDING DISTANCE.

An instruction that, in order to be an aider or abettor, the person so aiding and abetting should be present "within aiding distance" to aid by counsel, by watching or by assisting the person doing the unlawful act, is the same thing as saying that persons not sufficiently near to render assistance are not principals. From the language used, the jury could not fail to understand that, to constitute one who did not himself do the act a principal by reason of the fact that he was aiding and abetting in the performance of such act, he must either be actually present or near enough to render assistance while the act was being done. State v. Prater, 2 S. E. 108, 111, 26 S. C. 198, 613.

AIDOIO MANIA.

Aidoio mania is a form of insanity in which the sufferer longs for every woman he sees. Ekin's Heirs v. McCracken (Pa.) 11 Phila. 534, 539.

AILMENT.

"Ailment" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "disease; indisposition; morbid affection of the body—not ordinarily applied to acute diseases"; in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary as "indisposition; serious affection of the body—not ordinarily applied to acute diseases"; and by Worcester as "pain; disease; illness"; and it is so used in questions submitted to an applicant for a life insurance policy as to whether he had been treated for personal ailments within a certain time. McDermott v. Modern Woodmen of America, 71 S. W. 833, 838, 97 Mo. App. 636.

AIR.

The word "air," as used in an agreement to maintain a private alley, by which the parties to the agreement may mutually have light and "air," is meant the atmosphere at its outdoor temperature; air as pleasant and refreshing as the weather permits; not air raised to a supernormal temperature by artificial heat, and radiated into the neighboring buildings in hot currents, which, instead of cooling and purifying the confined atmosphere of a room, renders it less comfortable, and even intolerable. St. Louis Safe Deposit & Savings Bank v. Kennett's Estate, 74 S. W. 474, 480, 101 Mo. App. 370.

AIR CELL.

"The term 'air cell,' used in connection with the manufacture of fireproof material, is descriptive merely, and hence not the subject of a valid trade-mark." New York Asbestos Mfg. Co. v. New York Fireproof Covering Co., 62 N. Y. Supp. 339.

AIR GUN.

As gun or weapon, see "Gun"; "Weapon."

AIRTIGHT.

The term "airtight," as applied to the floor of an ice reservoir, means substantially "watertight," or such a construction as prevents water running down upon the articles stored below or air escaping to the ice above. A patent for such a floor is infringed by constructing a leaky floor. Chicago Fruithouse Co. v. Busch (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 603, 605.

AISLE.

The word "aisle," as used in the charter of a city providing a punishment for the obstruction of aisles in theaters, is such a passage for ingress and egress as has been actually constructed and now in use according to the plans filed with the building department, and is not a theoretical aisle of the minimum width permissible under the building code of the city. Sturgis v. Coleman, 77 N. Y. Supp. 886, 887, 38 Misc. Rep. 302.

ALABAMA MONEY.

Current money of Alabama, see "Current Money."

A promise to pay in "Alabama money" is in legal effect an undertaking to pay in gold or silver. Carlisle v. Davis, 7 Ala. 42, 45.

ALARM.

Act April 11, 1873, § 2, providing that, if any two or more persons shall confederate for the purpose of "intimidating, alarming or disturbing" any person or persons, they shall on conviction be fined, implied the use of physical force and menace, and involved a breach of the peace; and hence an allegation of a threat to prosecute for selling whisky without a license was not an intimidation, alarming, or disturbing within the statute. Embry v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 439, 441.

ALASKA.

See "District of Alaska."

As Indian country, see "Indian Country."

ALBACEA.

A term used in the Spanish law. Esriche defines "albacea" thus: "He who is charged with fulfilling and executing that which is directed by the testator in his testament or other last disposition." Emeric v. Alvarado, 2 Pac. 418, 433, 64 Cal. 529.

ALCALDE.

An alcalde is an officer appointed by the government of Mexico to exercise limited judicial functions. United States v. Castellero, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 17, 194, 17 L. Ed. 360.

In all cases where the word "alcalde" is used, it shall be taken and construed to mean and intend justice of the peace. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 3803.

ALCOHOL.

See "Wood Alcohol."

The essential element in all spirituous liquors is a limpid colorless liquid. To the taste it is hot and pungent, and it has a slight and not disagreeable scent. It has but one source, the fermentation of sugar and saccharine matter. It comes through fermentation of substances that contain sugar proper, or that contain starch that may be turned into sugar. It is a mistake to suppose that it is really produced by distillation. It is produced by fermentation, and the process of distillation simply serves to separate the spirit from the mixture in which it exists. State v. Giersch, 4 S. E. 193, 194, 98 N. C. 720.

"Alcohol is a volatile organic body, constantly formed during the fermentation of the vegetable juices, containing sugar in solution. In popular language, it is the intoxicating principle of fermented liquor. It is exclusively produced by the process of fermentation." Eureka Vinegar Co. v. Gazette Printing Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 570, 571; United States v. Cohn, 52 S. W. 38, 44, 2 Ind. T. 474.

It is a matter of common knowledge that alcohol is the intoxicating element in intoxicating liquor, that pure alcohol is not used as a beverage, and that all intoxicating liquors that are so used contain alcohol mingled with other things, particularly with water. Whisky is alcohol mixed with water and other elements, of which the alcohol alone is intoxicating. Commonwealth v. Morgan, 21 N. E. 369, 149 Mass. 314.

"Alcohol is the intoxicating principle—the basis—of all intoxicating drinks. Whatever contains alcohol will, if a sufficient quantity be taken, produce intoxication." Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 762, 87 Am. Rep. 284.

As ardent spirits.

See "Ardent Spirits."

As intoxicating liquor.

Where an indictment charges the sale of "alcohol," it does not charge the sale of intoxicating liquor. "Alcohol" is extensively used in the arts, it is employed in medicine as a solvent, in the preparations of tinctures, and by painters in the making of varnishes. The court does not judicially know that it is an intoxicating beverage like whisky, nor that it is in common use for purposes of dissipation, nor even that it is capable of being applied to such a use. A bare charge of selling "alcohol" discloses no criminal offense. State v. Witt, 39 Ark. 216, 218.

Alcohol is an intoxicating liquor, so that a sale of "alcohol" comes within Pen. Code, art. 376, forbidding selling intoxicating liquors to a minor without the written consent of his parents. Rucker v. State (Tex.) 24 S. W. 902, 903. See, also, Shaw v. Carpenter, 54 Vt. 155, 41 Am. Rep. 837; Emerson v. State, 43 Ark. 372, 375.

The courts will take judicial notice that alcohol is intoxicating. Snider v. State, 7 S. E. 631, 81 Ga. 753, 12 Am. St. Rep. 350.

As liquor.

See "Liquor."

As a spirituous liquor.

Pure alcohol is not in common parlance a spirituous liquor, although it is a basis of all spirituous liquors. But we are not prepared to say that "selling pure alcohol" is not selling spirituous liquors. Bennett v. People, 30 Ill. (20 Peck) 389, 395. See, also, State v. Haymond, 20 W. Va. 18, 20, 43 Am. Rep. 787; Lemly v. State, 12 South. 22, 70 Miss. 241, 20 L. R. A. 645.

As vinous liquor.

See "Vinous Liquor."

ALCOHOLIC COMPOUND.

"Alcoholic compound," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 8, § 1, includes a preparation of cherry juice, made by subjecting the natural juice to heat in a vacuum, to eliminate the watery parts, and adding 17 per cent. of alcohol, such preparation being thicker, darker, heavier, and stronger than the natural juice. Smith v. Rheinstrom (U. S.) 65 Fed. 984, 986, 13 C. C. A. 261.

"Alcoholic compounds," as used in Tariff Ind. New, par. 103, relating to the duties on "alcoholic compounds," include a compound composed principally of raisins and prunes crushed in water and fermented, to which mixture alcohol was added after fermentation, to preserve the compound from souring and spoiling, the alcohol at the time of importation varying between 14.6 and 16.28 per cent. by weight. Mackie v. Erhardt (U. S.) 59 Fed. 771, 772.

ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR.

The term "alcoholic or vinous liquor," in a statute prohibiting the sale of such liquor, includes wine made from grapes and from blackberries, though there is evidence that it is not intoxicating. Reyfelt v. State, 18 South. 925, 73 Miss. 415.

ALDERMAN.

See "Board of Aldermen."
See, also, "Councilmen."

Originally "ealderman" or "alderman" was the title of a judicial office of the English county courts, as well as of the borough and city courts, under the Anglo-Saxon dynasty. People v. City of New York (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 9, 36.

"The term 'alderman' does not embrace legislative more than judicial power. The term is equivalent to 'comes,' 'aldorman,' and 'earl' in the Latin-Saxon and Danish-Saxon languages. In England this officer sat with the bishop at the trial of cases, and, while the latter expounded the ecclesiastical, it was the duty of the former to declare the common law. Aldermen sat as judges of assize, and exercised such powers of government as were conferred by the charters of the cities or towns where they resided, and in that character took cognizance of civil as well as criminal matters, at one time administering the laws which emitted from the British Parliament, and at another acting under the code of the corporation law. Purdy v. People (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 384, 409 (citing 1 Hume's Hist. Eng. p. 69; Jacob's Law Dict. tit. "Alderman").

The term was formerly used to designate an officer having judicial as well as civil power in England, for a period which extended back even before the Norman Conquest; nor were they deprived of judicial powers by the loss of Normandy, when they were extended into England for a similar class of elective, judicial, and municipal officers. They acted in the states of France under the name of 'echevins' or 'aldermen,' from the remotest period of the French history, and their election by the citizens to discharge such duties was recognized in the capitularies or statutes of Charlemagne. Aldermen elected in New York also, for a long period, and probably until Act May 14, 1840 (Sess. Laws 1840, p. 257), excluding aldermen of the city of New York of the right to sit as judges of the Court of General Sessions, exercised judicial power in addition to their duties as members of the legislative department of the city. Purdy v. People (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 384, 387.

An alderman is one of a board of municipal officers next in order to the mayor. Crovatt v. Mason, 28 S. E. 891, 894, 101 Ga. 246.

Councilman synonymous.

In Act Sept. 26, 1883, relating to the town of Reynolds, the phrase "mayor and aldermen" is generally used as synonymous of the corporate use and style, "mayor and council of the town of Reynolds." Gostin v. Brooks, 15 S. E. 361, 89 Ga. 244.

The word "aldermen," as used in McClell. Dig. p. 246, § 4, authorizing the election of aldermen by a town, who shall be known as the "city council," will be construed as equivalent with the word "councilmen," as used in an ordinance of the town directing an election of "councilmen" under such act. State v. Anderson, 8 South. 1, 4, 26 Fla. 240.

Mayor.

Commonly and colloquially, when we speak of a councilman or alderman, we do not refer to a mayor. Hence, under a statute providing that the councilmen and aldermen of towns and cities shall be ineligible during their term of office to any other municipal office in said towns and cities, a mayor is not therefore rendered ineligible. Akerman v. Ford, 42 S. E. 777, 116 Ga. 473.

ALE.

See "American Hop Ale."

"Ale" is a liquor made from an infusion of malt by fermentation. Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44; Walker v. Prescott, 44 N. H. 511, 512.

The court will take judicial notice that "ale" is a malt liquor. Wiles v. State, 33 Ind. 206.

Ale is a liquor made from an infusion of malt by fermentation, differing from beer in having a smaller proportion of hops. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 426, 53 Am. Rep. 79; Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44.

As an intoxicating liquor.

"Ale," as used in Act March 8, 1870 (Laws 1870, p. 437), providing that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell "ale" except at a regular licensed inn and tavern, means a certain liquor made from malt, containing a certain percentage of alcohol sufficient to render it intoxicating. Murphy v. Inhabitants of Montclair Tp., 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 673, 675.

Ale is an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of statutes prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and there is no necessity, in a prosecution for the sale of ale, to introduce evidence that it is intoxicating, but the jury are at liberty to act upon the knowledge they possess upon the subject in common with all the rest of mankind. State v. Barron, 37 Vt. 57, 60.

Ale, by the express provisions of St. 1875, c. 99, § 18, is an intoxicating liquor. Commonwealth v. Curran, 119 Mass. 206, 208.

Act Feb. 12, 1853, prohibiting the manufacture of "intoxicating beverages," did not mean merely spirituous liquors or those which are distilled, but included all drinks of an intoxicating nature, and embraces beer and ale. People v. Hawley, 3 Mich. 330, 340.

As a spirituous liquor.

"Ale" is a strong or spirituous liquor within the meaning of 1 Rev. St. p. 680, § 15, providing for a forfeiture by any person who shall sell any strong or spirituous liquors in any quantity of less than five gallons at a time without having a license therefor. It is an intoxicating liquor. Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44.

Being a liquor produced by fermentation and not by distillation, ale is not a spirituous liquor within the meaning of Pamph. Laws, c. 846, referring to sales of wines or spirituous liquors, mixed or unmixed. Walker v. Prescott, 44 N. H. 511, 512.

A statute authorizing the granting of licenses to persons to be innholders, with liberty to sell "ale," wine, beer, and other fermented liquors, cannot be construed to authorize such holders to sell brandy, rum, or other spirituous liquors. Commonwealth v. Jordan, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 228.

As wine.

See "Wine."

ALEATORY CONTRACT.

An "aleatory contract," in civil law, is one in which the advantages and losses, whether to all the parties or some of them, depend on an uncertain event. Civ. Code, art. 2951. It is of the essence of such contracts that there should be risk on one side or on both, and that all risks appertaining to the contract and not inspected are assumed by the parties. Aleatory contracts are in the main, and in the general sense, contracts generally known as "gambling contracts." Moore v. Johnston, 8 La. Ann. 488, 489.

A contract is aleatory or hazardous when the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event; hence a contract for the purchase of crops of fruit to be grown in subsequent years is a certain contract. Losecco v. Gregory, 32 South. 985, 986, 108 La. 648.

A contract in which the interest of one or both of the parties depends on an element of chance as a contract for the racing of horses, etc. The performance of such contracts cannot be excused by the intervention of accidental or overpowering force. Henderson v. Stone (La.) 1 Mart. (N. S.) 639, 641.

A contract is aleatory or hazardous when the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1776.

ALEWIFE.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to fish and fisheries, the term "alewife" means the small species of mackerel fish commonly called "alewife," but known also by the local name of "herring" and "gaspereau," and also includes the similar species found in tidal waters and known as "bluebacks." Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 375, c. 40, § 32.

ALFALFA.

Alfalfa is not a grass indigenous to the land of California. It is a perennial plant, which, when properly cared for, like fruit trees, produces yearly crops of hay or pasturage for an indefinite number of years. As a crop it is unlike wheat or barley sown for hay, which produces but a single annual crop and no more. It adds value to the land, in different degree it may be, but in a similar manner, as do fruit or nut-bearing trees. It is therefore not exempt from taxation as a growing crop under Cal. Pol. Code, § 3607, exempting growing crops from taxation. Miller v. Kern County, 70 Pac. 549, 553, 137 Cal. 516.

ALIAS.

The word "alias" is simply an abbreviated form of the words "alias dictus," meaning "otherwise called," and, where a person is known by two different names, it seems a proper way to designate him in legal proceedings in order to avoid the danger of misnomer or of variance; so that the title of an action as naming the defendant as N. H. Anderson, "alias" Hans Anderson, sufficiently discloses who the real defendant is. O. L. Packard Mach. Co. v. Laev, 76 N. W. 596, 597, 100 Wis. 644.

The word "alias," as used in an indictment which was entitled, "The State against Ferguson, 'alias' Ferguson," is the equivalent of "alias dictus," or "otherwise called," and indicates not that the person referred to bears both names laid under the alias, but that he is called by one or the other of those names. Ferguson v. State, 32 South. 760, 761, 134 Ala. 63, 92 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The word "alias" is commonly used in indictments in naming the accused by two or more names by which he is known to the grand jury. "If the person on his arraignment does not plead in abatement, he admits himself rightly designated by the name stated." Turns v. Commonwealth, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 224, 235.

"Alias" was formerly employed in pleading in connection with "dictus," and a charge of the killing of H., "alias" T., would import a killing of H., otherwise called T. The use of the single word "alias" to express the whole meaning has so long obtained that it is not uncertain what its true meaning is. The term has become familiar as equivalent to "otherwise called," or "otherwise known as," and may properly be treated as having in use in pleadings in English acquired that import, without its former Latin companion. Kennedy v. People, 1 Cow. Cr. R. 119, 121.

ALIAS WRIT.

An "alias" execution is another or different execution actually issued at a different time, and does not include an execution which was renewed at the expiration of the return day by erasing the former date and inserting a subsequent one. Roberts v. Church, 17 Conn. 142, 145.

An alias writ is one which is issued when a former writ has not produced its effect. The writ is so called from the words "as we have formerly commanded you" being inserted after the usual commencement, "we command you." Farris v. Walter, 31 Pac. 231, 232, 2 Colo. App. 450 (quoting Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

ALIBI.

The defense known in law as an "alibi" is that, at the time of the commission of the crime charged in the indictment, the defendant was at a different place, so that he could not have committed it. State v. McGarry, 83 N. W. 718, 719, 111 Iowa, 709; State v. McGinnis, 59 S. W. 83, 88, 158 Mo. 105; State v. Hale, 56 S. W. 881, 882, 156 Mo. 102; State v. Taylor, 24 S. W. 449, 451, 118 Mo. 153; Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 319, 52 Am. Dec. 711; Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 970, 974; People v.

Levine, 24 Pac. 631, 632, 85 Cal. 39; Wisdom v. People, 11 Colo. 170, 174, 17 Pac. 519, 522; Dunn v. State, 94 N. W. 646, 648, 118 Wis. 82.

An alibi is evidence of the fact that the defendant, at the time the crime is charged to have been committed, was at another place, and therefore could not have committed the crime; hence it involves the impossibility of the person's presence at the scene of the offense at the time of its commission. State v. Caymo, 32 South. 351, 352, 108 La. 218; Ware v. State, 67 Ga. 349, 351; Brice-land v. Commonwealth, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 463, 469.

"An 'alibi' in law simply means that the defendant was not there; or, to state it more definitely, a defendant who sets up an alibi shows such a state of facts surrounding his whereabouts at that particular time as would make it practically improbable or impossible for him to have committed the offense charged." State v. Child, 20 Pac. 275, 276, 40 Kan. 482.

An "alibi" is a defense which is established by showing that the person charged with the crime was at some place other than where the crime was committed at such a time that he could not have been at the place of the crime at the time of its commission. State v. Powers, 47 Atl. 830, 833, 72 Vt. 168.

It is not an extrinsic defense, but a traverse of a material averment of an indictment that the defendant did then and there the particular act charged. State v. Taylor, 24 S. W. 449, 451, 118 Mo. 153.

An "alibi" is not a defense of confession and avoidance, but, if established, merely negatives the guilt of the defendant. In order to make the defense of an alibi successful and worthy of serious consideration by the jury, it is essential that the evidence to establish this defense should cover and account for the whole of the transaction in question, or, at least, so much of it as to render it impossible that the defendant could have committed the offense for which he is indicted. Albritton v. State, 10 South. 426, 427, 94 Ala. 76.

An "alibi" in criminal law is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as follows: "Elsewhere; in another place. A term used to express that manner of defense to a criminal prosecution where the party accused, in order to prove that he could not have committed the crime with which he is charged, offers evidence to show that he was in another place at the time, which is termed 'setting up an alibi.'" So that an instruction, on a defense of alibi, that defendants must have been at such distant and different place that they could not have participated in the commission of a crime, is erroneous as to the element of distance. That parties charged with acts constituting a crime were at a place other than that of the alleged acts embraces necessarily, as elemental of its existence as a fact, that they were also at some distance from the alleged place of the commitment of the crime; but that the distance disclosed by the evidence be long or short is not always an absolutely controlling fact. Peyton v. State, 74 N. W. 597, 598, 54 Neb. 183.

ALIEN—ALIENAGE.

See "Nonresident Alien"; "Resident Alien."

Lord Coke says: "Alien, alienigena, is derived from the Latin word 'alienus,' and, according to the etymology of the word, it signifies one born in a strange country, under the obedience of a strange prince or country, or, as Littleton says, 'out of the allegiance of the King.'" Coke's Littleton, 128, B. "When I say," says Blackstone, "that an alien is one born out of the king's dominion or allegiance, this also must be understood with some restrictions. The common law, indeed, stood absolutely so, with only a very few exceptions, so that a particular act of parliament became necessary, after the Restoration, for the naturalization of children of his majesty's English subjects born in foreign countries during the late troubles. And this maxim of the law proceeded upon a general principle, that every man owes natural allegiance where he is born, and cannot owe two allegiances or serve two masters at once." Ex parte Dawson (N. Y.) 3 Bradf. Sur. 130, 136.

An "alien" is defined by Lord Coke as "a person out of the legiance of the King. It is not extra regnum nor extra legem, but extra ligeantiam." To make a subject born, the parents must be under the actual obedience of the King, and the place of birth be within the King's obedience as well as within his dominion. McKay v. Campbell (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 161, 164 (citing Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 18a).

Every writer of the common law stated two circumstances which must concur in order to make a man an alien in England: (1) He must not be born within the allegiance of the Crown. (2) He must be born of parents who are not entitled to the privileges of natural-born subjects. Martin v. Brown, 7 Hal. 305, 335 (citing 1 Bac. Abr. 175).

An "alien" is defined to be one born out of the United States who has not since been naturalized under the Constitution. An "alien," it is said, means nothing more than a citizen or subject of a foreign state. Milne v. Huber (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 403, 406. Such is its meaning as used in Bill of Rights, § 17, declaring that no distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens with reference to the purchase, descent, or enjoyment of property. Buffington v. Grosvenor, 27 Pac. 137, 138, 46 Kan. 730, 13 L. R. A. 282. Such also is its meaning in Civ. Code, § 672, providing that if a nonresident alien takes by succession he must claim the property in five years from the time of succession or be barred. State v. Lyons, 7 Pac. 763, 764, 67 Cal. 380; State v. Smith, 12 Pac. 121, 123, 70 Cal. 153. So, also, as used in 2 Rev. St. c. 69, § 31, providing that an alien residing out of this state shall be incompetent to serve as executor. McGregor v. McGregor (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 456, 458; McGregor v. McGregor (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Dec. 92, 93; Id., *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 133, 134.

"Aliens" are the subjects of foreign governments, not naturalized under the laws of the United States. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 1814.

Civ. Code, § 71, providing that any person, whether citizen or "alien," may take, hold, and dispose of property, does not mean by the word "alien" a person who was born in another country and has come to this country and is here residing, either permanently or temporarily, in the one case being a resident alien and in the other a nonresident alien, but, according to Webster, the word "alien" means "a foreigner, one born in or belonging to another country, in American law one born out of the jurisdiction of the United States and not naturalized," and the word "foreigner," "a person belonging to a foreign country, or without the country or jurisdiction under consideration." Lyons v. State, 7 Pac. 763, 764, 67 Cal. 380.

The word "aliens," as used in section 25 of the Bill of Rights, that no distinction shall ever be made by law between resident "citizens and aliens" in relation to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property, relates to the political status of persons as respects their relation to the United States. Glynn v. Glynn, 87 N. W. 1052, 62 Neb. 872.

"Alien," within 2 Rev. St. 69, § 31, excluding certain aliens from being executors, means a person born out of the jurisdiction of the United States, and, according to the notion commonly received as law, an "alien" is one born in a strange country and in a foreign society, to which he is presumed to have a natural and a necessary allegiance. Aliens in the United States are of two kinds—aliens by birth and by election. Aliens by birth are all persons born out of the dominion of the United States since July 4, 1776, with the exception of children of citizens born abroad and of persons naturalized by acts of Congress; and aliens by election are those made by voluntary expatriation (1 Tucker's Blackstone, pt. 2, app. 101). Dane says: "An alien owes a local allegiance while in the country, and is there protected, and is one born under a foreign allegiance." Lynch v. Clarke (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 583, 668 (citing 4 Dane's Abr. 695).

The word "aliens," as used in 25 Stat. 433, c. 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], relating to the jurisdiction of federal courts, embraces subjects or citizens of foreign countries, and not merely persons resident in this country who owe allegiance to another. Hennessey v. Richardson Drug Co., 23 Sup. Ct. 532, 533, 189 U. S. 25, 47 L. Ed. 697.

A person born in England before the Declaration of Independence, and who also resides there, and never was in the United States, is an alien, and hence could not, in the year 1793, inherit lands in Maryland. Dawson v. Godfrey, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 321, 322, 2 L. Ed. 634.

Rev. St. 1881, § 1793, making alienage a cause of challenge of a juror, requires only that the juror be a citizen of the state, and not that he shall be a citizen of the United States; and one may be a citizen of a state and yet not a citizen of the United States. McDonel v. State, 90 Ind. 320, 323.

As citizen.

See "Citizen."

Citizens of colonies.

An "alien" is one who is born without the allegiance of the commonwealth, but does not include a person born in the territory of the late province of Massachusetts Bay before the Declaration of Independence, since the abdication of the former sovereign did not dissolve the social compact, nor annul the existing laws, nor extinguish the rights of the people, nor reduce them to a state of nature, without governmental laws or political rights, until a new social compact was established, but the previous rights and interests existing under the former government remained in force after the Declaration of Independence, without the passage of any act confirming or establishing such previous laws and rights. Ainslie v. Martin, 9 Mass. 453, 456.

One born in Ireland who emigrated to the United States after the Declaration of American Independence and did not become a citizen by naturalization must be regarded as an "alien," and was therefore a British subject in 1794, and, having purchased lands previously to that period, he comes within the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded in 1794, by which it was agreed that British subjects holding lands in the territories of the United States should continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein, and neither they nor their heirs or assigns, so far as may respect the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, shall be regarded as aliens. Jackson v. Wright (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 75, 78.

Where defendant was born in the colony of New York in 1760 of Irish parents, and in 1771 went to Ireland, and was educated and served his apprenticeship there, and remained in the British dominions until 1795, and then returned to America, he was not a citizen of the United States. Hollingsworth v. Duane (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 356, 358.

A native of Ireland removed to New York in 1760, where he continued to reside until his death, in 1798. He left a wife in Ireland at the time he removed from that country. His wife was a native of Ireland, and never left the country, but continued a subject of the King of Great Britain. Held, that the wife, being an alien, could recover dower of those lands only of which her husband was seised before the American Revolution, or before July 4, 1776, and not of those he acquired after that period. Kelly v. Harrison (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 28, 31, 1 Am. Dec. 154.

The conditions of a person born as a subject of a foreign state or power, and a plea of "alienage" filed in an action for dower, would not be sufficient unless it contained a direct averment that the person of the husband, through whom plaintiff claims, is an alien, and that he was born out of the allegiance of the state, and within the allegiance of a foreign state. Alienage will not be inferred simply from the fact that a person on the 3d day of July, 1776, was a subject of Great Britain, and in 1777 withdrew from the state of New Jersey and took refuge with the British army, and died in England, and never took upon himself the oath of allegiance to the state or to the United States, but elected to become a subject of the King of Great Britain. Coxe v. Gulick, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 328, 330.

A citizen of the colony of Connecticut, in 1759, removed to Nova Scotia, carrying with him his infant son. In 1797 the son removed from Nova Scotia to Manchester, Mass., where he purchased real estate, which he occupied for more than 10 years, paying all the taxes assessed upon him. Held, that the son was an alien, and acquired no settlement in Manchester. Inhabitants of Manchester v. Inhabitants of Boston, 16 Mass. 230, 235.

Persons born in a foreign country of parents also born in a foreign country are not citizens of Virginia, and consequently cannot inherit land there, although their grandmother was a native of Virginia, who moved to England before the Rebellion, married there, resided there until after peace, when she returned to Virginia and resided there until her death. Barzizas v. Hopkins (Va.) 2 Rand. 276, 286.

Citizen of Texas before annexation.

Where a person who owned land in Texas while it was a part of Mexico removed into Mexico prior to the declaration of independence by Texas, and continued to reside in Mexico until her death, her daughter, who was also a citizen of Mexico, could not, as heir, recover the land in Texas. The Constitution of Texas considered as aliens all those who did not reside there at the time of the declaration of independence, unless they were afterwards naturalized, and also decreed that no alien should hold land in Texas except by titles emanating directly from the government of that republic, and also provided that an alien could not inherit from an alien. McKinney v. Saviego, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 235, 237, 15 L. Ed. 365.

A person was born at Goliad in the state of Coahuila and Texas, being a part of the republic of Mexico, which place was also the domicile of her father and mother until their deaths. At the age of four years, before the declaration of Texan independence, she was removed to Matamoras in Mexico. Held, that she was an alien, and could sue in the courts of the United States. Jones v. McMasters, 61 U. S. (20 How.) 8, 20, 15 L. Ed. 805.

Citizenship distinguished.

See "Citizenship."

Native-born child of alien parent.

An alien is a person born in fealty to a foreign government or ruler who has not renounced his allegiance thereto, and does not embrace one born in the United States of alien parents. Town of New Hartford v. Town of Canaan, 54 Conn. 39, 40, 45, 5 Atl. 360, 363.

Rawle declares that every person born within the United States, its territories or districts, whether the parents are citizens or aliens, is a natural born citizen, within the sense of the Constitution, and entitled to all the rights and privileges appertaining to that capacity (Rawle's View of the Constitution, 86); and hence a person born in the state of New York of alien parents during their temporary sojourn in that state, and who returned within a year with her parents to their native country, where she subsequently resided, was a citizen of the United States. Lynch v. Clarke (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 583, 668, 669.

Foreign corporation.

A corporation created under the laws of the republic of France is an alien person, as a citizen of the republic of France, within the meaning of the law conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts of actions brought by an alien. Barrowcliffe v. La Caisse Generale (N. Y.) 58 How. Prac. 131, 132.

Foreign power.

The word "alien," as used in Act March 3, 1891, c. 517, § 6, 26 Stat. 826, 828 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 549], relating to appeals to the Supreme Court from the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals in a controversy between a foreign state and citizens, was not intended to exclude foreign powers that chose to sue here from the right of appeal. The word "aliens" could be given that effect only by straining it beyond its natural meaning and away from the indications of the context. Columbia v. Cauca Co., 23 Sup. Ct. 704, 705, 190 U. S. 524, 47 L. Ed. 1159.

Naturalized citizen.

Laws 1845, c. 115, § 4, enabling a "resident alien" to take and hold real estate, and enabling the heirs of a deceased "alien resident" to take, cannot be construed to include or designate a naturalized citizen. Luhrs v. Elmer, 80 N. Y. 171, 177.

Nonresident of state.

Under 2 Rev. St. 69, § 8, providing that an "alien" residing out of the state is incompetent to act as an executor, a native of the state, though not an inhabitant thereof, is not an "alien." McGregor v. McGregor, *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 133, 134; McGregor v. McGregor, 3 Abb. Dec. 92, 93; Id., 33 How. Prac. 456, 458.

Under Bill of Rights, § 17, requiring that no distinction shall ever be made between citizens and "aliens" in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property, a wife of a citizen of Kansas who resided in another state cannot be regarded as an alien. Buffington v. Grosvenor, 27 Pac. 137, 138, 46 Kan. 730, 13 L. R. A. 282.

ALIEN ENEMY.

An "alien enemy," within the meaning of the naturalization act providing that any free white person not an alien enemy might lawfully be naturalized, is one who owes allegiance to an adverse belligerent nation. Dorsey v. Brigham, 52 N. E. 303, 304, 177 Ill. 250, 42 L. R. A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228.

"By the modern phrase, a man who resides under the allegiance and protection of a hostile state for commercial purposes is to be considered to all civil purposes as much an 'alien enemy' as if he were born there." Hutchinson v. Brock, 11 Mass. 119, 122.

An alien is the subject of some hostile power. "A man who resides in the allegiance and protection of an hostile state for commercial purposes is as much an alien enemy as if he was born there." McConnell v. Hector, 3 Bos. & P. 113, 114.

The expression "alien enemy," as used in a plea in an action setting up that the plaintiff is an "alien enemy" commorant in Ireland, "being an alien born within the allegiance of the King of Great Britain, with whom we are at war," means that plaintiff's disability is but temporary, merely barring him in his character of an "alien enemy" commorant abroad, his right of action being only suspended by the war, and reviving on the return of peace. Bell v. Chapman (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 183, 184.

ALIEN IMMIGRANT.

One who is a resident of the United States, though of foreign birth and not naturalized, and who is returning from a visit to the country of his birth, is not an alien immigrant within the meaning of the laws regulating immigration. In re Panzara (U. S.) 51 Fed. 275, 276; In re Martorelli (U. S.) 63 Fed. 437.

The term "alien immigrants" does not include an unmarried man who has immigrated to the United States in 1892 with the intention of making his home there, has remained about two years, working at his trade, and then, being taken ill, has returned to his native country, remained about ten months, doing no work, and then in 1895 returning to the United States. In re Maiola (U. S.) 87 Fed. 114, 115.

ALIEN—ALIENATE—ALIENATION.

See "Suspension of Power of Alienation." Other alienation, see "Other."

To "alienate" is to divest one's self of property or title, or transfer property from one's self to another. Harty v. Doyle, 3 N. Y. Supp. 574, 576.

The term "alienation" embraces every mode of passing real estate by the act of the party, as distinguished from passing it by the operation of law. Jenckes v. Court of Probate of Smithfield, 2 R. I. 255, 257.

"Blackstone describes four modes of alienation or transfer of the title to real estate, which he calls 'common assurance': The first of which is by matter in pais or deed; the second, by matter of record, or an assurance transacted only in the King's public courts of record; the third, by special custom; and the fourth, by devise in a last will or testament." United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 397, 26 L. Ed. 167 (quoting Blackstone's Comm., book 2, c. 20); Lane v. Maine Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 44, 48, 28 Am. Dec. 150.

"Alienation" is the voluntary and complete transfer from one person to another, and, applied to the transfer of property, involves the complete and absolute exclusion from him who alienates of any remaining interest in the thing transferred, and involves the complete transfer of the property, possession of land, tenements, or other things to another. Stark v. Duvall, 54 Pac. 453, 454, 7 Okl. 213.

"The word 'alien' or 'alienate' extends not only to alienations of land in deed, but also to alienations in law. A transfer of title by devise, descent, or by levy would be as technically an alienation as a transfer by deed." Lane v. Maine Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 44, 48, 28 Am. Dec. 150.

As understood at common law, to "alienate" real estate is voluntarily to part with the ownership of it, either by bargain and sale, or by some conveyance, or by gift or will. Burbank v. Rockingham Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 24 N. H. (4 Fost.) 550, 553, 57 Am. Dec. 300; Harty v. Doyle, 3 N. Y. Supp. 574, 575, 49 Hun, 410.

"As generally used, 'alienation' means the passing of a thing from another, or the separation of two things, and not the conjoining or uniting of things. The passing of an estate or title from a person is an alienation, but the passing of an estate or title to a person is not an alienation. It is only when they are separated from each other in some manner, when they are discontinued, or when they become foreign to each other, that they are alienated. The passing of an estate to a person must be given some other name, as a 'reception,' or a 'union,' or an 'association.'" Vining v. Willis, 20 Pac. 232, 233, 40 Kan. 609.

"Alienation," as used in the articles of incorporation of an insurance company providing that, when any property insured with this corporation shall be aliened by sale or otherwise, the policy shall be void, means a transfer of the title, and "alienated" has been defined to be the act by which the title to an estate is voluntarily resigned by one person and accepted by another in the form prescribed by law. Masters v. Madison County Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 624, 629.

"Alienate," as used in articles of incorporation prohibiting the trustees of the corporation from alienating any shares of stocks, bonds, cash, or other property which might come into their possession or under their control, except on approval of the board of trustees, means to convey or transfer to another the title of property. Gould v. Head (U. S.) 41 Fed. 240, 245.

"Alienated," as used in Const. art. 15, § 9, providing that a homestead shall not be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists, "only means a voluntary parting or surrendering of some interest in the homestead." Vining v. Willis, 20 Pac. 232, 233, 40 Kan. 609.

Since the case of Frost v. Raymond, 2 Calnes, 188, it has been regarded as settled in this state that no one of the words "grant, bargain, sell, alien, or confirm," when used in a conveyance of real estate, imports a warranty. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541.

Where the word "alien" is employed in a deed, it is not used to designate the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing title to an estate described by other words introduced for that purpose. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314-316.

The words "alien or grant" in a deed will make a good deed of bargain and sale, if made for a pecuniary consideration or one of pecuniary value, and though ever so small, even a barley corn. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314, 315 (citing Shepherd's Touchstone, 222).

In St. 1862, p. 519, providing that no "alienation, sale, conveyance, mortgage or other lien" of or on the homestead property shall be valid or effectual for any purpose unless the same be executed by the owner thereof and be executed and acknowledged by the wife, such terms are comprehensive enough to include most, if not all, of the modes in which parties may by their own act convey, create a lien on, or otherwise affect real estate, and seem to have been inserted to confirm and conserve the right of voluntarily alienating or encumbering the homestead, but requiring the lien, etc., to be made in writing, and, in order to protect the wife of the owner, if the owner be a married man, and his wife a resident of the state, to be signed and acknowledged by her. Peterson v. Hornblower, 33 Cal. 266, 274.

The elementary writers say that "to alienate" is to pass property from one person to another. Under the constitutional clause giving a married woman an absolute power of alienation as to her separate estate, where such married woman assigns a mortgage and note held by her to creditors of her son, who are threatening to sue him, and the assignment is under seal and absolute in its terms, it is an actual and valid transfer of the property. Langston v. Smyley, 16 S. E. 771, 773, 38 S. C. 121, 125.

Contract to convey.

Within an act incorporating an insurance company, providing that when any property insured with this corporation shall be "aliened," by sale or otherwise, the policy shall thereby be void, the word "aliened" means alienated in the ordinary sense which belongs to it, namely, a transfer of the title, since the term "alienate" is the act by which the title to an estate is voluntarily resigned by one person and accepted by another in the forms prescribed by law. An "alienation" has been defined as a mode of obtaining an estate by purchase, by which it is yielded up by one person and accepted by another; and hence any transfer of real estate, short of the conveyance of title, is not an alienation of the estate, no matter in what form the sale may be made, and the term "alienate" does not include a contract to sell and convey the property. Masters

v. Madison County Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 624, 630.

Under an insurance policy providing that, if the insured property should be "alienated" by sale or otherwise, the policy should be void, it was held that a contract for the sale of the property under which no deed was made, and only a part of the purchase money paid, was not an alienation within the meaning of the policy. Hill v. Cumberland Valley Mut. Protection Co., 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 474, 478.

"Alienation," as used in an insurance policy providing that when the property insured shall be alienated, by sale or otherwise, the policy shall be void, means a technical alienation, and does not include any transfer short of a conveyance of the title, and, no matter in what form the sale may be made, the estate is not alienated unless the title is conveyed by the purchaser; and hence a contract to convey the insured property is not a conveyance within the meaning of the policy. Pollard v. Somerset Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 42 Me. 221, 225.

Under Rev. St. §§ 2290, 2291 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1389, 1390], providing that no patent shall issue without an affidavit that no part of the land has been alienated, a contract to convey, made during the transition period, having for its purpose the execution of a regular conveyance of the title when acquired, is an alienation within the spirit and purpose of the statute, and is illegal and void. Anderson v. Carkins, 10 Sup. Ct. 905, 907, 135 U. S. 483, 34 L. Ed. 272. And the undoubted preponderance of the adjudications of the state courts is to the same purpose. Horseman v. Horseman, 72 Pac. 698, 701, 43 Or. 83.

Deed of trust or mortgage.

A mortgage on property does not constitute an alienation within the meaning of a phrase in an insurance policy rendering the policy void whenever any property insured shall be "alienated" by sale or otherwise. Conover v. Mutual Ins. Co., 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 290, 294; Shepherd v. Union Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. H. 232, 240; Rollins v. Columbian Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 25 N. H. (5 Post.) 200, 202; Smith v. Monmouth Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 50 Me. 96, 97; Judge v. New York Bowery Fire Ins. Co., 132 Mass. 521, 523; Bryan v. Traders' Ins. Co. (Mass.) 14 N. E. 454, 457; Jackson v. Massachusetts Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 418, 34 Am. Dec. 69.

"Alienation," as used in the by-laws of a fire insurance company providing that an "alienation" of insured property will avoid any insurance thereon, construed to include a mortgage of the insured property. Edmonds v. Mutual Safety Fire Ins. Co., 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 311, 79 Am. Dec. 746; Pol- lard v. Somerset Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 42 Me. 221, 225.

"Alienate," as used in a fire insurance policy providing that the policy shall be void if the property be sold or transferred, means such a sale, transfer, or alienation of the property as passes the title and carries with it the right of possession, and does not include the execution of a chattel mortgage without change of possession. Union Ins. Co. of California v. Barwick, 54 N. W. 519, 521, 36 Neb. 223.

"Alienation or transfer," as used in a fire policy a clause of which provided that, in case of any sale, alienation, transfer, or change of title in the insured property, the policy should be void, meant which absolutely divested the title of the insured in the property, and hence the giving of a chattel mortgage without parting with possession did not avoid the policy. Van Deusen v. Charter Oak Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 1 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 349, 358, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 55, 62.

Code, § 2807, which provides that an insurance policy shall be void if, during the life of the policy, there be any "alienation" of the property, does not include the execution of a deed of trust by the insured, since the word "alienate," as there used, imports an absolute divestiture of title. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Feagin, 62 Ga. 515, 519.

"Alienation," as used in statutory provisions concerning homesteads, and in the Constitution, includes any agreement or contract by which the title would inure to the benefit of another, and hence includes a mortgage. Brewster v. Madden, 15 Kan. 249, 251.

The constitutional provision, that real estate constituting a homestead shall not be "alienable" without the joint consent of a husband and wife, construed as "simply a restriction upon an admitted power otherwise to sell or incumber." A mortgage is an alienation within the meaning of the provision. Hart v. Sanderson's Adm'rs, 18 Fla. 103, 115.

Gen. St. c. 41, § 7, providing that no land "alienated" shall be sold for taxes if the person taxed have other sufficient property, means land the title to which has been transferred, and implies a conveyance more than a mortgage. People's Sav. Bank v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 621, 622.

In the Wills Act, § 20, declaring that where judgment is obtained against an heir, on account of the death of his ancestor, by reason of any lands descending to him, an execution shall be taken out against the heir to the value of the lands, but that those which were bona fide "aliened" before the action brought shall not be liable to such execution, the word "aliened" is not used in any peculiar sense not applied to its use in other connections, and includes a bona fide mortgage. McMahon v. Schoonmaker, 25 Atl. 946, 947, 51 N. J. Eq. 95; Hetfield v. Jaques, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 259, 264.

The word "alienate," as used in a statute providing against the alienation of land held by a widow during a subsequent marriage, means "to convey," and includes mortgages. United States Saving Fund & Investment Co. v. Harris (Ind.) 40 N. E. 1072, 1075 (citing Vinnedge v. Shaffer, 35 Ind. 341).

Giving a lien on real estate by a mortgage is neither a bequest, a devise, nor an alienation. Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C. 190, 198. A mortgage of a married woman's separate estate to secure a debt of her husband in no way connected with her separate estate is not an alienation within the meaning of Const. S. C. art. 14, § 8, allowing married women to alienate their separate estate as fully as if they were single women. Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Rush, 26 S. C. 517, 533, 2 S. E. 402, 404.

"Alienated," as used in Act 1822, making property alienated between the signing of a judgment on appeal and the signing of the judgment in the trial court pursuant to the judgment on appeal subject to such judgment, construed to include a mortgage on the property. Phillips v. Behn, 19 Ga. 298-302.

The entryman, under section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, who swears that "no part of the land" which he seeks to have conveyed to him from the United States "had been alienated," may mortgage his claim before final certificate, in order to procure money with which to improve his land, or for any other purpose, provided he seeks in good faith to acquire the land as a homestead; and such mortgage will not be alienation under the statute. Stark v. Duvall, 54 Pac. 453, 454, 7 Okl. 213.

The phrase "alien, transfer and dispose," as used in a charter granting to a corporation the right to acquire, alien, transfer, and dispose of property of every kind, embraces the power to mortgage. McAllister v. Plant, 54 Miss. 106, 119.

Descent or devise.

The word "alien" or "alienate" extends not only to alienations of land in deed, but also to alienations in law. A transfer of title by devise, descent, or levy would be as technically an alienation as a transfer by deed. Lane v. Maine Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 44, 48, 28 Am. Dec. 150.

"As understood at common law, to 'alienate' real estate is voluntarily to part with the ownership of it, either by bargain and sale, or by some conveyance, or by gift or will. The right to alienate was a right which the owner had over the real estate to divert it from the heir. 'Alienation' differs from 'descent' in that it is effected by the voluntary act of the owner of the property, while 'descent' is the legal consequence of the decease of the owner, and is not changed by any previous act or volition of the owner. A 'sale and a conveyance' is an alienation which takes effect from the time of the transfer, while a 'devise' is an alienation that takes effect on the decease of the testator, according to the terms of the will." Burbank v. Rockingham Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 24 N. H. 550, 558, 57 Am. Dec. 300.

A charge imposed upon a testator's homestead by a will is not an "alienation" in the lifetime of the testator, which prevents the operation of the statute passing the homestead to the testator's wife and children on his decease without alienation, for the testamentary provision does not come into existence and take effect until the death of the testator. Macrae v. Macrae (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 423, 425.

In Hendrix v. Seaborn, 25 S. C. 481, it was held that while, in the broadest sense, "alienation" covered "devise," yet that a devise was not an alienation within the statute providing that no right of homestead shall exist in any property aliened by any person as against the title of the alienee. Bostick v. Chovin (S. C.) 33 S. E. 508, 509.

"Alienation," as used in Laws 1857, p. 119, amending Laws 1851, p. 25, requiring the signature and acknowledgment of the wife to "alienations" of the homestead by the husband, does not include transfer by descent. "It must mean a transfer by conveyance; such a one as the signature and acknowledgment of a party are proper to effect, as the law requires these acts as conditioned to the alienation of the homestead. If the homestead exemption applies to the acts of the descent of property, then it may be released in the mode required by the statute, as an act contemplates that it may be released; but it would be preposterous to suppose that the Legislature should intend such thing as the signature and acknowledgment of the wife should apply to the acts of the operation of the law of descent." Turner v. Bennett, 70 Ill. 263, 267.

The word "alienate," as used in Const. art. 5, § 9, providing that a homestead shall not be alienated without the joint consent of the husband and wife, means a voluntary parting with or surrendering of some interest in the homestead; and, as a person never parts with or surrenders anything by virtue of a will, but only by reason of his or her subsequent death, and as it never can be supposed without proof that any person will voluntarily bring about his own death, it necessarily follows that the constitutional provision has no application to wills. We know that text-writers have sometimes broadened the word "alienation" so as to make it include the transfer of property by will, death, and the state, and perhaps this use of the word is not inaccurate; but, as before stated, the efficient cause of the alienation in such case, indeed the sole cause, is death, and the will and the statute merely say where the title and estate shall go. Vining v. Willis, 40 Kan. 609, 613, 20 Pac. 232.

The word "alienable" may be broad enough to include dispositions by will, when not otherwise restrained by the context. But where that word was used in the first section with respect to the joint consent of husband and wife, and following this section was another providing for the continuance of the exemption in the heirs of the head of the family from and after his death, it cannot be said that the word "alienable" was intended to embrace testamentary dispositions. The word "alienable" was not used in the sense of "devisable." Caro v. Caro (Fla.) 34 South. 309, 313.

Entry or foreclosure by mortgagee.

"Alienate," as used in Pub. St. c. 12, § 25, providing that a reassessment, where an assessment has been made to the wrong person, shall constitute a lien on the real estate for two years, unless the estate has been "alienated" between the first and second assessments, means to transfer or convey the title, and hence does not include an entry on land by a mortgagee for the purpose of foreclosing his mortgage, since such entry cannot in any just sense be called an "alienation," though it constitutes one step in a proceeding which may result in an alienation by operation of law. Market Nat. Bank v. Inhabitants of Belmont, 37 Mass. 407, 409.

A fire policy conditioned that the same should be void if the premises were alienated without the consent of the insured, and that a judgment in foreclosure proceedings should be deemed an "alienation" of the property, meant a judgment of strict foreclosure, and did not embrace a decree for sale in the foreclosure suit without any further proceedings. Kane v. Hibernia Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 411, 456, 20 Am. Rep. 409.

"Alienation," as used in an insurance policy prohibiting the alienation of property, does not include a void sale of the property by a trustee under a deed of trust which is executed before the issuance of the policy. Worthington v. Bearse, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 382, 90 Am. Dec. 152; Lane v. Maine Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 44, 28 Am. Dec. 150; Pover v. Ocean Ins. Co., 19 La. 28, 36 Am. Dec. 665; Hooper v. Hudson River Fire Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 424; West Branch Ins. Co. v. Helfenstein, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 289, 80 Am. Dec. 573; Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Scammon (Ill.) 12 N. E. 324, 329.

"Alienation," like "sale," imports an actual transfer of title. Yet, where it is used in an insurance policy in a provision that the same shall become void on alienation of the insured premises, it is used in a narrower sense, and hence where, at the time of the fire, a decree in chancery for the sale of the property on foreclosure had been entered and the property bid in by the mortgagee, but no deed had been delivered, and because of the fire the mortgagee refused to receive a sheriff's deed, the policy did not become void by alienation. Marts v. Cumberland Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 478, 481.

Execution and sale.

To "alienate" means to transfer property to another; to make a thing another man's. In common law, to alienate realty is to voluntarily part with ownership in it by bargain and sale, conveyance, gift, or will; but within the statute providing that, when a widow shall be entitled to dower out of any lands which shall have been "allened" by her husband in his lifetime, and such lands have been enhanced in value after the alienation, such lands shall be estimated in setting out the widow's dower according to their value at the time they were so allened, the word "alienation" includes sale of the property of the husband on execution against him alone. Butler v. Fitzgerald, 61 N. W. 640, 641. 43 Neb. 192, 27 L. R. A. 252, 47 Am. St. Rep. 741.

An insurance policy provided for an immediate termination of the risk if the property be sold or transferred, or any alienation or change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance. It was held that the words "sold, transferred, alienated," do not ordinarily include a sale upon execution, and the words "change in the title of possession" do not extend the meaning; and this would be the meaning were it not for the words "by legal process or judicial decree." But since under a sale on execution the owner of the land has full right of possession and occupancy for 15 months after the sale, and for 12 months of that time he has an absolute right to redeem, so that neither possession nor title passes before the end of 15 months, such a sale does not violate the provisions of the policy. Hammel v. Queen's Insurance Co., 11 N. W. 349, 355, 54 Wis. 72, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

"Alienated," as used in a fire policy providing that the policy shall be void if the insured property is alienated, construed not to include the seizure of the insured goods on execution without removing them, since the general property and the goods remain in the debtor until they are sold. Rice v. Tower, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 420-429.

Lease.

Comp. Laws Kan. 1879, and Const. art. 15, § 9, providing that a homestead occupied as a residence shall not be alienated without the joint consent of the husband and wife, when that relation exists, prohibits the husband from executing a lease of the homestead for a term of five years, and giving possession thereof to a tenant, without the consent of his wife. Coughlin v. Coughlin, 26 Kan. 116, 118.

As sale in course of business.

"Alienated," as used in a fire policy on a stock of goods kept for sale, which provides that if the property be alienated by sale or otherwise it shall avoid the policy, construed to mean a sale of the whole or a material part of the stock out of the regular course of business, and not a sale of various items of the stock in the ordinary course of business. Lane v. Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 44-48.

Sale of partner's interest.

A fire policy, providing that it shall be void by "alienation" of the property by sale or otherwise, is to be construed as including a transfer by one partner, having an interest in the property, of his interest to another party. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Ross, 23 Ind. 179, 183, 85 Am. Dec. 452.

Settlement of boundary.

"Alienation" means, in law, the transfer of title by conveyance, so that the statute forbidding the "alienation" of property by a corporation except by a three-fifths vote of its stockholders relates to alienation of real estate, and will not include the mere settlement of a boundary dispute. Pittsburgh & L. A. Iron Co. v. Lake Superior Iron Co., 76 N. W. 395, 403, 118 Mich. 109.

Transfer without consideration.

"Alienate," as used in a quitclaim deed reserving to the grantor the power to "alienate" or mortgage, means "to divest one's self of property or title, to transfer property from one's self to another," which is not done by the execution of quitclaim deeds by the grantor without consideration. Harty v. Doyle, 3 N. Y. Supp. 574, 575, 49 Hun. 410.

Though the word "sale," as used in the Alabama statutes empowering a married woman to dispose of her separate property by sale, was used in its legal sense as a transfer of property for a valuable consideration, yet the word "alienation," as used in a subsequent statute giving a married woman power to alienate her separate property the same as a feme sole, authorizes a married woman to convey her land without consideration. Stacey v. Walter (Ala.) 28 South. 89, 90, 82 Am. St. Rep. 235.

ALIENATION IN MORTMAIN.

See "Mortmain."

ALIENIST.

An "alienist" is a person who has made mental diseases, those affecting the mind involuntarily, and the moral or spiritual faculties, his special study. State v. Reidell (Del.) 14 Atl. 550, 552.

ALIGNMENT.

In a contract for the construction of a village waterworks system, providing that the city engineer could make such changes in the form, dimensions, and "alignment" of the work as might be necessary for its proper fulfillment, the word "alignment" cannot be construed to mean simply an adjusting of a line, so that a change in alignment cannot be construed to cover a change of line, but signifies not only the act of adjusting to a line, but the state of being so adjusted, and in terms of engineering is used to denote the ground plan of a road or other work, as distinguished from its profile. Village of Chester v. Leonard, 37 Atl. 397, 400, 68 Conn. 495 (citing Webst. Dict.).

ALIKE.

The word "alike," as used in a will, is the same as the word "equally." Loveacres v. Blight, 1 Cowp. 352, 354.

ALIMONY.

See, also, "Suit Money"; "Permanent Alimony."

"Alimony" is defined to be an allowance which a husband or a former husband may be forced to pay to his wife or former wife, living legally separate from him, for her maintenance. Stivers v. Wise, 46 N. Y. Supp. 9, 18 App. Div. 316; Rogers v. Vines, 28 N. C. 293, 297; Sanchez v. Sanchez, 21 Fla. 346, 350; Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286, 319 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 441); De Roche v. De Roche (N. D.) 94 N. W. 767, 769; Chase v. Chase, 55 Me. 21, 23; Keerl v. Keerl, 34 Md. 21, 25; Newman v. Newman, 69 Ill. 167, 168.

"Alimony" is that allowance which is made to a woman on a decree of divorce, for her support out of the estate of her husband. It is equivalent to the obligation, implied in every marriage contract, that the husband shall furnish his wife a suitable support and maintenance. Adams v. Storey, 26 N. E. 582, 584, 135 Ill. 448, 11 L. R. A. 790, 25 Am. St. Rep. 392; Taylor v. Taylor, 93 N. C. 418, 420, 53 Am. Rep. 460; Westerfield v. Westerfield, 36 N. J. Eq. (6 Stew.) 195, 197; In re Le Claire (U. S.) 124 Fed. 654, 657 (citing Martin v. Martin, 21 N. W. 595, 65 Iowa, 255); Sheafe v. Sheafe, 24 N. H. (4 Fost.) 564, 567.

"Alimony," in its origin, was the method by which the spiritual courts of England enforced the duty of support owed by the husband to the wife during such time as they were legally separated pending the marriage relation. The courts of law could not adequately enforce this duty, but made a clumsy and circuitous attempt to do so under some circumstances by employing the fiction that a wife living apart from her husband by reason of his fault was his agent for the purpose of binding him to pay third parties for necessities furnished to her. Manby v. Scott, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 502; Snover v. Blair, 25 N. J. Law (1 Dutch.) 94; Vusler v. Cox, 22 Atl. 347, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 516. At common law, a divorce from the bonds of matrimony was granted by the ecclesiastical courts only for such causes as rendered the marriage void ab initio. Naturally, alimony was not allowed as an incident to such a divorce, for, there being no marriage, the duty of maintenance had not been undertaken. Divorces a mensa et thoro, however, amounting merely to a legal separation, were granted for causes which rendered it improper or impossible for the parties to live together, and in such case the ecclesiastical court ordered a periodical allowance to be paid by the husband to the wife for her support, the amount thereof being settled at the discretion of the judge, in view of all the circumstances of the case. The spiritual courts reserved and exercised the power of varying the amount of the alimony from time to time as required by change of circumstances. In this state, the subject-matter of divorce having been by statute committed to the court of chancery, and causes for absolute divorce having been allowed other than such as rendered the marriage void ab initio, there followed as a logical consequence the allowance of permanent alimony, in cases of absolute divorce, as a means of enforcing the continuing duty of support which the husband owed to the wife, and of which he was not permitted to absolve himself by his own misconduct, although that misconduct resulted in a dissolution of the marriage. Lynde v. Lynde (N. J.) 52 Atl. 694, 699.

"Alimony" is the allowance which a husband, by order of the court, pays to his wife, being separate from him, for her maintenance. Bish. Mar. & Div. This definition is substantially the same as that given by other American and English authorities, and may be said to be only applicable to divorces a mensa et thoro, because it presumes the relation of husband and wife still to exist, although the parties are separated by virtue of the decree of a competent court, and is peculiarly applicable to divorces granted by the courts in England prior to the year 1858, for in England, previous to that year, no judicial divorces dissolving the bonds of matrimony originally valid were allowed. Bowman v. Worthington, 24 Ark. 522, 523.

"Alimony" is an allowance for the support of the wife during divorce proceedings, or after a separation a mensa et thoro. The right to alimony of any kind is founded on the duty of the husband to support his wife, but this duty does not extend to affording her a separate maintenance, except in those cases where the law judges that she may live apart from him, for her protection, in consequence of his wrongdoing. Collins v. Collins, 80 N. Y. 1, 12.

"Alimony" is that allowance made to a woman on a decree of divorce for her support out of the estate of her husband. At common law it was usually settled at the discretion of the ecclesiastical judge on consideration of the circumstances of the case. The principle on which alimony is given to a divorced wife is that it is the equivalent of that obligation, implied in every marriage contract, that the husband shall furnish his wife a suitable support. Stillman v. Stillman, 99 Ill. 196, 201, 39 Am. Rep. 21.

The term "alimony," in its broad sense, means support to which the wife and children are entitled on account of the misconduct or negligence of the husband or father. Bucknam v. Bucknam (Mass.) 57 N. E. 343, 344, 49 L. R. A. 735.

"Alimony" means subsistence or support, and it is apparent that such allowance is given for the support to which the wife was entitled by the marriage, and which she has been compelled to forego, and has been deprived of, through the husband's default in failing to perform the marriage contract and covenant. Stearns v. Stearns, 28 Atl. 875, 66 Vt. 187, 44 Am. St. Rep. 836.

"Alimony" is the support which the court decrees in favor of the wife as a substitute for the common-law right of marital support. Livingston v. Livingston, 66 N. E. 123, 127, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L. R. A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600.

"Alimony" is a maintenance secured by judicial authority during coverture or until reconciliation. Lockridge v. Lockridge, 33 Ky. (3 Dana) 28, 29, 28 Am. Dec. 52.

"In its strict technical sense 'alimony' proceeds only from husband to wife, and, where the relation is not that of husband and wife, strictly speaking there can be no alimony. Alimony grows out of the obligation of support which arises from the relation of husband and wife, and the moment the decree of divorce is granted the relation of husband and wife has ceased. There is no husband nor wife, hence there can be no alimony." In re Spencer, 23 Pac. 395, 396, 83 Cal. 460, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266.

"Alimony" may be defined to be such sum as is ordered by the court to be paid to the wife by the husband for her support during the time she lives separate from him, or to be paid by her late husband for her maintenance after divorce from the marriage tie. The latter is a creation of modern law, and is known as "permanent alimony." Green v. Green, 68 N. W. 947, 948, 49 Neb. 546, 34 L. R. A. 110, 59 Am. St. Rep. 560; Pape v. Pape, 35 S. W. 479, 480, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 99.

"Alimony" is an allowance which by order of the court the husband is compelled to pay the wife, from the date he has been legally separated or divorced, for her support and maintenance. This is to be distinguished in a general sense from "alimony pendente lite," and proceeds from the husband's common-law liability to support the wife. Henderson v. Henderson (Or.) 60 Pac. 597, 599, 48 L. R. A. 766, 82 Am. St. Rep. 741.

Alimony is an allowance out of the husband's estate, made for the support of the wife when living separate from him. It is either temporary or permanent. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2456.

"Alimony" imports a provision for the support of the wife out of the profits of the estate of her husband, the allowance to be regulated according to the value of the estate. If the wife was entitled to her dower and distributable portion of the estate as in cases of intestacy, it could scarcely be believed that the Legislature would have made the provision for her recovery of alimony by a proceeding against the husband as in other cases. If the estate was in the husband, then there was propriety in the provision; but if an interest in the wife is great or greater than she would be entitled to recover, then there was no necessity or propriety in the provision. Wooldridge v. Lucas, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 49, 51.

The word "alimony," as commonly used, is equally applicable to all allowances, whether annual or gross, made to a wife on a decree of divorce. De Roche v. De Roche (N. D.) 94 N. W. 767, 769 (citing Burrows v. Purple, 107 Mass. 432).

By "alimony" we understand what is necessary for the nourishment, lodging, and support of the person who claims it. It includes the education when the person to whom alimony is due is a minor. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 230.

Alimony decreed upon the dissolution of a marriage, if payable in installments, is, unless otherwise specially provided, an allowance for the support of the beneficiary during the life of herself and her divorced husband. The duty of support ends with the death of the beneficiary. Craig v. Craig, 45 N. E. 153, 155, 163 Ill. 176.

Continuous or gross payments.

Alimony is not a sum of money nor a specific proportion of the husband's estate given absolutely to the wife, but is a continuous allotment of sums payable at regular intervals from year to year, continuing only during the joint lives of the parties, or, when there is a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, until the wife remarries. Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324, 328.

"Alimony and maintenance," as used in Nix, Dig. 247 (Rev. St. p. 317, § 19), declaring that when a divorce shall be decreed it shall be lawful for the court of chancery to make such order touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife and care and maintenance of the children as shall be fit, reasonable, and just, means money payments of the character of an annuity, and does not authorize the giving of a gross sum nor a portion of the real estate of the husband, since the terms "alimony" and "maintenance" were practically synonymous, and imported the giving of special specific sums necessary for the maintenance and support of the wife and child as needed. Calame v. Calame, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 C. E. Green) 548, 551.

Alimony includes all allowances made to a wife on the decree of a divorce, whether payable in periodical installments or in a gross sum. Robinson v. Robinson, 21 Pac. 1095, 1096, 79 Cal. 511.

"Alimony," as used in St. 1785, c. 69, § 5, St. 1805, c. 57, St. 1810, c. 119, Rev. St. c. 76, § 31, and Gen. St. c. 107, §§ 43, 44, providing that upon granting a wife a decree of divorce she may be allowed reasonable alimony out of her husband's estate, includes gross allowances as well as the payments of sums at stated intervals. Burrows v. Purple, 107 Mass. 428, 432

As a debt.

See "Debt"; "Debt Founded on Contract."

Dependent on means of parties.

"While 'alimony' is commonly defined a proportion of the husband's estate, yet the duty of the husband to maintain his wife does not depend alone on his having visible tangible property. While the parties are living together they are bound to contribute by their personal exertions to a common fund, which in law is the husband's, but from which the wife may claim support. If she is compelled to seek a divorce on account of his misconduct, she loses none of her rights in this respect, only she is to draw her maintenance in a different way; that is, under a decree for alimony, based, if he has no property, on his earnings or ability to earn money." Bailey v. Bailey (Va.) 21 Grat. 43, 57.

Alimony is a support for the wife allowed out of the husband's estate during proceedings for a divorce, or after a divorce a mensa et thoro. It depends on no principle of indebtedness, nor on his merit or demerit, but on the amount of his means and those of the party in whose favor it is decreed. Chase v. Ingalls, 97 Mass. 524, 527.

Alimony is an equitable allowance made to a wife out of her husband's estate on dissolution of the marriage relation, and should be based on the value of the estate, taking into consideration the debts of the husband. Daniels v. Lindley, 44 Iowa, 567, 569.

"As applied to the marital relation, 'alimony' is that maintenance or support which the husband on separation is bound to provide for the wife, and is measured by the wants of the person entitled to it, and the circumstances or ability of him who is bound to furnish it." Wheeler v. Wheeler, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 39, 40.

Alimony is an allowance for support and maintenance, having no other purpose and provided for no other object. It is solely intended to furnish a provision for food, clothing, and habitation for the wife who has been driven to seek a divorce on account of the husband's wrongful breach of the marriage contract. The amount necessary for this purpose depends more or less on the condition, habits of life, and social position of the parties. Turner v. Turner (U. S.) 108 Fed. 785-787.

Alimony is the maintenance or support which a husband is bound to give his wife upon a separation from her, or the support which either father or mother is bound to give to his or her child, though this is more generally called "maintenance." It is accorded in proportion to the wants of the person requiring it, and the circumstances of those who are to pay it. Burr v. Burr (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 207, 213.

"Alimony payable from time to time" may well be regarded as a portion of the husband's current income or earnings, and is ordinarily based and measured in its allowance upon such income or earnings. In re Lachemeyer (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 914, 915.

Alimony is an allowance for support and maintenance, having no other purpose and provided for no other object. Like the alimentum of the civil law, from which the word was evidently derived, it respects a provision for food, clothing, and a habitation, for the necessary support of the wife after the marriage bond has been severed; and since what is thus necessary has more or less relation to the condition, habit of life, and social position of the individual, it is graded in the judgment of the court of equity somewhat by regard for these circumstances, but never loses its distinctive character. Romaine v. Chauncey, 29 N. E. 826, 827, 129 N. Y. 566, 14 L. R. A. 712, 26 Am. St. Rep. 544.

Division of property distinguished.

Alimony is an allowance which by order of the court the husband or former husband is compelled to pay to his wife or former wife, from whom he has been legally separated or divorced, for her support and maintenance. The foundation of its allowance is the duty of the husband to provide for the wife's support. A division of the property of the parties is essentially a different thing. Johnson v. Johnson, 46 Pac. 700, 701, 57 Kan. 343.

As part of divorce proceedings.

The demand for alimony is not an essential part of the cause of action for a divorce. It is described by Bishop as a mere appendage of the action, or, where it enters into the final decree, it is a mere accident of the judgment. Hecht v. Hecht, 36 N. Y. Supp. 271, 272, 14 Misc. Rep. 597 (citing Forrest v. Forrest, 25 N. Y. 501).

As an estate or property right.

Alimony is not itself an estate in a technical legal sense of the word, and therefore not the separate property of the wife. Guenther v. Jacobs, 44 Wis. 354, 355; Miller v. Miller, 75 N. C. 70, 72.

Alimony allowed to a wife by the final decree granting her a divorce is not her property or separate estate, and cannot be reached by creditors whose claims and judgments antedate such decree. Romaine v. Chauncey, 15 N. Y. Supp. 198, 60 Hun, 477.

A wife's claim for an allowance of alimony is a purely personal right, and not in any sense a property right. It is in its nature not susceptible of assignment by the wife to another, nor capable of enjoyment by her in anticipation. Lynde v. Lynde, 52 Atl. 694, 699, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L. R. A. 471 (citing Miller v. Miller, 1 N. J. Eq. [Saxt.] 386; In re Robinson, 27 Ch. Div. 160).

Alimony is that portion of the husband's estate which is allowed to the wife for her sustenance and livelihood. It is unlike property held for her sole and separate use, and on her death the arrears, if any, belong to the husband, subject only to the payment of her debts. Holbrook v. Comstock, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 109, 110.

Estate of husband distinguished.

Alimony is a temporary provision allowed by the court to a wife, to continue during the separation of herself and husband, and hence, "does not include the allowance of a portion of the husband's estate in fee." Calame v. Calame, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 C. E. Green) 548, 550.

In the statute providing that in a decree of divorce the court may adjudge to the wife such part of the personal estate of the husband and alimony out of his estate as may be just, having regard to his ability, the estate intended must be understood as the estate applicable to the payment of alimony. The words "estate" and "alimony" in the section are not only associated within the rule of noscitur a sociis, to be understood in the kindred sense; they are correlatives, dependent one on the other for effect, and should be understood in a corresponding sense. Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206, 218. The words "alimony" and "estate," as used in Wis. Rev. St. § 2364, which, after declaring that "alimony may" be allowed, provides that the court may finally divide and distribute the estate, are not to be associated within the rule of noscitur a sociis, to be understood in a kindred sense; they are correlatives, depending one on the other for effect, and should be understood in a corresponding sense. Blake v. Blake, 43 N. W. 144, 145, 75 Wis. 339. In the former case it is further said: "We are not considering division of the estate, but alimony proper. The correlative estate must be intended as an estate available to the payment of the correlative alimony. This seems to disregard actual estate not yielding income, and implies income, however accruing, whether from estate proper, or employment, or both. This view is strongly upheld by the concurrent direction to have regard to the ability of the husband. The court shall have regard, not to his estate only, but to his ability; that is, his ability to pay by way of annuity or income. The word 'ability' here plainly bears the sense of the ecclesiastical term 'faculties.' For ability to pay by way of annuity does not rest on estate in the sense of investment, but on estate in the sense of income; ability to pay income to another depends on the income of the person to pay it. We have therefore no difficulty in holding, on authority, that 'alimony' may be always based on the husband's income at the time of divorce and afterwards." Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206, 218.

Alimony is a maintenance offered to the wife where the husband refuses to give it, or where from his improper conduct she is compelled to live separate from him. It is not a portion of his real estate to be assigned to her in fee simple, subject to her control, or to be sold at her price, but a provision for her support, to continue during their joint lives or so long as they live separate. Upon the death of either, or upon their mutual consent to live together, it ceases. Wallingsford v. Wallingsford (Md.) 6 Har. & J. 485, 488 (quoted in Field v. Field [N. Y.] 15 Abb. N. C. 434, 438).

"Alimony" is not an estate, and not a portion of the husband's estate to be assigned to the wife as her own, and, though it is payable out of the husband's real as well as his personal property, the word never covers the estate itself. Bacon v. Bacon, 43 Wis. 197, 203.

Income implied.

Alimony implies an income, and does not mean the corpus or capital yielding it, and it is paid by the husband as a part of and out of the income of his estate. It is not necessarily a charge upon the husband's estate; it may be derived from personal labor, wages, or salary, as well as from land or personal property. Miller v. Miller, 75 N. C. 70, 71.

Maintenance of children.

In its proper signification, "alimony" is not maintenance to the children, but to the wife, so that obligation of a man, or of his estate after his death (Pub. St. c. 189, § 17), to support his child, is not discharged by the procuring of a divorce by the mother, with alimony and custody of the child. Dolloff v. Dolloff, 38 Atl. 19, 20, 67 N. H. 512.

"Alimony" in its proper sense is not maintenance to the children, but to the wife. Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 452, 459, 15 N. E. 471, 4 Am. St. Rep. 542. Thus an order made by the common pleas, in granting a motion to modify the original decree in a divorce case as to the custody and maintenance of minor children, which requires the father to pay to the mother a monthly stipend for the support of the children, of whom she is given the custody, is not an order for the payment of alimony, and no appeal can be taken from such judgment to the circuit court. Rogers v. Rogers, 36 N. E. 310, 312, 51 Ohio St. 1.

Where, in a decree of divorce, the custody of minor children is awarded to the wife, and the husband is required to pay her a monthly sum for their support, such allowance is not alimony. Pape v. Pape, 35 S. W. 479, 480, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 99.

For present and future.

The word "alimony," as used in Indiana statutes in speaking of a judgment for support and maintenance of a wife, uses it in its primary sense of nourishment, sustenance, means of living, and hence applies only to nourishment and means of sustenance for the present and future. Carr v. Carr, 33 N. E. 805, 807, 6 Ind. App. 377.

ALIMONY PENDENTE LITE.

See, also, "Temporary Alimony."

"Alimony pendente lite," in a strict sense, is an allowance which the husband may be compelled to pay to the wife to enable her to prosecute a suit for divorce, or to defend an action where the proceedings are instituted by him. It is held that "alimony pendente lite" includes not only a reasonable allowance for the support and maintenance of the wife during the pendency of the action, but also court costs, reasonable attorney's fees, and necessary expenditures to enable her to prepare and conduct her case in an efficient manner. Gundry v. Gundry (Okla.) 68 Pac. 509, 510.

In its nature, "alimony pendente lite" is a fund for the current support of the wife. It is not in any sense a debt due from the husband to the wife, but is simply a provision made by law, in appropriate cases, to enable the wife to support herself and defend her rights in a suit for divorce against her husband, or a suit by him against her. Where a husband is paying excessive alimony and has the amount reduced, he cannot apply the amount overpaid on the current demand for accruing alimony. Johnson v. Johnson (Tenn.) 49 S. W. 305, 307.

"Alimony pendente lite" is that allowance which a husband may be forced to pay to the wife during the pendency of an action for divorce, separation, or annulment of marriage. Such definition recognizes the husband as the source of payment, so that alimony pendente lite cannot be awarded against the parent of an infant son who institutes an action to annul his marriage. Stivers v. Wise, 46 N. Y. Supp. 9, 18 App. Div. 316.

Wag. St. p. 535, § 12, providing that in a suit for a divorce the court may decree alimony pending suit in all cases where the same would be just, whether the wife be plaintiff or defendant, is properly construed to authorize the allowance of a reasonable sum for defending the suit where the husband is complainant. Waters v. Waters, 49 Mo. 385, 388.

An application for alimony pendente lite rests solely on the ground of necessity. Originally such allowances were made in divorce suits almost as a matter of course. This was but the natural result of the fact that at common law, by the marriage contract, the husband acquired complete control over all property owned by the wife at the time of the marriage, or which she might acquire during coverture. In such a state of affairs, unless the court required the husband to support his wife and to furnish her with the means of prosecuting her suit or defending his, she would be left during the litigation both destitute and defenseless, but since the modern innovations with respect to the proper rights of married women no such reason exists, and alimony pendente lite will only be allowed in cases where it is made to appear that such allowance is necessary. The facts that a wife is destitute of means to carry on her suit and to support herself during its pendency are as essential as any other fact to authorize the court to award temporary alimony. Westerfield v. Westerfield, 36 N. J. Eq. (9 Stew.) 195, 197.

ALIQOT. See page 312, post.

ALIVE.

See "Born Alive."

The term "alive," when used in an indictment charging the defendant with the larceny of animals, "the same being alive," may be rejected as surplusage, inasmuch as it is to be presumed animals are alive unless they are stated to be dead. Kollenberger v. People, 11 Pac. 101, 102, 9 Colo. 233.

The word "alive," as used in a will providing that, if any of the testator's children should die without issue "alive," the share of such child should be divided among the surviving children, refers to the devisee's death as the antecedent, and describes the state or condition of the issue at that precise time, and the natural and grammatical meaning is "if he die without issue alive when he dies." It cannot mean if he die without issue a century hence alive, and "dying without issue alive" means the same as "dying without issue," and both import an indefinite failure of issue. Van Middlesworth v. Schenck, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 29, 41.

ALIZARIN.

Alizarin is a natural dyestuff, found in the root of the madder plant, and has long been known as such in the art of coloring. It is formed and held in the fiber of the root, and reached by distintegrating the substances which it is among, separating it from them, and securing it, by long and well-known process. It is essentially an extract from among other natural products, and not in any sense an artificial compound. Its structure was carefully studied by chemists, and its formation ascertained to be composed of 14 atoms of carbon, 8 of hydrogen, and 4 of oxygen, represented by the formula $C_{14}H_8O_4$. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Cochrane (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 339, 340.

Alizarin is a peculiar red coloring matter ($C_{14}H_8O_4$), formerly obtained from madder and incidentally used as a dyestuff, but now artificially prepared from anthracene ($C_{14}H_{10}$), a product of the distillation of coal tar. Farbenfabriken of Elberfeld & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 102 Fed. 603, 42 C. C. A. 525.

A lake pigment, composed of 42.20 per cent. of alizarin, and 56.80 aluminum oxide, which is classed by the government chemists as alizarin color, comes within Tariff Act 1894, providing for the free entry of alizarin colors. Keppelmann v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 777.

ALKALOID SALT.

"Alkaloid salt," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 76, includes hydrochlorate or muriate of cocaine, which consists of hydrochloric acid in combination with cocaine, which is, chemically speaking, an alkaloid. This chemical compound is also a medicinal preparation, which is prepared for use by treating crude cocaine with hydrochloric acid to form the salt, and by washing it with alcohol to remove certain impurities found in crude cocaine. In re Mallinckrodt Chemical Works (U. S.) 66 Fed. 743.

ALIUOT.

The word "aliquot" is generally used in judicial opinions to signify a particular fraction of the whole. Skehill v. Abbott, 68 N. E. 37, 184 Mass. 145.

ALL

"All" means "every one, or the whole number of particulars; the whole number." State v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 66 Me. 488, 510.

A more comprehensive word cannot be found in the English language, and, when used in the condition of a policy of insurance providing that "all" fraud shall be a cause of forfeiture of any claim under the policy, it has the comprehensive meaning to be gathered from the literal terms in which it is expressed. Moore v. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (Va.) 28 Grat. 508, 516, 26 Am. Rep. 373.

"All," within a statute requiring the inspectors of wheat to determine the weight of "all wheat" that shall be inspected by them, does not require that every bushel shall be weighed, and the weighing 1 bushel in every 60, according to long-established usage, is the weighing of all wheat within the meaning of the act. Frazier v. Warfield, 13 Md. 279, 290, 291.

"All," as used in a statute imposing taxes, refers to such things as are within the jurisdiction of the taxing power. Thus a statute taxing "all" horses would not be held to tax those in another state. Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 146.

As all other.

The last section of St. 1834, authorizing a license for sale of liquor, and declaring that the act shall take effect from the first Monday of September following its enactment, and that "all acts and parts of acts" relating to the subject-matter were repealed from and after the time aforesaid, must be construed as intending "all other acts," since it would be absurd to hold the act repealed at the very moment when it was in express terms to take effect, and that the omission of the word "other" was therefore immaterial. State v. Stinson, 17 Me. (5 Shep.) 154, 158.

A marine insurance policy providing that the insurance was to be "against all risks" must be construed as creating a special insurance and extending to other risks than are usually contemplated, and covers all losses except such as arise from the fraud of the insured. Golz v. Knox, 1 Johns. Cas. 337, 340.

A policy of fire insurance, providing that in case of loss the insured shall furnish a statement of all other insurance and copies of "all policies" on the property, means copies of all other policies on the property exclusive of the policy in question, and therefore does not require the insured to furnish a copy of that policy. Miller v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 29 N. W. 411, 412, 70 Iowa, 704.

As any or each.

"All," as used in a will devising certain property share and share alike to certain persons, but providing that on the decease of "all" of said persons the property should go to their heirs, is to be construed as meaning "each or every one of." Sherburne v. Sischo, 9 N. E. 797, 798, 143 Mass. 439.

"All," as used in a devise to a mother and two daughters of an income during her life, and to each of the daughters a certain income so long as both they and their said mother shall "all" live, is not to be construed to mean "each," but is only satisfied by the death of the three. Towle v. Delano, 10 N. E. 769, 773, 144 Mass. 95.

In Rev. St. § 829 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 636], providing that "in all cases" where mileage is allowed the marshal may elect to receive the same or his actual traveling expenses, "in all cases" is not equivalent to "upon any process, warrant, attachment or writ," so that the marshal, having several writs in his hand at the same time, served on different persons at the same place, cannot at his election charge actual expenses on one and full mileage on the other. Saunders v. United States (U. S.) 73 Fed. 782, 790.

In a fee bill giving to a constable traveling expenses "in all cases," for each mile circular, six cents, the words "in all cases" are used in the sense of each case. McGee v. Dillon, 103 Pa. 433, 435.

As both.

In a return of an execution certifying that the creditor having appointed an appraiser and the debtor refusing to appoint one, the sheriff appointed two certain appraisers, "all indifferent freeholders," "all" signifies that the three appraisers were indifferent freeholders, and could not be limited to the two named, as such construction would virtually require the substitution of the word "both," which describes only two persons, for the word "all," which naturally includes more than two. Donahue v. Coleman, 49 Conn. 464, 465.

"All," is a term of number, and as used in St. 1893, p. 499, § 204, providing that certain supervisors shall receive a certain per diem and mileage, and that "all" of which compensation shall not exceed a certain sum, includes both the items making up the basis of the compensation. Chapin v. Wilcox, 46 Pac. 457, 458, 114 Cal. 498.

As description of locality.

The use of the word "all" in a devise of "all" of a certain tract of real estate is, by the authority of Bailis v. Gale, 2 Ves. Jr. 48, and Right v. Sidebotham (Eng.) Doug. 759, to be taken as descriptive of locality, and not of interest. Jackson v. Harris, 8 Johns. 141, 146.

As ejusdem generis.

The use of the word "all," in a will giving testator lands and the money arising from the sale of his stock and "all" of his loose property to his nephew, indicates that the word "property" in the latter clause is not to be limited to the kind or character of property described in the preceding clause, and therefore the ejusdem generis rule of construction does not apply. Fry v. Shipley, 29 S. W. 6, 8, 94 Tenn. 252.

In a deed of trust conveying "all personal effects" of every name, nature, and description, according to the general rule "all personal effects" embraces only things of the same kind as those which had been mentioned before, which might not have been supposed to pass under the words there used. Bellamy v. Bellamy's Adm'r, 6 Fla. 62, 107.

"All my personal goods and chattels," as used in a will in which testator bequeathed all his household furniture and all his personal goods and chattels on certain premises, should be construed as meaning only chattels ejusdem generis with the household furniture specifically enumerated, so as to mean only other articles of the same kind belonging to the house, and not as including, in its broad sense, all property other than realty. Peaslee v. Fletcher's Estate, 14 Atl. 1, 5, 60 Vt. 188, 6 Am. St. Rep. 103.

As word of emphasis.

Under a statute providing that malice is to be implied when no considerable provocation appears, or when "all" the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart, the word "all" is a word of emphasis only, and it is not essential to the completeness of a charge based thereon. People v. McDonald, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 10, 14, 1 Pac. 345.

In a case involving a devise of a slave and "all her increase," the court, after saying that it had become the established doctrine of the state, in view of a certain decision, that a devise of increase be construed to include after-born children only, said that "it is supposed that the term 'all her increase' may make a difference. But supposing 'increase' to have the established meaning of after-born children, 'all' is merely an expletive, and includes all her after-born children." Donald v. Dendy, 2 McM. 123, 130.

As every.

In a deed reciting that it was made expressly subject to a mortgage of a certain sum, together with interest and taxes from a certain date, "all" of which are assumed by the party of the second part, "all" means every one of which, and must include every one of the incumbrances previously set out, being the mortgage, interest, and taxes, and cannot be restricted to the last two incumbrances. Field v. Thistle, 43 Atl. 1072, 1073, 58 N. J. Eq. 339.

The word "all" is sometimes construed to mean "every," and will be so understood in an ordinance providing that "all" ordinances shall be read three times before being passed, etc. Swindell v. State, 42 N. E. 528, 534, 143 Ind. 153, 35 L. R. A. 50.

In Cincinnati Municipal Code, § 98, providing that "all" by-laws and resolutions of a permanent nature shall be read on three different days, etc., "all" should be construed as meaning "every." Campbell v. City of Cincinnati, 31 N. E. 606, 608, 49 Ohio St. 463.

"All," as used in Mun. Code, p. 166, c. 660, § 98, providing that "all" by-laws, resolutions, and ordinances of a general or permanent nature shall be fully and distinctly read on three different days, unless the rule is dispensed with, means "every," making the law read, "Every by-law, resolution, or ordinance must be read on three different days, unless the rule is dispensed with." The rule must therefore be dispensed with as to each particular ordinance. Bloom v. City of Xenia, 32 Ohio St. 461, 462.

In Rev. St. § 2513, giving "all" judgment creditors of a debtor who have obtained judgment for the execution sale of the land of the debtor, except where the judgment is obtained by fraud, the right to redeem from such execution sale, "all" is to be construed in its popular meaning as meaning every judgment creditor, except those expressly excepted. Posey v. Pressley, 60 Ala. 243, 246.

As the whole.

"All appropriations, general and special," should be construed to be of no more comprehensive meaning than the phrase "all appropriations," as the word "all" necessarily includes the whole. State v. Babcock, 33 N. W. 709, 711, 22 Neb. 33.

Where a will directed a sale of land for the purpose of paying "all" testator's debts, this provision indicated an intention on the testator's part that no part of the personal property should be used to pay debts, provided the proceeds of the real estate were sufficient for that purpose, and as the word

"all" was thus used it meant the whole, and not the remainder after application of the personal property. Sweeney v. Warren, 28 N. E. 413, 127 N. Y. 426, 24 Am. St. Rep. 468.

Nix, Dig. p. 218 (Rev. Laws, p. 209, § 8), declares that a landlord may "seize all or any wheat, rye, etc., or any produce whatever growing or being on the premises," as distress for rent. It was contended that the expression "all grain" in the connection in which it was used meant the grain of the tenant only, and did not include the crops on the property grown by others; but the court declined so to limit the statute, and declared that the term "all grain" was used in its popular sense, and extended the power of distress to all grain grown on the premises, by whomsoever it might be owned. Guest v. Opdyke, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 552, 555.

All accounts.

A submission to arbitrators of "all accounts, disputes, controversies, and reckonings," of whatsoever nature, now existing between the parties, should be construed to include the accounts of a partnership composed of the parties to the submission and a partner deceased. Wooden v. Little (S. C.) 3 McCord, 487, 489.

All actions or causes of action.

"All actions," as used in an agreement of attorneys under which a rule of court was made providing for the confession of judgment at certain periods, unless the clients would swear that they had a just defense, does not extend to torts, nor to matters in which plaintiff has no certain demand, or to executors or administrators, or to infants. Read v. Bush (Pa.) 5 Bin. 455, 457.

Prac. Act, § 124 (Revision, p. 868) providing that in all actions of libel and slander the plaintiff shall be at liberty to aver that the words or matter complained of were used in a defamatory sense, specifying such defamatory sense, without any prefatory averment to show how such words or matter were used in that sense, governs actions for slander of title. "Remedies of this kind are plainly within the language of the act, for it applies in terms to all actions of slander, and these are of that sort; nor is there any substantial difference between an action for a slander of a title to property and an action for slander of a person, for in the latter instance the words are actionable only on the ground of the special damage which has resulted. But whether or not such close similarity exists, the statute must be taken to apply in this and in similar cases, because they are not only within the words of the act, but they are also within the mischief to be remedied, for the same technicality in pleading prevailed according to the old mode in suits for defamation of title as in suits for defamation of character, there being the same difficulty in making the innuendoes congruous with the colloquium." Andrew v. Deshler, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 16, 19.

A release given to the acceptor of a bill of exchange, on a compromise with creditors, reciting that it released all "actions and causes of action," will not include a cause of action for money afterwards paid as indorser, when the bill had been negotiated before due, and at the date of the release was held bona fide by a third party. Crawford v. Swearingen, 15 Ohio, 264, 280.

All advances.

Where a bond is conditioned to pay "all the advances" which may be made under an agreement at the times, in the manner, and with the interest stipulated in such agreement, such bond is a continuing security for all advances finally unpaid to the amount of the penalty of the bond. Shores v. Doherty, 26 N. W. 577, 578, 65 Wis. 153.

All banks.

"All banks," as used in Const. art. 12, § 3, providing that all property, effects, or dues of every description of "all banks" shall be taxed, means only those banks which exercise the functions of issuing paper money, and does not include private bankers and exchange brokers who conduct their business without any special statutory authority, and includes only those banks, created by authority of law, which, in addition to the ordinary business of banking, have the power to issue their paper to circulate as money. Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, 31.

All bills or notes.

"All bills or notes," as used in the charter of a bank authorizing it to deal with "bills and notes," is very comprehensive, and includes bills of exchange. Battertons v. Porter, 12 Ky. (2 Litt.) 388, 389.

"All notes," as used in § 4 Anne, c. 9, declaring that "all notes" whereby any person promises to pay to any other person any sum of money shall be construed to be payable to any person to whom the same is made payable, and that every such note shall be assignable and indorsable as inland bills of exchange, etc., includes a note made in Scotland, the words "all notes" being given a liberal construction, and including foreign as well as inland notes, which are well within the spirit of the act. Milne v. Graham, 1 Barn. & C. 192.

All borrowed money.

"All borrowed money," as used in a deed of composition of creditors providing that the proceeds arising from the sale of the debtor's property should be used in paying "all borrowed money," etc., includes all sums of money loaned to the debtors, without regard to the mode or the existence of any security or evidence of indebtedness, and the comprehensive monosyllable "all" was sufficient to embrace money borrowed and security by mortgage, or a bond, bill, or note which was not secured. Murray v. Spencer, 24 Md. 520, 524.

All bridge structures.

"All bridge structures," as used in Laws 1873, p. 37, providing that all bridge structures across any navigable stream forming the boundary between the state of Illinois and any other state shall be assessed by the township where the same is located, does not include a bridge which was constructed and used solely as a part of a railroad track, but applies only to bridges owned by bridge companies. Anderson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 7 N. E. 129, 131, 117 Ill. 28.

All buildings.

A statute granting mechanics' liens against "all buildings" will not be held to include public buildings and grounds, unless they are, by the express terms of the statute, included within its operation. Atascosa County v. Angus, 18 S. W. 563, 83 Tex. 202, 29 Am. St. Rep. 637; City of Dallas v. Loonie, 18 S. W. 726, 727, 83 Tex. 291.

"All the buildings thereon," as used in deeds, have in fact no legal operation in the ascertainment of the particular premises conveyed, but are often inserted without any particular meaning. Crosby v. Parker, 4 Mass. 110, 114.

All business.

In a letter of attorney to ask, demand, and receive of a certain company all money that might become due to the writer on any account and to transact "all business," and on nonpayment use lawful means, the words "all business" did not authorize the attorneys to indorse a bill which they had received, but meant "all business" connected with the subject-matter. Rossiter v. Rossiter (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 494, 498, 24 Am. Dec. 62.

"All manner of business," when included in an authority of an agent by which the principal appointed the agent as his general and special agent to transact "all manner of business," did not necessarily authorize the agent to sell stocks or other property of the principal, and, if the agent sold public stock under such indefinite authority, it was necessary for the purchaser, at least when his title to the stocks is called in question, to show that he bought in good faith and paid a fair consideration. Hodge v. Combs, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 192, 194, 17 L. Ed. 157.

All cases.

The word "all," as used in Rev. St. art. 996, prescribing that the judgments of Courts of Civil Appeals shall be conclusive on the law and fact in "all" cases of divorce, and that no writ of error shall be allowed thereto from the Supreme Court, is significant that no exception was intended in cases where rights of property were involved in the determination of a divorce case. Kellett v. Kellett, 59 S. W. 809, 810, 94 Tex. 206.

"All," as used in the act of 1811 providing that "in all cases" where a levy is made on property which is claimed by a third person, and sufficient security is offered, it shall be the duty of the sheriff to leave the same in the possession of the claimant, means, in all cases where the claimant is in possession of the property he shall not be deprived of it, but it shall be left with him, and does not literally mean in "all cases," as the word "all" is frequently used to signify, not absolutely all, but all of a particular class only. Phillips v. State, 15 Ga. 518, 521.

Under St. 1851, c. 50, giving the justices of the Supreme Judicial Court power and authority to hear and determine in equity "all cases of trust arising under deeds, wills, or in the settlement of estates," the court may hear all cases of trust which arise under the contracts in writing of the deceased; that is, to trusts expressly and directly created, but not to those implied by law, or growing out of the official situation, or incidental to the official character of an executor or administrator. Given v. Simpson, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 303, 305.

A city charter giving the city court jurisdiction "of all cases" in which the cause of action arose within the city gives it jurisdiction of a demand for $25 for services rendered within the city, though such demand is also cognizable by a justice. Loomis v. Bourn, 28 Atl. 569, 571, 63 Conn. 445.

As used in Act 1873, § 18, providing that in all prosecutions for the sale of intoxicating liquors in violations of law, by indictment or otherwise, it shall not be necessary to state the kind of liquor sold, or describe the place where sold or the name of the person to whom sold, and in "all cases" the person or persons to whom the liquor shall be sold in violation of this act shall be competent witnesses to prove such fact, or any other tending thereto, "all cases" means criminal actions only, and hence, in an action for damages, sustained by a wife from intoxication of her husband, against the persons selling him the intoxicating liquors, the husband is not a competent witness for his wife in such case, in view of the common-law rule, and the legislative policy of the state, by which husband and wife are not competent witnesses for and against each other. Jackson v. Reeves, 53 Ind. 231, 233.

"All cases at law," as used in Const. art. 6, § 6, relating to the jurisdiction of courts, has no application to criminal cases. State v. Rising, 10 Nev. 97, 101.

Const. art. 1, § 5, declaring that the right of trial by jury shall extend to "all cases at law without regard to the amount in controversy," should be construed to mean civil actions, and to exclude criminal proceedings. Bennett v. State, 14 N. W. 912, 914, 57 Wis. 69, 46 Am. Rep. 26.

Code, § 348, as amended in 1857, providing for an appeal to the General Term from a judgment entered on the direction of a single judge in "all cases," means cases tried and decided after hearing the parties and an examination of the issues, and does not apply to a judgment to which the party against whom it is rendered has impliedly assented by his default. Flake v. Van Wagenen, 54 N. Y. 25, 28.

Cr. Code, § 158, declaring that, in "all cases" where the punishment shall be by confinement in the penitentiary, the jury shall in their verdict say what term the offender shall be confined, applies only to cases which are tried by a jury, since any other construction would lead to the consequence that on confession of guilt no punishment could be awarded. Blevings v. People, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 172, 173.

The words "in all cases," as occurring in the constitutional provision that the right to jury trial shall remain invalid "in all cases in which it has been heretofore used," is not confined to the kinds of action or the amounts claimed to be due thereon, but means in all the conditions and circumstances in which it had been heretofore used, including the tribunals and machinery of litigation in which it had been so used. Moreover, the word "jury" in such provision refers as well to the justice's jury of six as to the common-law jury of twelve; and it necessarily follows that the whole provision has reference to justices' juries as much as to common-law juries, and that the statute taking actions of replevin from courts of record, where juries are composed of 12 men, to justices' courts, where there are but 6, is constitutional. Mullen, P. J., dissented, however, both on the meaning of the word "jury" and of the phrase "all cases," referring the word "jury" to the common-law jury, and the phrase "all cases" to actions and proceedings, and hence reached an opposite conclusion as to the constitutionality of the statute. Knight v. Campbell (N. Y.) 62 Barb. 16, 25, 26.

All children.

A devise to testator's wife and "all" her children who should thereafter be born, etc., will be construed to include only such children as the testator should be the father of, and hence not to include the children of the wife by a second marriage after the testator's death. McCoy v. Fahrney, 55 N. E. 61, 63, 182 Ill. 60.

"All children," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, pp. 846, 847, § 2, requiring cities governed by the act to establish a system of free common schools, "free to all children" residing in such city between certain ages, means free to all children without discrimination as to color. Board of Education of City of Ottawa v. Tinnon, 26 Kan. 1, 20.

All claimants.

In Laws 1883, c. 272, § 14, requiring the claims of persons claiming mechanics' liens to state the names and residence of all the claimants, the phrase "all the claimants" means such claimants only as are interested in the particular claim, and does not mean all persons who have claims against the same property. Morgan v. Taylor, 5 N. Y. Supp. 920, 921, 15 Daly, 304.

All claims and demands.

"All claims," as used in Code 1876, § 2597, providing that all claims against the estate of a deceased person must be presented within 18 months after the same have accrued, or within 18 months after the grant of letters testamentary or of administration, is to be construed in its ordinary meaning, and cannot be construed to "mean all claims except those of a class not specified." Ynles-tra v. Tarleton, 67 Ala. 126, 129.

In a release of "all claims and demands whatsoever," the words are to be restricted to the subject-matter of the release. Thus, where a release acknowledged that the party executing it had received from another a conveyance of certain land valued at $2,000 in full satisfaction and discharge of "all claims and demands whatsoever," the release was to be restricted to the claims and demands for such land, or to some certain demand of $2,000 which the conveyance was intended to satisfy. McIntyre v. Williamson, 1 Edw. Ch. 34, 39.

A receipt given in full satisfaction of a certain judgment therein specified, and also of "all claims and demands," will not include another suit then pending between the same parties. Language, however general in its form, when used in connection with a particular subject-matter is to be presumed to be used in subordination to that matter, and construed and limited accordingly. Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444, 456, 100 Am. Dec. 304.

The acceptance of an offer to compromise "all claims" in personal action for penalties did not constitute a variation, as all claims must be construed to mean "all known claims." United States v. Richardson (U. S.) 9 Fed. 804, 807.

The submission to arbitrators of "all demands" between the parties to the submission includes questions concerning real as well as personal property. Questions concerning real property may be submitted without being specially named, as the law does not require a specific submission as to the one kind of property more than as to the other. Munro v. Alaire (N. Y.) 2 Caines, 320, 327; Sellick v. Addams (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 197, 199.

Where defendant bought plaintiff's interest in certain real estate, and in consideration thereof acknowledged payment in full of "all" notes, accounts, and "demands" of every kind and nature which defendant held against plaintiff, "all demands" cannot be construed as limited to some particular demands, but is very comprehensive, and would include a judgment which is a demand and contract of record. Henry v. Henry, 11 Ind. 236, 237, 71 Am. Dec. 354.

Gen. St. c. 123, § 1, classifying claims against the estate of a decedent, makes the fourth class include all judgments against the deceased in his lifetime, the fifth class to embrace "all demands," without regard to quality, exhibited within one year, while the sixth class includes all demands thus exhibited after the end of one year. Held, that the phrase "all demands" as used in the fifth class should be construed to mean all demands except judgments, while the same term as used in the sixth class meant all demands, including judgments. State Bank v. Tutt, 44 Mo. 366, 367.

Where a bond was conditioned to pay "all demands," and the bond is submitted to referees to determine the amount due, the expression "all demands" embraces not only bills payable at the time of the submission, but those outstanding. Cheshire Bank v. Robinson, 2 N. H. 126, 129.

Act April 2, 1806, provides that, when any building shall be torn down by order of the mayor or aldermen in order to prevent a fire in such building spreading to adjoining buildings, all damages accruing to any person interested in such building shall be assessed by a jury, and that, after such assessment has been confirmed, the sum assessed shall be paid in satisfaction of "all demands" of such persons by reason of the tearing down of such building. Held, that "all demands" extends to every claim for damages on the part of those interested in the building, provided such damages were the direct and consequential damages, and includes damages to merchandise in the building. City of New York v. Lord, 17 Wend. 285, 294, 18 Wend. 126.

"All demands," as used in a bond conditioned to perform the award of J. of all actions, cause and causes of action, suits, debts, trespasses, damages, and "demands" whatever, and as used in the award by which the plaintiff should pay to the defendant a certain sum in full satisfaction of "all demands," is not to be construed personally, because coupled with debts, trespasses, etc., but, the submission being in general terms.

would carry with it the right to award the possession of a house. Marks v. Marriot, 1 Ld. Raym. 114.

All contracts.

The expression "all contracts," in the provisions of a city charter defining the powers and duties of a city comptroller, and providing that he shall sign all contracts made with the city if the necessary funds shall have been provided to pay the liability that may be incurred against the city under such contract, will be taken in its comprehensive sense to refer to all contracts previously mentioned, namely, such contracts as entail a pecuniary responsibility upon the city, and not limited to contracts by the board of public works. City of Superior v. Norton (U. S.) 63 Fed. 357, 362, 12 C. C. A. 469.

The Michigan franchise tax act of 1891 (Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8574), which requires every foreign corporation which shall hereafter be permitted to transact business in the state to pay a franchise fee, and provides that all contracts made in the state by any corporation which has not first complied with the provision of this act shall be void, is not to be construed literally, for this would include contracts in respect of purely interstate commerce, and make the act repugnant to the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution. As construed by the Supreme Court of the state, such statute has no application to a foreign corporation whose business relates entirely to interstate commerce, but imposes a tax upon the franchise or privilege of carrying on business within the state. Oakland Sugar Mill Co. v. Fred W. Wolf Co. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 239, 243, 55 C. C. A. 93.

All convenient speed.

See "Convenient Speed."

All costs and damages.

"All costs and all damages," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 559, providing that an undertaking to procure an arrest must, in case it is finally decided that plaintiff is not entitled to the order of arrest, indemnify the defendant for "all costs and damages," not exceeding $250, must be taken in conjunction, and hence, where costs have been paid to the extent of $250, the sureties in the undertaking are not further liable for damages. Sutorius v. Dunstan, 13 N. Y. Supp. 601, 602, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 166.

Under Comp. St. 1895, c. 50, § 15, providing that persons licensed to sell intoxicating liquors shall pay "all damages" that the community or individuals may sustain in consequence of such traffic, the words "all damages" include loss of means of support to a married woman by reason of death of husband through intemperance, and also the disability or disqualification of a husband, either total or partial, physical or mental, as partial or total insanity caused by intoxication and incapacitating for labor. Gran v. Houston, 64 N. W. 245, 247, 45 Neb. 813.

Within the meaning of 2 Burns' Rev. St. Ind. 1894, § 5073, "providing that the officers of the corporation shall be liable for failure to make reports or false reports as required by statute," the words "all damages" include unliquidated damages for the breach of a contract, as well as liquidated. MacVeagh v. Wild (U. S.) 95 Fed. 84, 86.

"All damages and costs," within the meaning of the judiciary act of 1789, requiring the plaintiff in error to give security to prosecute the writ of error to effect, and answer for damages and costs if he fails to make his plea good, when applied to an ordinary foreclosure suit in the courts of the United States does not operate as security for the amount of the original decree, nor for interest accruing thereon pending the plea, nor for the balance due after applying the proceeds of the mortgaged premises, nor for the rents and profits, or use or detention, of the property pending the appeal, but only for the costs of the appeal and the deterioration or waste of the property, and, perhaps, burden accruing on it by nonpayment of taxes and loss by fire if not properly insured. It is very doubtful whether a mere depreciation in the market value is any cause of recovery on the bond. According to the English law, the terms "all damages and costs" would only cover all damages for delay, security for the original judgment being expressly provided for by separate words. Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 2 Sup. Ct. 911, 917, 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. Ed. 609.

All courts.

The bankruptcy act of 1841, providing that a discharge shall in "all courts" be deemed a complete discharge of his debts, unless impeached for fraud, authorizes the impeachment in any court, state or federal, in which, independent of the bankrupt act, a suit might properly be brought against the bankrupt. Tichenor v. Allen (Va.) 13 Gratt. 15, 34.

Sess. Acts 1851, p. 479, incorporating the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad Company, and declaring that it "may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, in all courts or places whatsoever," is to be construed in a qualified sense. Hence the right to sue and the liability to be sued are to be exercised and controlled by the provisions of the general law. It does not mean that the railway company can be sued before a probate or county court, or before a justice of the peace, without reference to the nature of the action or the amount in controversy, or that a suit could be brought in a county, remote from the line of the road, where neither the plaintiff nor any of the officers of the company reside. Fatchell v. St. Louis & L. M. R. Co., 28 Mo. 178, 179.

All crops.

A receiver, appointed in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on certain land, harvested and sold the crops thereon, paying the proceeds to the mortgagee. Plaintiff, who claimed the crops under a chattel mortgage describing the property as "all and the entire crop of flax and wheat and other grain or produce raised on this land," brought an action against the receiver for the conversion of the crops. Held, that the description of the property was too indefinite and uncertain to have put the receiver on inquiry, and that plaintiff could not recover. Eggert v. White, 13 N. W. 426, 59 Iowa, 464.

All crossings.

2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) pp. 689, 690, §§ 55, 56, declaring that cattle guards shall be maintained at "all crossings," is to be literally construed, and hence it is necessary that road crossings adjacent to the station buildings of a railroad should be provided with such guards, notwithstanding that it is inconvenient to build them at such a place. Bradley v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., 34 N. Y. 427, 430.

All debts and liabilities.

A will wherein testator directed that the income of his estate previously directed to be paid to his children should not be subject to execution, attachment, or sequestration for "all debts or liabilities" whatsoever, meant all legal, equitable, and moral liabilities, and hence such income could not be subject to the payment of alimony awarded to the divorced wife of one of the children. Thackara v. Mintzer, 100 Pa. 151, 155.

Under the words in a deed of "all debts due the grantor," the indebtedness of a partner of the grantor to the partnership will pass, and also a claim which the grantor has on a foreign government for damages for the detention of his ship. Griffin's Ex'r v. Macaulay's Adm'r (Va.) 7 Grat. 476, 477.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors, to pay "all debts and liabilities" of the assignor, held to include damages for breach of a contract of sale made before the assignment, though the breach occurred afterward. In re Ives, 11 N. Y. Supp. 650, 653.

"All debts," as used in the bankruptcy act of 1841, § 4, providing that, when the bankrupt has conformed to all the requisitions of the act, he shall be entitled to a full and complete discharge of "all his debts," is to be construed to only mean debts contracted after the passage of the act. Kunzler v. Kohaus (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 317, 320.

"All debts," as used in Bankr. Act 1867, which declares that the certificate of discharge shall release the bankrupt from "all debts" which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy, does not embrace a debt due to the United States. United States v. Herron, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 251, 260, 22 L. Ed. 275.

Where a note is delivered to a bank as collateral security for loans, and the contract of hypothecation recites that the note is deposited as security for "all liability," the phrase "all liability" imports a continuing guaranty, and not a security for a single sum, or exhausted when the loans equal the amount of the note. Agawam Bank v. Strever, 18 N. Y. 502, 513.

The words "all the debts of such bank," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 33, § 21, declaring that the stockholders of banks shall be individually liable, in an amount equal to double the amount of the stock owned by them, "for all the debts of such bank," and such liability shall continue for one year after any transfer or sale of stock by any stockholder or stockholders, are general and unqualified in their meaning, and include all debts, without regard to when they were incurred, whether prior or subsequent to a stockholder's becoming such. Olson v. State Bank, 59 N. W. 635, 637, 57 Minn. 552.

In acts of assembly, as well as in common parlance, the word "all" is a general rather than a universal term, and it is used in one sense or the other according to the demands of sound reason, and in a statute authorizing the attachment of debts in execution, and declaring that "all" debts so attached shall remain in the hands of the garnishees, it includes debts due by bill of exchange and promissory notes. Stone v. Elliott, 11 Ohio St. 252, 258; Kieffer v. Ehler, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 388, 390.

Judgments and promissory notes not due are not included within the term "all debts due defendant," as used in Civ. Prac. Act, § 147, relating to matters subject to attachment. Perkins v. Guy, 2 Mont. 15, 22.

All directors or trustees.

Gen. St. § 252, provides that "all the directors or trustees" of a corporation shall be jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the company that shall be contracted during the year next preceding the time when a certain statutory report required should have been made and filed, and until such report shall be made. Held, that the words "all the directors or trustees," etc., are not to be construed literally, since such a construction would work manifest injustice, as it might frequently happen that the terms of office of the directors in charge of the corporation might expire after the indebtedness had been created and after the default, and hence the term should be construed to limit the liability to the trustees chargeable with neglect of duty, which construction leads to a reasonable result, and one which does not create a liability on persons in no way to blame for the default. Austin v. Berlin, 22 Pac. 433, 434, 13 Colo. 198.

All disputes.

Where a contract provided, "To prevent all disputes, it is hereby mutually agreed that the said engineer shall in all cases determine the amount or quantity of the several kinds of work which are to be paid for under the contract, and the amount of compensation at the rates herein provided for," etc., the words "all disputes" were clearly controlled and limited to the distinctly enumerated grounds of anticipated dispute in the same sentence, which are so defined that these general words have no force or meaning unless they relate to anticipated disputes arising out of the work to be done and compensation to be paid. The parties anticipated disputes from no other source, or, if they did, they chose to rely for a settlement of them upon the established tribunals of the country. He was to determine in regard to work done, and has nothing to do with the dispute between the parties arising from a claim for damages for not being permitted to do work. Lauman v. Young, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 306, 309.

All duties and obligations.

St. 1874, c. 55, authorizing a corporation to purchase the property of another corporation subject to "all the duties, obligations, and restrictions" to which such other corporation may be subject, cannot be construed to mean only those obligations which the corporation owed the public under the charter and the law of the commonwealth, but will include an existing liability on a tort. New Bedford R. Co. v. Old Colony Ry. Co., 120 Mass. 397, 400.

All estates.

Under a statute imposing an inheritance tax "on all estates, personal and mixed," by the term "all estates," the Legislature meant that which a person shall die seised or possessed of, and shall leave, either by will or through intestacy, to be administered according to the laws of the commonwealth; in other words, his property, real or personal. Dixon v. Ricketts, 72 Pac. 947, 950, 26 Utah, 615 (citing In re Howell's Estate, 147 Pa. 164, 23 Atl. 403).

All faults.

See "With All Faults."

All fishing.

Pen. Code, § 265, prohibiting "all" fishing, horse racing, gambling, "or other public sports" on Sunday, will not be construed to be limited to only such fishing as might constitute a disturbance of the peace. People v. Moses, 20 N. Y. Supp. 9, 10, 65 Hun, 161.

All goods, wares, or merchandise.

Act June 30, 1864, as amended by Act July 13, 1866, § 48, providing that "all goods, wares, merchandise, articles or objects" on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession or custody or within the control of any person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes, may be seized, etc., and shall be forfeited to the United States, should be construed to include distilled spirits, though they are provided for in a different part of the act by a distinct series of sections, the terms used being of a most general nature, so used as not to admit of any possible escape or evasion, and which necessarily include most of the cases before specifically provided for. The Distilled Spirits, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 356, 364, 20 L. Ed. 167.

All I am or die possessed of.

A will devising "all I shall die possessed of" is sufficient to convey the fee in testator's real estate, if there is nothing in other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724; White v. White, 52 Conn. 518, 521.

In speaking of the common-law rule that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise "of all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth," "all my rights," "all my title," "or all I shall be possessed of," and many other expressions of like import, will carry an estate of inheritance, if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

The words "all I am possessed of," as used in a will devising all testator's estate in personal property, etc., in legal construction relate to and speak from the date of the testator's death, and not from the date of the execution of the will, unless otherwise explained. Wilde v. Holtzmeier, 5 Ves. 811.

A will giving and bequeathing "all that I possess indoors and out of doors" is to be construed as including all of testator's property, both real and personal. Tolar v. Tolar, 10 N. C. 74, 75.

All I am worth or own.

A devise of "all I am worth," without other words to control them, passes real as well as personal estate. Huxtep v. Brooman, 1 Brown, Ch. 437; Barnes v. Patch, 8 Ves. 604, 607.

"All I am worth or own," as used in a will, means that an estate of inheritance is created. White v. White, 52 Conn. 518, 521.

The phrase "all I am worth," when used in a will providing for the disposition of "all I am worth," is sufficient to pass the fee in testator's real estate, when such intention is manifest from the entire instrument. Chamberlain v. Owings, 30 Md. 447, 455; Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724. In speaking of the common-law rule that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise "of all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," or "all I shall be possessed of," and many other expressions of like import, will carry an estate of inheritance, if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

All I have.

The phrase "all I have," when used in a will providing for the disposition of "all I have," is sufficient to pass the fee in testator's real estate when such intention is manifest from the entire instrument. Chamberlain v. Owings, 30 Md. 447, 455.

All I have power over.

Where a testator first gives his property generally by the words "all my property," or "all my estate," or "all that I have power over," each of which is sufficient to pass everything, and then proceeds to enumerate particulars, such enumeration of particulars does not abridge or cut down the effect of the general words. Williams v. Brice, 51 Atl. 376, 377, 201 Pa. 595.

All I now possess.

"All the property I now possess," as used in a will, meant all that the party "owned," and therefore included estates in remainder, despite the use of the word "now." Brantly v. Kee, 58 N. C. 332, 337.

"All the estate I now own and possess," as used in a will, must be understood to speak from the time of the testator's death. The estate he then possessed must be held to have passed according to its terms, and therefore includes property acquired after the making of the will. Haley v. Gatewood, 12 S. W. 25, 26, 74 Tex. 281.

1 Wds. & P.—21

All indictments.

A statute prohibiting the sale of liquors prohibited (a) the sale of wine, gin, brandy, whisky, cider, spirits, and all other kinds of ardent spirits, etc.; (b) of any composition of which wine or any of the liquors above mentioned shall form a general ingredient; (c) of all mixed liquors by a less quantity than five gallons. Another section of the statute provided that, "in all indictments" found under it, it should be sufficient to describe the liquor sold as ardent spirits, without specifying apart the kind or description thereof. Held, that the word "all" in the latter section must be restricted to indictments found for selling any of the simple unmixed liquors named in the act, and that an indictment on the second clause must be for selling a composition not compounded or intended to be used as medicine, and that indictments under the third clause must be for selling a mixed liquor, commonly called so, whatever its appropriate name may be, and hence it could not be sufficient to denominate such "compound" and "mixed liquors" as ardent spirits. State v. Townley, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 311, 321.

All inhabitants.

"All the inhabitants," as used in the act incorporating the town of Marlborough, meant all those who were inhabitants of the several towns from which the town of Marlborough was formed who were of full age and sui juris, and did not include those who had settlements in other towns. Town of Marlborough v. Town of Hebron, 2 Conn. 20, 22.

All insurance companies.

In the provisions of Civ. Code, § 2110, providing that all insurance companies shall pay the full amount of the loss sustained upon the property insured by them, providing, etc., the phrase "all insurance companies" is broad enough to cover a mutual insurance company, no exception being made in favor of such companies. Word v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co., 37 S. E. 897, 898, 112 Ga. 585.

All interest.

The words "all interest" in a trust deed purporting to convey all interest in a lot has a broader significance than the language "their right, title, and interest," or "all their right, title, and interest." Giving the words their common and obvious meaning, they include the entire property; and therefore the deed is a cloud on the title of the lot, although the mortgagor only owns the east vigintillionth of a vigintillionth of the east $\frac{1}{64}$ inch of the lot. Glos v. Furman, 45 N. E. 1019, 1021, 164 Ill. 585.

"All the interest," as used in a decree authorizing the sale and conveyance of "all the interest" of the parties in suit to certain land, should not be construed as a limitation of the estate conveyed, so as to give effect to a prior unrecorded deed as against the purchaser under the decree. Harpham v. Little, 59 Ill. 509, 513.

An assignment of "all the interest" of a partner in certain land purchased by such partner on the joint account of himself and others, in which the other partners advanced the sum of $50,000, and in which such partner was entitled to one-third of the net profits, includes only the interest of such partner in the profits of the enterprise which belonged to him as a partner, and did not embrace a collateral benefit which he derived as agent of the firm, or otherwise than as a partner. Stewart v. Stebbins, 30 Miss. 66, 83.

All judgments, decrees, or orders.

"All judicial decisions," as used in Const. art. 6, § 22, providing that all laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person, construed "to mean what they naturally import, not all such judicial decisions only as the Legislature should direct to be published, which is what they did not import." Little v. Gould (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 604, 606.

By act of 1841 all judgments and decrees of the courts of law or equity operated as liens upon the property of a debtor elsewhere than in the county in which the court was held only upon compliance with certain conditions as to filing and recording. Held, that since the act did not, in terms or by necessary implication, include the rights of the state, and since such rights cannot be construed as embraced in the statute unless such an intention is clearly manifest, judgments in favor of the state would operate as liens upon the land of the defendant wherever situated within the state, though the requirement as to recording had not been complied with. Fisher, J., dissenting. Held, however, that the words "all judgments and decrees" embraced those to which the state is a party. Josselyn v. Stone, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 753, 765.

The phrase "all orders made and entered in the action," used in a notice of appeal to describe the orders appealed from, is insufficient in failing to point out the particular orders from which the appeal is taken. Genella v. Relyea, 32 Cal. 159.

All labor, services, or work.

While the words "all labor," as used in a Sunday law, are equivalent to the words "labor, business, or work," yet the making of a contract on Sunday is not prohibited by the statute, the intention being to prohibit such work as disturbs the religious observances in the quiet of the Sabbath. Holden v. O'Brien, 90 N. W. 531, 86 Minn. 297.

"All services," as used in St. 1897, p. 133, § 1, providing that the salaries of county commissioners shall be in full for "all services," includes mileage. State v. Trousdale, 16 Nev. 357, 358.

Within an act providing that the sheriff of the county shall receive a salary in lieu of all costs and fees in criminal cases, and for "all work within the county," the expression "for all work within the county" would include the serving of venire for petit jurors, the proper and reasonable construction being for all work as sheriff within the county for which the county is liable. Hunter v. Bamberg County, 41 S. E. 26, 27, 63 S. C. 149.

All laborers.

Under Comp. Laws 1879, c. 84, entitled an act to protect laborers, mechanics, and others in the construction of railroads, and providing that the contractor shall pay "all laborers," etc., the only limitation to be placed on the words "all laborers" is the limitation imposed by the work which is to be accomplished, to wit, the construction of the railroad. Mann v. Corrigan, 28 Kan. 194, 196.

"All," as used in Act July 23, 1868, giving "all" laborers a lien upon the product of their labor until the same is paid for, is not to be construed literally as giving every laborer a lien for his labor, but has reference solely to labor performed on movable property. Dano v. Mississippi, O. & R. R. Co., 27 Ark. 564, 567.

All lands, messuages, etc.

"All lands," as used in St. 1821, setting "all lands" in a certain list of taxable property, was not all inclusive, but was to be construed as not including lands exempted by prior acts. Atwater v. Town of Woodbridge, 6 Conn. 223, 230, 16 Am. Dec. 46.

"All the lands belonging to grantor," as used in a contract for the sale of lands which were specifically described, could not be construed literally, as intending to convey all the grantor's lands; it also appearing that he had previously conveyed lands similarly situated with those specifically described, and that his intention was to avoid granting two conveyances for the same lands. Gibbs v. Diekma (U. S.) 26 L. Ed. 177, 178.

Where a deed conveyed "an undivided one-half of all my land in Texas," describing some of it, and then in a subsequent portion of the deed again used the words "all my lands," the last "all my lands" conveys not all of the grantor's land, but only one-half thereof, since it merely repeats the grantor's original purpose of making his conveyance of an undivided interest extend to his entire landed property in the state, light being thrown on his meaning in using the word "all" by the use which he had made of it in the preceding part of the deed, in which he had conveyed an undivided one-half of all his lands. The second "all" in the deed should be construed in connection with the first one, and no greater interest than that expressed in the first passes under the conveyance. Witt v. Harlan, 2 S. W. 41, 66 Tex. 660.

Where an award of arbitrators was to the effect that plaintiffs should execute a good authentic deed of conveyance to "all the lands" which the plaintiff held by a deed of conveyance from M., but there was no statement as to how much of said land he held, the phrase "deed of conveyance of all the lands which plaintiffs held by deed of conveyance from M." meant that he should convey all, more or less, which he held by that deed. Whitcomb v. Preston, 13 Vt. 53, 66.

The phrase "all the land we own adjoining the pond," in a lease thereof, was held, when taken in connection with the description of the land by bounds, to mean that the land described was owned by the lessors, which could not have been said if they were mere tenants in common of the land with another person. Smith v. Moodus Water Power Co., 33 Conn. 460, 462.

A devise of all the testator's messuages, lands, etc., will include money in trust to be invested in land and settled, though not particularly charged on the estate's devise. Green v. Stephens, 17 Ves. 64.

All laws or usages.

All laws inconsistent herewith, see "Inconsistent—Inconsistency."

As used in Hill's Code, § 2998, providing that "all laws" which impose or recognize civil disabilities upon the wife which are not imposed and recognized as existing to the husband are hereby repealed, "all laws" will be construed to include both the statutory and the common law, and hence the section applies to whatever laws impose or recognize civil disabilities in the one that are not recognized in the other. Ingalls v. Campbell (Or.) 24 Pac. 904, 906, 18 Or. 461.

"All laws or usages," as used in a lease in which the lessee waives the benefit of "all laws or usages," exempting any property from distress or execution for rent, includes a landlord's warrant as well as an execution for rent. Beatty v. Rankin, 21 Atl. 74, 139 Pa. 358.

All matters.

A reference to arbitration, submitting "all matters between the parties," authorizes the arbitrators to adjust and settle all claims of whatsoever name, kind, or nature existing between the parties, and justifies an award declaring that defendant's intestate is indebted to plaintiff in a certain sum, and directing the cancellation of two mortgages from plaintiff, which were put in evidence by defendant, the debts secured being adjusted by the arbitrator. Bryant v. Fisher, 85 N. C. 69, 72.

"All matters in dispute," as used in a submission for arbitration, will sustain an award made thereunder. Shackelford v. Purket, 9 Ky. (2 A. K. Marsh.) 435, 440, 12 Am. Dec. 422.

Const. art. 4, § 18, vesting jurisdiction in the probate court over "all matters in the allotment of dower," applies only to parties who claim in virtue of the title of the deceased as his widow or heirs, and signifies an apportionment of the interest of one or more parties entitled to a share of the estate, and does not include a controversy between the widow and a stranger, who held the deceased's lands adversely to his representatives. Jiggitts v. Bennett, 31 Miss. 610, 613.

All means within its power.

"All the means within its power," as used in an instruction to the effect that a railroad company was bound to use all the means within its power to prevent killing stock, was a phrase of unlimited import, and imposed on the railroad excessive precautions and a low rate of speed. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Vincent, 36 Ark. 451, 455.

All moneys.

Rev. St. 1858, § 42, requires that "all moneys" paid for school or university lands shall be paid in specie only, and that receipts therefor shall be countersigned by the secretary of state, or otherwise shall not be evidence of payment. Held, that the words "all moneys," as used in such section, were general, and, as the statute did not restrict the words by express exception, they must receive a general construction, and in connection with the provisions of section 43 must be construed to require the issuance of a duplicate certificate of sale on all sales of land by the commissioners of the school and university lands, whether such sales be for cash or credit. Harrington v. Smith, 28 Wis. 43, 59.

The decree of a court in an accounting provided that each party should be allowed interest on all his proper expenditures, and be charged with interest on "all moneys received"; and the question arose whether "all moneys received" should be taken literally, or whether the party should be entitled to deduct his expenditures from the moneys received, and that the interest should be charged on the remainder; and it was held that the language should be so construed as being intended to be subject to any legal right which either had to first apply such moneys to the extinguishment of interest due himself; and hence "all" will not be held to include the interest on the expenditures, which may be deducted from the moneys received. Reed v. Jones, 15 Wis. 40, 48.

The phrase, "all moneys belonging to me and uninvested at the time of my death," in a will devising such moneys, being thus distinguished by the testator from the rest of his estate, operates to render the devise specific. In re Fow's Estate, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 133, 134.

All my blood kind.

Testator died, leaving as his only heirs two half-brothers and one nephew of the whole blood residing in Louisiana, and certain other nephews and nieces living in Texas, and by his will he gave, devised, and bequeathed all his property "to all my blood kind in Louisiana and Texas." It was held that the blood kind should be construed to mean kin, and as the testator had only one relative of the whole blood located in Louisiana, to whom the word "all," if he had intended to exclude his two brothers of the half blood, would not have appropriately applied, the will must be construed to include such brothers of the half blood. Lusby v. Cobb, 32 South. 6, 8, 80 Miss. 715.

All my effects.

The phrase "all my effects, real and personal," used in a devise, passes a fee. Fogg v. Clark, 1 N. H. 163, 167.

All my entire possessions.

A bill of sale describing the property sold as "all my entire possessions, including the certain household furniture and all paraphernalia thereunto belonging to said house," and then mentioning specific articles, both real and personal property, did not include a stock of liquors, although the phrase, "all my entire possessions," taken without qualification, would, of course, carry the liquor, as it would carry everything else that the testator possessed, even the clothes on his back, his personal ornaments, pictures, if he had any, and the material for the next meal. McAlpine v. Foley, 25 N. W. 452, 453. 34 Minn. 251, 252.

All my estate.

A devise of "all the residue of my estate," etc., means all the estate of the testator wherever situated, unless there is something in the context which shows that a more restricted construction will better comport with the clear intent of the testator. Hale v. Hale, 17 N. E. 470, 474, 125 Ill. 399.

In speaking of the common-law rule that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise of "all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth," "all my rights," "all my title," or "all I shall be possessed of," and many other like expressions, will carry an estate, if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

A devise to a wife of one-half of "all my estate," followed by a specific bequest of $3,000 for immediate support, where the estate was worth only one-half a million, and the testator had been an active, energetic business man, accustomed to use and handle the property as his own, and the whole tenor of the will in minor details indicated his intent to dispose of the whole, held to pass one-half of the whole estate held as community property of the husband and wife. In re Stewart's Estate, 15 Pac. 445, 446, 74 Cal. 98.

The language "my estate" or "all my estate," whenever used in a will devising such property, does not necessarily import an intent in the testator to give more than his own interest; and therefore an intent to exclude the dower is not logically inferable from the fact that the gift is to the wife equally with other persons, but he admits that, if an intention to give an immediate interest in the entire corpus of the land can be perceived, the intended equality would be destroyed by letting in the dower. In re Duffee, 14 R. I. 47, 52 (citing Jarm. Wills).

"All my estate" in a will in which testator gives to his wife for life the income and profits of all his estate, and then gives a legacy of money to an adopted child, operates to exclude such child from being entitled to interest on the legacy during the life of the wife. In re Vedder, 2 Con. Sur. 548-558, 15 N. Y. Supp. 798.

A will creating a general trust of "all my estate," real, personal, and mixed, includes income as well as capital, and is not broader than the term "whole estate" as used in a residuary clause defining the residuary estate as testator's whole estate. The words "all" and "whole" are both descriptive of the word "estate," and are equally broad and comprehensive in their import. Equitable Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Rogers, 44 Atl. 789, 792, 7 Del. Ch. 398.

"All my estate," as used in a will in a direction of a sale to pay debts, means both real and personal property. Hilton v. Hilton (U. S.) 2 MacArthur, 70, 87.

A will in which the testator devised all his real estate to his wife was sufficient to create a fee, and the words must in all instances convey an estate of inheritance, unless there is something in the other parts of the will to control their operation, and to show that they were to have a more limited effect. Bacon v. Woodward, 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 376, 379; Donovan's Lessee v. Donovan (Del.) 4 Har. 177, 178; Hitch v. Paten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334. 2 L. R. A. 724; Van Middlesworth v. Schenck, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 29, 39 (citing Countess of Bridgewater v. Duke of Bolton, 1 Salk. 236; Barry v. Edgeworth, 2 P. Wms. 524; Cooper v. Marten, 1 Term. R. 411; Lambert's Lessee v. Paine, 7 U. S. [3 Cranch] 134, 2 L. Ed. 377); Kellogg v. Blair, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 322, 325; Jackson v. Balcock (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 389, 393.

The words "all my estate" in a will passes a fee or whatever interest the debtor has in the lands, because the word "estate" comprehends not only the land which a man has, but also the interest he has in it. Terrel v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 598, 602; White v. White, 52 Conn. 518, 521.

"All my estate," as used in a will devising all of testator's estate in lands which he held in fee, operate to pass the fee, but "all my lands lying in such place" is not sufficient, such words being considered merely as descriptive of the local situation, and only carry an estate for life. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 553, 565, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724.

Where a testator first gives his property generally by the words "all my property," or "all my estate," or "all that I have power over," each of which is sufficient to pass everything, and then proceeds to enumerate particulars, such enumeration of particulars does not abridge or cut down the effect of the general words. Williams v. Brice, 51 Atl. 376, 377, 201 Pa. 595.

The words "all my estate," in a will, will pass everything a man has under his will; but if the word is coupled with the word "personal," or a local description, then the gift will pass only personalty. Andrews v. Brumfield, 32 Miss. 107, 108.

The devise by a testator of "all" his estate, and "all the rest, remainder, and residue of" his estate, disposes of the contingent interests and remainders which he had in an estate that did not vest in him during his life, as well as all estate in possession. Cruger v. Heyward (S. C.) 2 De-saus. 422, 430.

Testator devised "all of his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever" to F., in trust to pay funeral expenses and debts, and then subjected his said effects be-queathed to F. to pay the following legacies, enumerating among them a gift to S. "of the house his father now dwells in, at the decease of his said father," and giving to the father an annuity, and to the son a sum of money and other pecuniary legacies, and then, after desiring all the legacies to be paid out of his effects by the said F., gave all the rest and remainder of his effects to F. and his heirs forever. Held, that the words, "all my estate and effects whatsoever and where-soever," were sufficiently broad to include real estate; and hence F. took a remainder in fee, and the house devised to S. after the estates for life by implication to S.'s father, and a remainder for life only to the son, though the personal estate of the testator was sufficient to pay all the personal charges. Franklin v. Trout, 15 East, 394.

All my farm.

"All," as used in a devise of "all my homestead farm, being the same devised to me by my father," will pass the whole of the homestead farm, though a part of it was not devised by the father. Drew v. Drew, 28 N. H. (8 Fost.) 489, 502.

Testator devised "all that my farm and plantation in C. conveyed to me by the heirs of my deceased wife, and where my son E. now resides, containing about 85 acres, more or less." The testator owned two parcels of land in C., the one a farm containing about 72.62 acres, which had been conveyed to him by the heirs of his deceased wife, and the other containing 14.73 acres, which had been conveyed to him by one L. The two parcels adjoined each other, and had been rented and cultivated together for many years, and testator's son resided on the first parcel, but cultivated both. Held, that the words, "all that my farm," etc., were intended to and did convey only the premises which had been conveyed to the testator by the heirs of his deceased wife, and did not include both parcels. Evens v. Griscom, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 579, 580, 36 Am. Rep. 542.

All my heirs.

In a clause of a will reciting that the testator left it to the trustee to distribute either the whole or a part of the capital of his estate among "all my heirs," the words "all my heirs" were not to be taken as meaning solely those who would take in case of intestacy, but included all those who stood in an inheritable relation to him, and that the heirs took as a class. De Laurencel v. De Boom, 7 Pac. 758, 759, 67 Cal. 362.

All my house.

A bequest of "my house and all that shall be in it at my death" includes cash, but not promissory notes and securities. Stuart v. Marquis of Bute, 11 Ves. 657, 662.

A bequest of "my house and all that shall be in it at my death" includes cash and bank notes, but not promissory notes and securities, since they are evidences of title to things out of the house, and not things in it. Popham v. Lady Aylesbury, Amb. 68; Moore v. Moore, 1 Brown, Ch. 127, 129.

All my interest.

In speaking of the common-law rule, that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise of "all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth," "all my rights," "all my title," or "all I shall be possessed of," and many other like expressions, will carry an estate if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

The phrase "all my interest," when used in connection with a devise of land, passes a fee. Fogg v. Clark, 1 N. H. 163, 167.

A will devising "all my interest" is sufficient to convey the fee in testator's real estate, if there is nothing in other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724.

"All my interest," as used in a will, creates an estate of inheritance. White v. White, 52 Conn. 518, 521.

The phrase "all my interest," as used in a deed conveying to a certain person "all my interest" in all of a certain lot of land described, is equivalent to and conveys the same title as a deed of the land. Dow v. Whitney, 16 N. E. 722, 724, 147 Mass. 1.

All my land.

"The term 'all of my land,' as used in a marriage settlement, by necessary implication and a common understanding, is a description referring to such lands as I may own, evidenced by the public records where land titles are required to be recorded, or to my actual and continuous possession for such time as under the law constitutes a title." Moayon v. Moayon (Ky.) 72 S. W. 33, 38, 60 L. R. A. 415.

All my landed estate.

A will devising "all my landed estate" to a certain beneficiary, and followed by a description of testator's lands, will be construed to only include the land so described, and not to include a house and lot owned by testator, and not so described. Myers v. Myers (S. C.) 2 McCord, Eq. 214, 264, 16 Am. Dec. 648.

All my personal property or estate.

A bequest of "all my personal property" does not create a specific legacy. In re Woodworth's Estate, 31 Cal. 595, 601.

A bequest of "all the testator's personal estate" means only all his estate not otherwise disposed of, and is in effect a residuary clause of personality. Wilson v. Eden, 5 Exch. 752, 767.

A will bequeathing to testator's wife "all my personal property," following a bequest of the homestead farm to the wife during her natural life, cannot be construed to mean all that the words in common acceptance imply, but refers only to his personal effects, such as house, furniture, bric-a-brac, and the like, of which he died possessed. Tallman v. Tallman, 23 N. Y. Supp. 734, 741, 3 Misc. Rep. 465.

The phrase "all my personal property," employed in a will, is sufficiently broad to include all personal property which the testator could dispose of at the time of his death, unless there be something else in the will to qualify or limit it. Frick v. Frick, 33 Atl. 462, 463, 82 Md. 218.

A bequest by a testator of "all my personal estate" has always been held, where there were no expressions in the will requiring a different construction, to mean simply the balance of the personal estate that should be left after the payment of his debts and other charges, such as those of burial and administration. Cooch's Ex'r v. Cooch's Adm'r (Del.) 5 Houst. 540, 564, 1 Am. St. Rep. 161.

All my property.

In speaking of the common-law rule, that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise "of all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth," "all my rights," "all my title," or "all I shall be possessed of," and many other expressions of like import, will carry an estate of inheritance, if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

The phrase "all my property," as used in a will, is as extensive and comprehensive as "all my estate," or "all my effects, real and personal," or "all I am worth," and signifies all the right or interest which the testator had in land or chattels. Jackson v. Housel (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 281, 284.

The words "all my property, both real and personal," as used in a will, accompanied with the charge of the debts and power of sale, are sufficient to carry a fee in the real property of the testator. Carpenter v. Brown, 6 R. I. 383, 385.

A will leaving to testator's wife one-third part "of all my property," both real and personal, gives the wife a fee of one-third of the realty. Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 356, 358.

Where testator bequeathed one-half of "all my property" to a particular benefiary, the words "all my property" should be construed as meaning that which remained after payment of testator's debts and expenses of administration. Briggs v. Hosford, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 288, 290.

The phrase "all my property," as used in a will by which testator gives "to my wife the one-third part of all my property," meant his real and personal property subject to the payment of his debts, but did not subject it to the payment of legacies. Reed v. Addington, 4 Ves. 576.

A will by which testator gave to a certain person "all my property of every description," whether real, personal, or mixed, after paying all just debts, and in case such beneficiary should die not leaving any legitimate heirs of her body then all the property so granted to her by the will should go to others named, should be construed as giving the beneficiary all the estate and interest that was subject to disposition by the testator liable for the payment of his debts, subject to be divested on the happening of the contingency named in the will, and not a life estate only. Piatt v. Sinton, 37 Ohio St. 353, 354.

A bequest of "all my property of every description" to my great friend and relative J. "shows an intention to appoint a universal legatee, and therefore not only tangible property, but moneys, stocks, bonds, and choses in action" are included therein. Hurdle v. Outlaw, 55 N. C. 75, 77.

Where a testator devised "all my property, personal and real, after paying my just debts and claims," such devise vested an estate in fee in the devisee, and not a life estate. It is well settled that in order to convey a fee the use of the word "heirs" is not necessary; any other word or words denoting the intention of the testator to pass his whole estate or interest to the devisee, such as a devise of "all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth or own," "all my right," "all my title," or "all I shall die possessed of," and other expressions of like import, will create an estate of inheritance if there is nothing to limit or control the operation of such words or expressions. Ross v. Ross, 35 N. E. 9, 10, 135 Ind. 367.

Where a testator's will gives to a certain devisee "all my property," the phrase "all my property" means that an estate of inheritance is created, or, in other words, imports the absolute property in the testator's real estate. Nicholls v. Butcher, 18 Ves. 193, 195.

A will devising the same to testator's wife for life, with the exception of certain specified property, is a general, and not a specific, bequest. Mayo v. Bland, 4 Md. Ch. 484.

All my real estate.

"All my real estate," as used in a will, is to be construed not merely to mean the lands, but to include all interest which the testator has in them, so as to pass an estate of inheritance if he has one. Godfrey v. Humphrey, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 537, 539, 29 Am. Dec. 621.

A will directing the executor to sell "all the real estate and effects" of the testator, and safely invest the proceeds, etc., means all my real estate and personal property, and implied an intention on the testator's part that the executor should turn into money all the testator's property that might remain at his death in some other form than investments, and safely invest the amount so that all his estate should be in money-producing investments. King v. Grant, 10 Atl. 505, 506, 55 Conn. 166.

A will devising "all of testator's real estate," without more words, is not sufficient to carry an estate for years in lands and tenements which testator had at his decease from the executor of the devisee, since a term for years in lands and tenements are regarded as contracts affecting the estate, but not vesting it, the lessee having the term only or the user for the time prescribed by his contract, but not the possession or seisin of the legal estate. Bates v. Sparrell, 10 Mass. 323, 325.

Where a deed of assignment in trust for the payment of certain debts granted "all my real estate," and schedule thereof was declared to be annexed thereto, the phrase, "all my real estate," was restricted and qualified in its operation by the reference to a schedule, and hence property not described in the schedule did not pass. Gilbert v. North American Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 43, 45, 35 Am. Dec. 543.

All the real estate which a mortgagor owns in certain towns, within the meaning of a mortgage of all the real estate which he owns in such towns of whatsoever name or nature, includes his interest in lands of which he is an owner in common. Drew v. Carroll, 28 N. E. 148, 149, 154 Mass. 181.

All my real or personal estate or property.

A devise in a will of "my real and personal property" indicates an intention to give an estate of inheritance. Morrison v. Semple (Pa.) 6 Bin. 94, 97.

The words, "all the estate, both real and personal," in a deed describing the property conveyed as "all the estate, both real and personal," to which the grantor is entitled in law or in equity, in possession, remainder, or reversion, is sufficient, as between the parties, to pass all real estate owned by the grantor, but it is not a sufficient description to impart record notice to a subsequent purchaser from the grantor of a conveyance affecting the land. Actual notice of the deed and its contents would not affect such purchaser, unless he had notice that the land purchased by him was embraced in the deed. Mundy v. Vawter (Va.) 3 Grat. 518, 545.

A provision in a will that "all my property, both real and personal, shall be for the sole use of my beloved J.," gives a fee to the widow. Rodenfels v. Schumann, 17 Atl. 688, 689, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 383.

A will by which testator bequeathed to his wife "all my real and personal property, to hold and enjoy forever," imported an intent to convey the fee, and were sufficient for the purpose. Lord Mansfield says no technical words are necessary in a will to convey an estate, and if the testator makes use of words tantamount to those necessary to convey a fee, as if he says "given in fee simple," or "all my real and personal estate," that will carry all his interest in the land devised, and will pass a fee if testator has a fee in the premises. Gaskin v. Gaskin, Cowp. 659. If a man devises all his estate it comprehends all that he has, for the word "estate" is genus generalissimum, and includes all things, real and personal. Bolton v. Bowne, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 210, 213.

A devise to the testator's wife of all his property, "both real and personal, forever," passes the fee in the real estate; nor is such construction affected by a subsequent clause in the will whereby the testator declared that after her death he gave an additional annuity to a person to whom he had before given a mere annuity preceding the devise to the wife, the testator's intent to use the words, all his property, etc., in a more restricted sense, not being shown by such subsequent clause. Lady Dacre v. Roper, 11 East, 518.

In a will giving to the wife the use and improvement of "all" the real and personal estate, the word "all," as applied to the real estate, comprised the whole, as no portion of it had been disposed of. As applied to the personal estate, it meant all there was left, a portion having already been given, and the residue was "all" the personal estate. Alsop v. Russell, 38 Conn. 99, 102.

A conveyance of all the estate, both real and personal, to which a grantor is entitled, in law or equity, in possession, remainder, or reversion, passes the grantor's whole estate. Mundy v. Vawter (Va.) 3 Grat. 518, 545.

A will wherein testator devised in a residuary clause all his estate, "whether real or personal," meant that testator devised real estate as well as personalty, and hence the devise included a mortgage held by him. Ballard v. Carter, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 112, 115, 16 Am. Dec. 377.

A will devising "all my estate, real and personal," is to be construed as a disposal of all of testator's property after the payment of his debts and the expenses of administration. Lamb v. Lamb, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 371, 376.

"All estates," as used in Purd. Dig. 2148 (Act May 6, 1867), providing that "all estates," real, personal, and mixed, of every kind whatsoever, situated within the state, passing from any person who may die seised or possessed of such estates, either by will or under the intestate laws of the state, other than for the use of father, mother, husband, wife, and children and lineal descendants, where the wife or widow or son of the person dying seised or possessed thereof shall be subject to tax, except where the estate is of less value than $250, must be construed as meaning the property possessed by the decedent, and not the individual legacies, the word "estate" being ordinarily applied to property of decedents, and therefore where the estate exceeds $250 in value the tax must be levied upon all collateral legacies, regardless of the amount of the legacy. In re Howell's Estate, 23 Atl. 403, 147 Pa. 164.

All my right or title.

The use of the phrase "all my right" in a will devising all testator's right in property, including realty, means that an estate of inheritance is created. White v. White, 52 Conn. 518, 521.

A will devising "all my right" is sufficient to convey the fee in testator's real estate, if there is nothing in other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724.

A will devising "all my title" is sufficient to convey the fee in testator's real estate, if there is nothing in other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 572, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724.

In speaking of the common-law rule, that a general devise of real estate, without defining the interest to be taken by the devisee, gives only a life estate, it was said by Chancellor Kent in 4 Comm. (13th Ed.) 535, that it did not require the word "heirs" to convey a fee, but that other words denoting an intention to pass the whole interest of the testator, as a devise "of all my estate," "all my interest," "all my property," "my whole remainder," "all I am worth," "all my rights," "all my title," or "all I shall be possessed of," and many other expressions of like import, will carry an estate of inheritance, if there is nothing in the other parts of the will to limit or control the operation of the words. Mulvane v. Rude, 45 N. E. 659, 660, 146 Ind. 476.

All the oil.

Where the owner of the right to operate and mine for oil on certain premises sold all his interest therein, and in the contract of sale provided that "all the oil produced upon the above premises shall be the property of the vendee, or, if any be sold, the avails thereof shall belong to him," and at the time of the sale there was some oil in store in the tanks on the premises, such oil was included and passed by the sale. Willets v. Brown, 42 Hun, 140, 143.

All officers.

"All officers," as used in Const. art. 6, § 4, authorizing the removal of all officers, construed to include municipal as well as county and state officers. Houseman v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 222, 230.

The constitutional amendment regulating elections, and providing that the term of "all officers" whose successors would, under the law as it existed at the time of their election, be elected in an odd-numbered year, refers only to county and township officers, and does not include a municipal office. Griffith v. Manning (Kan.) 73 Pac. 75, 76.

"All officers," as used in Const. 1874, § 9, providing that "all officers" for a term of years shall hold their offices during good behavior, was not limited to such officers only as were subject to impeachment. Houseman v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 222, 230.

All ordinances.

As used in a bond given by a liquor dealer, conditioned that he would abide and keep "all ordinances of the mayor and council regulating the retailing of spirituous liquors," "all ordinances" meant all legal ordinances, and did not embrace an ordinance which was ultra vires or for any other reason void. Gilham v. Wells, 64 Ga. 192, 199.

All outstanding warrants.

Act March 13, 1885, to legalize void evidences of municipal indebtedness (section 4), provides that it shall be the duty of the county treasurer of Nelson county to negotiate the sale of certain bonds, and to call in "all outstanding warrants" whenever the bonds are sold, and he, the said treasurer, shall be allowed 2 per cent. commission for negotiating said bonds and paying out said money, etc. Held, that the words "all outstanding warrants" could not be limited to mean only all such warrants as the county commissioners might direct, since as to valid warrants the first section of the act, while in form permissive, was in fact mandatory on the board of county commissioners, requiring the issuance of such bonds for the payment of such warrants; and "all outstanding warrants," as used in the act, was to be treated in the same manner, since it cannot be presumed that the Legislature intended to clothe the county commissioners with power to determine the validity of municipal indebtedness. Ersikine v. Nelson County, 58 N. W. 348, 351, 352, 4 N. D. 66, 27 L. R. A. 696.

All payments.

An assignment of a mortgage providing that we do hereby guaranty the collection of such mortgage, and "all payments thereon at maturity," makes the assignors guarantors of the whole debt, though there is no bond accompanying the mortgage, and the mortgagor was not liable upon the mortgage. Waters v. Chase, 21 Atl. 882, 142 Pa. 463.

All persons.

Act Sess. 28, c. 55, § 9, exempting from toll, for passing a bridge over the Schoharie river, "all persons drawing firewood for their own family use," extends as well to a person drawing his firewood at one time with the assistance of his neighbors and others hired for the purpose as if he himself drew but one load in one day, and therefore exempts all persons so drawing. Wooster v. Van Vechten (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 467.

"All persons," as used in the treaty with Mexico, December 11, 1861 (12 Stat. 1199, art. 1), providing that the contracting parties shall, on requisition, deliver up "all persons" accused of crime, etc., if used without qualification would necessarily include all persons, citizens and aliens alike, and under that general designation the executive it is believed could not withhold the surrender of an American citizen upon requisition made by the republic of Mexico. Ex parte McCabe (U. S.) 46 Fed. 363, 374, 12 L. R. A. 539.

Act 1899, No. 205, providing that officers in custody of any county, city, or town records shall furnish proper and reasonable facilities for the inspection and examination of the records, to "all persons" having occasion to make such examination, is not confined to persons owning or interested in land, but applies to "all persons" who may desire to inspect the records and make memorandums, and includes an abstractor seeking information for private gain. Burton v. Tuite, 44 N. W. 282, 285, 78 Mich. 363, 7 L. R. A. 73.

"All," as used in Comp. St. c. 56, § 11, providing that "all" persons who shall sell liquor without a license shall be guilty, etc., means every one without exception, and is limited to no class of persons, and includes both wholesale and retail liquor dealers. State v. Cummings, 22 N. W. 545, 547, 17 Neb. 311.

"All persons," as used in Rev. St. c. 17, providing that persons engaged in blasting rock shall give seasonable notice, so that "all persons" approaching shall have time to retire to a safe distance from the place of explosion, includes only those not engaged about the quarry. Hare v. McIntire, 19 Atl. 453, 454, 82 Me. 240, 8 L. R. A. 450, 17 Am. St. Rep. 476.

Const. art. 1, § 9, declares that "all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties." It was decided in State v. Ward, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 443, that this provision was not applicable to prisoners after conviction, and that no discretion was conferred on the trial court or judge to admit to bail in such a case. In Longworth's Case, 7 La. Ann. 247, after a review of the cases, it was held that the prisoner was entitled to bail, as a matter of right, after conviction as well as before, and that it was not within the discretion of the court to deny it. The question was before the Supreme Court of California in Ex parte Voll, 41 Cal. 29, and the conclusion announced was that the right to bail after conviction was not absolute, but was within the discretion of the court. However, the court says: "We are impressed with the thought that the use of the words 'all persons,' instead of 'all persons before conviction,' was for a purpose, and not accidental, and that therefore it should be held that the right to bail after conviction was within the discretion of the court." Ford v. State, 60 N. W. 960, 961, 42 Neb. 418.

Const. art. 1, § 7, providing that "all persons" shall be bailable by sufficient surety, unless for capital offenses, when the proof is evident or the presumption great, is not to be construed in its literal sense, and, as so construed, including a convict with an appeal pending. Ex parte Voll, 41 Cal. 29, 33.

The Bill of Rights, providing that "all persons" shall be liable to bail on sufficient sureties, does not mean that "all persons" under all circumstances shall be entitled to bail, but refers to a class of persons each and all of whom shall be bailed, except as therein provided, and must be construed and controlled by the provision in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, providing that a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or any other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authorities of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to the state having jurisdiction of the crime; since if, on arrest under a warrant of extradition, bail is allowable, the federal Constitution is set at naught, and delivery in the state having jurisdiction of the offense would have its price regulated generally by the amount of the bail bond, and a fundamental provision which was intended to apply to all classes of citizens would be restricted to the poor and unfortunate who were unable to furnish bail. Ex parte Erwin, 7 Tex. App. 288, 295.

Mass. Act 1793, c. 34, declares that all persons shall gain residence in the town by dwelling and having their home there when it was incorporated into a town. It was held that the words "all persons" as there used was intended to include only those who were legally capable of gaining a settlement in their own right in any other mode, and hence inasmuch as an illegitimate child was incapable of gaining a residence in a town in its own right, but had a residence which was derivative from the residence of its mother, such child could not gain a legal residence in a town by being an actual resident therein at the time of its incorporation. Inhabitants of Milo v. Inhabitants of Kilmarnock, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 455, 457. This case followed Inhabitants of Hallowell v. Inhabitants of Gardiner, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 93, 101, where it was held that "all persons" did not include a married woman or a slave, they not being legally capable of gaining a settlement in any other mode.

The provision "all persons having any claim against the estate" in a notice directing the presentation of such claims is of so comprehensive a character as to embrace and include creditors, legatees, and persons entitled to distribution. Fillyau v. Lavery, 3 Fla. 72, 106.

All prisoners.

"All prisoners," as used in section 9 of the Bill of Rights, declaring that all prisoners shall be bailable unless for capital offenses when the proof is evident, means only prisoners who have not been tried and convicted in the district court. Ex parte Ezell, 40 Tex. 451, 454, 19 Am. Rep. 32.

All probate matters.

Const. 1870, art. 6, § 20, provided that the General Assembly might provide for the establishment of a probate court in each county having a population over 50,000, and that such courts shall have original jurisdiction of "all probate matters." Held, that the words "all probate matters" were used in their broadest and most general sense, and therefore authorized the Legislature to give such courts jurisdiction of proceedings by guardians for the sale of the real estate of their wards. Winch v. Tobin, 107 Ill. 212, 216.

All proceedings.

The act of 1874 (P. L. 219) providing for the removal of "all proceedings" in a criminal cause to the Supreme Court does not authorize the removal of matters which had theretofore rested solely in the discretion of the court below, such as the denial of a motion for new trial. Alexander v. Commonwealth, 105 Pa. 1, 11, 12.

Where an order provides "that all proceedings be stayed" in a case for a definite time, it operates to prohibit entry of judgment while such order is in force. It stops further progress in the case at the point where the order attaches. Uhe v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 57 N. W. 484, 485, 4 S. D. 505, 507.

All property.

The terms "property" and "all property" in a statute relating to taxation of railroad and canal companies are not interchangeable terms, and one cannot be substituted for the other. State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 606, 48 N. J. Law, 146.

Rev. St. 1852, p. 481, which exempts farm lands included within the limits of a city from taxation for municipal purposes, is not repealed by section 42 of the Acts of 1857, giving the common council of cities power to collect ad valorem tax on "all property" within the city. Blain v. Bailey, 25 Ind. 165, 166.

Within the provision of a statute providing that "all property," real and personal, from which an income or revenue is derived, shall be subject to taxation, the waterworks of the city from which a revenue is derived is not exempt from taxation for county purposes. Erie County v. Waterworks Com'rs, 6 Atl. 138, 113 Pa. 368.

"All property in the state," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that all property in the state shall be taxed in proportion to its value, cannot be construed to mean either all the property the Legislature may designate, or all except such as the Legislature may exempt. The phrase means all private property, or all property other than that belonging to the United States or the state. People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432, 456.

"All the property," as used in Act Feb., 1878, providing that "all the property" of every corporation formed under the act should be exempt from taxation for a period of six years, is a phrase of wide import, and includes the capital stock of such corporations. Santa Fé County Com'rs v. New Mexico & S. P. R. Co., 2 Pac. 376, 383, 3 N. M. 116.

Const. 1874, art. 16, § 5, declaring that "all property" subject to taxation shall be taxed according to its value, means all private property of every possible description, or all property situate in the state other than that belonging to the state or general government, and it does not mean all such property as the Legislature may designate, or all except such as the Legislature may exempt. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. v. Worthen, 46 Ark. 312, 327.

The expression in the charter of a municipal corporation, authorizing the municipality to tax "all property within the corporate limits" thereof, is not open to a broader construction than the phrase "all taxable property of the state," and cannot open a wider field for the exercise of the power, and, since the expression "taxable property of the state" does not embrace the bonds of the state in an act levying a tax on the people of the state, the phrase in the charter will not be construed to include the taxing of its own bonds, in the absence of express authority for that purpose. City of Macon v. Jones, 67 Ga. 489, 492.

An assignment for creditors conveyed to the assignee "all property of every description belonging to the assignor, the same being embraced in a schedule annexed," and, after the assignment, property purchased by the assignor, not previously delivered, was delivered and receipted for by the assignee, and was claimed under the assignment. Held, that the term "all property of every description" was a general term, and if used alone would convey all the property in which the assignor had an interest, but that the words "the same being embraced in a schedule annexed," which were special words, limited the grant, and the assignment should be construed according to the rule of construction that, where a general clause in an instrument of conveyance is followed by special words in accordance therewith, the grant will be limited to the special matter, and hence the assignment only included those articles embraced in the schedule. Belding Bros. & Co. v. Frankland, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 67, 70, 41 Am. Rep. 630.

A gift of "all property" will not only pass real estate, but will pass all the interest of the testator in the estate. Thomas v. Phelps, 4 Russ. 348, 351.

Where testator bequeathed certain property to his wife for life, with remainder over of a part of such property to his children, followed by a general bequest of all the property "in which his widow has given the life estate to another child," the phrase "all the property" was not intended to include the entire amount given to the wife, but should be construed as meaning all the property not otherwise disposed of. West v. Randle, 3 S. E. 454, 456, 79 Ga. 28.

Where testator by one clause of his will gave his wife personal property, and in the following clause devised to her real estate for life, and added, "but on her decease the remainder of all the property that I give to my said wife I give and devise to my son," held, that the words "all the property" in the last clause applied only to the real estate. Howland v. Howland, 100 Mass. 222, 223.

All purposes.

In Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that the aggregate amount of indebtedness of any county "for all purposes" shall not exceed a certain amount, "all purposes" includes all debts, without regard to the method of their contraction, and covers every kind of indebtedness, whether the same be incurred for necessary running expenses or in the consummation of other legitimate municipal objects. People v. May, 12 Pac. 838, 840, 9 Colo. 404.

All qualified or legal voters.

Where a right to remonstrate against the issuance of a license to sell intoxicating liquors is given to "all" legal voters, it includes every legal voter. White v. Furgeson, 64 N. E. 49, 53, 29 Ind. App. 144.

The phrase "all the qualified voters," in a statute providing that towns may issue bonds in aid of a railroad when authorized by "all the qualified voters," was construed to mean simply "by the qualified voters," or "by the voters," which terms have always been held to mean by a majority of the qualified voters. Such a statute requires a majority of all voters qualified to vote, and not merely a majority of those voting. Glenn v. Wray, 36 S. E. 167, 169, 126 N. C. 730.

All real estate.

Act 1873 provided that all real estate within the commonwealth should be liable to taxation for all such purposes "as now is or hereafter may be provided by general laws." Held, that the exemption of the property of soldiers, as found in the bounty acts, was not repealed by statute, inasmuch as a general statute, without negative words, is not to be construed to repeal a previous statute which is particular or special, though the provisions in the two differ. Rounds v. Waymart Borough, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 395, 397.

An indictment charging defendant with falsely representing that he was the owner of several parcels of real estate does not sufficiently negative the truth of such representations by the allegation that defendant was not then and there the owner of "all" of such real estate, inasmuch as he might have been the owner of all save some insignificant parcel of the land. State v. Trisler, 31 N. E. 881, 49 Ohio St. 583.

All rents and profits.

Where one who was entitled to the rents and profits of an estate until a certain date died previous to said date, leaving a will bequeathing "all of the rents and profits" of such estate, only the rents and profits accruing from and after the testator's death passed. Tissen v. Tissen, 1 P. Wms. 500, 503.

All repairs.

A covenant in a lease to repair, uphold, and support, or to well and sufficiently repair, or to keep in repair and leave as found, or to repair and keep in repair, or to keep in good repair, natural wear and tear excepted, or to make all necessary repairs, or to deliver up in tenantable repair, or to deliver up the premises in as good a condition as they now are, all impose upon the covenantor the duty of rebuilding or restoring the premises destroyed or injured by the elements. Armstrong v. Maybee, 48 Pac. 737, 738, 17 Wash. 24, 61 Am. St. Rep. 898.

A covenant by a lessee to make all "inside and outside repairs" is simply a general covenant under which the lessee was bound to make all ordinary repairs, but was not called upon to make those which were extraordinary, such as those caused by a violent storm. May v. Gillis, 62 N. E. 385, 386, 169 N. Y. 330.

All rest, residue, and remainder.

"All the rest," as used in a will in which testator gave certain legacies to his sisters, and gave and bequeathed to his wife "all the rest" of his lands and tenements, of themselves import a devise of the fee, but, unless aided by the context, the devisee, whether he be a sole or a residuary devisee, will, if there be no words of limitation, take only a life estate. Wright v. Page, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 204, 205, 6 L. Ed. 303.

Where a will authorizes executors to sell testator's real estate expressly at their discretion, and directs them to convert into money and invest "all the rest" of testator's estate not already in money, the words "all the rest" exclude the real estate. Graydon's Ex'rs v. Graydon, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 229, 233.

Where testator devised "all the residue and remainder of my estate," such phrase creates a fee, though no words of limitation or inheritance are added. Parker v. Parker, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 134, 138.

In a will the words "all the rest of my lands" do not of themselves import a devise of a fee, but, unless aided by the context, the devisee, whether sole or residuary, will, if there are no words of limitation, take only a life estate. Wright v. Page, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 204, 236, 6 L. Ed. 303.

A bequest in a will by which testator gave all his household furniture, wearing apparel, cattle, horses, carriages, tools, produce, etc., and "all the rest and residue" of his estate not thereinbefore bequeathed or devised or mentioned, should be construed as a general residuary bequest, making the person designated the testator's residuary legatee, the same as he would have been had the enumeration of specific articles been omitted, for such enumeration prior to the words "rest and residue" does not necessarily alter their meaning. Le Rougetel v. Mann, 63 N. H. 472, 473, 3 Atl. 746.

"All the rest and residue," as used in a will making specific devises, and then directing the disposition of "all the rest and residue" of testator's property, includes all of testator's property not included in the specific devises. Prowitt v. Rodman, 37 N. Y. 42, 49.

"All the rest and residue," as used in a bond requiring a testatrix to make and return a true and perfect inventory of all "the rest and residue" of the goods and chattels of the estate, means what remains for distribution according to law, or what is left after payment of the intestate's debts. Carrol v. Connet, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 195, 201.

"All the rest and residue of my estate," as used in a will, is intended as "a general description of all the property testator had left in the world, whether real, personal, or mixed, after the payment of debts and specific legacies. In the older cases such an expression was interpreted in a more restricted sense, and did not include real property, but the tendency of modern holdings is to construe the phrase according to its popular signification, as including property of every variety." Chapman v. Chick, 16 Atl. 407, 409, 81 Me. 109; Burkitt v. Chapman, 1 H. Bl. 223, 226.

Where testator gave a life estate in certain real estate to his wife, a devise by another clause of the will of "all the residue of his estate" to his wife enlarges the life estate to a fee, and cannot be regarded as intended to embrace only the personal estate. Warner v. Willard, 9 Atl. 136, 137, 54 Conn. 470.

"All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," as used in the residuary clause of a will disposing of all the "rest, residue, and remainder of testator's estate," means real estate as well as personalty. Hackett v. Commonwealth, 102 Pa 505, 514.

"All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," within the meaning of a will declaring testator's intention to be to dispose of "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," is to be construed to mean all such estate, both in quantity and quality. In re Jeremy's Estate, 35 Atl. 847, 178 Pa 477.

All right, title, and interest.

"All," as used in partition deeds conveying "all right, title, and interest of the said parties of the first part," is not ambiguous, and a reservation of a part cannot be implied, but the entire estate and interest of such parties passed under such deed. Snyder v. Grandstaff, 31 S. E. 647, 650, 96 Va. 473, 70 Am. St. Rep. 863.

An attachment of "all the right, title, and interest" which a debtor has in lands is a good attachment of the land itself. Millett v. Blake, 18 Atl. 293, 295, 81 Me. 531, 10 Am. St. Rep. 275.

"All right and title," as used in Homestead Act July 1, 1873, declaring that every householder having a family shall be entitled to a certain estate or homestead, and such homestead and "all right and title therein" shall be exempt from attachment, is to be construed literally as to all the right which the head of the family has in the premises, and includes the lot of ground occupied as a residence, and is not limited to the mere homestead right of occupancy. Hartman v. Schultz, 101 Ill. 437, 440.

All risks.

A policy insuring a floating dry dock against "all risks" should be construed to include all river and harbor risks, so far as those risks are applicable to floating docks. Marcy v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 11 La. Ann. 748, 749.

All sailing.

The term "all sailing," as used in the contract of a steamship company for the carriage of cattle on certain specified vessels "all sailing" during certain months, should not be read "all vessels that may sail," but should be construed to import a warranty that all the vessels named will sail during such month. Morris v. Chesapeake & O. S. S. Co. (U. S.) 125 Fed. 62, 67.

All seminaries of learning.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 11, § 5, exempting from taxation "all seminaries of learning," with the books and furniture therein, and the grounds attached, includes seminaries for young ladies erected by private persons and supported by their patrons. It means all seminaries of learning open for the instruction of the young and dissemination of knowledge. It is not necessary that the school shall belong to and be a part of the general educational system provided by the state, any more than colleges and academies within its bounds founded and sustained by private patronage. The character, objects, and benefits of such an institution are public in their nature. Nelson v. Stryker Seminary, 53 N. W. 1133, 1134, 52 Minn. 144.

All sorts or manufactures of wool.

"All sorts of wool," as used in Navigation Act 43 Geo. III, c. 155, § 13, do not include cotton wool, especially where the words "wool" and "cotton wool" are used in another clause, and in the same section of the act, as distinct commodities. Therefore the importation of cotton in a Portuguese vessel owned by a British subject, the captain and crew of which are Portuguese, is contrary to the act. Pearce v. Cowie, 1 Holt, N. P. 69, 70.

Act Cong. March 3, 1883, Schedule K, imposing a duty of 35 per cent. on "all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially enumerated or provided for" in the act, does not include manufactures which are composed partly of wool but the component part of chief value of which is silk, for the reason that Schedule L. of the same act imposes a duty of 50 per cent. on all goods, wares, and merchandise made of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value. Hartranft v. Meyer, 10 Sup. Ct. 751, 135 U. S. 237, 34 L. Ed. 110.

All spawls and rubbish.

A condition in a lease of a quarry to deliver the premises at the expiration of the lease in as good condition as they are now, all spawls and rubbish to be removed, merely requires the removal of such spawls and rubbish as accumulated during the term of the lease, and not those on the ground when the tenant took possession. The words "all spawls and rubbish to be removed" are but a part of the general clause which was designed to secure a return of the premises in as good condition as they now are, and only amplified that expression. Coppinger v. Armstrong, 8 Ill. App. 210, 213.

All stations.

A bill of lading giving the vessel "liberty to call at any port or ports for whatever purpose, * * * and to tow and assist vessels in all stations," authorized only assistance to vessels needing help in all stations that might be met with in the ordinary course of the voyage, and did not justify the vessel in making a material deviation to assist a disabled vessel. Ardan S. S. Co. v. Theband (U. S.) 35 Fed. 620, 622.

All stockholders.

"All stockholders," as used in a statute providing that stockholders of corporations shall be held for the corporate debts, must, in the absence of any legislative intent to the contrary, be regarded as including not only those who were such at the time the indebtedness was incurred, but all those who successively stand in their shoes in respect to the stock. Brown v. Hitchcock, 36 Ohio St. 667, 681.

All summer.

In an action for slander, an allegation that defendant stated that plaintiff had been stealing from him "all summer" is not proved by the words, "he is stealing from us every day." Smith v. Moore, 52 Atl. 320, 322, 74 Vt. 81.

All sums collected.

A city ordinance providing that the city attorney should receive 10 per cent. "on all sums collected for the city" includes all sums collected in both civil suits and criminal suits, and the ordinance does not make any distinction between the sums collected in such suits. City of Austin v. Johns, 62 Tex. 179, 183.

All taxes.

Where a lease requires the lessee to pay "all taxes" on the demised premises, "all taxes" means merely general taxes, and does not make the lessee liable for a special sewer assessment. Ittner v. Robinson, 52 N. W. 846, 847, 35 Neb. 133.

All that therein exists.

A will giving testator's wife the homestead, and all articles of goods in my house, personal furniture, household furniture, and "all that therein exists," will pass money contained in an iron box in the house. Perea v. Barela, 23 Pac. 766, 771, 5 N. M. 458.

All the proceeds of estate.

"All the proceeds," as used in a will whereby testator gave to his wife all his real and personal estate, requesting that at her death she divide equally between certain persons "all the proceeds" of testator's estate, meant the entire body of the estate, subject to such sales and conversions thereof as the interest or the interests of the parties might require, and did not mean merely the rents and profits of the corpus of the estate. Knox v. Knox, 18 N. W. 155, 157, 59 Wis. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 487.

All the estate.

A devise of "all the estate" is as comprehensive and extensive as one of "all my estate," and carries the fee. Lambert's Lessee v. Paine, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 97, 138, 2 L. Ed. 377.

A devise of "all the testator's estate" includes a fee simple in his real estate, "for an estate means interest, and all the interest of testator must mean a fee simple if the testator has one." Van Middlesworth v. Schenck, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 29, 39.

"All the estate, real and personal, of every nature and description, in law or equity," as used in Bankr. Law 1800, § 5, declaring that it shall be the duty of the commissioners, after a party has been declared a bankrupt, to take into their possession all the estate, real and personal, of every nature and description, to which the bankrupt may be entitled either in law or equity, "are broad enough to cover every description of vested right and interest attached to or growing out of property." Comegys v. Vasse, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 193, 218, 7 L. Ed. 108; Williams v. Heard, 11 Sup. Ct. 885, 888, 140 U. S. 529, 35 L. Ed. 550.

"All the estate," as used in a guardian's bond, obligating him to file an inventory of "all the estate" which he shall have received or taken possession of, meant and was confined to an obligation to file and inventory "of the estate of the infant" received by him, as it would lead to an absurdity to assign to the terms in question a meaning which would convert them into a stipulation that the guardian in the bond bound himself to put in an account of every estate that belonged to strangers that might come into his hands. Ordinary v. Helshon, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 15, 18.

All times.

See "At All Times."

All the water.

A deed granted a right to lay a pipe to a designated spring on the grantor's premises, and to convey "all the water" "of said spring which can be taken through the pipe." Held, that the phrase "all the water" did not authorize the grantee to excavate and thereby get water from neighboring springs, so that he could obtain water to the full capacity of the pipe, but that he was only entitled to take such water as might flow from the spring designated, through such pipe. Furner v. Seabury, 31 N. E. 1004, 135 N. Y. 50.

A grant by an irrigation ditch company to a lumber company of a right of way for a flume across the grantor's ditch provided that the crossing should be made in such a way as not to stop or impede the flow of "all" the water which the ditch might or could carry. In construing the term "all" as used in this grant, the court says that it is used to signify the "maximum quantity of"; that it was not in contemplation that every drop of running water should be absolutely stopped or absolutely impeded, but that there should be no stoppage or impediment to the maximum quantity of water which the ditch was capable of carrying, so that the grant was with a proviso that the crossing should not impede the maximum quantity, and not that it should not impede the flow of all the water in the ditch. Centerville & K. Irr. Ditch Co. v. Sanger Lumber Co., 73 Pac. 1079, 1080, 140 Cal. 385.

All who may feel interested.

A common carrier engaged in carrying federal mail, and also in the transportation of passengers, wrote a letter to the postmaster at one of the offices from which he was accustomed to carry mail, informing him that on a certain day one of his vessels which did not ordinarily stop or receive mail or passengers at that place would stop there, and requesting the postmaster for a mail in readiness, and to "advise all who may feel interested in the above." Held, that the expression "all who may feel interested" did not refer alone to persons interested in the arrival and departure of the mail, but, under the circumstances, included all those who wished to take passage on the vessel, so that a person offering himself as a passenger, and prevented from being accepted by the failure of the boat to stop, was entitled to recover damages for breach of special contract. Heirn v. McCaughan, 32 Miss. 17, 45, 66 Am. Dec. 588.

All words.

Code 1873, c. 145, § 2, providing that "all words" which are considered as insults and lead to violence and breach of the peace shall be actionable, will be construed to include written or printed words of such character. Chaffin v. Lynch, 1 S. E. 803, 807, 83 Va. 108.

All unpaid taxes.

Laws 1859, c. 22, § 5, providing that the title vested by a tax deed shall be subject to "all unpaid taxes and charges" which are a lien on the land, mean only such unpaid taxes and charges as may have accrued subsequently to the sale on which the deed issued. Sayles v. Davis, 22 Wis. 225, 230.

ALL AND EVERY OTHER.

"All and every other my lands, tenements, and hereditaments," as used in a devise, were general words, and were sufficient to pass a remote reversion in real estate and lands to be purchased and settled by the testator. Attorney General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 256, 294.

ALL AND EVERYTHING.

"All and everything," as used in a will devising "all and everything" that testator shall receive from his mother's estate, is of similar import and as comprehensive as the expressions "all I have," "all I am worth," or "everything I may die possessed of," and will pass the fee in his real estate, such intention being manifested from the will as a whole. Chamberlain v. Owings, 30 Md. 447, 455.

ALL AND SINGULAR.

The words "all and singular my real estate," in a will devising "all and singular my real estate," is broad enough to include all real estate possessed by the testator at the time of his death, including property acquired by him after making the will. McClaskey v. Barr (U. S.) 54 Fed. 781, 798.

ALL OTHER.All other acts.

Act Jan. 4, 1860, incorporating the St. Joseph board of public schools, section 1, defining the boundaries of the corporation, giving it its corporate name, conferring perpetual succession, authorizing it to sue and be sued, and providing that it may purchase, receive, and hold property, real and personal, may lease, sell, or dispose of the same, and do "all other acts as natural persons," means acts within the powers granted but not specified. Corporations obtain powers by grant exclusively, and from their thus limited character can claim such implied powers only as are necessary to carry out the obvious object and intention of the charter. Especially is this true in cases where the act of incorporation, when properly construed, provides for the very contingencies which are claimed to have existed, creating a necessity for the implied powers. Hence, where the charter provided that the school board should cause an estimate of the amount of money necessary to be raised for the purpose of building and repairing schoolhouses and furnishing the same, together with the amount necessary to meet other expenses, to be made out and certified, and the county court should cause the amount so certified to be levied upon all taxable property and collected, provided the taxes should not exceed a certain per cent., the school board had no implied power to issue bonds for the purpose of raising money to build schoolhouses. Erwin v. St. Joseph's Board of Public Schools (U. S.) 12 Fed. 680, 682.

Under a charter of a corporation authorizing it to do "all other acts as natural persons," its power is limited to such other acts as were authorized by the corporate charter or statutes of the state applicable to such corporations, and the charter cannot be construed as removing all limitations inseparable from corporate existence, and to confer on the corporation power to engage in a business of a different character from that for which it was organized. Gauze v. Clarks-ville (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 96, 98.

All other business, trades, etc.

Rev. St. § 4644, subd. 15, conferring power upon the city to license, tax, and regulate auctioneers, grocers, commission merchants, retailers, merchants, agents, real estate agents and brokers, horse and cattle dealers, mercantile agents and insurance agents, banking and other corporations and institutions, and "all other business, trades, avocations, or professions whatever," does not include abstracters of titles, though the words are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the avocation of an abstracter of titles, considered as standing alone, independent of the preceding parts of the section and other provisions of the statute in pari materia. But it is among the well-recognized rules of construction that, when a particular enumeration or words are followed by general terms or words, the latter are to be understood as limited in their scope and application to persons and things of the same kind or character as those specified in the preceding parts. This rule applies to statutes, as well as to private instruments, that general words are restricted in their operation by the context, the apparent intent; and in every enumeration of particulars, followed by general terms, the latter are to be restricted to cases ejusdem generis. City of St. Joseph v. Porter, 29 Mo. App. 605, 608.

Under the same provision in a city charter, the words "all other business, trades, avocations, or professions" were, under the rule of ejusdem generis, held not to authorize the city to license lawyers. City of St. Louis v. Laughlin, 49 Mo. 559, 564.

All other chattel or personal property.

"All other articles of personal property," as used in Laws 1872, c. 148, requiring assessments of merchandise, goods, etc., in the town or ward where located, and specifying in a later clause for the assessments of certain enumerated property, and providing that "all other articles of personal property" shall be assessed where the owner resides, is not to be construed as meaning all other personal property not before mentioned in the clause in which the phrase is found, since such a construction would destroy the rule first prescribed in reference to the taxation of merchants' goods. Mitchell v. Town of Plover, 11 N. W. 27, 30, 53 Wis. 548.

At the time of making a will, testator's estate consisted of United States bonds, a certificate of deposit, a small amount of currency, and some wearing apparel. He gave all his real and personal property to his father during the life of another, and on the death of such other a sister was to take $100, and the second sister $100 in money and "all other personal property," and the will then recited that the remainder of all the property should go to the father. Held, that the words "all my other personal property" in the legacy to the latter sister meant testator's personal effects other than the money and securities. Wolf v. Schoeffner, 51 Wis. 53, 54, 8 N. W. 8, 11.

In construing a mortgage given by a railroad company on the road and its rolling stock and "all other personal property, right thereto and interest therein," it was said by the court that the phrase "all other personal property, right thereto and interest therein," was probably intended, from the connection in which it was found, to refer to property appurtenant to the road and employed in its operation, and which had not been enumerated. Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 117, 126, 16 L. Ed. 436.

"All other chattel property," as used in a will making several specific bequests and afterwards bequeathing "all other chattel property," should be construed as restricted in its meaning to the same class of property as that which had been previously mentioned specifically; as, for instance, where testator bequeathed to his niece all his goods, chattels, household stuff, furniture, and other things which should be in his house at A., it was decreed that cash found at the testator's house did not pass, for the words "other things" should be construed to mean things of like nature and species with those before specified. Peaslee v. Fletcher's Estate, 14 Atl. 1, 3, 60 Vt. 188, 6 Am. St. Rep. 103.

All other collections of antiquities.

Rev. St. § 2505, providing that cabinets of coins, medals, and "all other collections of antiquities" shall be exempt from duty, embraces all collections of antiquities within the ordinary meaning of those words, and is not limited to collections of antiquities ejusdem generis, as coins and medals. Sixty-Five Terra Cotta Vases (U. S.) 10 Fed. 880, 882.

All other demands.

Under Rev. St. c. 128, a submission to a referee in an action of trespass then pending, "and all other demands and costs already accrued on or growing out of said suit," is a reference of all demands between the parties. Harmon v. Jennings, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 240, 241.

All other goods, implements, etc.

A mortgage on goods described as a general stock of millinery, stock of ladies' notions, consisting of hats, etc., or "all other goods now on hand or to be purchased and used in the business of a general millinery store," means only such millinery goods as are on hand or may be added by purchase for sale, that being the business of a general millinery store. Chapin v. Garretson, 52 N. W. 104, 105, 85 Iowa. 377.

"All other implements of industry," as used in Gen. St. p. 473, § 3, providing that every person residing in the state and being a head of a family shall have exempt from seizure and sale one sewing machine, all spinning wheels and looms, and "all other implements of industry," and all other household furniture not herein enumerated, means "all other household implements of industry, or all other implements of industry appertaining to houses, such as sewing machines, spinning wheels, looms, etc." Rasure v. Hart, 18 Kan. 340, 344, 26 Am. Rep. 772.

"All other paper not specially provided for," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, c. 1244, par. 422 (26 Stat. 599), does not include merchandise imported and invoiced as crêpe, or crêpe tissue, which, according to the finding of the board of general appraisers, is made in a tissue paper mill, and invoiced, advertised, and sold as "tissue." Dennison Mfg. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 728, 729.

"All other seeds not otherwise provided for," as used in 9 Stat. 49, placing on the free list garden seeds and "all other seeds not otherwise provided for," is not restricted to seeds imported for agricultural purposes, but includes seeds imported for any purpose which are not otherwise provided for. Boving v. Lawrence (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1024.

"All other soaps not provided for," as used in the last clause of Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, c. 1244, par. 79, 26 Stat. 570, includes a medical soap containing 20 per cent. of carbolic acid and used for curative purposes. Park v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 731.

All other land or property.

In construing a mortgage given by the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company to the state of Alabama upon "all lands granted by the United States, to and for the benefit of this company; * * * the telegraph line and telegraph offices along the line of said road and belonging to said company; also the machine shops and all other property in said states of Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and Mississippi belonging to said company; also all coal mines now open or hereafter to be opened and worked belonging to said company, and all iron or other mineral lands and all iron manufacturing establishments now in operation or hereafter to be constructed"—the court held that the words "all other property" was not intended to include lands or interests in lands in the four states through which the road passed, other than those mentioned especially in the mortgage, and said: "While the company enumerated with great particularity its land grant from Congress, its telegraph lines and offices, its machine shops and its coal mines, it is quite unreasonable to suppose that it would have been thus needlessly minute in its description of the property conveyed, enumerating with great particularity the four or five classes of property, mostly real estate, which were intended to pass, if it had also intended that the three words 'all other property' should stand for everything in the four states which the company owned, and especially all its lands. These words, which are found neither in the beginning of the granting clause, as a general phrase to be afterwards emphasized by a more minute description, nor at the end, as a summary of what had preceded them, have their appropriate use in the precise place where they are found. We say they are there appropriate, because, in conveying the telegraph offices, the machine shops, the coal mines, the iron mines, and the manufacturing establishments, there might in them be found much property belonging to the company about which a doubt would arise whether it was a part of these offices, mines, machine shops, and manufacturing establishments. All such doubt or ambiguity is removed by declaring that all the property of the grantors in these places or used in any of these pursuits is conveyed. For this purpose the phrase 'all other property' is apt, and is used in the right place, in a description designedly minute and elaborate." Alabama v. Montague, 6 Sup. Ct. 911, 913, 914, 117 U. S. 611, 29 L. Ed. 1003.

A gift in a will of "all other land," or of "all land not hereinbefore devised," may be regarded as a devise of the residue, and not as indicating an intention to exclude lapsed, specific gifts. Moffett v. Elmendorf, 46 N. E. 845, 849, 152 N. Y. 475, 57 Am. St.

Rep. 529 (citing Cogswell v. Armstrong, 2 Kay & J. 227; Green v. Dunn, 20 Beav. 6; Culsha v. Cheese, 7 Hare, 236; Carter v. Haswell, 26 Law J. Ch. 576; Burton v. Newbery, 1 Ch. Div. 241; Roberts v. Cooke, 18 Ves. 451).

All other liens.

The phrase "all other liens," as used in a deed providing that the grantee shall assume all unpaid taxes and mortgages shown of record, and all other liens, including an attachment, will be construed ejusdem generis, and held to apply only to liens of record, under the ancient maxim that "general words shall be restrained unto the fitness of the matter and person." Whicker v. Hushaw, 64 N. E. 460, 462, 159 Ind. 1.

All other losses.

Where a policy insures a ship against the usual perils of the sea, and contains the general clause against "all other losses and misfortunes" which shall come to the damage of the ship, and an accident happens in the course of necessary repairs, the ship being upon a railway, or in dock, or hove down upon a beach, it is a peril ejusdem generis with those named in the policy. Swift v. Union Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 122 Mass. 573, 575.

All other metals.

"An act of parliament imposed certain duties on copper, brass, pewter, tin, and all other metals not enumerated, and it was held that the latter words did not include gold and silver." In re Barre Water Co., 20 Atl. 109, 110, 62 Vt. 27, 9 L. R. A. 195; Cashier v. Holmes, 2 Barn. & Adol. 592, 596.

All other mineral districts.

"All other mineral districts," within the act of Congress providing that persons may cut timber on public lands in certain states, and all other mineral districts of the United States, for domestic, mining, or agricultural purposes, does not include the mineral land of the state of Oregon. English v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 625, 626, 54 C. C. A. 81 (citing United States v. Smith [U. S.] 11 Fed. 487; Same v. Benjamin [U. S.] 21 Fed. 285).

All other officers.

The term "all other officers," as used in a constitutional provision designating a separate mode of election for "county officers" and "city, town and village officers" and "all other officers," includes such officers as are not required to reside and perform the duties of their office either within their counties or within their cities, and includes, above all, an officer who is appointed both for city and county, and neither performs all his work within the city and county, nor is obliged to reside in either. In re Whiting, 2 Barb. 513, 516.

"All other school officers," as used in How. Ann. St. § 5132, as amended by the act of 1885 requiring a majority vote to elect the trustees and "all other school officers," means the moderator, director, and assessor, who comprise the board of the primary school district. Cleveland v. Amy, 50 N. W. 293, 88 Mich. 374.

All other ordinances.

"All other ordinances of said city," as used in a bond requiring an applicant for a license to keep a barroom to observe all other ordinances of said city, means all other ordinances on the subject of licensing barrooms and drinking shops, and not all of the ordinances of the city. In re Schneider, 8 Pac. 289, 293, 11 Or. 288.

All other perils, losses, etc.

Where a marine policy insures the vessel against perils of the seas, men of war, fire, etc., and "all other perils, losses and misfortunes that shall come to the damage of the ship," such phrase means only such perils as are ejusdem generis with those particularly enumerated. Phillips v. Barber, 5 Barn. & Ald. 161, 163.

All other permanent fixtures.

The phrase "all other permanent fixtures," in a fire policy reciting that the insurer shall not be liable unless liability is specifically assumed for loss to store or office furniture or fixtures, and describing the property insured as a building including gas, steam, and water pipes, and "all other permanent fixtures," is used in connection with such fixtures as gas, steam, and water pipes, and does not cover counters, shelving, and office furniture, which might be removed without injury to the building. Banyer v. Albany Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. Supp. 65, 66, 85 App. Div. 122.

All other places.

A place where intoxicating liquors are sold at retail is not within the phrase "all other places of accommodation and amusement," as used in Bates' Ann. St. § 4426, subd. 1, which provides for the equal accommodation of all persons at inns, restaurants, eating houses, barber shops, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and all other places of public accommodation and amusement, there being considerable dissimilarity between saloons and the places previously mentioned. Kellar v. Koerber, 55 N. E. 1002, 1003, 61 Ohio St. 388.

All other proceedings.

Pol. Code, § 3787, providing that a tax deed duly acknowledged is conclusive evidence of the regularity of "all other proceedings" from the assessment, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed, refers to the acts and proceedings required to be done and had at the hands of the public officers intrusted with the various steps leading up to the execution of the tax deed, and not to something required to be done by the applicant for the deed. Such a deed is not prima facie evidence that the tax purchaser served the 30-day notice on the owner before the expiration of the time for redemption or before he applied for a deed. Miller v. Miller, 31 Pac. 247, 248, 96 Cal. 376, 31 Am. St. Rep. 229.

ALL POLICIES CONCURRENT.

An insurance policy providing that permission was thereto given for carpenters to erect an addition, "all policies concurrent," indicates that the parties intended to agree that the policy to which this permission was attached and made a part should concur with the other policies in the terms of the permission, and that therefore the property in the addition was to be covered by all the policies. Butterworth v. Western Assur. Co., 132 Mass. 489, 494.

ALL POSSIBLE CARE, SKILL, OR FORESIGHT.

"All possible care" has a broader and more unlimited meaning than "utmost care," which is the degree of care required of a carrier of passengers. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. George (Tex.), 60 S. W. 313, 314.

In an instruction that a carrier of passengers must use "all possible care," the phrase "all possible care" has a broader and more unlimited meaning than "utmost care." The word "possible" as used in this connection means "capable of being done." From the charges given, the jury must have understood that the carrier was bound to do everything that it was capable of doing to prevent the injury. The term "all possible care" might be understood by one man to mean all that the party could foresee, while it might mean to another all that might have been done as viewed after the occurrence; and the law does not require everything to be done which might be foreseen, but only such as might appear to be necessary. Thus the instruction was erroneous. International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Welch, 24 S. W. 390, 391, 86 Tex. 203, 40 Am. St. Rep. 829.

"All possible skill and care," as applied to the operation of a street railway, means every reasonable precaution in the management and operation of the cars to prevent injury to passengers; that is, good tracks, safe cars, experienced drivers, careful management, and judicious operation in every respect. Topeka City Ry. Co. v. Higgs, 16 Pac. 667, 674, 38 Kan. 375, 5 Am. St. Rep. 754.

"All possible foresight," as used with reference to the care required of a street railway company, means more than "all possible skill and care," and imports, in addition, anticipation, if not knowledge, that the operation of such cars will result in danger to passengers, and that there must be some action with reference to the future, a provident care to guard against such occurrences, and a wise forethought and prudent provision that will avert the threatened evil, if human thought or action can do so. Topeka City Ry. Co. v. Higgs, 16 Pac. 667, 674, 38 Kan. 375, 5 Am. St. Rep. 754.

ALL POSSIBLE DISPATCH.

See "With All Possible Dispatch."

ALL RAIL.

Where the contract of a carrier is that the goods shall be carried "all rail," such expression constitutes a direction by the owner and an agreement by the carrier for transportation by rail as far as practicable, and hence the necessary crossing of ferries is not a deviation. Maghee v. Camden & A. R. Transp. Co., 45 N. Y. 514, 521.

ALL REASONABLE CARE AND CAUTION.

The expression "all reasonable care and caution" would seem to require a higher degree than ordinary care, which is the care a railroad company is required to use in keeping its apparatus to prevent the escape of fire to adjoining property in repair. St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Gentry (Tex.), 74 S. W. 607, 608 (citing International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Timmermann, 61 Tex. 660, 663).

ALL RIGHT.

A statement by the agent of an insurance company, on being informed that insured property was vacant, that "it was all right," was held to be a waiver of a condition providing that the policy should be void if the premises became unoccupied without the consent of the company indorsed on the policy. Palmer v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 44 Wis. 201, 207.

The words "all right," in a telegraph message, "all right, sell 100 bales of each described" at a certain price, indicate that this was a reply to some previous message, and are notice of such fact to the telegraph operator. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Birge-Forbes Co., 69 S. W. 181, 182, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 526.

The words "all right," in a statement by the seller of a horse to the buyer that the horse is all right, amounts to a warranty that the horse is reasonably fit for the use for which it is desired by the purchaser. It is what the purchaser would naturally understand and the seller must be presumed to have intended. Smith v. Justice, 13 Wis. 600, 602.

A warranty that a span of ponies is "all right for livery purposes" is not a warranty that they are not with foal. Whitney v. Taylor, 54 Barb. 536, 539.

ALL SUCH.

Where a city charter authorized the city to license "all such" business, callings, trades, and employments as a common council may require to be licensed and as are not prohibited by the laws of the state, the words "all such" were employed as indicative of qualification in reference to that subdivision only. The reading is plain and the meaning manifest—all such business, callings, trades, and employment as the common council may require to be licensed and as are not prohibited by the laws of the state, the two latter clauses alone setting the limit of the delegated power. The provision is broad enough to include all that the common council may require to be licensed under the restriction of the succeeding clause. Lent v. Portland, 71 Pac. 645, 647, 42 Or. 488.

ALLEGATION.

See "Immaterial Allegation or Averment"; "Material Allegation."

"Allegations," in law, are statements of facts in pleadings, affirmed on one side and denied on the other. Nash v. Towne, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 689, 699, 18 L. Ed. 527.

The word "allegation," in legal parlance, usually denotes the formal averments of the parties interested, setting forth the issue, which they are prepared to prove. Mere allegations, usually undenied, are not usually a sufficient foundation for a judicial or a quasi judicial determination. In accordance with this definition, Laws 1880, c. 14, being a portion of the charter of the city, providing that after hearing the proofs and allegations of all parties interested in land taken for public improvements, the common council shall assign a time for hearing objections to the confirmation of the commissioners' report, and at the time assigned shall hear the allegations of all persons interested, and take proof in relation thereto, and confirm the same, or set it aside, does not authorize the council to set aside such report on the unverified allegations, not supported by proof, of the alderman who represents the ward in which the street was proposed to be obtained, and of the assistant city attorney. Schneider v. City of Rochester, 54 N. E. 721, 722, 160 N. Y. 165.

An "allegation," as the term is used in pleadings, is the statement of what one can prove; the positive assertion of a fact. It is not the office of a demurrer to allege facts, and hence a statute providing that "allegations in pleadings shall be liberally construed" does not mean that demurrers shall be liberally construed. Merrill v. Pepperdine, 36 N. E. 921, 922, 9 Ind. App. 416.

ALLEGATION OF FACULTIES.

Where alimony is demanded, the statement of the wife as to the means at the disposal of the husband is technically called an "allegation of faculties." Wright v. Wright, 3 Tex. 168, 179.

ALLEGE—ALLEGED.

As alleged or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

In an indictment under Rev. St. § 5440 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3676] relating to conspiracies to defraud the United States and charging accused with an intent to defraud by obtaining a dismissal of certain suits which might be brought by the United States to recover certain lands "alleged" to have been fraudulently obtained from the United States, "alleged" must be taken in its usual significance of meaning "claimed," and hence the indictment is defective, since the use of the word "alleged" leaves the fraud a question. United States v. Milner (U. S.) 30 Fed. 890, 891.

Where an answer in an action for damages for infringement of a patent for an improvement in net fabrics admits that a portion of the goods sold by respondents was fabric "alleged" by the complainant to be such as is described and claimed in said letters patent, "alleged" should be construed to mean "alleged" in the bill. Chase v. Fillebrown (U. S.) 58 Fed. 374, 376.

"Alleged," as used in Const. 1848, art. 2, § 9, providing for a trial before a jury of the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, means as "charged" or "stated" in the indictment or information. Watt v. People, 126 Ill. 9, 33, 18 N. E. 340, 1 L. R. A. 403.

"There may be a difference in meaning between the word 'alleges' in the original section and the words 'setting forth' in the amended section (Act 1881, § 10, as amended by Laws 1889, c. 30, § 7, providing that: 'When any creditor * * * shall petition to the court or judge, * * * setting forth that such debtor has' concealed and keeps a large amount of his unexempt property, and all evidence thereof, from his said assignee, with intent to delay and defraud his creditors'), but, whatever the difference may be, it is too slight to indicate an intent to change the rule on so important a matter as to what the creditor must state in order to be allowed to search the conscience of the insolvent. In re Harrison, 46 Minn. 331, 334, 48 N. W. 1132, 1133.

As admission of truth.

The words "alleged fact" in a reply, referring to an allegation of defendant in the answer as an alleged fact, cannot be considered as an admission of the truth of such fact. Day v. Mill Owners' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. W. 113, 117, 75 Iowa, 694.

The word "alleged," in an instruction referring to an instrument as an "alleged" codicil of a will, cannot be construed as casting discredit upon its validity, any more than would a reference to the codicil, without the use of the word "alleged," be an announcement in favor of its validity; by such use of the word the jury cannot be considered to have been instructed that the instrument was not a codicil. Smith v. Henline, 51 N. E. 227, 232, 174 Ill. 184.

The use of the word "alleged" in instructions in a personal injury case, which refers to the "alleged" negligence of a party, can only be construed as showing that the court is noncommittal on the question of whether there is or there is not negligence. West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Petters, 63 N. E. 662, 664, 196 Ill. 298.

ALLEGIANCE.

"Allegiance," as the term is generally used, means fealty or fidelity to the government of which the person is either a citizen or subject. Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 64, 120, 2 L. Ed. 208.

"Allegiance" was said by Mr. Justice Story to be "nothing more than the tie or duty of obedience of a subject to the sovereign, under whose protection he is." United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 461, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

Allegiance is that duty which is due from every citizen to the state, a political duty binding on him who enjoys the protection of the commonwealth, to render service and fealty to the federal government. It is that duty which is reciprocal to the right of protection, arising from the political relations between the government and the citizen. Wallace v. Harmstad, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 492, 501.

By "allegiance" is meant the obligation to fidelity and obedience which the individual owes to the government under which he lives, or to his sovereign, in return for the protection which he receives. It may be an absolute and permanent obligation, or it may be a qualified and temporary one. A citizen or subject owes an absolute and permanent allegiance to his government or sovereign, or at least until, by some open and distinct act, he renounces it and becomes a citizen or subject of another government or sovereign, and an alien while domiciled in a country owes it a temporary allegiance, which is continuous during his residence. Carlisle v. United States, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 147, 154, 21 L. Ed. 426.

"Allegiance," as defined by Blackstone, "is the tie or ligamen which binds the subject to the King, in return for that protection which the King affords the subject. Allegiance, both expressed and implied, is of two sorts, the one natural, the other local, the former being perpetual, the latter temporary. Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the King's dominions immediately upon their birth, for immediately upon their birth they are under the King's protection. Natural allegiance is perpetual, and for this reason, evidently founded on the nature of government. Allegiance is a debt due from the subject upon an implied contract with the prince that so long as the one affords protection the other will demean himself faithfully. Natural-born subjects have a great variety of rights which they acquire by being born within the King's liegance, which can never be forfeited but by their own misbehavior; but the rights of aliens are much more circumscribed, being acquired only by residence, and lost whenever they remove. If an alien could acquire a permanent property in lands, he must owe an allegiance equally permanent to the King, which would probably be inconsistent with that which he owes his natural liege lord; besides, that thereby the nation might, in time, be subject to foreign influence and feel many other inconveniences." Indians within the state are not aliens, but citizens owing allegiance to the government of a state, for they receive protection from the government and are subject to its laws. They are born in allegiance to the government of the state. Jackson v. Goodell, 20 Johns. 188, 191.

Allegiance is the obligation of fidelity and obedience which every citizen owes to the state. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 55; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 81; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 14.

ALLEGIANCE BY BIRTH.

"Allegiance by birth" is said to be that which arises from being born within the dominions and under the protection of a particular sovereign. United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 461, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

ALLEY.

An alley is not meant primarily as a substitute for a street, but only as a local accommodation to a limited neighborhood, and the public has no general right of way through it. Beecher v. People, 38 Mich. 289, 291, 31 Am.

Rep. 316; Horton v. Williams, 58 N. W. 369, 99 Mich. 423, 427.

An "alley" "is conventionally understood, in its relation to towns and cities, to mean a narrow street in common use." Bailey v. Culver, 12 Mo. App. 175, 183.

The use of the words "street" and "alley," in exclusion of the more general term "highway," in Rev. St. c. 113, § 9, which enacts that any person found drunk in any street, "alley," or other place shall be punished therefor, indicates that the public road of the country was not intended, but only the avenues of the compact part of the town. State v. Stevens, 36 N. H. 59, 63.

"Streets and alleys" ordinarily relate exclusively to the ways or thoroughfares of towns and cities. They are laid out and dedicated to public use, and especially for the use and convenience of the property holders of the towns or cities, by the proprietor thereof, or laid out and established for the same purposes by the corporation authorities. Debolt v. Carter, 31 Ind. 355, 367.

An "alley" is a narrow way, less in size than a street, and if a public one it is a highway, and in general is governed by the rules applicable to streets. Kalteyer v. Sullivan, 46 S. W. 288, 290, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 488.

An alley is no more than a way subject to a modified supervision and liable to be used for drainage and other urban service under municipal regulations, and is intended for the convenience of adjacent property, but it is not a "highway" in the proper sense of the term, nor intended for general travel or passage like streets. Paul v. City of Detroit, 32 Mich. 108, 111; Face v. City of Ionia, 51 N. W. 184, 186, 90 Mich. 104.

An alley is not a public highway so that an obstruction thereof can be regarded as a public wrong. Bagley v. People, 5 N. W. 415, 43 Mich. 355, 38 Am. Rep. 192.

In boundaries.

Where the owner of an alley and adjoining lots conveys part of them, describing them as fronting on a certain street and "with a depth of 85 feet to an alley 15 feet in width," the description is to be construed as carrying title to the middle of the alley, with an easement of way over the other half. Lindsay v. Jones, 25 Pac. 297, 21 Nev. 72.

As easement in surface only.

An "alleyway," as the term is used to denote an easement to lots bordering on an alley, means simply the right to use the same for ingress and egress to and from the lots, and does not include any right to the land beneath or above the surface; hence the owner of such easement is not entitled to an injunction to restrain the owner of the land from joining two buildings abutting the "alley" at an elevation of 10 feet, leaving a sufficient space for the use of the "alley" as a way. Sutton v. Groll, 5 Atl. 901, 902, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 213.

Opening to a street.

A conveyance granting an easement to a "right of way of an alley" construed to mean a passageway leading from the land conveyed, and not to be satisfied by a mere open space of land in the rear of the land conveyed which is inclosed by other lands over which the grantee has no right to pass. McConnell v. Rathbun, 9 N. W. 428, 46 Mich. 303.

"Alley," as used in an order directing defendants to restore a certain "alley," so as to allow the plaintiff free and common use thereof by opening an "alley" of a certain width over the rear of defendant's lot, means an open and unobstructed way of less than the usual width of a street, and the order to open and provide an alley is not fulfilled by providing a passageway through which a person may pass by opening and closing doors and gates; such means of passage are not within the reasonable and natural understanding of an "alleyway." Appeal of Hacke (Pa.) 31 Pittsb. Leg. J. 315, 316.

As a private way.

Where the term "alley" is used in a deed or in a plat, it will be taken to mean a private alley, where the term "private" is prefixed, or where the context requires that a different meaning than that of a public alley is to be assigned to the term. Elliott, Roads & S. (2d Ed.) § 24; City of Chicago v. Borden, 60 N. E. 915, 918, 190 Ill. 430 (quoting Elliott, Roads & S. [2d Ed.] § 24).

Street distinguished.

An "alley" is a narrow passageway in a city, as distinguished from a public street. Praigg v. Western Paving & Supply Co., 42 N. E. 750, 751, 143 Ind. 358; Winston v. Johnson, 45 N. W. 958, 959, 42 Minn. 398; see, also, Face v. City of Ionia, 51 N. W. 184, 186, 90 Mich. 104.

In Bailey v. Culver, 12 Mo. App. 183, an alley was said, when not private, to mean a narrow street in common use, and was declared a road in Re Sharet's Road, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 92. In Bagley v. People, 43 Mich. 355, 5 N. W. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 192, the court said: "It is designed more especially for the use and accommodation of the owners of property abutting thereon, and to give the public the same unqualified rights therein would defeat the very end and object intended." See, also, Horton v. Williams, 99 Mich. 427, 58 N. W. 369. Alleys are not intended to be substitutes for streets, but to serve as means of accommodation to a limited neighborhood for chiefly local convenlence. Beecher v. People, 38 Mich. 289, 291, 31 Am. Rep. 316 (cited in Dodge v. Hart, 83 N. W. 1063, 1064, 113 Iowa, 635, where it is said that "the principal purpose of a public alley is to furnish the owners of abutting lots and those dealing with them convenient access thereto. The main lines of travel are in the streets").

While the word "alleys" generally means narrow passageways in cities, its use in a constitutional provision furnishes no reason for claiming that streets were embraced within the provision. In re Woolsey, 95 N. Y. 135, 140.

Where a statute declares that all streets, roads, and alleys in a particular village, which have been worked and improved and are now used as such, shall be deemed public highways, the question whether a certain way is a street, road, or alley is one to be determined by the fact whether it comes within the provision of the statute, and not by the rules of the common law or the general statutes. Hickok v. Village of Plattsburgh, 41 Barb. 130, 131.

ALLOCUTION.

"Allocution" is the formal address of the judge to the prisoner asking him why sentence should not be pronounced. State v. Ball, 27 Mo. 324, 326.

ALLODIAL.

Const. art. 1, § 14, provides that all lands within the state are declared to be allodial, and feudal tenures are prohibited. Held, that the word "allodial" means free, not subject to the burdens and restrictions on alienation connected with feudal tenures; but this provision does not prohibit the Legislature from regulating the conveyance of dower or other rights growing out of the domestic relations as relating to title to real property. Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367, 384.

"Allodial lands," at common law, were those in which the owner had a complete and absolute property, free from all services to any particular lord. Wallace v. Harmstad, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 492, 499.

ALLODIUM.

"As defined by Blackstone, allodium is the land possessed by a man in his own right, without owing any rent or service to any superior." McCartee v. Orphan Asylum Soc., 9 Cow. 511, 513, 18 Am. Dec. 516 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 104).

ALLONGE.

"Allonge" is an additional piece of paper attached to a note or a similar instrument in order to make further indorsement thereon. Fountain v. Bookstaver, 31 N. E. 17, 141 Ill. 461; Crosby v. Roub, 16 Wis. 616, 626, 84 Am. Dec. 720.

An allonge is a slip of paper which, when convenient or necessary, may be annexed to an instrument on which subsequent indorsements may be written, which shall have the same effect as if written on the instrument itself, such paper being deemed a part thereof. Haug v. Riley, 29 S. E. 44, 46, 101 Ga. 372, 40 L. R. A. 244; French v. Turner, 15 Ind. 59, 62; Crutchfield v. Easton, 13 Ala. 337, 338.

Where an indorsement of a negotiable paper is made on a piece of paper so attached to the original instrument as in effect to become part thereof or be incorporated into it, such addition is called an "allonge." That device had its origin in cases where the back of the instrument had been covered with indorsements or writing, leaving no room for further indorsements thereon. An indorsement on such a paper transfers the instrument. Bishop v. Chase, 56 S. W. 1080, 1083, 156 Mo. 158, 79 Am. St. Rep. 515; Osgood's Adm'rs v. Artt (U. S.) 17 Fed. 575, 577.

"Allonge," as defined by Webster, is a paper attached to a bill of exchange for receiving indorsements too numerous to be written on the back of the bill itself, and hence where the mortgage was assigned by writing indorsed on the back of it, the mortgage not being attached to a note which was neither assigned nor indorsed, and there being plenty of room remaining blank on the back of the note for indorsement, the term "allonge" could not be construed to include such mortgage, and thus operate as an assignment of the note, in that the mortgage was to be regarded as an allonge to the note. Doll v. Hollenbeck, 28 N. W. 286, 288, 19 Neb. 639.

ALLOPATHIC PRACTICE.

"Allopathic practice is the ordinary method of practicing medicine, adopted by the great body of learned and eminent physicians, which is taught in their institutions, established by their highest authorities, and accepted by the larger and more respectable portion of the community"; but whether a physician practices such method or not cannot be proved by general reputation as a physician. Bradbury v. Bardin, 34 Conn. 452, 453.

ALLOT.

The language used in treaties to Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense, and to contend that the word "allotted," in reference to land guarantied to Indians in certain treaties, indicates a favor conveyed rather than a right acknowledged, would do injustice to the understanding of the parties. Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 515, 582, 8 L. Ed. 483; Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 22 Sup. Ct. 650, 659, 185 U. S. 373, 46 L. Ed. 954.

"Allotted," as used in a contract declaring that the shares of stockholders were "allotted" to them on the distribution, etc., means "issued" or "paid." Anthony v. American Glucose Co., 41 N. E. 23, 25, 146 N. Y. 407.

As conveying full title.

To "allot" is usually understood as meaning to set apart a portion of a particular thing or things to some particular person. Glenn v. Glenn, 41 Ala. 582. In the case of Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 112, 21 L. Ed. 805, where by the terms of a treaty there was no provision for a patent, the term "allotted" was held to pass the full title. Meehan v. Jones (U. S.) 70 Fed. 453, 454.

To "allot" means to set apart a thing to a person as his share, as to allot a fund or land; and the term "allotted," in a deed in partition, in itself implies a full partition of the land. Fort v. Allen, 14 S. E. 685, 686, 110 N. C. 183.

ALLOW.

See "Duly Allowed."

"Allow" is defined as follows: "To grant, to admit; to suffer; to yield; to grant license to; to permit; to tolerate; to fix; to give." Thurman v. Adams (Miss.) 33 South. 944, 945.

"Allowed," as used in the indorsement by a justice of the peace on a statement of appeal that it was filed and "allowed," is equivalent to "adopted" in Comp. Laws, requiring the statement on appeal to be settled or "adopted" by the justice. City of Chamberlain v. Putnam, 73 N. W. 201, 202, 10 S. D. 360.

In Rev. Code, c. 9, § 1, providing that the probate court shall have jurisdiction and authority to examine and "allow" the accounts of executors, administrators, and guardians, "allow" means nothing but the sanction or approbation which the court gives to the acts of the executor or administrator as manifested by the allowance of the account. Gildart's Heirs v. Starke, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 450, 457.

A verdict is not "allowed" and recorded within Gen. St. c. 149, § 21, giving complainant in an action for assessment of damages for flooding lands the right to elect to take damages in gross within three months after the verdict is "allowed," until the exceptions have been overruled by the Supreme Court, and complainant was entitled to judgment and execution upon the verdict of the sheriff's jury. Hamilton v. Farrar, 131 Mass. 572, 573.

As claimed.

Comp. Laws, § 1324, provides for an appeal from a determination or an award of damages on the establishment of a highway, provided the amount "allowed" in such bill does not exceed $100; and section 1327 provides for an appeal to the circuit court in case the amount of damages claimed exceed $100. Held, that the word "allowed," as used in section 1324, will be held to mean "claimed on appeal," and not the amount allowed by the supervisors. Town of Dell Rapids v. Irving, 68 N. W. 313, 314, 9 S. D. 222.

Right of determination implied.

To "allow" an account or claim is to accept or admit it as a legal demand, and the authority to audit and allow an account primarily implies the right to determine whether it is an accurate and just claim. Authority to allow an account does not necessarily negative the power to disallow. People v. Gilroy, 31 N. Y. Supp. 776, 780, 82 Hun, 500.

As direct in will.

In a will which recited, "I 'allow' my daughter Mary to take care of my said daughter Betsy," "allow" was used as meaning "direct." Cabeen v. Gordon, 1 Hill, Eq. 51, 56.

"Allow," as used in a will devising testator's real estate to his wife for life, and providing that after the death of my said wife I "allow" all my estate to be disposed of at public sale, the proceeds to be equally divided between certain beneficiaries, "allow" is "here used in the sense of positive direction, for without the sale the testator's expressed intention in respect to distribution could not be carried out." Ramsey v. Hanlon (U. S.) 33 Fed. 425, 426.

Discretion indicated.

In Pol. Code, § 4597, providing that the whole number of deputies "allowed" the sheriff is one undersheriff and not to exceed the following number of deputies, "allowed" is not used in the sense of a power granted to the sheriff to exercise his discretion in making appointments within the maximum limits, but he is subject to the control of the board of commissions. Jobb v. Meagher County, 51 Pac. 1034, 1038, 20 Mont. 424.

Rev. St. c. 64, § 18, authorizing the court to appoint or "allow" any person as next friend of an infant to commence or defend a suit in his behalf, means that the court shall have a discretion in appointing or allowing other than the guardian to institute or defend such suit. Patterson v. Pullman, 104 Ill. 90, 87.

As entering allowance.

In Rev. St. § 4461, providing that the commissioners shall, upon actual view of the premises sought to be taken for public use for the construction of a ditch, fix and "allow" compensation for the lands appropriated to each person or corporation making application, the word "allow" relates to the entering upon their journal an order fixing and allowing the amount of compensation to a landowner who has made application therefor, which act exhausts their power. Nothing remains but for the county auditor to draw his warrant on the county treasurer for the sum so allowed. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463, 468.

As fix.

"Allowed," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5197 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], providing that any national bank may charge the interest "allowed" by the laws of the state where it is located, means fixed or established by the law of such state. Guild v. First Nat. Bank, 57 N. W. 499, 501, 4 S. D. 566.

In the national banking act authorizing the national banks to charge and receive interest at the rate "allowed" by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and declaring that when no rate is "fixed" by the laws of the state or territory they are "allowed" a rate not exceeding 7 per cent., the word "fixed" is used in the same sense as the word "allowed." Hinds v. Marmolejo, 60 Cal. 229, 231; Daggs v. Phoenix Nat. Bank (Ariz.) 53 Pac. 201, 204; Wolverton v. Exchange Nat. Bank, 39 Pac. 247, 248, 11 Wash. 94.

"Allow," as used in Sess. Laws 1885, p. 83, providing that the district attorneys shall receive such salaries for their services as the board of county commissioners of the proper county shall "allow," is synonymous with the word "fix" as used in a resolution of the board stating that they "fix" the salary of the district attorney at a certain sum. Polk v. Minnehaha County, 37 N. W. 93, 94, 5 Dak. 129.

As give, grant, or pay.

In a will which recited that testatrix bequeathed to her daughter Betsy one mulatto girl, and that at Betsy's decease testatrix allowed another daughter to have the mulatto girl, "allow" was used as synonymous with "give." Cabeen v. Gordon, 1 Hill, Eq. 51, 58.

"Allow," as used in an agreement providing that one of the parties thereto was to "allow" the other a certain sum yearly out of a certain fund, is used in the sense of "give" or "pay." This sense, though uncon-mon, is not entirely unknown. Straus v. Wanamaker, 34 Atl. 648, 652, 175 Pa. 213.

In the supplementary articles to the Choctaw treaty of September 28, 1830 (7 Stat. 340), wherein no provision is made for patents, the terms "shall be entitled to," "there is allowed," "may locate," "shall be granted," "there is given," are used synonymously with respect to reservations. Meehan v. Jones (U. S.) 70 Fed. 453, 455.

As intend.

In a written instrument executed by defendant reciting that "this is to show that I allow to give" W. J. a certain sum to be paid in two years after date, "allow" is equivalent to "intend" to give, and simply expresses a present intention to give the person named therein the sum stipulated within two years, and constitutes no valid obligation which can furnish a sufficient ground for an action. Harmon v. James, 7 Ind. 263, 264.

A will providing that "I also 'allow' my son Henry to give his mother a support off my plantation during her lifetime," expresses an intention that his son should support his wife, during her life, off the plantation, the testator being an illiterate man, and it not being uncommon for that class of persons to use the word "allow" as synonymous with that of intention—"I allow to go to town to morrow;" "I allow for my wife to have a support off my plantation when I die," etc. The testator used the word "allow" in this clause of the will as expressive of his intention that his son, to whom he had given his homestead, should support his mother off the same during her life. Hunter v. Stembridge, 12 Ga. 192, 194.

Knowledge implied.

"The word 'allow' is defined thus: 'To suffer; to tolerate;' and, as used in a definition of 'permit' as to allow, implies knowledge of what is to be permitted." Gregory v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1195, 1198.

The term "allow" implies knowledge and consent. Under Code, § 1590, providing that any person who shall sell or give away any liquors unlawfully, or allow the same to be sold or given away, knowledge of the person charged is necessary. Thurman v. Adams (Miss.) 33 South. 944, 945.

As permit.

Permit distinguished, see "Permission—Permit."

A provision in a will "allowing" the wife to have any part of the dwelling house means that she is "permitted" to have such part, and confers a personal privilege merely. Kearns v. Kearns, 107 Pa. 575, 578.

A contract for the purchase of a boiler, providing that it shall be "allowed 130 pounds of steam working pressure by United States inspectors," should not be construed as an assurance that the boiler contracted for would produce and maintain a working pressure of that amount, but should be held to refer only to the capacity of the boiler, and plainly refers to the government inspection of boilers under Rev. St. U. S. § 4418 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3024], and that it would be such a boiler that such inspectors would permit a working pressure of 130 pounds and set the safety valves accordingly. Milwaukee Boiler Co. v. Duncan, 58 N. W. 232, 234, 87 Wis. 120, 41 Am. St. Rep. 33.

The word "allow" is not as positive as the word "permit," being more of a synonym with the word "suffer," while the word "permit" denotes a decided assent. Wilson v. State, 46 N. E. 1050, 1051, 19 Ind. App. 359.

"Allowing," as used in a reservation in a deed commencing with the grantee "forever hereafter allowing all persons to pass, repass," etc., presupposes the absence of a right to pass and repass without the permission of the grantee, so as to create, not a reservation or an exception, but a condition subsequent. Parsons v. Miller (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 561, 564.

"Allowed," as used in an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if there be kept, used, or "allowed" gasoline on the premises, means "allowed to be kept or used by some third person," and will be so construed, even though such meaning is covered by the words "kept" and "used," so that the condition is not violated by merely permitting gasoline to be carried through the building on the premises. London & L. Fire Ins. Co. v. Fischer (U. S.) 92 Fed. 500, 502, 34 C. C. A. 503.

Power to permit or refuse implied.

"Allow," as used in a contract whereby an improvement company sold the hydraulic power arising from a dam and a canal, covenanting that it would not construct or "allow" to be constructed any dam or other work below on said river which should raise the water beyond the ordinary stage at the foot of the rapids, must be construed to have been used in its ordinary and popular sense, implying an understanding or expectation of the parties at the time that the improvement company would continue in such relation to the property that it might, if so disposed, by some affirmative act on its part facilitate or permit the construction of a dam below the rapids, which the contract intended to prevent. The word "allow," in its ordinary sense, means "to grant," "to admit," "to afford," or "to yield," "to grant license to," "to permit," from which is implied a power to grant some privilege or permission, and hence there was no breach of covenant where a dam had been constructed so as to raise the water above the ordinary stage at the point mentioned by the United States government after its purchase of the property of the improvement company, for the purpose of improving navigation, after a foreclosure sale under a deed of trust given by the improvement company in which it had made no exception or reservation in respect to the construction of the dam below its water power, since it was not in a position to allow any such thing when the government entered upon the enterprise of improving the water power of the river, and rebuild the dam below the dam of the improvement company. The improvement company was in a position where it could prevent nothing; it could suffer nothing. The United States could proceed in the construction of this dam independently of the improvement company, without its consent, against its protest. When the United States stepped in and acquired dominion and control of the property for the purpose of improving the navigation, it had the right by virtue of its sovereign power to build a dam, and its act was not one covenanted against by the improvement company. Doty v. Lawson (U. S.) 14 Fed. 892, 893.

The word "allow" is ordinarily equivalent to the word "permit" or to the words "consent to." Its use in any given case assumes the existence of a power to refuse to allow, permit, or consent to, and the right to elect whether to grant or withhold the allowance or permission asked for. Marshall v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 35 Atl. 204, 176 Pa. 628, 34 L. R. A. 159.

As proved.

Laws 1887, c. 548, requires the court to remove an assignee for creditors on the application of a majority of the creditors representing a majority in value of the debts "allowed." Held, that the term "allowed" as so used was evidently an oversight on the mistaken supposition of the Legislature that the statute provided for the allowance of claims, and that, in view of the fact that no such provision or proceeding existed, the word "allowed" must be given a reasonable construction, and be held to mean "allowed by the assignor or assignee" or "proved." The word "allowed" is not therefore to be limited to the establishment of a claim by judgment or order of court. Burt v. Barnes, 58 N. W. 790, 791, 87 Wis. 519.

Something to allow from implied.

In Act March 23, 1837 (P. L. 48), authorizing the chancellor to "allow" the commissioners, upon a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, reasonable compensation, and the jurors fixed fees out of the estate of the person subject to the inquisition, the word "allow" impliedly premises a fund in court. It does not contemplate payment from the estate of the subject of the inquisition when no offices should be found. In re Farrell, 27 Atl. 813, 816, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 353.

ALLOWANCE.

See "Additional Allowance"; "Extra Allowance"; "Reasonable Allowance."

Of widow, see "Statutory Allowances."

An "allowance" is that which is allowed; a share or portion allotted or granted; an appropriation for any purpose; a stated quantity, as of food or drink (Webster). De Roche v. De Roche (N. D.) 94 N. W. 767, 770.

"Allowance," as applied to accounts of executors and administrators, means nothing more than the sanction or approbation which the court gives to acts of the executor or administrator as manifested by his account. Gildart's Heirs v. Starke, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 450, 457.

As act of judicial officer.

The word "allowance" in Code, § 139, does not mean the act of the attorney in proceedings for the claim and delivery of personal property. It means the act of a judicial officer, and not one whose duties are purely ministerial. Adams v. Henry (N. Y.) 3 Wkly. Dig. 22.

As compensation.

An "allowance" is something conceded as a compensation; abatement; deduction; and in 1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 62, authorizing "allowances" by the board of commissioners of a county, permits a payment to a person for services voluntarily rendered and things voluntarily purchased for the county. Carroll County Com'rs v. Richardson, 54 Ind. 153, 159.

"Allowances," in an order granting trustees just "allowances," entitled them only to charges and expenses, but not to compensation. State Bank at Elizabeth v. Marsh, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 288, 297.

As fees or salary.

Under a statute providing that fees of county officers shall be increased 50 per cent., "allowances" made to the sheriff for feeding prisoners are not increased, the word "fees" not including "allowances," which means, according to Webster, "to put upon allowance; to restrain or limit to a certain quantity of provisions or drink." The word "allowance" does not signify the compensation the sheriff earns by arresting prisoners or summoning juries or performing duties of like character, they being peculiar to the office which he holds, and under which he becomes entitled to fees. Feagin v. Comptroller, 42 Ala. 516, 522.

In construing Const. art. 3, § 8, prohibiting the Legislature from passing a private or local bill creating, increasing, or decreasing fees, percentage, or allowances of public officers during the term for which said officers are elected or appointed, the court comments on the meaning of the word "allowance," and the omission of the words "salaries" and "stipends," which are defined as requital of some supposed service paid yearly or even portions of the year, and are the subject of a contract between the parties. The courts say: "We have yet to discover any employment of the word 'allowance' by lawmakers or others which is the exact equivalent of either of the words 'salary' or 'compensation.'" Reference to the works of lexicographers shows Webster's definition to be: The act of allowing; granting or admitting; permission or license; that which is allowed; a portion appointed; a limited quantity of meat and drink when provisions fall short; a customary deduction from the gross weight of goods. The substance of the definitions is that an allowance is gratuitous; it ceases at the pleasure of the donor. Worcester gives a definition similar to that of Crabbe, but refers to the word 'salary' as one of the synonyms of 'allowance,' distinguishing them, however, by stating that the latter is gratuitous, and the former a stated compensation payable under a contract. Richardson's English Dictionary gives: To permit; to concede; to suffer; to ascend; to yield. Other lexicographers give definitions similar to those of Worcester and Crabbe, and seem to exclude the idea that the terms are analogous, except perhaps in a very loose and imperfect sense. It seems to us that the authors of the Constitution did not intend to include salaried officers within the meaning of the clause in question." Mangan v. City of Brooklyn, 98 N. Y. 585, 597, 50 Am. Rep. 705.

As a gift or devise.

The term "allowance" is ordinarily only another name for a gift or gratuity to a child or some other dependent. Taylor v. Staples, 8 R. I. 170, 179, 5 Am. Rep. 556.

A will providing that after the testator's property had remained with his family for the term of one year, then, after the "allowance of one-third of my property to my widow," the remainder should be divided among testator's children, entitles the widow to one-third of the testator's real and personal property in fee simple absolutely. White v. Commonwealth, 1 Atl. 33, 34, 110 Pa. 90.

As a legal demand.

"Allowance," as used in 1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 476, § 15, providing that a board of county commissioners shall make no "allowance" not specially required by the act to any county officer, either directly or indirectly, nor to any clerk, deputy, bailiff, or employé of such officer, should not be construed as embracing a legal demand which any of the officers named might have against the county, but only such matters as would otherwise, under other laws, have rested in the discretion of the board. The law was not intended to take away the right of the board to allow all legal demands or accounts chargeable against the county, and hence the board could allow a sheriff for the value of certain candles, brooms, mops, and coal purchased by him for the use of the jail thereof, and necessary therefor and used therein. Marion County Com'rs v. Reissner, 58 Ind. 260, 263.

Allowance to soldier or officer.

A soldier who had enlisted for 3 years deserted at the expiration of 10 months, and, after being subsequently arrested, was restored to duty, with the loss of all pay and allowance due or to become due during the term of his enlistment. He was thereafter honorably discharged. Held, that under the term, "allowance" as used in the judgment of forfeiture everything was embraced which could be recovered by the government from the soldier in consideration of his enlistment and services, except a stipulated money compensation designated as "pay." United States v. Landers, 92 U. S. 77, 81, 23 L. Ed. 603.

The term "allowances" is sometimes used synonymously with "emoluments," as indirect or contingent remuneration, which may or may not be earned, but which is sometimes in the nature of compensation, and sometimes in the nature of reimbursement; but as used in a statute providing that military officers upon their discharge shall receive one year's pay and "allowances," it does not include commutation for traveling expenses, and hence the omission of such term from an amendment of such statute did not affect the right of such officers, upon their discharge, to a commutation for traveling expenses from the place where they are mustered out or discharged to the place where they were enlisted. Sherburne's Adm'r v. United States, 16 Ct. Cl. 491, 496, 500.

Acts Feb. 14, 1885, and Sept. 30, 1890, provide that a hospital steward after being retired is entitled to 75 per cent. of the pay and "allowances" of the rank on which he was retired. Held, that the word "allowances" does not include commutation for fuel and quarters. Lander v. United States, 30 Ct. Cl. 311, 318.

Allowance to wife in divorce statutes.

Under Civ. Code, § 139, which provides that, where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to make such suitable "allowance" to the wife for her life, or for a shorter time, as it may deem just, the "allowance" will be construed as something more than a substitute for her interest in the community of property, or her right or inheritance in the property of the husband, and to be compensation for the work done to the wife. It proceeds upon the theory that the husband entered upon an obligation which, among other things, bound him to support the wife during the period of their joint lives, and gave to her a right to share in the fruits and accumulations of his skill, and that by his own wrong deeds he forced her to sever the relation which enabled her to enforce this obligation, and for the wrong by which he thus deprived her from the benefit of the obligation he must make her compensation. In re Spencer, 23 Pac. 395, 396, 83 Cal. 460, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266.

The allowance specified in a statute providing that if a wife has no separate estate, or if it be insufficient for her maintenance, the chancellor, upon granting a divorce, must decree her an "allowance" out of the estate of the husband, "is not in fact alimony in the sense of the ecclesiastical law of England, but it is more strictly an arrangement in law, by a division of the estate of the parties, so as to return to the wife her just portion of that property which mutually belongs to both during the marriage, and which the labor and care of both may have equally contributed to procure and preserve. This allowance was intended to supply the wife with the means of commencing life anew after her expulsion from the household of the husband and the withdrawal of his liability for her maintenance and support, and to place her above actual destitution." Smith v. Smith, 45 Ala. 264, 268.

"Allowance," as used in Civ. Code, § 139, providing that, when a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to make such "suitable allowance" to the wife for her support for life, or for a shorter period as the court may deem just, construed to include the allowance of a gross sum to the wife. Robinson v. Robinson, 21 Pac. 1095, 1096, 79 Cal. 511 (citing Jeter v. Jeter, 36 Ala. 391; Platt v. Platt, 9 Ohio [9 Ham.] 37).

The term "allowance," as used in Rev. Code 1899, § 2761, providing that on divorce the court may grant alimony in a gross amount in lieu of an allowance at stated periods, permits the court to grant a gross sum as an allowance. De Roche v. De Roche (N. D.) 94 N. W. 767, 770.

ALLOWED BY LAW.

When the term "allowed by law" is used in a statute, it is to be construed as meaning allowed by the statute law, and not to have reference to the general law or legal right. Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 1 N. E. 663, 665, 99 N. Y. 185.

The compensation from fees allowed a civil officer, to an amount to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, not to exceed a certain amount a day, is compensation "allowed by law," within 18 Stat. c. 328, § 3, prohibiting civil officers from receiving any compensation in addition to that "allowed them by law," the Commissloner's authority to fix such compensation, the Comptroller's authority to pass it, and the Treasurer's authority to pay it, all being "allowed by law." Hedrick v. United States, 16 Ct. CL 88, 103.

ALLUDE.

To "allude" means to refer to something not directly mentioned, to have reference to, and as used in Gen. St. tit. 1, c. 73, § 7, providing that, on the trial of all indictments against persons charged with crime, the neglect of a defendant to testify shall not be "alluded" to or commented upon by the prosecuting attorney or the court, the court rightly refuses an instruction in reference to such failure to testify. State v. Pearce, 57 N. W. 652, 655, 56 Minn. 226.

ALLUVIAL.

Earthy deposits made to a tract of land situated along a river which become incorporated with the soil of the tract are usually called "alluvial accretions," and become the property of the riparian owner. Welch v. Browning, 87 N. W. 430, 431, 115 Iowa, 690.

"Alluvion" has been defined to be those accumulations of sand, earth, and loose stones or gravel brought down by rivers, which, when spread out to any extent, form what is called "alluvial land." It is an addition made to land by washing of the seas or rivers, and its characteristic is its imperceptible increase, so that it cannot be perceived how much is added in each moment of time. Freeland v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 47 Atl. 745, 747, 197 Pa. 529, 58 L. R. A. 206, 80 Am. St. Rep. 850.

ALLUVION.

As defined in Roman law, "alluvion" is an addition of soil to land by a river, so gradually and in so short a period that the change is imperceptible, or, to use a common expression, a latent addition, and Justinian says that it is added so gradually that no one can perceive how much is added at any one moment (Inst. Bk. 2, tit. 1, § 20), and the same rule was expressed in the English jurisprudence, and Bracton says (Book 2, c. 2) that alluvion is lands gained from the sea by a washing up of sand and earth so as in time to make it terra firma, and that if the gain be little by little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the adjoining land. The test as to what is gradual and imperceptible in the sense of the rule is that the witnesses could see from time to time that progress had been made in the formation of the land, but could not perceive it while the process of formation was going on. In the light of the authorities, "alluvion" may be defined as addition to riparian land, gradually and imperceptibly made by the water to which the land is contiguous. Jefferis v. East Omaha Land Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 518, 521, 134 U. S. 178, 33 L. Ed. 872; St. Clair County v. Lovington, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 46, 68, 23 L. Ed. 59.

"Alluvion," according to the common law, is an addition made to land by the washing of the sea or other stream, where the increase is so gradual in its progress that it cannot be perceived how much is added at any moment of time. Land thus formed belongs to the proprietor of the adjacent land to which it is attached. Warren v. Chambers, 25 Ark. 120, 121, 91 Am. Dec. 538, 4 Am. Rep. 23; Adams v. Frothingham, 3 Mass. 352, 358, 3 Am. Dec. 151; Lovington v. St. Clair County, 64 Ill. 56, 58, 16 Am. Rep. 516; De Bary Baya Merchants' Line v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 40 Fed. 392, 393; Hubbard v. Maxwell, 14 Atl. 693, 696, 60 Vt. 235, 6 Am. St. Rep. 110; Coulthard v. Stevens, 50 N. W. 983, 984, 84 Iowa, 241, 35 Am. St. Rep. 304 (citing Benson v. Morrow, 61 Mo. 345, 352).

"Alluvion," as defined by the Civil Code of Louisiana, "is the accretions which are formed successively and imperceptibly to any soil situated on the shores of any creek or run." Saulet v. Shepherd, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 502, 508, 18 L. Ed. 442; Municipality No. 2 v. New Orleans Cotton Press, 18 La. 122, 167, 36 Am. Dec. 624.

To acquire title by alluvion, it is necessary that its increase should be imperceptible. Halsey v. McCormick, 18 N. Y. 147, 149.

Alluvion is the land formed by sedimentary deposits and added to an ordinary tract by the imperceptible action of the waters bordering the latter. It is a mode of acquiring property by natural law, jure gentium, by those principles and maxims which regulated the conduct of men before the formation of civil society, and is recognized by the statutory law as a means of the acquisition of property. Sapp v. Frazier, 26 South. 378, 380, 51 La. Ann. 1718, 72 Am. St. Rep. 493. "The right to such increase is said to rest in the law of nature, and is analogous to the right of an owner of the tree to its fruits, and the owner of flocks and herds to their natural increase. The owner takes the chances of injury and benefit arising from the situation of his property. If there be a gradual loss, he must bear it; if a gradual gain, it is his." Hubbard v. Maxwell, 14 Atl. 693, 696, 60 Vt. 235, 6 Am. St. Rep. 110.

increase, so that it cannot be perceived how much is added in each moment of time. Free-land v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 47 Atl. 745, 747, 197 Pa. 529, 58 L. R. A. 206, 80 Am. St. Rep. 850.

The right to alluvion is a right attached to the land, and one who owns the fee simple of such land owns all that becomes attached to that part of it bordered by the water. Washburn says (3 Washb. Real Prop. 59) that "this right to alluvion is considered as an interest appurtenant to the principal land, and belonging in the nature of an incident to the ownership of that, rather than something acquired by prescription or possession in the ordinary legal sense of the terms." Kinzie v. Winston (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 649, 652.

Title by alluvion is a purely accessory right, attaching exclusively to riparian proprietorship, and incapable of existing without it. White v. Leovy, 22 South. 931, 943, 49 La. Ann. 1660.

Accretion distinguished.

"Alluvion" is the deposit on the lands of a riparian owner caused by the gradual and continued action of the water. It "is applied to the deposit itself, while 'accretion' rather denotes the act." St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Ramsey, 13 S. W. 931, 933, 53 Ark. 314.

Avulsion distinguished.

"Alluvion" is a secret increase made to land by the sea, and is so gradually added that it cannot be known at what moment the addition took place. It is contradistinguished from those large additions which are made to land when the sea suddenly recedes, or when it casts up by its immediate and manifest force large quantities of earth and sand. Linthicum v. Cone, 2 Atl. 826, 827, 828, 64 Md. 439, 54 Am. Rep. 775; St. Clair County v. Lovington, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 46, 66, 23 L. Ed. 59.

As reliction.

There is no "alluvion" without some kind of reliction, for the sea shuts out itself. Ocean City Ass'n v. Shriver, 46 Atl. 690, 692, 64 N. J. Law. 550, 51 L. R. A. 425.

"Alluvion" may be defined as an addition to riparian land, gradually and imperceptibly made by the water to the land which is contiguous. It is different from "reliction." St. Clair County v. Lovington, 85 U. S. (23 Wall.) 46, 23 L. Ed. 59.

ALLUVIUM.

"Alluvium" is used in the mining law to designate that superficial deposit on the earth's surface which is movable, as contrasted with the immovable mass that lies below. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

ALMS.

"Alms," as used in St. 5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 76, § 9, declaring that persons who have received parochial relief or other alms shall not be entitled to hold office, applies only to parochial alms, and not such as might be rendered by persons not connected with established charities. Reg. v. Lichfield, 2 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 693.

ALMSHOUSE.

The word "almshouse," as used and defined in the New York poor laws, means a place where the poor are maintained at the public expense. People v. Lyke, 53 N. E. 802, 803, 159 N. Y. 149.

"Almshouse," being defined in Poor Law 1896, § 2, as a place where poor are maintained at public expense, includes any place, and not merely a county poorhouse or a place specially provided. In re McCutcheon, 56 N. Y. Supp. 370, 372, 25 Misc. Rep. 650.

As exempt from legacy tax.

An almshouse is an institution supported by charity which makes no charge whatever for the benefits rendered, and a charitable institution which maintains a home and provides lodging and meals free, but which also maintains a day nursery for which it makes a small charge, is not an almshouse, and hence is not exempt from the legacy tax. In re Vanderbilt's Estate, 10 N. Y. Supp. 239, 2 Con. Sur. 319.

An association to improve the condition of the poor, which dispenses its benefits without any charge whatever, and keeps a place where money is disbursed to the needy, is an "almshouse," within the definition of a pure charity, so as to exempt a legacy to it from the legacy tax, although it has no house where the poor are lodged. In re Lenox's Estate, 9 N. Y. Supp. 895, 896.

A charitable institution depending wholly on voluntary contributions, and performing a work of pure charity in taking care of sick and disabled indigent persons, is an "almshouse" within Rev. St. p. 388, § 4, exempting devisees to the same from the collateral inheritance tax. In re Curtis' Estate, 7 N. Y. Supp. 207, 208.

As exempt from taxation.

"Almshouse," as used in Rev. St. (7th Ed.) p. 982, § 4, subd. 4, providing that every poorhouse, almshouse, etc., shall be exempt from taxation, means any institution whose inmates are supported wholly by charity. In re Herr's Will, 10 N. Y. Supp. 680, 57 Hun. 591.

"Almshouse" "is defined by Webster as a house appropriated to the poor." Thus a house devoted to the purpose of affording pecuniary relief to persons of Swiss origin in need of assistance is an almshouse, within a statute exempting such property from taxation. People v. City of New York (N. Y.) 36 Hun, 311, 312.

Either of the terms "almshouse," "poorhouse," "schoolhouse," or "house of industry," within the meaning of statutes exempting such houses from taxation, includes buildings owned by the Church Charity Foundation, and used for the care, maintenance, education, and support of aged and indigent persons and indigent orphans and half-orphan children, and other children left in a destitute and unprotected state or condition. Church Charity Foundation v. People (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 154, 157.

An institution incorporated as a colored orphan asylum, for the purpose of maintaining a place of refuge for the colored orphans, where they should be boarded and suitably educated, is exempt from taxation under 1 Rev. St. p. 388, § 4, subd. 4, as an almshouse, where it is appropriated wholly for the poor, where they have a place of refuge, and are clothed, boarded, and suitably educated gratuitously; and the fact that it is a private corporation is immaterial. Association for Colored Orphans v. City of New York, 12 N. E. 279, 281, 104 N. Y. 583.

"Almshouse," as used in Rev. St. pt. 1, c. 13, tit. 1, § 4, subd. 4, exempting almshouses from taxation, is a house appropriated for the poor, and does not include an institution which required the persons admitted to pay an entrance fee and to transfer their property, in case they had any, to the institution. In re Keech's Estate, 7 N. Y. Supp. 331, 332.

The term "almshouse," within the meaning of the law exempting almshouses from taxation, includes a hospital for the gratuitous medical and surgical relief of the poor and used as a hospital for indigent sick, and as a dispensary to relieve the poor, for which no charge or return is exacted. Western Dispensary v. City of New York, 4 N. Y. Supp. 547, 56 N. Y. Super. Ct. (24 Jones & S.) 361.

The term "almshouse" in 1 Rev. St. p. 388, § 84, exempting every poorhouse, almshouse, etc., from taxation, includes the Vassar Brothers' Home for Aged Men, incorporated under the general law for charitable purposes, although applicants for admission are required to pay a certain fee and to turn over their property, if they have any, to the home. In re Vassar, 27 N. E. 394, 397, 127 N. Y. 1.

ALONE.

"Alone," as added to a requested instruction, which was given as modified, that if the jury had any reasonable doubt as to whether or not a certain confession was obtained by threats or promises they should not convict on such confession "alone," does not modify or change the meaning of the instruction as requested, since the instruction embodies all that is expressed by the word "alone," and its use cannot be regarded as prejudicial. Bartley v. People, 40 N. E. 831, 833, 156 Ill. 234.

ALONG.

Under the word "along," and as an adverb, in Webster's Dictionary, is the following: "Sax., andlang or ondlang; Fr., au-long, lelong. See Long. The Saxons always prefixed 'and' or 'ond,' and the sense seems to be, by the length or opposite the length, or in the direction of the length." The first definition given is: "By the length; lengthwise; in a line with the length; as the troops marched along the bank of the river, or along the highway." The first definition given of the word "long" is: "Extended, drawn out in a line, or in the direction of length, opposed to short, and contradistinguished from 'broad' or 'wide.' Long is a relative term; for a thing may be long in respect to one thing, and short with respect to another." Pratt v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 42 Me. 579, 585.

As across.

The omission of the word "across" in the amendment of a statute which authorized the construction of a railroad "across, along, or upon" any highway, the amendment providing that nothing therein contained should be construed to authorize the construction of a railroad upon or along any highway without an order of the Supreme Court authorizing the same, was construed in the case of Osborne v. Railroad Co., 27 Hun, 589, not to show that the consent of the Supreme Court was not required in order to authorize a railroad company to cross a highway, but the words "upon or along" were held to include such crossings. New York L. & W. Ry. Co. v. Roll, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748, 751, 32 Misc. Rep. 321.

As used in General Railroad Act 1872, § 5, providing that, in the case of the construction of a railway "along" highways, plank roads, turnpikes, or canals, such railway shall either first obtain the consent of the lawful authorities having control or jurisdiction of the same, or condemn the same, under the provisions of any eminent domain law now or hereafter in force in this state, "along" means "by the length of," as distinguished from across; and hence where a railway constructed its track across the highways in an incorporated town, where such track intersected the highways, it was not necessary for the railway company to obtain permission of the board of county commissioners, since such constructions did not constitute the building of a track "along" the highway. Cook County v. Great Western R. Co., 10 N. E. 564, 567, 119 Ill. 218.

A barbed-wire fence running diagonally across a yard from the house to the corner of a street is not maintained "along" a sidewalk, within St. 1884, c. 272, § 1, prohibiting the construction of barbed-wire fences along a sidewalk upon a public street. Quigley v. Clough, 53 N. E. 884, 173 Mass. 429, 45 L. R. A. 500, 73 Am. St. Rep. 303.

As adjacent to.

"Along" refers to the waters adjacent to and easily reached from the coast line, and, while "upon" relates to any given spot or place, the word "along" extends the suggestion to the very northern from the very southernmost point of that coast line. American Fisheries Co. v. Lennen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 869, 873.

As adjoining.

In Wag. St. p. 310, § 43, requiring every railway to erect and maintain fences on the sides of the road where the same passed through, and "along" or adjoining inclosed and cultivated fields, or uninclosed prairie lands, and making it liable for injuries to stock caused by neglect to maintain such fences, "along" is synonymous with the term "adjoining"; both words as used imply contiguity, contact. Walton v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 67 Mo. 56-58.

As alongside of.

"Along," as used in Code, § 1287, allowing telegraph companies to construct their lines "along" any of the roads or railroads, as to country roads means to go along, upon, or on them; that is, in the way country roads are used by the public. They are highways for the uses of the public, and all people may pass along or upon them, at their pleasure and in their own way. The railroad is a highway of a different sort. To grant its use to others than the owners thereof would be to destroy its value and its usefulness. The lexicographers define "along" as "by the length of," as distinguished from "across," and plainly it has such meaning in the statute, and as so used evidently means, as to railroads, that the telegraph line is to run in the direction lengthwise of the railroad; alongside and equidistant from it, throughout all its parts, so that neither shall meet or touch; not in or upon the railroad strip. Postal Telegraph Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 14 S. E. 803, 805, 88 Va. 926.

The word "along" in a statute giving a railroad company the right to construct its line across, "along," and upon any stream of water, or water course, street, or highway, turnpike or canal, when considered in reference to a street, cannot mean along the side of a street, because such meaning confers no right whatever in respect to the street, but leaves the railroad to make its way through the adjoining lots owned by individuals without the consent of the city or any aid of the statute. Arbenz v. Wheeling & H. R. Co., 10 S. E. 14, 17, 33 W. Va. 1, 5 L. R. A. 371.

As in the vicinity of.

In construing Code 1897, § 427, providing that the board of supervisors shall have power to change and establish a highway along a stream, when it can avoid bridging such stream, the court said that the word "along" has a somewhat elastic meaning, even when used in its most technical sense. As used in this statute, it is evidently not to be construed as meaning on the immediate bank of the stream, so that the construction of a road within the vicinity of the stream, and within a reasonable distance thereof, is authorized. Stahr v. Carter, 90 N. W. 64, 65, 116 Iowa, 380.

In an act of the Legislature reciting that it is for the protection of farmers and owners of cattle residing "along" the line of any railroad, and making the railroad company liable for cattle killed in consequence of the neglect of the railroad company to fence its track, the words "along the line of" mean in the vicinity of; otherwise only such stock owners as own or occupy land adjoining the lines of railway would be protected; and so even those who are in the lawful occupancy of highways crossing the railroads, unless they were adjoining landowners, would not be within the terms of the act. Dunkirk & A. V. R. Co. v. Mead, 90 Pa. 454, 458, 8 Wkly. Notes Cas. 206, 208.

The statutes declare a railroad company responsible for an injury by fire communicated to any building, and declare that the railroad shall have an insurable interest in property for which it may be held responsible in damages "along its route." Held, that the company's liability only existed with regard to property which lay "along its route," which meant property sufficiently near to railroad as to be exposed to danger of fire from its engines. Pratt v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 42 Me. 579, 585. If the property is so near the railroad that it in fact took fire from the engine, it must be deemed to be situated along the route of the railway. Martin v. Grand Trunk Ry. of Canada, 32 Atl. 976, 977, 87 Me. 411.

Under Gen. St. Vt. c. 28, § 79 (a like statute), it is held that the phrase "along its route" means in proximity to the rails on which the locomotive engine runs, and applies to buildings or property along the route, whether they are outside the lines of the roadway of the railroad or lawfully within those lines. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 472, 23 L. Ed. 556.

Under a like statute (St. 1840, c. 85, § 1), "along its route" was held to mean a building which is near and adjacent to the road, so as to be exposed to danger by fire from engines, but without limiting or defining any distance, and the phrase is not to be construed as limiting the operation of the act to the very first building which might be touched with a spark. Hart v. Western R. Corp., 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 99, 104, 46 Am. Dec. 719.

In the statute (Rev. St. §§ 4358, 4359) providing that railroads shall be liable for damages caused by disease being communicated from diseased cattle in course of transportation to other cattle in the neighborhood or along the line of such transportation, the expression "along the line of the road" means in a line with it; by the side of it; near to it. Coyle v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 27 Mo. App. 584, 593.

As on or over.

A declaration alleging that plaintiff was walking "along" the sidewalk at the time of an injury is equivalent to a statement that she was on the sidewalk. Town of Nappanee v. Rukman, 34 N. E. 609, 610, 7 Ind. App. 361.

Within the meaning of Laws 1899, c. 152, § 2, declaring that no bicycle side paths shall be constructed "upon or along" any regularly constructed or maintained sidewalk, "along" is synonymous with the word "upon" as so used, the provision being intended to prevent the appropriation of any portion of a regularly constructed sidewalk for a bicycle path, and not to forbid the construction of a bicycle path at the side of or adjoining any such sidewalk. Ryan v. Preston, 66 N. Y. Supp. 132, 163, 32 Misc. Rep. 92.

A municipal ordinance authorizing the construction of railroad tracks "along" an alley does not necessarily mean by the side of, and, when considered in connection with another portion of the ordinance authorizing the construction of the road "on, over, and along" certain other alleys, it will be construed as being synonymous with "on," "over," and "along" as there used. Heath v. Des Moines & St. L. Ry. Co., 15 N. W. 573, 574, 61 Iowa, 11.

The term "along," as used in a description in a deed as along the shore, means "on," and includes the shore. Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, 425.

A statute authorizing a railroad company to construct their road "along" the river means beside or alongside, and does not authorize the railroad company to construct its road in or on the river, since the meaning of the word "along" must be controlled by the subject-matter, and a railroad cannot be built in a river unless it is first filled in, and it cannot be presumed that the company had authority to fill in the river. Stevens v. Erie Ry. Co., 21 N. J. Eq. (6 C. E. Green) 259, 261.

A statute conferring on a railroad company the right to construct its road along a river, and to acquire the rights of the shore owners, gave the right to the railroad company only to construct its line along the bank of the river, and would not be construed by implication to confer on it the right to take the lands between the high and low water mark, since, though by local custom the shore owner was entitled to use the land between the high and low water mark, such privilege was a mere license from the state, which was the sole owner of such land, which the Legislature had the right to revoke. Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co., 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 532, 537, 3 Am. St. Rep. 269.

"Along," as used in Rev. St. arts. 721, 722, authorizing a corporation organized to construct channels in the waters of the gulf "along and across" any of the bays on the coast to the mainland, etc., is not to be construed as synonymous with or as meaning "upon," so as to require a construction across the waters, but should be construed separately from the other preposition used, and hence authorizes a construction on the land adjacent to the bay as well as on the bay itself. Crary v. Port Arthur Channel & Dock Co., 47 S. W. 967, 969, 92 Tex. 275; Davis v. Port Arthur Channel & Dock Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 512, 515, 31 C. C. A. 99.

Laws 1890, c. 565, § 4, permitting a railroad company to construct its road "across, along or upon" any highway, means only a casual or incidental occupation and use of the highway, and does not authorize a company to build its entire railway along the highway. Burt v. Lima & H. F. R. Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 482, 483.

"Along," as used in Code 1887, c. 54, § 50, relating to the use of public streets by railroad companies, means along in the street, at, above or below the common level of the existing or changed surface of the street, according as the particular facts and circumstances may require, but does not authorize an occupancy by the railroad, for its exclusive use, of the entire street, or of such considerable portion of it as would substantially prevent the use of it by the public. Arbenz v. Wheeling & H. R. Co., 10 S. E. 14, 17, 33 W. Va. 1, 5 L. R. A. 371.

As parallel to.

Gen. St. c. 45, § 6, providing that a person owning lands adjoining a highway may construct a sidewalk within such highway "along the line of such land," does not necessarily import that the part of the sidewalk finished for travel must at all points touch or be parallel to the line of the land, but it may happen that owing to the peculiarities of the land, or because of the direction which foot travel had before taken, that it would be more convenient and better to finish the sidewalk in a direction not exactly parallel with the landowner's fence. Commonwealth v. Franklin, 133 Mass. 509, 570.

Code, § 1287, authorizing telegraph and telephone companies to construct and operate their lines "along and parallel to any of the railroads of the state," meant conforming to, having the same direction of, tendency with, the railroad, and not that the lines should extend in the same direction, and in all parts be equally distant. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Farmville & P. R. Co., 32 S. E. 468, 470, 96 Va. 661.

As up to or reaching.

A deed conveyed 30 acres of land, more or less, off of what was known as a "mill track," beginning at a white oak stump at a named bridge on the road, running from the old mill seat to P.'s, and running "along" P.'s line to high-water mark on the west bank. Held, that the word "along," as used in such description in the sentence "along a line," etc., did not signify that the object to which the line ran must be on the line, but rather the reverse. "Along," in this sense, is used as equivalent to "up to"; "extending to"; "reaching to." Benton v. Horsley, 71 Ga. 619, 628.

C. and M. were owners of adjoining lots, both claiming from the same source. M.'s lot had been previously contracted to be sold to O., who was then in possession under his contract. A brick building stood on C.'s lot at the date of the conveyance, and C.'s deed described the land as continuing the same course "along the front of said building 79 feet 9 inches, to the corner thereof, being the north line of the premises contracted to O.; thence easterly, along the southern side of the brick wall of the said building, 77 feet, to an alley." M. erected a building on his lot, constructing his north wall up to and against C.'s south brick wall; and C., claiming that his deed carried him to the southern line of the foundation wall instead of the southern line of the brick wall of the building, brought ejectment for the intervening 6 or 8 inches. Held, that the word "along," as there used, meant up to, and that the division line between the lots mentioned in O.'s deed was intended to be a straight line from the corner of the building to the rear of the lot, and that the term corner of the building and "along the southern side of the brick wall" clearly limited C.'s southern line to the outer surface of the brick wall, and therefore that C. had no title to the strip of land in question. Cornes v. Minot (N. Y.) 42 Barb. 60, 65.

Along the bank or shore.

"Along the bank," as used in a description of land defining one of the boundary lines as extending "along the banks" of a river, and running "on the bank," limited the conveyance to a line drawn on the bank, and did not extend ad flum aquæ to the center of the stream. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 417, 14 L. Ed. 189.

"Along," when used in the description in a deed, means "by, on, or over," according to the subject-matter and context, and in a description along the shore means "on," and includes the shore. Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, 425.

"Along the shore," as used in a deed describing a boundary as "along the shore," included the strip between high and low water mark, since the word "shore" means the land washed by the seas between high and low water mark. Oakes v. De Lancey, 24 N. Y. Supp. 539, 540, 71 Hun. 49.

A conveyance of a lot in a city was described as a mill lot beginning and running easterly to the Genesee river; thence southerly, "along the shore" of the said river, to B. street. Held, that the word "along" as there used meant a boundary line drawn along the shore at low-water mark, which constituted the grantee's eastern boundary, and hence the grantee took no title to any part of the bed of the stream. Child v. Starr (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 369, 380; Starr v. Child (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 149, 153; Jacquemin v. Finnegan, 80 N. Y. Supp. 207, 211, 39 Misc. Rep. 628; French v. Bankhead (Va.) 11 Grat. 130, 155.

"Along" the shore line means on a line parallel with and three miles from the shore. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3907.

Along the bay or pond.

The use of the words "along the bay" in the charter of a village describing one boundary as being along a certain bay is not to be construed as having been used for the purpose of giving an absolute and fixed boundary at the shore as it then existed, but to designate a shifting terminus at the shore as it might exist at any time thereafter, whether it extends into the bay by natural cause, or by artificial structures erected for the purposes of commerce. Bechtel v. Village of Edgewater (N. Y.) 45 Hun. 240, 242.

A description of land in a deed describing the property as commencing at a known monument on the shore of a nonnavigable lake or pond, and running thence "along said pond," does not show an intention to convey only to the shore of the pond, but conveyed all the land to the center of the pond. The course and distance given represent the sinuosity of the line of connection of the water with the shore, and the boundary as "along the pond," as generally understood, means on its water. And the fact that the length of the lines running to and from the monuments at the pond is the distance to and from them on the bank does not of itself affect the question, since such is usually the case in the description of land bounded on streams in which the grants are treated as ad filum aquæ. And as said by Mr. Justice Cowan in Luce v. Carley, where the grant is so framed as to touch the water of the river, one-half the bed of the stream is included by construction of law. This, of course, means to the extent of the boundary in contact with the water. It is a matter of common knowledge in respect to lands bordering on streams and other bodies of water that it is usual in surveys, when made, to so describe the uplands as to compute the number of acres they contain, as generally in them, exclusive of the soil beneath the water, is mainly the value, and the quantity of the uplands embraced in a conveyance constitutes, in view of the situation, the basis for measuring the consideration. Gouverneur v. National Ice Co., 31 N. E. 865, 870, 134 N. Y. 355, 18 L. R. A. 695, 30 Am. St. Rep. 669.

Along the highway, road, or street.

General words of description bounding land "along a highway," or "upon a highway," or as "running to a highway," are expressive of an intention to convey to the middle of the highway; but when, from the description, it is manifest that the parties intended to restrict the conveyance to the line of the highway or street, no part of the highway or street passes. Anderson v. James, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 35, 37; Jackson v. Hathaway (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 447, 453, 8 Am. Dec. 263; Witter v. Harvey (S. C.) 1 McCord, 67, 71, 10 Am. Dec. 650; Hunt v. Brown, 23 Atl. 1029, 75 Md. 481.

The words "along a highway," when used in a deed describing a boundary of the land conveyed as being "along a highway," will be construed, in the absence of anything showing a contrary intention, as fixing the boundary of the land at the center of the highway. Buck v. Squiers, 22 Vt. 484, 489; Holloway v. Delano, 18 N. Y. Supp. 700, 703, 64 Hun. 27; Trustees of Hawesville v. Lander, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 679, 680; Moody v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 31, 37 (citing Paul v. Carver, 26 Pa. [2 Casey] 223, 67 Am. Dec. 413; Newhall v. Ireson, 62 Mass. [8 Cush.] 598, 54 Am. Dec. 790); Fraser v. Ott, 30 Pac. 793, 794, 95 Cal. 661. The same rule applies to a private street as well in the city as in the country, opened by the grantor, upon which he sells house lots bounding upon it. Trustees of Hawesville v. Lander, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 679, 680.

A grant of land described as bounded "along" or "by" or "on" a highway carries the fee to the center of the highway, if the grantor owns so far. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gould, 8 Atl. 754, 756, 67 Md. 60.

In a description in a deed describing one of the lines as "running thence northwesterly 'along' Spring place, 25 feet," "along" meant that the limitation of the grantee's deed was a line drawn along the side of the street, and therefore did not convey any portion of the street. Pollock v. Morris, 51 N. Y. Super. Ct. (19 Jones & S.) 112, 116.

The words "along the road," used in a deed to describe a boundary, commencing in the middle of the road, operates to fix the boundary line as the center of such road. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 524, 527, 61 Am. Dec. 678; Herring v. Fish, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sandf.) 344, 348; Cochran v. Smith, 26 N. Y. Supp. 103, 105, 73 Hun. 597.

A description in a deed which gave one boundary of the land conveyed as "along" said road meant a grant to the edge of the road, and did not pass title to the highway to the center thereof. Kings County Fire Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 87 N. Y. 287, 291, 41 Am. Rep. 361.

The words "along the road," used by one who has laid out a road entirely on his own land, but on the margin thereof, in a conveyance of the land described in one boundary as being along said road, operates to fix the boundary along the outer boundary of the road from the land conveyed, and therefore the grantee acquires the fee in the road. Haberman v. Baker, 28 N. E. 370, 371, 128 N. Y. 253, 13 L. R. A. 611.

Where the words "along the street" are used in a conveyance to describe a boundary of land, the purchaser acquires title to the center of the street, though such boundary line is described as commencing at a point on the side of the street, as nothing short of an intention expressed in ipsisssimis verbis to exclude the highway can exclude it. Salter v. Jonas, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 469-470, 23 Am. Rep. 229.

The words "along the street," when used to describe the boundary of real property, will ordinarily carry to the grantee the fee of the street to its middle line; but if two points on the side line of the street are fixed as the beginning and end of the course, the boundary will be upon the side line of the street. Patten v. New York El. R. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Abb. N. C. 306, 342.

Along the line of the street.

As used in Act March 23, 1876, providing for the widening of a certain street in the city of San Francisco, defining the district benefited thereby, and appointing a board of commissioners to carry out the work, section 6, prescribing a notice to the "property owners along the line of said street" that the board was then organized, the words "property owners along the line of said street" are not equivalent to the words "owners of property fronting on said street." Lent v. Tillson, 14 Pac. 71, 75, 72 Cal. 404.

Along a mountain or ridge.

Along a mountain or ridge means summit point or summit line, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3905. The words "to," "on," or "along" a mountain range or mountains mean the summit point or summit line of such range of mountains. Rev. St. Ariz. 1901, par. 929.

The words "to," "on," "along," "with," or "by" a mountain or ridge mean summit point or summit line, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4105.

Along the river or stream.

Along the river, as used in the description of a deed which described one boundary of the land conveyed as running "along" a certain river, meant that the grantee took title to the center of the main channel of the stream. Walton v. Tift (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 216, 219.

Where a grant of land is so formed as to touch the water of the river, and run thence along the river as it winds and turns, and the parties did not expressly except the river, if it be above the tide, one-half of the bed of the stream is included by construction of law. Luce v. Carley (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 451, 452, 35 Am. Dec. 637.

In a patent from the state of New York the lines of a land grant were described as proceeding along the shore of Lake Ontario; and then up along the shore of Oswego river; thence along the bound of a certain tract of land to Oneida Lake; and thence along the shore of such lake to a certain creek; thence along such creek to the place of beginning. Having in view the situation at the date of the grant, its fair construction is that the center of the river was intended as the boundary line, and the grant should be held to extend to the center of the Oswego river. Van Buren v. Baker, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 209, 210.

"Along said stream," as used in Sess. Laws 1862, p. 48, § 13, prohibiting the diversion of any stream from its original channel to the detriment of any miner or others along the line of said stream, and requiring that there shall be at all times left sufficient water in said stream for use of miners and others "along said stream," is equivalent to the phrase "on the bank, margin, or neighborhood," as used in Sess. Laws 1861, p. 67, § 1, providing that persons having claims on the bank, margin, or neighborhood of any stream shall be entitled to the use of the water thereof, and includes all lands in the immediate valley of the stream of water, etc. Coffin v. Left Hand Ditch Co., 6 Colo. 443, 451.

Along a creek, river, slough, strait, or bay means the middle of the main channel thereof, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3906; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4106.

Along the route.

Under a statute authorizing commissioners to be appointed for any town site "along the route" of a certain railroad, for the purposes of railroad aid, a town which it is impossible to avoid in proceeding from one terminus of the railroad to the other is "along the route" of such railroad. Phelps v. Lewiston (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 450, 460.

Along the side of the street.

In the case of land bounded by a highway, the grant extends to the center of the highway; but, where it is bounded by and "along the side" of such highway, the boundary is fixed at the side thereof, leaving still in the grantor the fee of the land over which the highway passes, subject only to the easement of public right of way. Child v. Starr (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 369, 382.

The words "along the southerly side," in describing a boundary in the conveyance of land as being on the southerly side of a certain street, the boundary running to the street, thence along the southerly side of the street, westwardly, etc., was construed as fixing the boundary on the south side of the street, and not at the center. Anderson v. James, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 35, 37.

ALONGSIDE.

A bill of lading of iron shipped by boat providing that the iron should be taken from "alongside," and discharged at a certain rate per day, must be construed to mean that the consignee should take the iron at the end of the voyage from where the ordinary appliances of the ship would leave it in discharging—"at the end of the ship's tackle," on the wharf, if the ship were discharging at a wharf; on a lighter, if the ship could not reach a wharf and was discharging in the stream. It cannot be construed to impose upon the carrier the duty of moving the iron over the wharf to the land, beyond where the ordinary appliances of the ship would leave it, but the expense of moving the iron to the land must fall upon the consignees. Turnbull v. Citizens' Bank of Louisiana (U. S.) 16 Fed. 145, 147.

A bill of lading specifying that coal was to be delivered "alongside" means that the cargo was to be unloaded at the expense of the consignees. Kilroy v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 30 N. Y. St. Rep. 724, 725.

ALONG WITH.

A rule of court providing that no dilatory plea shall be received unless the party offering it shall file, along with the plea, an affidavit proving the truth thereof, means that the affidavit shall be filed at the time the plea is filed, and the filing of an affidavit after demurrer, and not until the time of argument, is insufficient, since the plea and the evidence to support it must be put in together. Trenton Bank v. Wallace, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 83, 84.

ALOOF.

"Aloof" may mean separate or apart, but also carries with it the meaning of standing off or at a distance; and hence, in a prosecution under a statute against gaming at an outhouse where people resort, an instruction that the house must be one standing "aloof" from occupied houses is not correct. Downey v. State, 22 South. 479, 481, 115 Ala. 108.

ALREADY.

In P. L. 149, exempting suits "already" commenced from the operation of the statute, "already" refers to present, and not future, time, and the meaning of the phrase, "suits already commenced," is not the same as where suits shall have been commenced. Appeal of Manufacturers' Natural Gas Co., 18 Atl. 630, 631, 130 Pa. 283.

"Already done," as used in an ordinance directing the laying of sidewalks where not "already done," has no other signification in the ordinance than to exclude its application to the parts of the line where work contemplated had been done, and continued to be in such state that further attention was unnecessary. It applies to existing, and not to the prior, condition of the subject-matter. In re Burmeister (N. Y.) 6 Wkly. Dig. 197.

"Already" means previously to some specified time, so that, as used in Laws 1869, c. 40, § 1, providing that the clerk of the Supreme Court shall have in addition to the fees "already" prescribed, such per diem, etc., it has the effect of continuing the right to charge the fees which had theretofore been prescribed by statute, though the statutes which have prescribed them have been repealed. Harrison v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc., 59 Pac. 266, 267, 61 Kan. 134.

In statutes as affecting application.

Pub. Laws 1874, c. 215, requiring notice to the selectmen of a town of the nature and attendant circumstances of an injury caused by a defective way within sixty days of the occurrence of the accident, except in cases of injuries "already sustained," took effect at the expiration of thirty days after the adjournment of the Legislature that enacted it, and was approved March 13, 1874. Held that the words "already sustained" must be construed as referring to the time when the act took effect, and not to the date of its passage, and hence the act had no application to an injury received on March 7, 1874. Jackman v. Inhabitants of Garland, 64 Me. 133, 135.

"Already," as used in Act April 9, 1883 (P. L. p. 414), providing that any mutual insurance companies already chartered by the Legislature, or already organized under the general laws of the state, may, after giving 90 days' notice in three of the public papers in the state, change to joint-stock companies by proceeding in accordance with the provisions of the act, is fairly susceptible of two interpretations—one as applying to the date of the passage of the act, and the other to the date of the application for change; and, inasmuch as the first construction would make the act unconstitutional, it must be construed as referring to the time when the change was desired to be made. Schwarzwalder v. Tegen, 43 Atl. 587, 589, 58 N. J. Eq. 319.

"Already accrued," as used in Code 1848, § 73, changing the operation of the statute of limitations, but relieving from the effect of such changes causes of action "already accrued," and providing that the statutes "now in force" should be applicable to them, should be construed as applying not merely at the date of the original enactment, but to any subsequent amendment as of the date of such amendment. Causes of action "already accrued" are intended and saved as well at the date of the change affected by the amendment as at the date of the change accomplished by the original law. Goillotel v. City of New York, 87 N. Y. 441, 444.

In the provision of the Constitution that "no county, city, school district or municipal corporation, except in cases where such corporations have already authorized their bonds to be issued, shall hereafter be allowed to become indebted," etc., the words "already" and "hereafter" plainly have reference to the same time; that is, the time at which the Constitution acquired life and force by its adoption. List v. City of Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 501, 522.

St. 1870, c. 389, § 8, which declared that nothing contained in the act should affect any penalty or forfeiture "already incurred" under the provision of any law in force prior to the passage of the act, means that the act should not affect any penalty incurred before the taking effect of the statute. Commonwealth v. Bennett, 108 Mass. 30, 32, 11 Am. Rep. 304.

ALSO.

See "And Also."

The word "also," prefixed to a sentence in a will, serves to point out the beginning of a new devise or a new bequest. It imports no more than "Item," and is, in such case, of the same signification as "moreover." Evans v. Knorr (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 66, 68.

The word "also," as used in Rev. Code 1819, c. 96, § 18, providing that in making title by descent it shall be no bar to the party that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate is an alien, and bastards shall "also" be capable of inheriting or transmitting inheritance on the part of the mother in like manner as if they had been legitimate children, is introduced simply to mark the transition, and cannot be construed to authorize the inference that similar provisions were in contemplation for the two cases. Garland v. Harrison (Va.) 8 Leigh, 368, 384.

As in addition to.

"Also," as used in a deed exempting what is granted, thereby means "likewise, in like manner, in addition to," denoting that something is added to what preceded it. Panton v. Tefft, 22 Ill. (12 Peck) 367, 375.

"Also," as used in a lease providing for the rental of a building, together with power, not exceeding six-horse, for the conduct of the lessee's business, that of a steam laundry, "also" steam for washing machines and dry rooms, means in addition; besides; as well; further; too. Reynolds v. Washington Real-Estate Co., 49 Atl. 707, 709, 23 R. I. 197.

In a sale of a specific quantity of land, and "also" the prior right to use one-half the waters of a certain creek, "also" has the meaning attached to the word by lexicographers, meaning "in like manner" or "in addition to" the land above described. Dalton v. Bowker, 8 Nev. 190, 201.

"Also" is defined by Webster to mean in like manner, further, in addition to, and when used in a statute providing that a new county should not be created unless the question of segregation should first be submitted to a vote of the people of K. county, and "also" to the voters of that part proposed to be detached from S. county, means that the question should be submitted to the vote of K. county, and in addition thereto should be submitted to the voters of the part intended to be segregated. Van Dusen v. Fridley, 43 N. W. 703, 704, 6 Dak. 322.

"Also," as used in a deed reciting that the grantor reserves to herself the possession, use, enjoyment, and control of a tract of land for and during her natural life, and reserves "also" the care and support of her daughter for and during her natural life, created a charge on the rents and profits of the lands for the care and maintenance of the daughter during her life, and not only during the life of the grantor. Wall v. Wall, 35 S. E. 811, 126 N. C. 405.

"Also" means furthermore; in addition; in like manner; likewise; and, as used in Const. art. 12, § 1, providing that the legislative assembly may "also" impose a license both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in the state, is used in the sense of a conjunctive, and will not be held to carry over into the sentence the idea of the sentence which precedes, and make the section say that the Legislature may also impose such license tax for the support and maintenance of the state and for the support and maintenance of the county. State v. Camp Sing, 44 Pac. 516, 518, 18 Mont. 128, 32 L. R. A. 635, 56 Am. St. Rep. 551.

The word "also," in a clause of a city charter empowering the mayor to try all offenders against the ordinances of the city in a summary manner, without a jury, with the right of appeal to the city council, presided over by the mayor or an alderman, which shall sit as a jury to try the facts involved, and may also reverse, modify, or affirm all or any of the rulings of the mayor in the first trial of the case, shows that the province of the alderman was not to be confined merely to trying the facts involved, and therefore the last clause shows the purpose to confer upon the alderman two different and distinct powers—first, to try the facts sitting as a jury; and, second, to reverse, affirm, or modify the law as ruled by the mayor. City Council of Anderson v. O'Donnell, 7 S. E. 523, 527, 29 S. C. 355, 1 L. R. A. 632, 13 Am. St. Rep. 728.

The word "also" in a claim of a patent which, after stating one of the claims, said, "I also provide means for certain other purposes," indicated that the inventor had on his mind not only the combination of the first claim, but also an additional contrivance that could be embodied in the second claim as auxiliary and healthful, although not necessary to the efficiency of the first. Stockton v. Maddock (U. S.) 10 Fed. 132, 134.

"Also" means "too," "further," or "in addition to," and sometimes has the meaning "in like manner." It will be held to mean "in addition to" when used in a will devising certain property absolutely, and "also" I give and devise certain other property. Kinkele v. Wilson, 29 N. Y. Supp. 27, 29, 9 Misc. Rep. 139.

"Also," as used in a will in which the testator devised a certain tract of land, and also certain goods and chattels to K., his heirs and assigns, in trust for the sole and separate use of E., and "also" a sum of $1,000 to K. in trust for the use of her, the said E., serves to point out the beginning of a new devise or a new bequest, and imports no more than the word "item," and has the same signification as "moreover," and cannot be construed as meaning "in like manner." The word was obviously used as a mere copulative, and hence the bequest of $1,000 was not for the sole and separate use of E., but went to K. Evans v. Knorr (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 66, 68.

As used in a will bequeathing and devising specific articles of personal property to his wife for life, and in the same clause "also" giving and bequeathing to her a certain sum of money, "also" should be construed in the sense of "in addition" or "besides," and not "in like manner." While it is true that one meaning of the word "also" is "in like manner," another and quite as common a meaning is "in addition," "besides." Loring v. Hayes, 29 Atl. 1093, 1094, 86 Me. 351, 356.

"Also," as used in a will giving to testator's wife and son his homestead, with the buildings thereon, "also" all farming tools and utensils, carts, carriages, etc., should be given one of its most ordinary and usual meanings, that of "in addition thereto." Mace v. Mace, 49 Atl. 1033, 1039, 95 Me. 233.

"Also," as used in a will, means only some other subject of gift beside that which has been already mentioned, and can include only what is specified by name or description. Williamson v. Williamson, 57 N. C. 281, 286.

A deed recited that the party of the first part should "sell and convey to the party of the second part . . . one bay horse, . . . to have and to hold to the party of the second part and his heirs, forever; also a lien upon each and every one of said crops to be cultivated during the said year;" and it thus proceeded to give the mortgagee the right to take possession of the crops and sell them in certain specified contingencies. Held, that the word "also" as employed in the deed was a copulative conjunction, and implied "likewise; in like manner; in addition to; besides." Rawlings v. Hunt, 90 N. C. 270, 273.

As in like manner.

"Also" imports in like manner. State v. Parler, 29 S. E. 651, 654, 52 S. C. 207.

Where by the will testator made a general gift to his wife of everything, real and personal, during her life or widowhood, and at the decease of his wife gave to two sons certain slaves, "also" to another son all his land, and also two certain slaves, such sons could not take until the decease, or at all events the marriage, of the wife. The grammatical construction establishes that position. The future gift in the first part of the clause of two slaves to the two sons, limited expressly to commence "at the decease of my wife," came in the same clause with the two gifts of the last son. The one of land begins with "also," that is, "in like manner"; the other, of negroes, begins with the words, "and also," that is, again "in like manner," which clearly connects these gifts to this son with those of the two others as all having the same beginning, namely, at the death of the wife. Sherrill v. Echard, 29 N. C. 161, 164.

"Also," as used in a will, means in the same manner; and where a negro woman was given by testator to his wife for life, and "also" a choice of any one of the other negroes, the wife took a life estate only in the negro selected by her. Hyman v. Williams, 34 N. C. 92, 94.

"Also," as used in Act April 2, 1861, as amended March 25, 1866 (Swan & S. Rev. St. 389, 391) §§ 1, 2, 3, providing that all the real and personal property of the wife at marriage remains her separate estate, and in any action against the husband and wife upon any cause existing against her at their marriage, or upon any tort committed by her during coverture, or upon any contract made by her concerning her separate property, the separate property of the wife shall be "also" liable to be taken for any judgment rendered therein, does not mean that liability of the husband or of his property is implied, no such liability having been declared in the preceding part of the statute, but the word "also" must be understood as referring to the ownership of the wife declared in the preceding sections. The Legislature intended to say, not that the husband should be liable and the property of the wife should be "also" liable, but that the property of the wife should be separately owned by her, and should be "also" liable for the judgments levied in the cases named. Westerman v. Westerman, 25 Ohio St. 500, 508.

"Also" means likewise, or in the same manner; and where it was used in a will relating to a devise of slaves its effect was to connect those who followed with those who preceded its use, and to give to all the same destiny. Allison v. Bates, 45 Ky. (6 B. Mon.) 78, 80.

In a will giving a testator's wife during her widowhood all his lands, tenements, and hereditaments, all his interest in real estate, mortgages, and notes, "also" all his money accounts, bonds, and evidences of indebtedness, and personal property and personal estate, "also" means in like manner. Kratz v. Kratz, 59 N. E. 519, 520, 189 Ill. 276.

In a will providing that testator's widow should have all his household goods and furniture, and "also" one-third of all the income of his estate during her widowhood, in lieu of dower, "also" means the same as "in like manner," and hence the widow was entitled only to a life estate. Morgan v. Morgan, 3 Atl. 63, 64, 41 N. J. Eq. 235.

The word "also," when used as an adverb, means in the same manner, or in like manner, or likewise; it is also used with the meaning of "too," "further," and "in addition to"; but in devise "and also I give" will be construed to give the property in the same manner as the previous bequest. Kinkele v. Wilson, 45 N. E. 869, 871, 151 N. Y. 269; Anonymous, 8 N. C. 161; Du Pont v. Du Bos, 29 S. E. 665, 670, 52 S. C. 244; Noble v. Ayers, 56 N. E. 199, 61 Ohio St. 491.

An ordinance requiring an officer to give a bond, and "also take and subscribe an oath," means that he shall give the bond and likewise take the oath; and as the oath is to be taken before entering the office, and is to be in the same manner, the bond must be given before he enters the office; the definitions of "also" being in the same manner; likewise; too; in addition. Howell v. Commonwealth, 97 Pa. 332, 335.

In a will devising to testator's wife certain lots for and during her natural life, "also" all the rents, incomes, and profits arising from my real estate for a certain time, after which she should receive one-third of the net income, the word "also" means in like manner, and not in addition to, and thus gave the wife only a life interest in the one-third of the net rents and income of the real estate. Morrison v. Schorr, 64 N. E. 545, 549, 197 Ill. 554.

ALTER—ALTERATION.

See "Material Alteration."

Deface distinguished, see "Deface."

The word "alter" has been defined to make a change; to modify; to vary in some degree. It means to make a thing different from what it was; to vary in some degree without making the entire change; and, again, to make otherwise; to change in some respect, either partially or wholly. Sessions v. State, 41 S. E. 259, 260, 115 Ga. 18.

To alter a thing is to change its form or nature, without a destruction of the existence of the thing altered or changed, or a loss of its identity. Haynes v. State, 15 Ohio St. 455, 458; Davenport v. Magoon, 4 Pac. 299, 301, 13 Or. 3, 57 Am. Rep. 1; Heiple v. Clackamas County, 25 Pac. 291, 292, 20 Or. 147; City of Hannibal v. Winchell, 54 Mo. 172, 177; Black River Imp. Co. v. Holway, 59 N. W. 126, 128, 87 Wis. 584.

"Alter" means to change or modify the form or character of a thing, without absolute change of its identity, as where a power to alter a wharf authorizes an extension or diminishing of it. City of Hannibal v. Winchell, 54 Mo. 172, 177.

Act.

The word "alter." as used in an act entitled "An act to alter or amend the several acts incorporating the town of S." is capable of two meanings. If the word as used in the title be construed to mean a change in the acts incorporating the town of such a kind as to entirely change the character of the municipality, then that part of the act which creates a city from a town would not be different from that expressed in the title. Sessions v. State, 41 S. E. 259, 260, 115 Ga. 18.

Bank bill or note.

Swan's St. 233, 234, providing a punishment for uttering "altered bank bills," means an authentic and genuine bill legitimately printed from the genuine plate and truly signed by the officers of the bank, but altered in its denomination or in some other material part. An altered bank bill can neither be a counterfeit and forged, nor a spurious bill. Kirby v. State, 1 Ohio St. 185, 189.

"Alter," as used in statute forbidding an alteration of bills, means such an alteration as will increase the apparent value of the bill. Commonwealth v. Hayward, 10 Mass. 34, 35.

"Alter," as used in Crimes Act, § 22, Starr & C. Ann. St. 409, making it a forgery to "alter any bank note," means a change in form or nature, without a destruction of the existence of the thing altered or changed, or loss of its identity, and hence cutting out the words "one dollar" from the body of a bank note and artfully fitting blank paper in the space so made, and substituting the figure five for the figure one where it appears in the corners of the bill, is an alteration of the note. Haynes v. State, 15 Ohio St. 455, 458.

Building.

As construction, see "Construct—Construction."

"Alterations," as used in a building contract providing that no "alterations" could be made in the work shown or described by the drawings and specifications except upon a written order of the architect, should be construed to include changes in substituting mountain surface stone for mountain quarried stone, and lap binders for headers in the foundation walls. Gibbs v. School Dist. of Girardville, 46 Atl. 91, 94, 195 Pa. 396.

Where the taking down and rebuilding of area walls was rendered necessary by the facts that, through carelessness or negligence of others than the person erecting them or his servants, an excavation near the area was left exposed to the elements during the winter, and the excavation became filled with water, which overflowed the area walls and entered them, where it froze and caused the walls to crack and split and become defective, the damage did not result from the "alterations in the plan of construction," which the contractor had agreed to make without extra charge. Fay v. Muhler, 20 N. Y. Supp. 671, 673, 1 Misc. Rep. 321.

"Alterations, deviations, or additions," within the meaning of a building contract expressly providing for "alterations, deviations, or additions, and the payment for them," includes extra work on the building, and therefore an order payable out of the amount due on the builder's contract includes the sum due for such extra work. Dunn v.

Stokern, 3 Atl. 349, 350, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 401.

A building contract requiring additional payments for changes, additions, and alterations will be construed to mean such changes as are incidental to the complete execution of the work as described in the plans and specifications, and therefore of only minor or trifling importance; if otherwise, some different mode of determining what prices should be paid for them would also have been prescribed by the writer. We think any material departure from the plans and specifications with reference to which the contract was made, which resulted in a new and substantially different undertaking, cannot be regarded as within the meaning of this language. Cook County v. Harms, 108 Ill. 151, 159.

The true construction of a clause in a deed giving to the grantee certain privileges in the alley between the message conveyed and the message on the adjoining lot, providing that "so long as the said two messages stand and remain as they now are, or until the owners of both lots mutually agree to alter the buildings, only certain alterations are to take place in the alley," is not that the grantee shall not repair, but that he shall not rebuild; and the alteration of the message of the grantee by the addition of a story and a new roof, without affecting the state of things previously existing in relation to the alley, is not repugnant to the provision of the deed. Burkelow v. Maurer (Pa.) 3 Rawle, 482, 483.

"Alter," as used in a clause of a lease which provided that the tenant might make "alterations in the buildings so as to adapt it to other business than that of a livery stable," meant that the tenant might change the nature or form of the building, but did not authorize him to tear it down and erect or rebuild a new and different structure on the building. To alter any building or thing is to change its form or nature without destroying its identity. Davenport v. Magoon, 4 Pac. 299, 301, 13 Or. 3, 57 Am. Rep. 1.

Altering, repairing, or ornamenting (as used in the Illinois mechanic's lien law) does not include putting a lightning rod on a house. Drew v. Mason, 81 Ill. 498, 499, 25 Am. Rep. 288.

"Alteration of a building" is an addition to its height or to its depth or to the extent of its interior accommodations. It is distinguished from the word "addition" as that term is used within the meaning of the mechanic's lien law, in that the latter must be a lateral addition and occupy grounds without the limits of the building to which it constitutes an addition. Updike v. Skillman, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 131, 133.

An insurance policy on a building providing that the insured has permission to make

"alterations and repairs incidental to the business," means such alterations in relation to the carrying on of the business as would not essentially and materially increase the liability of the property's being destroyed by fire, and cannot be intended to embrace all alterations which the insured might desire to make in connection with his business. Crane v. City Ins. Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. 558, 561.

"Alteration," as used in a lease prohibiting the "alteration" of the buildings without the consent of the lessors, includes the erection of a wooden structure on the back part of the lot included in the lease. It is difficult to see what could be an alteration to the premises if a new building of such a description was not one. Whitwell v. Harris, 106 Mass. 532, 537.

The words "erection," "alteration," or "repair" of buildings and structures, within the meaning of the mechanic's lien law, giving a lien for labor or materials furnished in the erection, alteration, or repair of buildings or structures, seem to be quite plain in their signification, and insusceptible of any interpretation but the common one of building, altering, or repairing a house. Words in a statute are to be taken in their usual sense in which they are understood by people generally, unless there be some technical sense in which they must be considered in order to give the intended effect to the law, or the circumstances under which they are employed warrant applying a different sense to them. It has been held in France v. Woolston (Del.) 4 Houst. 557, that glazing and painting were within the terms of the statute; but in Capelle v. Baker (Del.) 3 Houst. 344, the terms were held not to include an architect's bill for a plan of a building. The terms do not include upholstering a hall. McCartney v. Buck, 12 Atl. 717, 719, 8 Houst. 34.

Cattle brand.

To "alter" is to make a thing different from what it was. The erasing any letter or the addition to the brand mark is an alteration. Smith v. Brown, 1 Wend. 231, 236.

To "alter any brand," as used in Rev. St. Crim. Code, art. 760, providing that any one who shall "alter the brand" on an animal which is the property of some other person into a different brand shall be punished, includes clipping some of the hair from the brand of the animal, whereby it was changed, and it is not necessary that the scar made by the original branding iron should be altered in order to constitute the offense. Slaughter v. State, 7 Tex. App. 123, 124.

"Altering" and "defacing" are not synonymous terms as applied to a brand on cattle. The putting of an additional brand to one already on is an alteration of the brand, though it may not interfere with or change the figure of the first brand. Linney v. State, 6 Tex. 1, 2, 55 Am. Rep. 756.

Corporate charters or by-laws.

An "alteration" in a by-law of a corporation is a pro tanto repeal. Parish v. New York Produce Exchange, 61 N. E. 977, 981, 169 N. Y. 34.

Nix Dig. 152, § 6, providing that corporate charters should be subject to "alteration," suspension, and repeal in the discretion of the Legislature, means that the Legislature shall have the power to alter something contained in or granted by the act, which may be the franchises granted, or the right to take land by condemnation, or the right to take tolls or fare, or the amount to be taken, but does not confer on the Legislature the right to impose on a railway company any other duty or anything involving any other duty than that attending the building of a railroad, and the Legislature cannot require a railroad company to build a dam, or to construct a canal, or to extend its road. Zabriskie v. Hackensack & N. Y. R. Co., 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 178, 193, 90 Am. Dec. 617.

"Alter or amend," as used in a charter of a theological institute reserving to the Legislature the power to "alter or amend" the charter incorporating the trustees of said theological institute, does not mean that the Legislature could increase the number of the trustees or corporators of such institute without the consent of the other trustees or corporators. The charter was a contract, and the right to "alter or amend" it does not include the right to add other parties and invest them with the same privileges and franchise conferred upon the original parties. The power to "alter or amend" a contract is to change it as between the original parties and such others only as have been permitted by their mutual consent to come into the enjoyment of its benefits and privileges, and not to compel one of the parties to operate in conjunction with others and share with them the privileges and benefits of the contract. Sage v. Dillard, 54 Ky. (15 B. Mon.) 340, 358.

"Alter," as used in Const. art. 11, § 1, relating to corporations, and providing that all general or special acts enacted under the provisions of the section may be altered or repealed by the Legislature at any time after their passage, the term "alter" should be construed to mean to make different without destroying the identity of the act; to vary without making an entire change. Thus, a corporate charter of one kind could not be altered to a charter of an entirely different kind, but a corporate charter may be altered so as to make it different in detail, so long as the general identity of the corporation remains, so that it is varied without an entire change. Black River Imp. Co. v. Holway, 59 N. W. 126, 128, 87 Wis. 584 (citing Attorney General v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 35 Wis. 425, 427).

Distillery warehouse stamp.

"Change or alteration," as used in Rev. St. § 3326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2169], making it an offense to change or alter a distillery warehouse stamp, means to obliterate or render illegible a portion of it, or to erase part of it and substitute something else in lieu of the part erased. United States v. Bardenheier (U. S.) 49 Fed. 846, 847.

Estimate of assessment.

The word "alter" means to make otherwise, and a power given a city council to "alter" the engineer's estimate of the assessment for local improvements, which must be made under the front-foot rule, authorizes the council to depart from the front-foot rule in case of special benefit, and does not limit them to errors in the engineer's estimate. Adams v. City of Shelbyville, 57 N. E. 114, 121, 154 Ind. 467, 77 Am. St. Rep. 484, 49 L. R. A. 797.

Flume.

A contract relating to certain dams and passages for water, providing that a dam, pier, guard gates, and stone flume, and a general passage for the water into that flume, should remain situated as they were unless "altered" by mutual consent of the parties, could not be construed to apply to the making of openings in the dam or flume merely in order to take water for mill purposes. Bardwell v. Ames, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 333, 359.

"Alter," as used in a deed granting water from a pond providing that the grantee shall have the privilege to enter on the lands of the grantor along and adjoining the flume to alter, repair, or renew the same, relates to the aqueduct as a structure, and not to the easement in the land. The flume was made of boards, and liable to rot and become leaky, and to alter it means that the grantee might change its construction, shape, or the material of which it was composed, or might substitute another and different appliance for transmitting water, but it does not give the grantee the right to place the feeder on another part of the grantor's land, since the power to alter is very different and distinguishable from that of changing the place of the flume on the land. It might be totally altered and remain where it was placed in the grant, and it might be removed to another place without altering it. Jaqui v. Johnson, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 526, 531.

Instrument.

An alteration of an instrument is something by which its meaning or language is changed, either in a material or immaterial particular. If what is written upon or erased from the paper containing the instrument has no tendency to produce this result or to mislead any person, it cannot be said to be an alteration. Morrill v. Otis, 12 N. H. 466, 472; Moore v. Macon Sav. Bank, 22 Mo. App. 684, 690; Bridges v. Winters, 42 Miss. 135, 143, 97 Am. Dec. 443, 2 Am. Rep. 598; Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439, 444.

The term "alteration," when applied to instruments, is usually applied to the act of the party entitled under the deed or instrument, and imports some fraud or improper design on his part to change its legal effect. It is distinguished from a spoliation, which is the act of a stranger in altering or changing the instrument. Medlin v. Platte County, 8 Mo. 235, 239, 40 Am. Dec. 135; Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439, 444; Bridges v. Winters, 42 Miss. 135, 143, 97 Am. Dec. 443, 2 Am. Rep. 598.

An "alteration" of an instrument is an act done upon the written instrument which, without destroying its identity, changes its language or meaning. Davis v. Campbell, 61 N. W. 1063, 1055, 93 Iowa, 524.

"Not every change in a bill or note amounts to an alteration; if the legal effect be not changed the instrument is not altered, although some change may have been made in its appearance, either by addition of words, which the law may imply, or by striking out words of no legal signification." Reiley v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 35 N. E. 1120, 1121, 148 Ill. 349 (quoting 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst., p. 359).

The "alteration" of an instrument which avoids it upon the technical and strict grounds of alteration is generally made after the instrument has had a legal existence. Bingham v. Reddy (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 402, 404.

A change in a material part of a note, made by an erasure and interlineation before execution, is not an "alteration" within Code, § 2852, but is an "alteration" if made afterwards without the consent of the other contracting parties. Winkles v. Guenther, 98 Ga. 472, 25 S. E. 527.

Where the "alteration" of an instrument is shown to have been made by a stranger to the instrument, and is therefore a mere spoliation, the rights of the party under the instrument as it was before the alteration will not be affected thereby. Cochran v. Nebeker, 48 Ind. 459, 462.

Memoranda upon a plan of lots, stating that a certain person desires the offer of one lot and that a certain part of such lot had been sold to a certain person, and upon another lot the words indicating that a certain person desires the offer and sold to such person, being intended only to enable the person making them to remember who desired to purchase the lots, and to whom and when one of them was sold, did not constitute an "alteration" of the plan. They do not affect its authenticity, nor vary in any way the courses and distances of the lines separating the lots, or the relative situations of the lots to each other. They may be said to disfigure the face of the plan, but that does not alter it; nor were they made with any intent to mislead or injure any person. Morrill v. Otis, 12 N. H. 466, 472.

An "alteration" in promissory notes by detaching therefrom the words "this note is given upon condition," which words stood alone, the nature of the condition nowhere appearing, was an immaterial one, and was no defense to an action on the notes. Palmer v. Largent, 5 Neb. 223, 224, 25 Am. Rep. 479.

The addition of a price of payment in a promissory note, after indorsement, by filling in a blank in a printed form which was preceded by the word "at," does not amount to such an alteration as will discharge an indorser. Wessell v. Glenn, 108 Pa. 104.

An alteration of a written contract such as to destroy it as a legal obligation is any change in its terms made by any party thereto, without the express or implied consent of all the parties, which varies its original legal effect and operation, whether in respect to the obligation it imparts or its force as matter of evidence. To erase the marginal figures "136⁰¹/₁₀₀" in a note and write at the top of the instrument "118⁰⁹/₁₀₀ correct amount," in order to correct a mutual mistake, is not such an alteration as will render the note void. Chamberlain v. Wright (Tex.) 35 S. W. 707.

The word "alter," in the definition of forgery, means to erase or obliterate any word, letter or figure; to extract the writing altogether, or to substitute other words, letters, or figures for those erased, obliterated, or extracted; to add any other word, letter, or figure to the original instrument; or to make any other change whatever which shall have the effect to create, increase, diminish, discharge, or defeat a pecuniary obligation or to transfer, or in any other way affect any property whatever. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 534.

Judicial districts.

In Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that the state shall be divided into 14 judicial districts, subject to such "alteration" from time to time by a two-thirds vote of all the members elected to both houses of the Legislature as the public good may require, "alteration" means the increasing or diminishing of the number of such judicial districts, and is not confined to a change the size of such districts. "To alter means to change." While it might be more exact, when speaking of a number with a view to its change, to employ the words "increase" or "diminish," it cannot be affirmed that their places may not be efficiently filled by the words "to change" or "to alter." On the contrary, each of the two latter are more comprehensive terms, and embrace both of the former. It is not a violation of usage, which is the law of language, to speak of the increase or diminishing of a given number as an alteration of the number, although less exact than the words "increase" and "diminish." People v. Sassovich, 29 Cal. 480, 483.

Jurisdiction and proceedings.

"Alter," as used in Const. art. 6, § 8, providing, except as herein otherwise provided, the Legislature shall have the same power to "alter and regulate" the jurisdiction and proceedings in law and equity that they have heretofore exercised, implies that the old jurisdiction shall in some degree continue in an altered or regulated form, and does not authorize the Legislature to entirely deprive a court of a part of its original jurisdiction. People v. Coughtry, 12 N. Y. Supp. 259, 58 Hun, 245.

Street.

"Alteration," as used in Rev. St. §§ 1265, 1269, authorizing the supervisors of the town to lay out, "alter," or discontinue any highway, means the change of course of an existing highway, leaving it substantially the same highway as before, but with its course in some respects changed. While an "alteration" will necessarily require the condemnation of additional lands, and will result in a vacation or discontinuance of that part of the former highway not included within the limits of the altered course, the proceeding to alter a highway does not thereby become a proceeding to lay out a new highway or to discontinue the old one, and hence a new and separate highway cannot be laid out on an application to alter an existing highway. State v. Burgeson, 84 N. W. 241, 242, 108 Wis. 174.

"An alteration of a highway generally refers to a change in the course thereof, and therefore necessarily involves to some extent the establishment of a new highway and the vacation of a part of the old highway for which the substitution is made." Buchholz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 824, 826, 71 App. Div. 452; Sprague v. Waite, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 309, 315. Thus the change in the direction of a city street so that it crosses a railroad track at a different place was held an alteration of the highway. Buchholz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 824, 826, 71 App. Div. 452.

Where an alteration and not a new way is prayed for, and is adjudged to be of common convenience, and is laid out accordingly, the laying out of a new section for the highway between two termini in the old way, pursuant to the petition, is an "alteration" and substitution of one for the other, and, of course, by legal implication, a discontinuance of that part of the old highway lying between the same termini. Sprague v. Waite, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 309, 315.

"Alteration," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, § 13, authorizing a jury to make any alterations of a highway between the termini laid out by county commissioners, was technically to distinguish between the making of an entire new way and changing the location in one or more intermediate sections, and does not confer an authority to construct another new line of road from one terminus to the other. Inhabitants of Gloucester v. Essex County Com'rs, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 375, 379.

"Altering," as used in Laws 1827, p. 276, § 21, providing that it shall be lawful for the city trustees to order the paving of streets according to the map and survey, and the "altering" and cleansing of any street, vault, or sink, related to the old streets and roads which existed at the time of passing the act of incorporation, and not to new streets which might thereafter be laid out, opened, or graded in conformity to the map and survey and to the grade as first adopted by the trustees, and confers on the trustees no power or authority to change the grade or location of any new street after it has once been established by them in conformity to the map and survey first established, or of any of the old streets after they have been made to conform to such general plan. Oakley v. Trustees of Williamsburgh, 6 Paige, 262, 267.

"Altered," as used in St. 1871, c. 382, § 1, providing that, at any time within two years after any street, highway, or other way is laid out, altered, or graded, the board of the city must assess, etc., means when the order to lay out, alter, or grade is passed by the competent authority, and the date of the passage of such an order fixes the time from which the rights of the parties are to be determined, and from which the limitation of two years begins to run. Hitchcock v. Board of Aldermen of Springfield, 121 Mass. 382, 385 (cited in Foster v. Board of Park Com'rs, 133 Mass. 321, 327).

Acts Feb. 12, 1851, incorporating a railroad company, section 9, making it the duty of the company to erect and keep in repair good and sufficient bridges or passages over or under the railroad where any public or other roads then or thereafter laid out shall cross the same, and so to "alter" and grade the several public or other roads that the passage of carriages, etc., should not be impeded thereby, means to "alter" the road where the public had placed it, but the railroad cannot take it up and put it in a new place. "Alter" is not used in its most general sense to include the power of vacating a road, or a part of it, and laying a new one, as used in the acts concerning roads. It is not used in conferring a power respecting a highway, to be exercised or not in the discretion of the company, but is used in imposing a duty, which was to "alter" and grade the existing road so that the railway in crossing shall not impede travelers. State v. Warren R. Co., 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 353, 355.

Under a city charter authorizing the city council to close streets within said city, and to "lay out, adopt, alter, widen, and open" the same, and providing compensation to any person damaged by such closing or altering, "alter" includes a change in the grade of a street, and does not mean a change in the course or direction of a street, a widening thereof, or some act which involves a taking or damaging of the property of an adjoining owner. Paris Mountain Water Co. v. City of Greenville, 30 S. E. 699, 701, 53 S. C. 82.

Same—Change of grade.

"Alter" means to change or modify in form or structure without a change of identity, as, where power is conferred on a municipality to alter a street, the municipality has power to change the grade. Waddell v. City of New York, 8 Barb. 95, 96.

A technical "alteration" of a way is the substitution of one way for another, and hence the work of excavating earth forming a causeway across a great pond and substituting therefor a bridge at a different grade is not a technical alteration of a highway, but is in the nature of repairs. Bigelow v. City Council of City of Worcester, 48 N. E. 1, 2, 169 Mass. 390.

"Altering," as used in Const. art. 4, § 31, which prohibits the Legislature from enacting any special law for opening or altering highways, means an alteration of its course, and not a change of grade. Harrison v. Board of Sup'rs of Milwaukee County, 51 Wis. 645, 646, 8 N. W. 731, 736.

A change in the grade of a street is not "alteration" where it is made without an adjudication, within the meaning of a corporate charter giving a city council exclusive control of the construction, "alteration," and repair of streets, etc. Simpson v. City of North Adams, 54 N. E. 878, 879, 174 Mass. 450.

Same—Discontinuance.

Under a citation to "alter" a road, while it would not be competent to discontinue the road altogether, it is competent to discontinue that part of the old road which is rendered unnecessary by the alteration. Ponder v. Shannon, 54 Ga. 187, 189.

An "alteration" in a way is in law a discontinuance of the part altered. Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Westborough, 3 Mass. 406, 407.

An alteration ex vi termini means a change or substitution, one thing for another, and, where it appears that a highway has been altered, a discontinuance of the old highway will be implied. Johnson v. Wyman, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 186, 189.

The power to open, "alter," or abolish a street does not give the right to grant a railway a right of way over the same. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co., 31 Mo. 180, 187.

Same—Widening.

The widening of a way is an "alteration in the location" of a highway, within Pub. St. c. 112, § 129, which provides a method for altering the location of a town way at a railroad crossing. New England R. Co. v. Board of Railroad Com'rs, 171 Mass. 135, 50 N. E. 549; Boston & A. R. Co. v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 177 Mass. 511, 59 N. E. 115. So that a petition for the widening of a street must be brought under an act providing a method for altering the location of highways. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 177 Mass. 511, 59 N. E. 115.

"Alter" means to change or modify; to change in form without destroying identity. As used in Hill's Code, § 4061, authorizing the county court to lay out, alter, or vacate a road, it gives the right or power to extend or diminish, so that the width is not beyond that established by statute. Heiple v. Clackamas County, 25 Pac. 291, 292, 20 Or. 147.

In Laws 1871, p. 210, chartering the city of Camden, and authorizing any street, highway, etc., to be vacated, opened, altered, widened, etc., by the city, "alter" is to be construed as relating "to the other changes contemplated in streets not included in the words 'laying out and widening.'" State v. City of Camden, 21 Atl. 565, 566, 53 N. J. Law, 322.

Will.

The difference between "revocation" and "alteration" of a will is this: If what is done simply takes away what was given before, or a part of what was given before, then it is revocation; but if it gives something in addition, or gives something else, then it is more than revocation, and cannot be done by mere obliteration. Appeal of Miles, 36 Atl. 39, 41, 68 Conn. 237.

ALTERNATE.

In political conventions in the United States an "alternate" is one who is authorized to take the place of another in his absence; a substitute. An alternate of a member of the county committee of a political party has no authority to act while his principal is present and acting for himself. State ex rel. Kelton v. Young, 60 S. W. 1086, 1087, 160 Mo. 320.

ALTERNATED CURRENT.

An electric current which is periodically reversed by a commutator, which thus breaks the current between the changes in direction and takes off the current in sections, is known as a "reversed" or "alternated" current. This distinction between an "alternating" and an "alternated" current should be carefully noted. An "alternating" current continues to act in opposite directions as originally generated. An "alternated" current has been so reversed that the whole flows in one direction, and is then known as a "continuous" current. Every mechanically generated current is naturally and originally an "alternating" current. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. New England Granite Co. (U. S.) 177 Fed. 951, 952.

ALTERNATING CURRENT.

See "Alternated Current."

ALTERNATIVE CONTRACT.

Alternative contracts are such as by their terms may be performed by doing either of several acts at the election of the party from whom performance is due. Crane v. Peer, 4 Atl. 72, 78, 43 N. J. Eq. 553 (citing 1 Suth. Dam. 471).

ALTERNATIVE OBLIGATION.

Where the things which form the object of the contract are separated by a disjunctive, then the obligation is alternative. A promise to deliver a certain thing, or to pay a specified sum of money, is an example of this kind of obligation. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2066.

ALTERNATIVE WRIT.

The purpose of an "alternative writ of mandamus" is to compel persons charged with the performance of a public duty to perform that duty, or to show good and sufficient reasons why the same has not been performed. Allee v. McCoy, 36 Atl. 355, 359, 2 Marv. 465.

An "alternative writ of mandamus" is employed to elicit an answer showing cause why a peremptory writ should not issue. It is essential that the writ be served on the individuals who may be punished if the command is not obeyed. Norwalk & S. N. Electric Light Co. v. Common Council, 42 Atl. 82, 85, 71 Conn. 381.

An "alternative mandamus" is in the nature of an order to show cause. It does not affect a substantial right, because it determines nothing against the respondent or in favor of the relator. It cannot be quashed or set aside for any matter involving the merits. See Code Civ. Proc. § 2075. People ex rel. Ackerman v. Lumb, 6 App. Div. 28, 27, 39 N. Y. Supp. 514.

ALTHOUGH.

The word "although" implies a doubt; a concession of something not positively determined. There is nothing in the negative terms, "although without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual," which should exclude from the definition of murder in the second degree cases of constructive malice against a particular individual, but the definition should be construed in the same manner as if the words were, "although without premeditated design to effect the death of any person." Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 244.

ALUMINA.

"Alumina," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 9, includes the fine powder known as "hydrate of alumina," and manufactured from the crude mineral known as "bauxite." Irwin v. United States (U. S.) 67 Fed. 232, 233, 14 C. C. A. 381.

ALUMINOUS CAKE.

"Aluminous cake" is the crude bauxite simply treated with acid. It contains all the undesirable ingredients of bauxite, namely, iron, silica, and titanlic acid. In re Irwin (U. S.) 62 Fed. 150, 152.

ALWAYS.

Act 1857-58, c. 44, § 3, requiring all railroad companies to keep the engineer, fireman, or some one else "always on the lookout" ahead when the train is in motion, does not require that the railroad company should keep somebody on the locomotive throughout the entire trip "always on the lookout," but it is sufficient if the precaution was being observed when the accident occurred. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stone, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 468, 471.

AMALGAMATION.

Of corporations, see, also, "Consolidate—Consolidation."

"Amalgamation" of corporations is used in the English cases in the sense of what is usually known as "merger" in this country, meaning the absorption of one corporation by another, so that the absorbing corporation continues in existence, and differs from consolidation, the meaning of which is limited to such a union of two or more corporations as necessarily result in the creation of a third new corporation. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 24 So. 200, 211.

AMBIGUITAS LATENS.

"An ambiguitas latens is that which seemeth certain and without ambiguity, for anything that appeareth on the deed or instrument, but there is some collateral matter out of the deed that breedeth ambiguity." Carter v. Holman, 60 Mo. 498, 504 (quoting Bac. Max. 25); Aldrich v. Griffith, 29 Atl. 376, 378, 66 Vt. 390; Putnam v. Bond, 100 Mass. 58, 60, 1 Am. Rep. 82.

AMBIGUITAS PATENS.

An "ambiguitas patens" is that which appears to be ambiguous upon the deed or instrument. Hastings' Estate, 15 N. Y. St. Rep. 420, 427; Carter v. Holman, 60 Mo. 498, 504.

AMBIGUITY.

See "Latent Ambiguity"; "Patent Ambiguity."

Ambiguity "is defined as duplicity, indistinctness, an uncertainty of meaning or expression used in a written instrument." Nindle v. State Bank, 13 N. W. 275, 13 Neb. 245 (quoting 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 117).

Ambiguity is the effect of words that have either no definite sense, or at most doubtful ones. Ellmaker v. Ellmaker (Pa.) 4 Watts, 89, 90.

"Ambiguity," as used in reference to the rule announced by Lord Bacon that a patent "ambiguity" cannot be explained by parol evidence, cannot be construed in its broad sense of doubtfulness, uncertainty, and double meaning. Whalen v. Stephens, 61 N. E. 921, 926, 193 Ill. 121 (citing Fish v. Hubbard's Adm'rs, 21 Wend. 651; Doyle v. Teas, 5 Ill. [4 Scam.] 202).

"Ambiguity" signifies the quality or state of being ambiguous; doubtfulness or uncertainty, particularly of signification. Webster so defines it. He defines "ambiguous" as "doubtful or uncertain," "particularly in respect to signification"; "equivocal"; "as, an ambiguous course, an ambiguous expression"; giving as synonyms "indeterminate," "doubtful," "uncertain," "unsettled," "indistinct," "equivocal"; and hence where a complaint is neither doubtful, uncertain, nor equivocal in its meaning, and enough appears to render it easy of apprehension and free from reasonable doubt, it is not demurrable on the ground of "ambiguity." Kraner v. Halsey, 22 Pac. 1137, 1138, 82 Cal. 209.

Ambiguity is an uncertainty of meaning in the terms of a written instrument. There are two kinds of ambiguity, to wit: A latent ambiguity, where the writing appears on the face of it certain and free from ambiguity, but the ambiguity is introduced by evidence of the something extrinsic, or by some collateral matter out of the instrument; a patent ambiguity, which is the ambiguity apparent on the face of the instrument itself. Brown v. Guice, 46 Miss. 299, 302.

An "ambiguity" in a will is not that which may be made doubtful by extrinsic proof tending to show an intention different from that manifested in the will, but it grows out of the difficulty of identifying the person whose name and description correspond with the terms of the will. Thus, if a testator make a devise to "William," but there are two persons of that name, there is an "ambiguity" that may be explained. Ward v. Epsy, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 447.

AMBIGUITY UPON THE FACTUM.

Ambiguity upon the factum "is an ambiguity as to the foundation itself of the instrument, or a particular part of it, as whether the testator meant a particular clause to be part of the instrument, or whether it was introduced with his knowledge; whether a codicil was meant to republish a former or subsequent will; or whether the residuary clause, or any other passage, was accidentally omitted. It does not mean an ambiguity upon the construction, as whether a particular clause shall have a particular effect." Eatherly v. Eatherly, 41 Tenn. (1 Cold.) 461, 465, 78 Am. Dec. 499.

AMBIGUOUS.

In a demurrer to a complaint on the ground that the complaint was "ambiguous," uncertain, and unintelligible, the term "ambiguous" must be construed to mean "doubtful" or "uncertain," particularly in respect to signification, "equivocal," as an ambiguous course, an ambiguous expression; such being Webster's definition of it, being synonymous with indeterminate, indefinite, doubtful, uncertain, unsettled, indistinct, equivocal; and hence, if the complaint cannot be considered as either doubtful, uncertain, or equivocal in its meaning, it is not "ambiguous," and the demurrer on such ground cannot be sustained. Kraner v. Halsey, 22 Pac. 1137, 1138, 82 Cal. 209.

AMBULANCE.

An ambulance is a wheeled vehicle, used for the purpose of conveying sick or wounded persons. Kendall v. City of Duluth, 66 N. W. 1150, 1151, 64 Minn. 295.

AMBULATORY WILL.

A will is said to be ambulatory until the death of the testator, and speaks in reference to that time. This is true as to its legal effect. It can only operate upon things as they then exist. Hattersley v. Bissett, 25 Atl. 332, 333, 50 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 577.

AMBUSH.

"The noun 'ambush' means (1) the act of taking an enemy unexpectedly from a concealed station; (2) a concealed station where troops or enemies lie in wait to attack by surprise; an ambuscade; (3) troops posted in a concealed place for attacking by surprise. The verb 'ambush' means to lie in wait, to surprise, to place in ambush, and hence a shooting from ambush will not justify a conviction under a statute relating to homicide by parties in disguise." Dale County v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118, 142.

AMENABLE.

"Amenable" is to be liable to answer, responsible, answerable, liable to be called to account. The word is of similar import to that of the word "obedient," and therefore a recognizance conditioned that the principal obligor render himself obedient to the orders and process of the court is a sufficient compliance with Crim. Code, § 77, requiring such bonds to be conditioned to answer such charge, and at all times render the obligor amenable to the orders and process of the court. Miller v. Commonwealth, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 14, 17.

AMEND—AMENDMENT.

The word "amend" came into our language from the French "amender," the root or parent word being "menda," signifying a fault, and in its comprehensive sense meaning to better, and it is sometimes defined as meaning "to make better," or to change from bad for the better, and "amend" is defined by Webster as meaning to change in any way for the better by substituting something else in the place of what is being removed. As a law term it means the espying out of some error in the proceedings and the correcting of it before judgment, and after if the error be not in the giving of the judgment. Diamond v. Williamsburgh Ins. Co., 4 Daly, 494, 500.

To "amend" a thing, as defined by Webster, is to change it in any way for the better; to remove what is erroneous, superfluous, faulty, and the like; to supply deficiencies; to substitute something in place of what is removed. The word is synonymous with "correct," "reform," "rectify." An amendment, therefore, is a change or alteration for the better; a correction of faults or errors; an improvement, a reformation, an emendation. It necessarily implies something upon which the correction, alteration, improvement, or reformation can operate; something to be reformed, corrected, rectified, altered, or improved. In other words, that which is proposed as an amendment must be germane to or relate to the thing to be amended. In re Pennsylvania Tel. Co. (Pa.) 2 Chest. Co. Rep. 129, 131.

The term "amendment" implies such an addition or change within the lines of the original instrument as will effect an improvement or better carry out the purposes for which it was framed. Livermore v. Waite, 36 Pac. 424, 426, 102 Cal. 113, 25 L. R. A. 312.

Bill or law.

It is said in Cushing's Law of Legislative Assemblies, § 1302, that the term "amendment" is used to denote any alteration which may be proposed or adopted; that according to the etymology of the word it might be supposed that nothing could be an "amendment" that did not improve the proposition; but this does not convey a correct idea of what is meant in legislation by this term. A proposition may be amended by an alteration which entirely defeats the purpose of the mover, or it may be turned into a motion of a different kind. The house is not obliged to consider a proposition which is moved and seconded, but it is within its power to substitute a different proposition, and this may be done by means of an amendment. This appears to have been the established law of parliamentary usage in England, and though it appears to have been modified at an early date in our legislative law, in some respects, we find that it has only been restricted to changes bringing in a subject different from the original. And where a bill was introduced in a state senate, and regularly passed, and referred to the house, where upon its second reading a substitute was introduced and regularly passed, and forwarded to the senate, it was but an amendment of the original bill. Brake v. Callison (U. S.) 122 Fed. 722, 724.

Amendments may be made so as to totally alter the nature of the proposition, and it is a way of getting rid of the proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves. 2 Hats, 79; 4, 82, 84. A new bill may be engrafted by way of amendment on the words "Be it enacted," etc. De Hay v. Berkeley County Com'rs, 44 S. E. 790, 795, 66 S. C. 229; 1 Grey, 190, 192.

In State v. Wright, 14 Or. 365, 370, 12 Pac. 708, it is said that in legislation an amendment means an alteration in the draft of a bill proposed or in a law already passed. Where, however, an act is complete and perfect in itself and not amendatory or revisory in its character, though such law by implication amends other statutes on the same subject, it is not an amendment. Warren v. Crosby, 34 Pac. 661, 662, 24 Or. 558.

"Amendment," as used in Const. art. 4, § 32, requiring that, when an act is amended, the act or section amended shall be set forth at full length, means a change in some of the provisions of an act, and does not include additional provisions not affecting existing ones. Sheridan v. City of Salem, 12 Pac. 925, 928, 14 Or. 328.

A law is "amended" when it is in whole or in part permitted to remain, and something is added to or taken from it, or it is in some way changed or altered to make it more complete or perfect, or to fit it the better to accomplish the object or purpose for which it was made, or some other object or purpose. Falconer v. Robinson, 46 Ala. 340, 348.

Charter.

Under a charter of a theological institute reserving to the Legislature the power to alter or amend the charter, the Legislature cannot increase the number of trustees, nor add other parties and invest them with the same privileges and franchises conferred on the original parties. Sage v. Dillard, 54 Ky. (15 B. Mon.) 340, 358.

Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a city charter can be "amended" only on the vote of electors of the city and the approval of the Legislature, does not apply to a change in the salary of the chief of police, under article 3, § 1, of the charter of the city of San Diego, providing that the common council in the month of January, 1891, and every four years thereafter, shall readjust and fix a new amount of all official salaries. Coyne v. Rennie, 32 Pac. 578, 97 Cal. 590.

In respect to the amendment of a charter of a corporation, the amendment must relate to the charter as originally granted, and if it does not correct, improve, reform, rectify, or alter something in the original charter, it is not, properly speaking, an amendment to that charter. In re Pennsylvania Tel. Co. (Pa.) 2 Chest. Co. Rep. 129, 131.

Constitution.

Const. art. 14, § 1, provides that propositions for the amendment of the Constitution shall be submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection, and that, if a majority of the electors voting on said amendments at said election shall adopt the amendments, the same shall become a part of the Constitution. Held, that the use of the word "amendments" does not mean that no single amendment submitted with others can be adopted unless all are, but that every amendment submitted stands upon its own merits, and that, if a majority of those voting upon it vote in the affirmative, it becomes a part of the Constitution. Prohibitory Amendment Cases, 24 Kan. 700, 722.

1 Wds. & P.—24

Highway.

Under a city charter authorizing the council to alter and amend all streets, the council has the right to change the grade of a street. Waddell v. City of New York, 8 Barb. 95, 97.

"Amend," as used in St. 1786, c. 81, § 1, providing that all highways within any town shall be amended from time to time, so that the same may be safe, and convenient for travelers, with their horses, teams, carts, carriages, etc., means any alteration or improvement which would tend to make the road or highway better, and hence would include the cutting down of a sharp hill, and carrying the materials to the foot so as to reduce the grade. Callender v. Marsh, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 418, 429.

Pleading.

Amendment is the correction of any error in a pleading. Hardin v. Boyd, 5 Sup. Ct. 771, 773, 113 U. S. 756, 28 L. Ed. 1141; Shroyer v. Pittenger, 67 N. E. 475, 477, 31 Ind. App. 158 (citing Anderson, Law Dict.; Black, Law Dict.; Burrill, Law Dict.).

A pleading is "amended" when a correction of its faults has been made—when its defects have been cured—whether that change has been brought about by the action of the court in striking out and lopping off improper, irrelevant, and unnecessary matter contained therein, or whether a new frame of words has been filed embodying the good of the original with the improper, irrelevant, and unnecessary matter left out in obedience to the view of the court expressed in sustaining the motion to strike out. Lennox v. Vandalia Coal Co., 59 S. W. 242, 246, 158 Mo. 473.

"Amendment" means to add something to or withdraw something from that which has been previously pleaded, so as to perfect that which might be deficient, or correct that which might have been incorrectly stated by the party making the amendment. Supreme Tent Knights of Maccabees v. Cox, 60 S. W. 971, 973, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 366.

"Amendment of a pleading implies an improvement of it, the making the pleading better as a pleading, the making good that which before was defective in its form of statement, or in making better the issues presented between the same parties. A change or alteration of parties in this sense does not amend the pleading. A mere alteration of names cannot make the pleading better; it may make it worse. The difference between an alteration of the parties and an amendment of the pleading is palpable, and, though both are included under the general term 'amendments,' the former is an amendment of process or of a proceeding, which is exclusively in the court. The power to perform the latter is permitted in certain cases to be exercised by a referee, and may also and in proper cases be exercised by the court." Billings v. Baker, 6 Abb. Prac. 213, 218.

To "amend" is, as the term implies, to free from error or deficiency; to cure an error; to supply a deficiency. Thus, where complainant sought injunctive relief, with damages as an incident thereof, and failed to allege that the injunction was sought for continuing trespass, an application to insert such allegation is simply to supply a deficiency, and constitutes an amendment. Weill v. Metropolitan Ry. Co., 24 Civ. Proc. R. 85, 87, 30 N. Y. Supp. 833, 834.

An amendment is the correction of some error or mistake in a pleading already before the court, and there must therefore be something to amend by; whereas the insertion of facts constituting a new cause of action or defense would be a substituted pleading, and not an amendment of an existing pleading. Woodruff v. Dickle, 28 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Rob.) 619, 622.

An "amendment" is a correction of some error or mistake in a pleading or before the court, and there must therefore be something to amend. A plaintiff cannot abandon his original cause of action and substitute an entirely new cause of action in his complaint. A complaint for a breach of covenant of warranty contained in defendant's deed cannot be amended so as to state a cause of action in the nature of a fraud and deceit on the part of defendant. Givens v. Wheeler, 6 Colo. 149, 151.

Under the Code the verification is no part of a complaint, and, where an unverified complaint was served, a subsequent service, after answer, of the same complaint, with a verification attached thereto, was not an amendment of the complaint, and does not require an answer. George v. McAvoy, 6 How. Prac. 200.

The withdrawal of a pleading or answer because it does not set up a defense which the defendant has, and putting in its stead a pleading or answer which does set up such defense, is a change for the better, and therefore constituted an amendment as defined by the lexicographers. Diamond v. Williamsburgh Ins. Co., 4 Daly, 494, 500.

An "amended complaint" supersedes the original complaint, but is not the beginning of a new action, and does not create a new jurisdiction; nor is an appearance necessary to an amended complaint. Flanagan v. Reltemier, 59 N. E. 389, 393, 26 Ind. App. 243.

As a general rule, the very purpose of an "amended declaration" is to state, in a more accurate and legal manner than had been previously stated, the cause of action for which the suit was brought. Filing an amended declaration cannot be construed to be the commencement of the suit within the meaning of the limitation of the statutes. Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Hackendahl, 58 N. E. 930, 932, 188 Ill. 300.

An "amended demurrer" is one which adds to or supplements a demurrer already filed in the cause, but which does not add entirely new matter or arrest the progress of the case. Lundbeck v. Pilmair, 43 N. W. 271, 78 Iowa, 434.

A petition containing merely a statement of transactions constituting his cause of action arising before the bringing of the suit is technically an "amended petition," and it was incorrect to designate it as "supplemental petition," since it pleaded no new facts accruing after the filing of his original petition. Scroggin v. Johnston, 64 N. W. 236, 238, 45 Neb. 714.

AMENDATORY LAW.

An amendatory law is a statute for the amendment, not of what might have been enacted under the title of the original statute, but what was enacted; not of what the original law might have been, but what it was; and hence the sufficiency of the title of an act merely declared to be amendatory of a prior law, to justify the legislation which may be enacted under it, depends not alone on the fact that the title of the original statute was so comprehensive that the legislation in question might have been properly enacted in such law, but also upon the nature and extent of the prior enactment to amend which is the declared purpose or subject of the latter act. State v. Smith, 28 N. W. 241, 244, 35 Minn. 257.

AMENDMENT OF FORM.

An "amendment of form," as used in pleading, is one which is merely formal, as to correct a clerical error, the name of the court or party, and which does not consist of a material allegation necessary to the plaintiff's recovery. Barber v. Briscoe, 19 Pac. 589, 590, 8 Mont. 214.

AMENDMENT OF SUBSTANCE.

An "amendment of substance," in pleading, is one which consists of a material allegation which has been left out of the original complaint, or which sets forth an allegation of a material fact, proof of which is necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover. Barber v. Briscoe, 19 Pac. 589, 590, 8 Mont. 214.

AMENITY.

An "amenity" consists in restraining the owner from doing that with and on his property which, but for the grant or covenant, he might lawfully have done, and is sometimes called a "negative easement," as distinguished from that class of easements which compels the owner to suffer something to be done on his property by another. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Brennan, 24 N. Y. Supp. 784, 788.

AMERCEMENT.

"Amercement" was the practice which obtained at the common law of compelling the plaintiff who made a false clamor, and either failed to try his case, or, trying it, failed to sustain it, to pay a fine which went to the King as a penalty for the groundless invasion of a court of justice. Good-year v. Sawyer (U. S.) 17 Fed. 2, 9.

"Amercement" is a pecuniary penalty, in the nature of a fine, imposed on a person for some fault or misconduct, he being "in mercy" for his offense. The term is generally used with reference to a penalty imposed on a sheriff or other executive officer for failure to comply with a duty of his office, and is assessed against the delinquent or imposed arbitrarily by the court at its discretion. The difference between "amercement" and "fines" is that the latter are certain and are created by statute, and can only be imposed by courts of record, while the former are arbitrarily imposed, and may be imposed by courts not of record. Stansbury v. Patent Cloth Mfg. Co., 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 433, 441.

An "amercement" is a penalty, and is for a fixed sum, without regard to the little or much of the plaintiff's damage. Thompson v. Berry, 65 N. C. 484, 485.

An "amercement" is a penalty, and ought not to be enforced by a court of justice at the instance of a party who has not performed precedent duties required of him by the law. Taylor v. Rhyne, 65 N. C. 530, 532.

A judgment of amercement on due notice is when the officer is sued upon his bond, conclusive against the officer, but only prima facie against the sureties. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia v. Ruby, 49 Neb. 584, 588, 68 N. W. 939 (citing Graves v. Bulkley, 25 Kan. 249, 37 Am. Rep. 249, where many authorities are cited).

AMERICAN.

"American," as used in a devise to be used by trustees for the benefit of worthy, deserving, poor, white "American" Protestants, means all descendants of Europeans born in America, especially the inhabitants of the United States. Beardsley v. Selectmen of Bridgeport, 3 Atl. 557, 559, 53 Conn. 489, 55 Am. Rep. 152.

AMERICAN CLAUSE.

The "American clause" in a marine insurance policy is a clause providing that, if the insured shall have made any other insurances on the premises aforesaid prior in date to this policy, then such company shall be answerable only for so much as the amount of such prior insurance may be deficient towards fully covering the premises hereby assured, and that the company shall return the premium on so much of the sum by them assured as they shall by such prior assurance be exonerated from, and that, in case of any insurance on such premises subsequent in date to this policy, the company shall nevertheless be answerable for the full extent of the sum by them subscribed hereto, without the right to claim contribution from such subsequent assurers, and shall accordingly be entitled to retain the premium by them received, in the same manner as if no subsequent assurance had been made. American Ins. Co. v. Griswold, 14 Wend. 399, 499.

The term "American clause" in the law of insurance is used to designate a condition in the policy that, if the assured shall have made any other assurance upon the premises aforesaid prior in day of date to the policy in question, then the said assurer shall be answerable only for so much as the amount of such prior assurance may be deficient to fully cover the premises assured. Corporation of London Assurance v. Patterson, 32 S. E. 650, 655, 106 Ga. 538.

AMERICAN DOCTRINE.

The "American doctrine," as commonly called, or the trust-fund doctrine, is that the capital of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co., 50 N. W. 1117, 1119, 48 Minn. 174, 192, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637.

AMERICAN FISHERY.

A corporation consisting of American citizens fitted out a registered American vessel, which was manned with an American crew, and engaged in the business of catching turtles in Central American waters, and canning them aboard the vessel. Held, that this constituted an American fishery, within the meaning of Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, c. 349, § 2, Free List, par. 568, 28 Stat. 542, which exempts from duty "all fish and other products" of "American fisheries," and that the canned turtle meat is free of duty as the product of such fishery. Downing v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 107, 108.

AMERICAN HOP ALE.

American hop ale, as sold in Kansas, is an imitation of lager beer, made of malted grain, hops, and water, slightly fermented, and contains a very slight percentage of alcohol. City of Lincoln Center v. Linker, 53 Pac. 787, 788, 7 Kan. App. 282.

AMERICAN SHIP.

A ship engaged in a whaling voyage without having surrendered her register or taken out an enrollment and license is not an "American ship or vessel" within the purview of Act 1835, c. 40, providing that if any one or more of the crew of an American ship or vessel, etc., shall endeavor to make a revolt, etc., he and they shall, on conviction, be punished, etc. United States v. Rogers (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 890.

AMERICANS.

A treaty with a foreign nation provided that American consuls should have jurisdiction of offenses committed by Americans. The statute enacted to carry the treaty into effect provided that the consuls should have jurisdiction over crimes of the citizens of the United States. Held, that the term "Americans," when construed in connection with the term "citizens of the United States," included "all who are citizens, and all who, though not strictly citizens, are by their service equally entitled to the care and protection of the government." A citizen of a foreign country who enlists on an American vessel is included within the term. Ross v. McIntyre, 11 Sup. Ct. 897, 904, 140 U. S. 453, 35 L. Ed. 581.

AMICABLE ACTION.

Amicable action, "in the sense in which these words are used in courts of justice, presuppose that there is a real dispute between the parties concerning some matter of right. And in a case of that kind it sometimes happens that, for the purpose of obtaining a decision of the controversy without incurring needless expense and trouble, they agree to conduct the suit in an amicable manner; that is to say, that they will not embarrass each other with unnecessary forms and technicalities, and will mutually admit facts which they know to be true without requiring proof, and will bring the point in dispute before the court for decision without subjecting each other to unnecessary expense or delay. But there must be an actual controversy and adverse interests. The amity consists in the manner in which it is brought to issue before the court. And such amicable actions, so far from being opposed or censured, are always approved and encouraged, because they facilitate greatly the administration of justice between the parties." Lord v. Venzie, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 251, 255, 12 L. Ed. 1067.

The words "arbitration" and "amicable law suit" are not convertible terms; the former carries with it the idea of settlement by disinterested third parties, and the latter by a friendly submission of the points in dispute to a judicial tribunal, to be determined in accordance with the terms of law. Thompson v. Moulton, 20 La. Ann. 535, 537.

AMICUS CURIAE.

"Amicus curiae," in its ordinary use, implies the friendly intervention of counsel to remind the court of some matter of law which has escaped its notice, and in regard to which it appears to be in danger of going wrong. It is not ordinarily the function of the "amicus curiae" to take upon himself the management of a cause. Taft v. Northern Transp. Co., 56 N. H. 414, 416.

An "amicus curiae" is a bystander who, when a judge is doubtful or mistaken in a matter of law, may inform the court. He is heard only by leave and for the assistance of the court on a case already before it. He has no control over the suit, and no right to institute proceedings thereon, or to bring the case from one court to another by appeal or writ of error. Birmingham Loan & Auction Co. v. First National Bank, 13 South. 945, 946, 100 Ala. 249, 46 Am. St. Rep. 45.

An amicus curiae is heard only by the leave and for the assistance of the court, and upon a case already before it. He has no control over the suit, and no right to institute any proceedings therein, or to bring the case from one court to another by exceptions, appeal, or writ of error. In re Columbia Real Estate Co. (U. S.) 101 Fed. 965, 970 (citing Martin v. Tapley, 119 Mass. 116, 120).

AMITY.

The word "amity" is not a technical word. It is a word of common use, and when found in a statute must be given its ordinary meaning, unless there be something in the context which compels a narrower or different scope. Webster defines it as friendship, in a general sense, between individuals, societies, or nations. The question whether an Indian tribe, some of whose members have committed depredations upon the property of persons subject to the authority of the United States, was in amity with the United States, within the meaning of Act Cong. March 3, 1891, c. 538, 26 Stat. 851 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 758], so as to entitle the claimants to a judgment against the United States and the tribe for the value of the property, is a question of fact depending upon whether the tribe was in the relation of actual peace with the United States, and not upon whether there was a subsisting treaty between it and the United States which had never been formally abrogated by a declaration of war by either party. Marks v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 476, 478, 161 U. S. 297, 40 L. Ed. 706.

AMNESTY.

"An amnesty is an act of oblivion or forgetfulness. It is an act of sovereign mercy and grace, flowing from the appropriate organ of the government." Ex parte Law, 35 Ga. 285, 296.

"Amnesty" is a sovereign act of pardon and oblivion for past acts, granted by a government to a person who has been guilty of crime or political offenses, such as treason, sedition, and rebellion. The term properly belongs to international law, and is applied to rebellions which by their magnitude are brought within the rules of international law, and has no technical meaning in the common law, where it is merely the synonym of "oblivion" and "pardon." Knote v. United States, 10 Ct. Cl. 397, 407.

"Amnesty" is defined to be the act of the sovereign power granting oblivion or a general pardon for a past offense. It is rarely exercised in behalf of single individuals, but usually exerted in favor of certain classes of persons who are subject to trial but have not yet been convicted. Brown v. Walker, 16 Sup. Ct. 644, 648, 161 U. S. 591, 40 L. Ed. 819.

Pardon distinguished.

The word "amnesty" is defined thus. An act of oblivion of past offenses, granted by the government to those who have been guilty of any neglect or crime, usually upon condition that they return to their duty within a certain period. A "pardon" relieves an offender from the consequences of an offense of which he has been convicted, while "amnesty" obliterates offense before conviction, and in such case he stands before the law precisely as though he had committed no offense; and while the word "pardon" was used by the President in the crime of amnesty to a person who had been guilty of polygamy, but had abandoned those practices, nevertheless the instrument has the effect of an amnesty. United States v. Bassett, 13 Pac. 237, 239, 5 Utah, 131.

"Amnesty" is included within the word "pardon," which is generic, and includes every character of pardon. Davies v. McKeeby, 5 Nev. 369, 373.

"Amnesty" and "pardon" are not precisely the same. Pardon is granted to one who is certainly guilty, sometimes before, but usually after, conviction. Courts take no notice of it unless pleaded or claimed by the person pardoned, and it is usually granted by the crown or by the executive; but "amnesty" is to those who may be guilty, and is usually granted by Parliament or the Legislature, and to whole classes before trial.

"Amnesty" is the abolition or oblivion of the offense; "pardon" is its forgiveness. State v. Blalock, 61 N. C. 242, 247. See, also, Ex parte Law, 35 Ga. 285, 296; State ex rel. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Ass'n v. Eby, 71 S. W. 52, 61, 170 Mo. 497.

"Amnesty," as used in the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, extending unconditionally and without reservation a full pardon and "amnesty" for the offense of treason against the United States, or of giving aid and comfort to their enemies, to all persons who had directly or indirectly participated in the Rebellion, in consideration of all rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution, and the rights held in pursuance thereof, is synonymous with "pardon," and confers no greater benefits upon the persons included within the meaning of the proclamation than if the term "pardon" alone had been used. It is sometimes said that "amnesty" operates as an extinction of the offense of which it is the object, causing it to be forgotten so far as the public interests are concerned, while "pardon" only operates to remove the penalties for the offense. Such distinction is not recognized in the law, and, except that the term "amnesty" is generally employed in pardons extending to whole classes and communities instead of individuals, the distinction between "pardon" and "amnesty" is merely philological rather than legal. Knote v. United States, 95 U. S. 149, 152, 24 L. Ed. 442.

AMONG.

The word "among" means "intermingled with." Commonwealth v. Gloucester Ferry Co., 98 Pa. 105, 120.

In cases where construction is necessary to determine whether an instrument creates a joint tenancy or tenancy in common, the distributive words "among," "any," and "each" are used to distinguish estates in common from joint tenancies, and are given controlling effect in determining the estates to be tenancies in common. Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257.

In the provision of the federal Constitution "that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes," the word "among" means "intermingled with." Commerce among the states cannot stop at the external boundary of each, but must be introduced into the interior. It means commerce which concerns more states than one, not mere internal regulation and traffic. Under a different construction one state might load another with imposts and taxes, on the passage of goods and persons, ruinous to the interior. State v. Foreman, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 256, 316.

A bequest of personalty to testatrix's son, to be held in trust by her daughter and her husband for the support and maintenance of the son, with a direction that anything remaining at the latter's decease should be equally divided "among my three daughters," should be construed as equivalent to naming such daughters particularly, and not to indicate that such daughters were to be treated as a class, the survivors only of which should share in the distribution. Bancroft v. Fitch, 41 N. E. 661, 662, 164 Mass. 401.

Distribution to each required.

"Among," as used in a will directing that a certain amount should be divided "among" certain heirs, imports a division of the fund into many parts. The word "between" is even used as synonymous with "among," especially when employed to convey the idea of division or separate ownership of property held in common, it being quite as appropriate to say that property is to be divided "between" A., B., and C., as "among" A., B., and C. So Webster says, "We observe that 'between' is not restricted to two," and illustrates thus: "Twenty proprietors owned a tract of land between them." Myres v. Myres (N. Y.) 23 How. Prac. 410, 415.

"Among," as used in a will providing that the property of testator shall be divided "among" certain persons, is not properly executed by giving all to one, nor by excluding any, but requires each and every one of them to have a share therein. Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 103.

"Among," as used in a will by which the testator empowered his widow to dispose of certain slaves "among his children" as she might think proper, contemplated that the slaves were to be divided according to the widow's discretion and the different portions given to the testator's children, and hence the widow could not give all of the slaves to one child, nor wholly exclude any, nor could she give any of them to the testator's grandchildren, and if she made an appointment violating this principle it would be avoided in equity, and the property divided among all the children and their representatives. Hudson v. Hudson's Adm'r (Va.) 6 Munf. 352.

Where a father transferred certain stocks to trustees in trust for his wife and children, the income and use to be for her benefit for life, with the power to distribute "among" such of her children as she should by her last will appoint, the power to distribute "among" includes the power to select from and direct any distribution among such children, and she may exclude one entirely, or give to one less than to the others. Ingraham v. Meade (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 50, 53.

Act Feb. 1832, incorporated a bank, and named commissioners to receive subscriptions and to distribute the stock "among" the subscribers, providing that, in case there should be subscriptions to more than the amount of stock, they should apportion the same "among" the subscribers as they deemed most advantageous to the bank. Held, that "among" in such provision did not require that every subscriber should receive some stock, such construction interfering with the power given the commissioners. Clarke v. Brooklyn Bank, 1 Edw. Ch. 361, 368.

Act March 26, 1813, incorporated a bank, and appointed commissioners to apportion an excess of shares "among" the several subscribers as they judged discreet and proper. It was held that shares should be assigned to each subscriber. Haight v. Day (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 18, 20.

Where a will gave a trustee power to sell, exchange, and invest property, and to "dispose of any or all of said property as he may choose, 'among' our children in such proportion as he may choose," he did not have the authority to exclude any child from the estate, and hence each child was not entitled to an equal portion, but was entitled to some substantial part. Hatchett v. Hatchett, 16 South. 550, 551, 103 Ala. 556.

The word "among" in a will, stating that it is my will that my said daughter shall in such case have power to distribute the same "among" her brothers and sisters and other children in such proportion as she may see fit, is inconsistent with an exclusive appointment, standing as the word does without any qualification of its own import and consequence, and each was entitled to a portion. Lippincott v. Ridgway, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 164, 170.

Division in equal shares implied.

A will providing that a certain sum should be divided equally "among" certain persons named clearly indicates an intention that the persons named were to take in equal shares. In re Holder, 41 Atl. 576, 21 R. I. 48; In re Hicks' Estate (Pa.) 25 Wkly. Notes Cas. 499, 500.

The prepositions "among" and "between" are often capable of different meaning according to their collocation and connection, as the same are differently used and placed and intended to express different ideas. But when the prepositions "between" and "among" follow the verb "divide," their general signification is very similar, and in popular use are considered synonymous, though "among" denotes a collection, and is never followed by two of any sort, whilst "between" may be followed by any plural number, and seems to denote rather the individuals of the class than the class itself generically; but whatever importance may be attached to such philological refinements, it is certain that the general rule is that where a bequest is made to several persons, in general terms, indicating that they are to take equally as tenants in common, each individual will take the same share, or, in other words, the legatees will take per capita. Senger v. Senger's Ex'r, 81 Va. 687, 698.

AMONG THE FILES.

A clerk's certificate that certain papers were true and correct copies of original papers "among the files of tax papers now on file in my office," means that the papers among the files were filed. State v. Board of Equalization of Washoe County, 7 Nev. 83, 96.

AMONGST.

A devise or bequest to several persons "amongst" them makes the objects tenants in common. Stetson v. Eastman, 24 Atl. 868, 870, 84 Me. 366.

The phrase "to and amongst," when used in a devise to testator's children, has a strict technical meaning, which requires that each child must have some share assigned to him. Willmet v. Alchin, 2 Barn. & Ald. 122, 124.

Lord Alvanley, in construing a power to appoint "amongst children as the donee shall think proper," construed the word "amongst" to mean "all and every," and he held that the power did not authorize an exclusive appointment. Thrasher v. Ballard, 14 S. E. 232, 35 W. Va. 524.

AMOTION.

"Amotion" is the right to remove an officer of a corporation, and it is a power inherent in every corporation, and may be exercised without interfering with the officer's franchise, as the officer, when removed, still continues a member. White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 162, 192; Richards v. Clarksburg, 4 S. E. 774, 778, 30 W. Va. 491.

Disfranchisement distinguished.

In a corporation there is a distinction between what is called "amotion," or the right to remove an officer, and disfranchisement. The former may be exercised without interfering with the franchise, as the officer, when removed, still continues a member; but disfranchisement is an absolute expulsion of the member from the body, and the taking away of his franchise, which cannot be done unless the power is given by the charter creating the corporation, or the member has been guilty of crime a conviction of which would work a forfeiture of all civil rights, including the corporate franchise, or has committed acts which tend to the destruction of the corporation. White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 329, 356, 357.

AMOUNT.

Other amounts due, see "Other."

"Amount" means the effect, substance, or result; the sum. Swartley v. McCracken, 7 Montg. Co. Law Rep. 49, 50 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Rate distinguished.

"Amount" means a sum or total, the aggregate, while "rate" means a fixed measure of estimation, so that Pol. Code Mont. § 1940, as amended by Act March 8, 1897, § 1940b, providing for the submission to the voters of the question whether school taxes should be levied, which requires a notice stating the "amount" to be raised, is inconsistent with section 1941, providing that, when the "rate" of taxation has been determined as provided in the preceding section, the trustees shall certify the same, etc., and hence the statute is inoperative. Hilburn v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 58 Pac. 551, 555, 23 Mont. 229.

As value.

"Amount," when used in reference to money, is synonymous with "value," and hence a verdict of the jury that defendant embezzled a certain "amount" of money complies with the statute requiring the jury to ascertain and declare the value of the property stolen, embezzled, or falsely obtained. Bartley v. State, 73 N. W. 744, 761, 53 Neb. 310.

In cases of notes current as money, the words "amount" and "value" are ordinarily synonymous terms. Commonwealth v. Warner, 54 N. E. 353, 355, 173 Mass. 541 (citing Commonwealth v. Hussey, 111 Mass. 432).

St. 1881, c. 288, § 3, providing that no renewal or continuation of a limited partnership shall be made unless the capital contributed by the special partners is "equal in amount" or more than the aggregate capital the special partners originally contributed, means equal in value as a resource or asset of the partnership. Durgin v. Colburn, 57 N. E. 213, 214, 176 Mass. 110.

As the whole.

A statutory provision that a trust company shall be taxed upon the amount of its capital stock issued and outstanding may mean either the par value of such shares or the entire amount of such shares of stock, signifying that the whole number of its shares shall be subject to taxation, and not that the assessment shall be made at the arbitrary value, less than the true value of such shares. As the former meaning is unconstitutional, the latter should be adopted. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 48 Atl. 580, 581, 66 N. J. Law, 86.

"Quantum," according to Webster, means quantity, amount; and "amount," the sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; the aggregate; the whole quantity; a totality. Where a telegraph company failed to deliver a message promptly, and the plaintiff proved his right to recover damages for the delay, the jury could consider mental anguish occasioned by such delay in fixing the quantum of damages. Connelly v. Western Union Tel. Co., 40 S. E. 618, 622, 100 Va. 51, 56 L. R. A. 663, 93 Am. St. Rep. 919.

AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

See, also, "Value in Controversy."

In Rev. St. arts. 1165, 1638, fixing the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace "when the amount in controversy" does not exceed a certain sum, the words "amount in controversy" mean and are synonymous with "matter in controversy," the word "amount" being used instead of the word "matter." Smith v. Giles, 65 Tex. 341, 343.

There can be no difference in the meaning of the words "amount in controversy" and "damages claimed" or "relief demanded," as used in the statute. Howard Iron Works v. Buffalo Elevating Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 452, 459, 81 App. Div. 386.

As amount claimed or sued for.

In the constitutional provision that no justice shall have jurisdiction in any civil action where the "amount in controversy" exceeds $100, the phrase "amount in controversy" means the same thing as the words "sum claimed" in Gen. St. c. 65, § 5, providing that a justice shall have jurisdiction in actions arising on contract for the recovery of money, only if the "sum claimed" does not exceed $100, and the latter expression is not broader and does not controvert the terms of the Constitution. Barber v. Kennedy, 18 Minn. 216, 226 (Gil. 196, 208).

The phrase, "the amount in controversy," in a statute making jurisdiction dependent upon the "amount in controversy," means the sum of money or value of the thing originally sued for. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Cunnigan, 67 S. W. 888, 890, 95 Tex. 439.

Where there has been no fraud practiced on the court in the allegation of the plaintiff's claim, in order to give the court jurisdiction, the amount in dispute or in controversy will be deemed to be that claimed by the plaintiff in his declaration. Boyt v. Mitchell (Ind. T.) 64 S. W. 610, 612.

Act 1789, c. 20, §§ 11, 20, providing that the Circuit Court shall have jurisdiction where the "amount in controversy" exceeds $500 in value, means the amount named in the declaration. Green v. Liter, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 229, 242, 3 L. Ed. 545.

"Amount in controversy," as used in a statute relating to jurisdiction on appeal, meant the entire amount as finally claimed by the plaintiff, and included an amount assigned by one of two plaintiffs pending the action. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663, 666.

Within Laws 1883, c. 205, § 10, giving the Court of Appeals from the board of claims jurisdiction where the "amount in controversy" is $500, the amount in controversy is the amount of the claim presented for the amount which the board of claims may legally award the claimant under the proofs, with interest, and hence an appeal from the board of claims will not be dismissed though a large part of the claims presented are barred by the statute of limitations, where it appears from their date that an award may be made exceeding $500. Folts v. State, 23 N. E. 567, 568, 118 N. Y. 406.

Const. art. 4, § 4, providing that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall not extend to civil actions at law for the recovery of money or personal property when the original amount in controversy does not exceed the sum of $200, "can mean nothing more or less than the amount originally in controversy, or, in other words, the amount sued for." Bleecker v. Satsop R. Co., 27 Pac. 1073, 1074, 3 Wash. St. 77.

As difference between claim and recovery.

"Amount in controversy," within the meaning of the statutes giving an appellate court jurisdiction of actions for a money judgment where the "amount in controversy," inclusive of costs, does not exceed $3,500, means the amount in controversy or actually in dispute in the court to which the appeal is taken, and not the amount in controversy in the trial court, where the amount in controversy in the two courts is different. It has been held by this court that where the plaintiff recovers in the trial court a judgment for a part only of his claim, and is dissatisfied therewith, and appeals to this court, the amount in controversy on such appeal is the amount of the difference between his judgment and his claim. Johnson v. Board of Com'rs of Randolph County, 39 N. E. 311, 140 Ind. 152.

Costs excluded.

"Amount in controversy," as used in a statute providing that justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction where the amount in controversy exceeds $200, means the principal sum sued for, exclusive of costs. Bradley v. Kent, 22 Cal. 169, 172.

Counterclaim or intervention included

Where complainant brought suit for an amount insufficient to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction of an appeal in the cause, but in the progress of the case another creditor intervened, alleging his claim against the common debtor, and praying that it might be allowed and payment enforced against the same property pursued by the complainant, who afterward took a bona fide assignment of such claim for value, the aggregate of the two claims constituted the amount in controversy, and the fact that the assignment was made pending suit was of no consequence. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663, 666.

In determining the "amount in controversy" necessary to give this court jurisdiction under section 6, art. 5, Const., and Rev. St. 1895, art. 966, where there is a cross-action in the nature of a counterclaim or plea in reconvention, either the amount of the original demand or that of the counterclaim must reach the jurisdictional sum. Crosby v. Crosby, 49 S. W. 359, 360, 92 Tex. 441.

Interest included.

Code Prac. § 16, providing that the appellate court should not have jurisdiction where the "amount in controversy" did not exceed a certain value, should be construed to include the interest due on the debt at the time the action was commenced. Orth v. Clutz's Adm'r, 57 Ky. (18 B. Mon.) 223, 225.

The "amount in controversy," as used in a statute taking away the right of appeal except when the amount in controversy exceeds $20, includes, not only the principal of a promissory note on which suit is brought, but also the interest thereon, and hence an appeal may be taken when the combined sum is over $20, though the principal is less than that amount. Smith v. Smith, 15 Vt. 620, 621.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 64, § 82, limiting the jurisdiction of the municipal court of the city of St. Paul to civil actions where the "amount in controversy" does not exceed $200, means the amount in controversy at the time of the rendition of the verdict, and hence an addition of interest accruing between such time and the rendition of the judgment does not divest the court of jurisdiction, though it makes the amount exceed $200. "The interest accruing subsequent to the finding was never in controversy. It is allowed much the same as costs and disbursements, as an incident to the main recovery, and is not to be taken in the act in determining the jurisdiction of the court." Conger v. Nesbitt, 15 N. W. 875, 30 Minn. 436.

The amount in controversy necessary to give jurisdiction on appeal, whether it be in an action at law, a suit in chancery, or in libel, must appear on the face of the pleading by which the claim is made, and no computation of interest can be called in to give jurisdiction. Udall v. The Ohio, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 17, 18, 15 L. Ed. 42.

AMOUNT IN DISPUTE.

The term "amount in dispute" in Rev. St. § 691, giving the Supreme Court in the United States appellate jurisdiction in certain cases when the amount or value in dispute equals a certain sum, was held by a divided court in 1798 to mean the amount in dispute as determined by the foundation of the original controversy, the amount in dispute when the action was instituted (Wilson v. Daniel, 3 U. S. [3 Dall.] 401, 1 L. Ed. 655); but Justices Chase and Iredell dissented, the latter laying down the doctrine that the amount involved should be determined in the case as it appears in the Supreme Court, and not by the sum in controversy in the court below. The doctrine of the dissenting opinion was adopted by the court in Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 33, 7 L. Ed. 592, in 1830, which has been followed by a continuous and unbroken line of Supreme Court decisions ever since. Decker v. Williams (U. S.) 73 Fed. 308, 310.

The expression "amount in dispute," as used in a statute giving the jurisdiction to the Supreme Court when the "amount in dispute" exceeds a certain sum, does not depend upon the amount claimed, but upon the real amount in dispute. As has been said, the amount in dispute which brings a case within the jurisdiction of the court is the real amount in controversy. Thus, where a petition alleged that plaintiff borrowed of defendant $2,500, and executed therefor his note secured by trust deed, and that defendant retained $600 to satisfy a prior incumbrance, which it failed to do, and prayed that the amount due be ascertained, and on payment thereof the trust deed satisfied, the amount in dispute was only $600, with interest. May v. Jarvis-Conklin Mortg. Trust Co., 40 S. W. 122, 138 Mo. 447.

"Amount in dispute," as used in Const. Mo. art. 6, § 12, defining the "amount in dispute" necessary to bring the cause within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, construed to mean the amount in dispute at the time the appeal is taken, as shown by the record. Reichenbach v. United Masonic Ben. Ass'n, 20 S. W. 317, 318, 112 Mo. 22; Addison Tinsley Tobacco Co. v. Rombauer, 20 S. W. 1076, 113 Mo. 435.

Under the Constitution of California, providing that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction on appeal of cases where the "amount in dispute" exceeds $200, where an appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor, then the amount in dispute is the difference between the amount of the judgment and the sum claimed by the plaintiff; and where the appeal is taken by the defendant from a judgment rendered against him, the judgment is the amount in dispute. Skillman v. Lachman, 23 Cal. 198, 203, 83 Am. Dec. 96.

The phrase "amount in dispute," as used in Const. art. 6, § 4, providing that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction where the matter in dispute exceeds $200, includes interest on the amount in controversy. Malson v. Vaughn, 23 Cal. 61, 63; Skillman v. Lachman, 23 Cal. 198, 203, 83 Am. Dec. 96.

Jurisdiction, where the matter in controversy was an execution for a less sum than $2,000, depends on the "amount in dispute" between the parties, and not the "amount" of any contingent loss or damage which one of them may sustain by a decision against him. Ross v. Prentiss, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 771, 772, 11 L. Ed. 824.

AMOUNT INVOLVED.

The term "amount involved," in 23 Stat. 24, which is part of the organic act of Alaska, and which provides that an appeal shall lie in any case, civil or criminal, from the judgment of the United States commissioners to the District Court, where the amount involved is $200 or more, is equivalent to the phrase "amount in dispute" in Rev. St. § 691, authorizing appeals to the United States Supreme Court when the amount or value in dispute reaches a certain sum. The amount so in dispute is to be determined as the case appears in appellate court, and not by the sum in controversy in the court below. Decker v. Williams (U. S.) 73 Fed. 308, 309.

The "amount involved" is not the full amount of two executions, where plaintiff enjoins a judgment against him as security on two injunction bonds for 20 per cent. on the two executions enjoined, but is the amount of such 20 per cent. Gayarre v. Hays, 21 La. Ann. 307.

Where plaintiff's claim was $127, of which the defendant conceded $56 and the contest was entirely related to the $71 difference, the amount of that difference was the amount involved in litigation. Henk v. Baumann, 75 N. W. 313, 314, 100 Wis. 28.

AMOUNT OF INSURANCE.

The phrase "the amount of insurance" as used in a life insurance policy, which by express provision was incontestable, and which provided that the amount of insurance should be paid immediately upon proof of death, has been held to mean the sum for which the life is insured; that is, the sum which under the contract is to be paid to the beneficiary as indemnity for the loss. "These words," said the court, "cannot, we think, be construed to mean the net value of the policy, the sum which by the terms of the original contract was to be paid under certain circumstances in lieu of the amount of insurance. This construction is consonant with the preceding provision that the policy should be incontestable. The quality of the incontestability could not with any propriety be predicated of this contract of insurance if it were still allowed to the insurer to dispute its liability to the insured for the amount of the insurance upon the ground that the death was caused by the use of intoxicating liquor, etc., or any condition or agreement contained in this policy." Simpson v. Life Ins. Co. of Virginia, 20 S. E. 517, 115 N. C. 393.

AMOUNT OF JUDGMENT.

Under the head "amount of judgment" in a judgment docketed should be stated every fact which enters into the value or amount of the judgment, and thereby affects the extent of the lien which it is the sole object of the entry to create and observe. Of these facts in case of a money judgment, the most material are the number and denomination or kinds of money for which the judgment is given, and the rate of interest and kind of money in which it is payable. The direct and ultimate purpose of the entry is not to give notice of the judgment, but to produce a certain legal effect, to wit, a lien on the real property of the judgment debtor within the county. In re Boyd (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1091, 1093.

AMOUNT SOLD FOR.

"Amount sold for," as used in publication of list of tax sales heading the column as "amount sold for," will not be held equivalent to amount of tax due, and hence does not comply with Comp. Laws, § 1620, requiring notice of sales to state the amount of taxes due. Mather v. Darst, 82 N. W. 407, 408, 13 S. D. 75.

AMPLE SUM.

A direction in a will by which testator's executor was required to invest in a bank an "ample sum" of money, the income of which should be sufficient to keep the testator's burial lot in repair forever, requires the investment of a sum of money reasonably capable of accomplishing the testator's purpose. Gafney v. Kenison, 10 Atl. 706, 707, 64 N. H. 354.

AMUSEMENT.

See "Place of Amusement."

Circus and theater.

"Amusements" include the theater and circus, though they may differ from each other as one species differs from another under the same genus. It may often be difficult to trace the dividing line between the theater and circus from the character of their exhibitions. Jacko v. State, 22 Ala. 73, 75.

Dancing.

"Amusement," as used in St. 1849, c. 231, § 2, prohibiting the setting up or maintaining any public show or amusement, etc., without license, construed not to include a school for instruction in dancing. "Such a case is not within the language of the statute, nor probably one of the evils sought to be remedied by it." Commonwealth v. Gee, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 175, 179.

"Amusement" is synonymous with diversion, entertainment, recreation, pastime, and sport, so that a public dance is a public amusement within the meaning of paragraph 2 of an ordinance providing that every person who shall conduct any concert, show, or other public "amusement" within the city of Seattle without obtaining a license therefor will be guilty of misdemeanor. Pearson v. City of Seattle, 44 Pac. 884, 885, 14 Wash. 438.

A dance hall to which the public is admitted on payment of a small fee is a "public amusement" within Pub. St. c. 102, § 116, providing that whoever carries on any public show, amusement, or exhibition without a license shall be fined. Commonwealth v. Quinn, 40 N. E. 1043, 164 Mass. 11.

Horse races.

Horse races are included in the terms "shows" and "amusements" as used in Rev. St. 1893, c. 24, art. 5, § 1, subd. 41, authorizing city councils to license and tax theatricals and other exhibitions, "shows, and amusements." Webber v. City of Chicago, 38 N. E. 70, 72, 148 Ill. 313.
